NAOMI SHIHAB NYE

The daughter of a Palestinian father and an American mother, Naomi Shihab Nye was born in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1952. Her poems and stories have been published in many journals and magazines in the United States and throughout the world. Nye’s books of poetry include Fuel (1998) and You and Yours (2005). She lives in San Antonio, Texas.

The Traveling Onion

It is believed that the onion originally came from India. In Egypt it was an object of worship—why I haven’t been able to find out. From Egypt the onion entered Greece and on to Italy, thence into all of Europe.

—Better Living Cookbook
When I think how far the onion has traveled just to enter my stew today, I could kneel and praise all small forgotten miracles,

crackly paper peeling on the drainboard,

pearly layers in smooth agreement,

the way knife enters onion and onion falls apart on the chopping block, a history revealed.

And I would never scold the onion for causing tears.

It is right that tears fall for something small and forgotten.

How at meal, we sit to eat,

15

commenting on texture of meat or herbal aroma
but never on the translucence of onion,

now limp, now divided,
or its traditionally honorable career:

For the sake of others, disappear.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Do you think that this poem benefits from the epigraph, or would the poem be more effective without it?

2. In your own words, please summarize what the speaker is saying in stanza 1. Next, summarize stanza 2.

3. Commenting on this poem, one critic has observed, "the speaker shows us how much the onion can teach us about life." Do you agree? Please cite details from the text to explain and support your response.

4. Could you write a poem like this one about some other vegetable or fruit, or is there something special about an onion?

A NOTE ON HAIKU

One form of poetry that puts a great emphasis on sharp images is the haiku, a Japanese poem of seventeen syllables, arranged in three lines of five, seven, and five syllables. Japanese poetry is unrhymed, but English versions sometimes rhyme the first and third lines. The subject matter can be high or low—the Milky Way or the screech of automobile brakes—but usually it is connected with the seasons, and it is described objectively and sharply. Most haiku set forth a sense of where, what, and when—but the when may be implicit, as in the first haiku.
MORITAKE (1452–1540)

Fallen petals rise

Translated by Harold G. Henderson

Fallen petals rise
back to the branch—I watch
oh . . . butterflies!

Concentrating his attention on the phenomenon (butterflies moving upward), the poet nevertheless conveys an emotion through the images (wonder, and then the recognition of the familiar), stirring the reader’s imagination to supply the emotion that completes the experience.

SÔKAN (1465–1553)

If only we could

Translated by Kenneth Yasuda

If only we could
Add a handle to the moon
It would make a good fan.

SHIKI (1867–1902)

River in summer

River in summer
there is a bridge, but my horse walks through the water.
Writing a Haiku

Although the haiku originated in Japan, it is now written throughout the world.

For a start, you may want to take some ordinary experience—tying your shoelaces, seeing a cat at the foot of the stairs, glancing out of a window and seeing unexpected snowflakes, hearing the alarm clock—and present it interestingly. One way to make it interesting is to construct the poem in two parts—the first line balanced against the next two lines, or the first two lines balanced against the last line. If you construct a poem on this principle, the two sections should be related to each other, but they should also in some degree make a contrast with each other. For instance, in the following poem by Taigi, there is a contrast between pleasant sociability (the first two lines) and loneliness (the last line).

Look, O look, there go

_Translated by Kenneth Yasuda_

"Look, O look, there go Fireflies," I would like to say—
But I am alone.

Basho said, "He who creates three to five haiku during a lifetime is a haiku poet. He who attains to ten is a master."

Cyber-Haiku

It has come to our attention that students have enjoyed composing haiku as substitutes for Microsoft’s error messages. Here are four examples:

First snow, then silence.
This thousand-dollar screen dies
So beautifully.
A crash reduces
Your expensive computer
To a simple stone.
A file that big?
It might be very useful
But now it is gone.

You step in the stream,
But the water has moved on.

Why not try your hand at something on this topic?
In Chapter 23 (page 865) we reprint additional haiku and we offer suggestions about translating them.
There is a kind of discourse which, though nonliteral, need not use similies, metaphors, apostrophes, personification, or symbols. Without using these figures, speakers may say things that are not to be taken literally. They may, in short, employ irony.

In Greek comedy, the eiron was the sly underdog who, by dissembling inferiority, outwitted his opponent. As Aristotle puts it, irony (employed by the eiron) is a "pretense tending toward the underside" of truth. Later, Cicero somewhat altered the meaning of the word: He defined it as saying one thing and meaning another, and he held that Socrates, who feigned ignorance and let his opponents entrap themselves in their own arguments, was the perfect example of an ironist.

In verbal irony, as the term is now used, what is stated is in some degree negated by what is suggested. A classic example is Lady Macbeth’s order to get ready for King Duncan’s visit: "He that’s coming / Must be provided for." The words seem to say that she and Macbeth must busy themselves with household preparations so that the king may be received in appropriate style, but this suggestion of hospitality is undercut by an opposite meaning: preparations must be made for the murder of the king. Two other examples of verbal irony are Melville’s comment and the lover’s assertion (in Marvell’s “To His Coy Mistress”) that

What like a bullet can undeceive!

The grave’s a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.

Under Marvell’s cautious words ("I think") we detect a wryness; the understatement masks yet reveals a deep-felt awareness of mortality and the barrenness of the grave. The self-mockery in this understatement proclaims modesty, but suggests assurance. The speaker here, like most ironists, is both playful and serious at once. Irony packs a great deal into a few words. What we call irony

*A word of caution: We have been talking about verbal irony, not irony of situation. Like ironic words, ironic situations have in them an element of contrast. A clown whose heart is breaking must make his audience laugh; an author’s worst book is her only financial success; a fool solves a problem that vexes the wise.

here, it should be mentioned, is often called sarcasm, but a distinction can be made: sarcasm is notably contemptuous and crude or heavy-handed (“You're a great guy, a real friend,” said to a friend who won’t lend you ten dollars). Sarcasm is only one kind of irony, and a kind almost never found in literature.

Overstatement (hyperbole), like understatement, is ironic when it contains a contradictory suggestion:

> For Brutus is an honorable man;
> So are they all, all honorable men.

—Shakespeare

The sense of contradiction that is inherent in verbal irony is also inherent in a paradox. Paradox has several meanings for philosophers, but we need only be concerned with its meaning of an apparent contradiction. In Gerard Manley Hopkins’s “Spring and Fall: To a Young Child” (page 660), there is an apparent contradiction in the assertions that Margaret is weeping for the woods (line 2) and for herself (line 15), but the contradiction is not real: both the woods and Margaret are parts of the nature blighted by Adam’s sin. Other paradoxes are

> The child is father of the man;

—Wordsworth

and (on the soldiers who died to preserve the British Empire)

> The saviors come not home tonight;
> Themselves they could not save;

—Housman

and

> One short sleep past, we wake eternally,
> And Death shall be no more; Death, thou shalt die.

—Donne

Donne’s lines are a reminder that paradox is not only an instrument of the poet. Christianity embodies several paradoxes: God became a human being; through the death on the cross, human beings can obtain eternal life; human beings do not live fully until they die.

Some critics have put a high premium on ironic and paradoxical poetry. Briefly, their argument runs that great poetry recognizes the complexity of experience, and that irony and paradox are ways of doing justice to this complexity. I.A. Richards uses “irony” to denote “The bringing in of the opposite, the complementary impulses,” and suggests (in The Principles of Literary Criticism) that irony in this sense is a characteristic of poetry of “the highest order.” It is dubious that all poets must always bring in the opposite, but it is certain that much poetry is ironic and paradoxical.

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792–1822) was born in Sussex in England, the son of a prosperous country squire. Educated at Eton, he went on to Oxford but was expelled for having written a pamphlet supporting a belief in atheism. Like John Keats he was a member of the second generation of English Romantic poets. (The first generation included Wordsworth and Coleridge.) And like Keats, Shelley died young: he was drowned during a violent storm off the coast of Italy while sailing with a friend.

Ozymandias

I met a traveler from an antique land
Who said: Two vast and trunkless legs of stone
Stand in the desert . . . Near them, on the sand,
Half sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown,
And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command,
Tell that its sculptor well those passions read
Which yet survive, stamped on these lifeless things,
The hand that mocked them, and the heart that fed:
And on the pedestal these words appear:
“My name is Ozymandias, king of kings:
Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!”
Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare
The lone and level sands stretch far away.

Lines 4–8 are somewhat obscure, but the gist is that the passions—still evident in the “shattered visage”—survive the sculptor’s hand that “mocked”—that is, (1) imitated or copied, (2) derided—them, and the passions also survive the king’s heart that had nourished them.

TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

There is an irony of plot here: Ozymandias believed that he created enduring works, but his intentions came to nothing. However, another irony is also present: How are his words, in a way he did not intend, true?

ANDREW MARVELL

Born in 1621 near Hull in England, Marvell attended Trinity College, Cambridge, and graduated in 1638. During the English Civil War he was tutor to the daughter of Sir Thomas Fairfax in Yorkshire at Nun Appleton House, where most of his best-known poems were written. In 1657 he was appointed assistant to John Milton, the Latin Secretary for the Commonwealth. After the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660, Marvell represented Hull as a member of Parliament until his death. Most of his poems were not published until after his death in 1678.
To His Coy Mistress

Had we but world enough, and time,
This coyness, lady, were no crime.
We would sit down, and think which way
To walk, and pass our long love's day.
Thou by the Indian Ganges' side
Should'st rubies find: I by the tide
Of Humber would complain.\(^5\) I would Love you ten years before the Flood,
And you should, if you please, refuse
Till the conversion of the Jews.\(^10\)
My vegetable\(^7\) love should grow
Vaster than empires, and more slow.
An hundred years should go to praise
Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze:
Two hundred to adore each breast:
But thirty thousand to the rest.
An age at least to every part,
And the last age should show your heart.
For, lady, you deserve this state,
Nor would I love at lower rate.\(^20\)

But at my back I always hear Time's wing'ed chariot hurrying near;
And yonder all before us lie
Deserts of vast eternity.
Thy beauty shall no more be found,
Nor in thy marble vault shall sound
My echoing song; then worms shall try
That long preserved virginity,
And your quaint honor turn to dust,
And into ashes all my lust.\(^30\)
The grave's a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.
Now therefore, while the youthful hue
Sits on thy skin like morning dew,
And while thy willing soul transpires
At every pore with instant fires,
Now let us sport us while we may;
And now, like am'rous birds of prey,
Rather at once our time devour,
Than languish in his slow-chapt\(^40\) power,
Let us roll all our strength, and all
Our sweetness, up into one ball;
And tear our pleasures with rough strife
Thorough\(^44\) the iron gates of life.
Thus, though we cannot make our sun
Stand still, yet we will make him run.

7 complain write love poems. 11 vegetable i.e., unconsciously growing. 40 slow-chapt slowly devouring. 44 Thorough through.
TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Do you find the assertions in lines 1–20 so inflated that you detect behind them a playfully ironic tone? Explain. Why does the speaker say, in line 8, that he would love "ten years before the Flood," rather than merely "since the Flood"?

2. Explain lines 21–24. Why is time behind the speaker, and eternity in front of him? Is this "eternity" the same as the period discussed in lines 1–20? What do you make of the change in the speaker's tone after line 20?

3. Do you agree with the comment on page 705 about the understatement in lines 31–32? What more can you say about these lines, in context?

4. Why "am'rous birds of prey" (line 38) rather than the conventional doves? Is the idea of preying continued in the poem?

5. Try to explain the last two lines, and characterize the speaker's tone. Do you find these lines anticlimactic?

6. The poem is organized in the form of an argument. Trace the steps.

JOHN DONNE

John Donne (1572–1631) was born into a Roman Catholic family in England, but in the 1590s he abandoned that faith. In 1615 he became an Anglican priest and soon was known as a great preacher. Of his sermons 160 survive, including one with the famous line, "No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main; if a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less . . . ; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee." From 1621 until his death, Donne was dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in London. His love poems (often bawdy and cynical) are said to be his early work, and his "Holy Sonnets" (among the greatest religious poems written in English) his later work.

Holy Sonnet XIV [1633]

Batter my heart, three-personed God; for you As yet but knock, breathe, shine, and seek to mend; That I may rise and stand, o'erthrow me, and bend Your force, to break, blow, burn, and make me new. I, like an usurped town, to another due, Labor to admit you, but oh, to no end, Reason, your viceroy in me, me should defend, But is captivated, and proves weak or untrue. Yet dearly I love you, and would be loved fain, But am betrothed unto your enemy: Divorce me, untie, or break that knot again, Take me to you, imprison me, for I Except you enthrall me, never shall be free, Nor ever chaste, except you ravish me.
TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Explain the paradoxes in lines 1, 3, 13, and 14. Explain the double meanings of “enthral” (line 13) and “ravish” (line 14).
2. In lines 1–4, what is God implicitly compared to (considering especially lines 2 and 4)? How does this comparison lead into the comparison that dominates lines 5–8? What words in lines 9–12 are especially related to the earlier lines?
3. What do you think is gained by piling up verbs in lines 2–4?
4. Do you find sexual references irreverent in a religious poem? (As already mentioned, Donne was an Anglican priest.)

LANGSTON HUGHES

_Dream Boogie_ [1951]

Good morning, daddy!
Ain’t you heard
The boogie-woogie rumble
Of a dream deferred?

Listen closely:
You’ll hear their feet
Beating out and beating out a—

_You think_
_It’s a happy beat?_

Listen to it closely:
Ain’t you heard something underneath like a—

_What did I say?_

Sure,
I’m happy!
Take it away!

_Hey, pop!
Re-bop!
Mop!_

_Y-e-a-h!_
TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. What is boogie, or boogie-woogie?
2. Why did many whites assume that boogie was “a happy beat” (line 9)? In fact, what was boogie chiefly an expression of?

MARTÍN ESPADA

Martín Espada was born in Brooklyn in 1957. He received a bachelor’s degree from the University of Wisconsin and a law degree from Northeastern University. He is now an associate professor of English at the University of Massachusetts (Amherst).

Tony Went to the Bodega* but He Didn’t Buy Anything [1987]

para Angel Guadalupe

Tony’s father left the family and the Long Island city projects, leaving a mongrel-skinny puertorriqueño boy nine years old who had to find work.

Makengo the Cuban let him work at the bodega.

In grocery aisles he learned the steps of the dry-mop mambo, banging the cash register like piano percussion in the spotlight of Machito’s orchestra, polite with the abuelas° who bought on credit, practicing the grin on customers he’d seen Makengo grin with his bad yellow teeth.

Tony left the projects too, with a scholarship for law school. But he cursed the cold primavera° in Boston; the cooking of his neighbors

and no one spoke Spanish (not even the radio).

So Tony walked without a map through the city,
a landscape of hostile condominiums and the darkness of white faces, sidewalk-searcher lost
till he discovered the projects.

Tony went to the bodega
but he didn't buy anything:
he sat by the doorway satisfied to watch la gente° (people island-brown as him) thought: this is beautiful, and grinned

his bodega grin.

This is a rice and beans

today Tony lives on Tremont Street,

34 la gente the people. 37 hablando español speaking Spanish.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Why do you suppose Espada included the information about Tony's father? The information about young Tony "practicing" a grin?
2. Why does Tony leave?
3. How would you characterize Tony?

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY

For another poem by the American poet Edna St. Vincent Millay (1892–1950) as well as a brief biography, see page 627.
Love is not all: it is not meat nor drink
Nor slumber nor a roof against the rain;
Nor yet a floating spar to men that sink
And rise and sink and rise and sink again;
Love can not fill the thickened lung with breath, 5
Nor clean the blood, nor set the fractured bone;
Yet many a man is making friends with death
Even as I speak, for lack of love alone.
It well may be that in a difficult hour,
Pinned down by pain and moaning for release, 10
Or nagged by want past resolution’s power,
I might be driven to sell your love for peace,
Or trade the memory of this night for food.
It well may be. I do not think I would.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. “Love Is Not All” is a sonnet. Using your own words, briefly summarize the argument of the octet (the first 8 lines). Next, paraphrase the sestet (the six lines from line 9 through line 14), line by line. On the whole, does the sestet repeat the idea of the octet, or does it add a new idea? Whom did you imagine to be speaking the octet? What does the sestet add to your knowledge of the speaker and the occasion? (And how did you paraphrase line 11?)

2. The first and last lines of the poem consist of words of one syllable, and both lines have a distinct pause in the middle. Do you imagine the lines to be spoken in the same tone of voice? If not, can you describe the difference and account for it?

3. Lines 7 and 8 appear to mean that the absence of love can be a cause of death. To what degree do you believe that to be true?

4. Would you call “Love Is Not All” a love poem? Why or why not? Describe the kind of person who might include the poem in a love letter or valentine, or who would be happy to receive it. (One of our friends recited it at her wedding. What do you think of that idea?)

SHERMAN ALEXIE

The short-story writer, essayist, poet, and film director Sherman J. Alexie, Jr., was born in October 1966 and was raised on the Spokane Indian Reservation in Wellpinit, Washington, located fifty miles northwest of Spokane. He went to high school off reservation in Reardan, Washington, where he was an excellent student and played on the basketball team. He attended Gonzaga University in Spokane for two years and then transferred to Washington State University in Pullman. There, he began writing poetry, graduating with a degree in...

Buffalo Bill opens a pawn shop on the reservation right across the border from the liquor store and he stays open 24 hours a day, 7 days a week and the Indians come running in with jewelry television sets, a VCR, a full-length beaded buckskin outfit it took Inez Muse 12 years to finish. Buffalo Bill takes everything the Indians have to offer, keeps it all catalogued and filed in a storage room. The Indians pawn their hands, saving the thumbs for last, they pawn their skeletons, falling endlessly from the skin and when the last Indian has pawned everything but his heart, Buffalo Bill takes that for twenty bucks closes up the pawn shop, paints a new sign over the old calls his venture THE MUSEUM OF NATIVE AMERICAN CULTURES charges the Indians five bucks a head to enter.

HENRY REED

Born in Birmingham, England, Henry Reed (1914–1986) served in the British army during the Second World War. Later, in civilian life he had a distinguished career as a journalist, a translator of French and Italian literature, a writer of radio plays, and a poet.

"Naming of Parts" draws on his experience as a military recruit.

Naming of Parts

Today we have naming of parts. Yesterday, We had daily cleaning. And tomorrow morning, We shall have what to do after firing. But today, Today we have naming of parts. Japonica Glistens like coral in all of the neighboring gardens, And today we have naming of parts.

This is the lower sling swivel. And this Is the upper sling swivel, whose use you will see,
When you are given your slings. And this is the piling swivel,
Which in your case you have not got. The branches
Hold in the gardens their silent, eloquent gestures,
   Which in our case we have not got.

This is the safety-catch, which is always released
With an easy flick of the thumb. And please do not let me
See anyone using his finger. You can do it quite easy
If you have any strength in your thumb. The blossoms
Are fragile and motionless, never letting anyone see
   Any of them using their finger.

And this you can see is the bolt. The purpose of this Is to open the breech, as you see. We can slide it Rapidly backwards and forwards: we call this Easing the spring. And rapidly backwards and forwards
The early bees are assaulting and fumbling the flowers:
   They call it easing the Spring.

They call it easing the Spring: it is perfectly easy
If you have any strength in your thumb: like the bolt,
And the breech, and the cocking-piece, and the point of balance,
Which in our case we have not got; and the almond-blossom
Silent in all of the gardens and the bees going backwards and forwards,
   For today we have naming of parts.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. How many speakers do you hear in the poem? How would you characterize each of them?

2. Why do we include this poem in a chapter on “irony”?

SARAH N. CLEGHORN

Sarah N. Cleghorn (1876–1959) was born in Manchester, Vermont. A Quaker, she was active in pacifist, anti-vivisectionist, and women’s suffrage movements. Among her many books are The True Ballad of Glorious Harriet Tubman (1933) and an autobiography, Threescore (1936).

The Golf Links

The golf links lie so near the mill
   That almost every day
The laboring children can look out
   And see the men at play.
Chapter 17 / Irony

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Check the meanings of “ironic,” “satiric,” and “sarcastic” in a dictionary, and decide which, if any, of these words applies well to Cleghorn’s poem.

2. The poem was published in 1917, when child labor was common. (Children as young as ten worked as much as fifteen hours a day in mills. In 1916—a year before the poem was published—Congress had passed the Child Labor Act, but in 1918 the Supreme Court struck down the act, arguing that Congress did not have the right to control labor within a state.) Today, however, child labor in the United States is virtually nonexistent. Is there any point, then, in reading this poem? Set forth your response in a brief argument, perhaps of two paragraphs.
Up and down the City Road,
In and out the Eagle;
That's the way the money goes,
Pop goes the weasel.

Probably very few of the countless children—and adults—who sometimes find themselves singing this ditty have the faintest idea of what it is about. It endures because it is catchy—a strong, easily remembered rhythm. Even if you just read it aloud without singing it, we think you will agree.

If you try to specify exactly what the rhythm is—for instance, by putting an accent mark on each syllable that you stress heavily—you may run into difficulties. You may become unsure of whether you stress up and down equally; maybe you will decide that up is hardly stressed more than and, at least compared with the heavy stress that you put on down. Different readers (really, singers) will recite it differently. Does this mean that anything goes? Of course not. No one will emphasize and or the, just as no one will emphasize the second syllable in city or the second syllable in money. There may be some variations from reader to reader, but there will also be a good deal that all readers will agree on. And surely all readers agree that it is memorable.

Does this song have a meaning? Well, historians say that the Eagle was a tavern and music hall in the City Road, in Victorian London. People went there to eat, drink, and sing, with the result that they sometimes spent too much money and then had to pawn (or “pop”) the “weasel”—though no one is sure what the weasel is. It doesn’t really matter; the song lives by its rhythm.

Now consider this poem by Ezra Pound (1885–1972). Pound’s early work is highly rhythmical; later he became sympathetic to Fascism and he grew increasingly anti-Semitic, with the result that for many readers his later work is much less interesting—just a lot of nasty ideas, rather than memorable expressions. Pound ought to have remembered his own definition of literature: “Literature is news that stays news.” One way of staying is to use unforgettable rhythms.
Ezra Pound

An Immorality

[1912]

Sing we for love and idleness,
Naught else is worth the having.

Though I have been in many a land,
There is naught else in living.

And I would rather have my sweet,
Though rose-leaves die of grieving,

Than do high deeds in Hungary
To pass all men’s believing.

A good poem. To begin with, it sings; as Pound said, “Poetry withers and dries out when it leaves music, or at least imagined music, too far behind it. Poets who are not interested in music are, or become, bad poets.” Hymns and ballads, it must be remembered, are songs, and other poetry, too, is sung, especially by children. Children reciting a counting-out rhyme, or singing on their way home from school, are enjoying poetry:

Pease-porridge hot,
Pease-porridge cold,
Pease-porridge in the pot
Nine days old.

Nothing very important is being said, but for generations children have enjoyed the music of these lines, and adults, too, have recalled them with pleasure—though few people know what pease-porridge is.

The “music”—the catchiness of certain sounds—should not be underestimated. Here are lines chanted by the witches in Macbeth:

Double, double, toil and trouble;
Fire burn and cauldron bubble.

This is rather far from words that mean approximately the same thing: “Twice, twice, work and care; / Fire ignite, and pot boil.” The difference is more in the sounds than in the instructions. What is lost in the paraphrase is the magic, the incantation, which resides in elaborate repetitions of sounds and stresses.

Rhythm (most simply, in English poetry, stresses at regular intervals) has a power of its own. A good march, said John Philip Sousa (the composer of “Stars and Stripes Forever”), “should make even someone with a wooden leg step out.” A highly pronounced rhythm is common in such forms of poetry as charms, college yells, and lullabies; all of them (like the witches’ speech) are aimed at inducing a special effect magically. It is not surprising that carmen, the Latin word for “poem” or “song,” is also the Latin word for cælæm, and the word from which “charm” is derived.

Rain, rain, go away;
Come again another day.

Block that kick! Block that kick! Block that kick!

Rock-a-bye baby, on the tree top,
When the wind blows, the cradle will rock.
In much poetry, rhythm is only half-heard, but its omnipresence is suggested by the fact that when poetry is printed it is customary to begin each line with a capital letter. Prose (from Latin prorsus, “forward,” “straight on”) keeps running across the paper until the right-hand margin is reached, and then, merely because the paper has given out, the writer or printer starts again at the left, with a small letter. But verse (Latin versus, “a turning”) often ends well short of the right-hand margin, and the next line begins at the left—usually with a capital—not because paper has run out but because the rhythmic pattern begins again. Lines of poetry are continually reminding us that they have a pattern.

Before turning to some other highly rhythmical pieces, a word of caution: a mechanical, unvarying rhythm may be good to put the baby to sleep, but it can be deadly to readers who wish to keep awake. Poets vary their rhythm according to their purpose; a poet ought not to be so regular that he or she is (in W. H. Auden’s words) an “accentual pest.” In competent hands, rhythm contributes to meaning; it says something. The rhythm in the lines from Macbeth, for example, helps suggest the strong binding power of magic. Again Ezra Pound has a relevant comment: “Rhythm must have meaning. It can’t be merely a careless dash off, with no grip and no real hold to the words and sense, a tumty tum tumty tum tum ta.” Some examples will be useful.

Consider this description of Hell from John Milton’s Paradise Lost (the heavier stresses are marked by ́):

Rócks, ca´ves, lak´es, fen´s, bog´s, den´s, an˘d shádes of˘ deáth.

Such a succession of stresses is highly unusual. Elsewhere in the poem Milton chiefly uses iambic feet—alternating unstressed and stressed syllables—but here he immediately follows one heavy stress with another, thereby helping to communicate the “meaning”—the impressive monotony of Hell. As a second example, consider the function of the rhythm in two lines by Alexander Pope:

Whên Ájax str´ives som˘e roc´k’s vas´t weight tó th´row,
The líne too lábo˘rs, an˘d th˘e word´s móve slów.

The heavier stresses (again, marked by ́) do not merely alternate with the lighter ones (marked ˘); rather, the great weight of the rock is suggested by three consecutive stressed words, “rock’s vast weight,” and the great effort involved in moving it is suggested by another three consecutive stresses, “line too labors,” and by yet another three, “words move slow.” Note, also, the abundant pauses within the lines. In the first line, unless one’s speech is slovenly, one must pause at least slightly after “Ajax,” “strives,” “rock’s,” “vast,” “weight,” and “throw.” The grating sounds in “Ajax” and “rock’s” do their work, too, and by the explosive t’s. When Pope wishes to suggest lightness, he reverses his procedure and he groups unstressed syllables:

Not so, when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Flíes o’er th’ unbënding córn, an˘d skim´s álóng th˘e máin.

This last line has twelve syllables and is thus longer than the line about Ajax, but the addition of “along” helps to communicate lightness and swiftness because in this line (it can be argued) neither syllable of “along” is strongly stressed. If “along” is omitted, the line still makes grammatical sense and becomes more “regular,” but it also becomes less imitative of lightness.
The very regularity of a line may be meaningful too. Shakespeare begins a sonnet thus:

Whēn Í do˘ count th˘e clo˘ck th˘at tēlls th˘e ti˘me.

This line about a mechanism runs with appropriate regularity. (It is worth noting, too, that “count the clock” and “tells the time” emphasize the regularity by the repetition of sounds and syntax.) But notice what Shakespeare does in the middle of the next line:

An˘d sée th˘e bráve dáy sun´k in˘ hídeo˘us nig´ht.

What has he done? And what is the effect?

Here is another poem that refers to a clock. In England, until capital punishment was abolished, executions regularly took place at 8:00 A.M.

A. E. HOUSMAN

A. E. Housman (1859–1936) was one of the most distinguished classical scholars of his time. Though he left Oxford without a degree (having failed his examinations), through hard work, discipline, and rigorous study he earned an appointment in 1892 as professor of Latin at University College, London, and in 1911 as professor of Latin at Cambridge and fellow of Trinity College. Only two volumes of Housman’s poems appeared during his lifetime: A Shropshire Lad (1896) and Last Poems (1922).

Eight O’Clock

He stood, and heard the steeple
Sprinkle the quarters on the morning town.
One, two, three, four, to market-place and people
It tossed them down.

Strapped, noosed, nighing his hour,
He stood and counted them and cursed his luck;
And then the clock collected in the tower
Its strength, and struck.

The chief (but not unvarying) pattern is iambic; that is, the odd syllables are less emphatic than the even ones, as in

Hê stóød, aⁿd heárd thê stéeplê

Try to mark the syllables, stressed and unstressed, in the rest of the poem. Be guided by your ear, not by a mechanical principle, and don’t worry too much about difficult or uncertain parts; different readers may reasonably come up with different results.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Where do you find two or more consecutive stresses? What explanations (related to meaning) can be offered?
2. What do you think is the effect of the short line at the end of each stanza? And what significance can you attach to the fact that these lines (unlike the first and third lines in each stanza) end with a stress?

Following are some poems in which the strongly felt pulsations are highly important.

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

The Dance [1944]

In Breughel's great picture, The Kermess,°
the dancers go round, they go round and around, the squeal and the blare and the tweedle of bagpipes, a bugle and fiddles tipping their bellies (round as the thick-sided glasses whose wash they impound) their hips and their bellies off balance to turn them. Kicking and rolling about the Fair Grounds, swinging their butts, those shanks must be sound to bear up under such rollicking measures, prance as they dance in Breughel's great picture, The Kermess.

1 Kermess Carnival.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Read Williams’s poem aloud several times, and decide where the heavy stresses fall. Mark the heavily stressed syllables ´, the lightly stressed ones ^, and the unstressed ones ˘. Are all the lines identical? What effect is thus gained, especially when the poem is read aloud? What does the parenthetical statement (lines 5–6) do to the rhythm? Does a final syllable often receive a heavy stress here? Are there noticeable pauses at the ends of the lines? What is the consequence? Are the dancers waltzing?

2. What syllables rhyme or are repeated (e.g., “round” in lines 2 and 5, and “–pound” in line 6; “–ing” in lines 5, 8, 9, and 11)? What effect do they have?

3. What do you think the absence at the beginning of each line of the customary capital contributes to the meaning? Why is the last line the same as the first?
Robert Francis (1901–1987) was born in Upland, Pennsylvania, and educated at Harvard. He taught only briefly, a term here or there and an occasional summer, devoting himself for the most part to reading and writing.

Pitcher

His art is eccentricity, his aim
How not to hit the mark he seems to aim at,
His passion how to avoid the obvious,
His technique how to vary the avoidance.

The others throw to be comprehended. He Throws to be a moment misunderstood.

Yet not too much. Not errant, arrant, wild,
But every seeming aberration willed.

Not to, yet still, still to communicate
Making the batter understand too late.

If you read this poem aloud, pausing appropriately where the punctuation tells you to, you will hear the poet trying to represent something of the pitcher's “eccentricity.” (“Eccentric,” you may know, literally means “off center.”) A pitcher tries to deceive a batter, perhaps by throwing a ball that will unexpectedly curve over the plate; the poet playfully deceives the reader, for instance, with unexpected pauses. In line 5, for example, he puts a heavy pause (indicated by a period) not at the end of the line, but just before the end.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Notice that some lines contain no pauses, but the next-to-last line contains two within it (indicated by commas) and none at the end. What do you suppose Francis is getting at?
2. What significance can be attached to the fact that only the last two lines really rhyme (communicate/late), whereas other lines do not quite rhyme?

VERSIFICATION: A GLOSSARY
FOR REFERENCE

The technical vocabulary of prosody (the study of the principles of verse structure, including meter, rhyme, and other sound effects, and stanzaic patterns) is large. An understanding of these terms will not turn anyone into a poet, but it will enable one to discuss some aspects of poetry more efficiently. A knowledge of them, like a knowledge of most other technical terms (e.g., “misplaced modi-fyer,” “woofer,” “automatic transmission”), allows for quick and accurate communication. The following are the chief terms of prosody.

Meter

Most English poetry has a pattern of stressed (accented) sounds, and this pattern is the meter (from the Greek word for “measure”). Although in Old English poetry (poetry written in England before the Norman-French Conquest in 1066) a line may have any number of unstressed syllables in addition to four stressed syllables, most poetry written in England since the Conquest not only has a fixed number of stresses in a line but also has a fixed number of unstressed syllables before or after each stressed one. (One really ought not to talk of “unstressed” or “unaccented” syllables, since to utter a syllable—however lightly—is to give it some stress. It is really a matter of relative stress, but the fact is that “unstressed” and “unaccented” are parts of the established terminology of versification.)

In a line of poetry, the foot is the basic unit of measurement. On rare occasions it is a single stressed syllable, but generally a foot consists of two or three syllables, one of which is stressed. (Stress is indicated by ′, lack of stress by ″.)
The repetition of feet, then, produces a pattern of stresses throughout the poem.

Two cautions:

1. A poem will seldom contain only one kind of foot throughout; significant variations usually occur, but one kind of foot is dominant.
2. In reading a poem one pays attention to the sense as well as to the metrical pattern. By paying attention to the sense, one often finds that the stress falls on a word that according to the metrical pattern would be unstressed. Or a word that according to the pattern would be stressed may be seen to be unstressed. Furthermore, by reading for sense, one finds that not all stresses are equally heavy; some are almost as light as unstressed syllables, and sometimes there is a hovering stress; that is, the stress is equally distributed over two adjacent syllables. To repeat: read for sense, allowing the meaning to help indicate the stresses.

Metrical Feet
The most common feet in English poetry are the following six.

- Iamb (adjective: iambic): one unstressed syllable followed by one stressed syllable. The iamb, said to be the most common pattern in English speech, is surely the most common in English poetry. The following example has four iambic feet:

  My˘ hért i˘ s liké a sin˘ giñg birď.

  —Christina Rossetti

- Trochee (trochaic): one stressed syllable followed by one unstressed.

  Wé we rè vé ré tí réď, wé wè rè vé ré mé ré ĭy

  —Edna St. Vincent Millay

- Anapest (anapestic): two unstressed syllables followed by one stressed.

  Thère ar˘ e má ný who sá y thät ā dóg hás hîs dâý.

  —Dylan Thomas

- Dactyl (dactylic): one stressed syllable followed by two unstressed. This trisyllabic foot, like the anapest, is common in light verse or verse suggesting joy, but its use is not limited to such material, as Longfellow’s Evangeline shows. Thomas Hood’s sentimental “The Bridge of Sighs” begins:

  Také hër up tén ďe rlîy.

- Spondee (spondaic): two stressed syllables; most often used as a substitute for an iamb or trochee.

  Smá rt lá d, tî slî p bê tí mes âw ay.

  —A. E. Housman

- Pyrrhic: two unstressed syllables; it is often not considered a legitimate foot in English.

Metrical Lines
A metrical line consists of one or more feet and is named for the number of feet in it. The following names are used:

- Monometer: one foot
- Dimeter: two feet
- Trimeter: three feet
- Tetrameter: four feet
- Pentameter: five feet
- Hexameter: six feet
- Heptameter: seven feet
- Octameter: eight feet
A line is scanned for the kind and number of feet in it, and the scansion tells you if it is, say, anapestic trimeter (three anapests):

Ās Ī cáme tō thē ēdge ēf thē wōds.

—Robert Frost

Or, in another example, iambic pentameter:

Thē sūmmēr thūndēr, lik´ē ā wōdēn bél

—Louise Bogan

A line ending with a stress has a masculine ending; a line ending with an extra unstressed syllable has a feminine ending. The caesura (usually indicated by the symbol //) is a slight pause within the line. It need not be indicated by punctuation (notice the fourth and fifth lines in the following quotation), and it does not affect the metrical count:

Awake, my St. John! // leave all meaner things
To low ambition, // and the pride of kings.
Let us // (since life can little more supply
Than just to look about us // and to die)
Expatriate free // o´er all this scene of Man;
A mighty maze! // but not without a plan;
A wild, // where weeds and flowers promiscuous shoot;
Or garden, // tempting with forbidden fruit.

—Alexander Pope

The varying position of the caesura helps to give Pope’s lines an informality that plays against the formality of the pairs of rhyming lines.

An end-stopped line concludes with a distinct syntactical pause, but a run-on line has its sense carried over into the next line without syntactical pause. (The running on of a line is called enjambment.) In the following passage, only the first is a run-on line:

Yet if we look more closely we shall find
Most have the seeds of judgment in their mind:
Nature affords at least a glimmering light;
The lines, though touched but faintly, are drawn right.

—Alexander Pope

Meter produces rhythm, recurrences at equal intervals; but rhythm (from a Greek word meaning “flow”) is usually applied to larger units than feet. Often it depends most obviously on pauses. Thus, a poem with run-on lines will have a different rhythm from a poem with end-stopped lines, even though both are in the same meter. And prose, though it is unmetrical, can have rhythm, too.

In addition to being affected by syntactical pauses, rhythm is affected by pauses attributable to consonant clusters and to the length of words. Words of several syllables establish a different rhythm from words of one syllable, even in metrically identical lines. One can say, then, that rhythm is altered by shifts in meter, syntax, and the length and ease of pronunciation. But even with no such shift, even if a line is repeated word for word, a reader may sense a change in rhythm. The rhythm of the final line of a poem, for example, may well differ from that of the line before, even though in all other respects the lines are identical, as in Frost’s “Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening” (page 839), which concludes by repeating "And miles to go before I sleep." One may simply sense that the final line ought to be spoken, say, more slowly and with more stress on "miles."

Patterns of Sound

Though rhythm is basic to poetry, rhyme—the repetition of the identical or similar stressed sound or sounds—is not. Rhyme is, presumably, pleasant in itself; it suggests order; and it may also be related to meaning, for it brings two words sharply together, often implying a relationship, as in the now trite dove and love, or in the more imaginative throne and alone.

Perfect, or exact, rhyme: Differing consonant sounds are followed by identical stressed vowel sounds, and the following sounds, if any, are identical (foe—toe; meet—fleet; buffer—rougner). Notice that perfect rhyme involves identity of sound, not of spelling. Fix and sticks, like buffer and rougner, are perfect rhymes.

Half-rhyme (or off-rhyme): Only the final consonant sounds of the words are identical; the stressed vowel sounds as well as the initial consonant sounds, if any, differ (soul—oil; mirth—forth; trolley—bully).

Eye-rhyme: The sounds do not in fact rhyme, but the words look as though they would rhyme (cough—bough).

Masculine rhyme (or double rhyme): Stressed rhyming syllables are followed by identical unstressed syllables (revival—arrival; flatter—batter).

Triple rhyme is a kind of feminine rhyme in which identical stressed vowel sounds are followed by two identical unstressed syllables (machinery—scenery; tenderly—slenderly).

End rhyme (or terminal rhyme): The rhyming words occur at the ends of the lines.

Internal rhyme: At least one of the rhyming words occurs within the line (Oscar Wilde’s “Each narrow cell in which we dwell”).

Alliteration: Sometimes defined as the repetition of initial sounds (“All the awful auguries,” or “Bring me my bow of burning gold”), and sometimes as the prominent repetition of a consonant (“after life’s fitful fever”).

Assonance: The repetition, in words of proximity, of identical vowel sounds preceded and followed by differing consonant sounds. Whereas tide and bide are rhymes, tide and mine are assonantal.

Consonance: The repetition of identical consonant sounds and differing vowel sounds in words in proximity (fail—feel; rough—roof; pitter—patter). Sometimes consonance is more loosely defined merely as the repetition of a consonant (fail—peel).

Onomatopoeia: The use of words that imitate sounds, such as hiss and buzz. There is a mistaken tendency to see onomatopoeia everywhere—for example in thunder and sorrow. Many words sometimes thought to be onomatopoeic are not clearly imitative of the thing they refer to; they merely contain some sounds that, when we know what the word means, seem to have some resemblance to the thing they denote. Tennyson's lines from "Come down, O maid" are usually cited as an example of onomatopoeia:

The moan of doves in immemorial elms
And murmuring of innumerable bees.

If you have read the preceding—and, admittedly, not entirely engaging—paragraphs, you may have found yourself mentally repeating some catchy sounds, let's say our example of internal rhyme ("Each narrow cell in which we dwell") or our example of alliteration ("Bring me my bow of burning gold"). As the creators of advertising slogans know, all of us—not just poets—can be hooked by the sounds of words, but probably poets are especially fond of savoring words. Consider the following poem.

GALWAY KINNELL

Born in 1927 in Providence, Rhode Island, Galway Kinnell was educated at Princeton and the University of Rochester. He is the author of several books of poems, and he has won many awards, including the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry and the American Book Award.

Blackberry Eating

I love to go out in late September among the fat, overripe, icy, black blackberries to eat blackberries for breakfast, the stalks very prickly, a penalty they earn for knowing the black art of blackberry-making: and as I stand among them lifting the stalks to my mouth, the ripest berries fall almost unbidden to my tongue, as words sometimes do, certain peculiar words like strengths or squinched, many-lettered, one-syllabled lumps, which I squeeze, squinch open, and splurge well in the silent, startled, icy, black language of blackberry-eating in late September.

Kinnell does not use rhyme, but he uses other kinds of aural repetition. For instance, in the first line we get "love" and "late," and the l sound (already present in the title of the poem) is picked up in the second line, in "black blackberries." The k sound is then continued in the next line, in "stalks" and the l and k in "prickly," and "prickly" contains not only the k and the l of "blackberry" but also the r.

In lines 7–9 Kinnell compares eating blackberries—an action involving the tongue and the lips, and the mind also, if one is savoring the berries—to speaking "certain peculiar words." There is no need for us to point out additional connections between words in the poem, but we do want to mention that the last line ends with the same three words as the first, providing closure, which is one of the things rhyme normally does.
TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Specify three words that you like to "squinch," and explain why.
2. Specify one poem, other than a poem in this chapter (the poem need not be in this book), in which you think the repetitions of sounds are especially important, and explain why you hold this view.

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

William Carlos Williams (1883–1963) was the son of an English traveling salesman and a Basque-Jewish woman. The couple met in Puerto Rico and settled in Rutherford, New Jersey, where Williams was born. He spent his life there, practicing as a pediatrician and writing poems in the moments between seeing patients who were visiting his office.

The Artist

[1954]

Mr. T.

bareheaded

in a soiled undershirt

his hair standing out on all sides

stood on his toes

heels together

arms gracefully

for the moment

curled above his head.

Then he whirled about bounded into the air

and with an entrechat\(^e\) perfectly achieved

completed the figure.

My mother

taken by surprise

where she sat

in her invalid's chair was left speechless.

Bravo! she cried at last and clapped her hands.

The man's wife

came from the kitchen:

What goes on here? she said.

But the show was over.

14 entrechat a leap, in ballet.
TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Why does Williams tell us that Mr. T.'s hair was untidy and that he wore "a soiled undershirt"?
2. Suppose the poem ended with line 23, "and clapped her hands." Would it be just as good, better, or less good? Why?

LAURENCE FERLINGHETTI

Lawrence Ferlinghetti (b. 1919) has been much concerned with bringing poetry to the people. To this end he has not only written poetry but has also been the editor and publisher of City Lights Books in San Francisco and (since 1953) has operated a bookstore, the City Lights Bookshop, the first all-paperback bookstore in the United States. In 1956 Ferlinghetti achieved national fame when, as the publisher of Allen Ginsberg's Howl, he was arrested (and later acquitted) on an obscenity charge.

Constantly Risking Absurdity

Constantly risking absurdity and death whenever he performs above the heads of his audience
the poet like an acrobat climbs on rime
to a high wire of his own making and balancing on eyebeams above a sea of faces paces his way
to the other side of day performing entrechats and sleight-of-foot tricks and other high theatrics and all without mistaking any thing for what it may not be
For he's the super realist who must perforce perceive taut truth
before the taking of each stance or step in his supposed advance toward that still higher perch where Beauty stands and waits with gravity

13 entrechats a leap in ballet.
To start her death-defying leap

And he

A little Charlie Chaplin man
Who may or may not catch
Her fair eternal form
Spreadeagled in the empty air
Of existence

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. In this poem, which compares a poet to an acrobat, is Ferlinghetti “constantly risking absurdity”?
2. What examples of word play do you find, in addition to “above the heads/of his audience”?

A Note about Poetic Forms

"Art is nothing without form," the French author Gustave Flaubert maintained, and it’s true that works of art have a carefully designed shape. Most obviously, for instance, a good story has an ending that satisfies the reader or hearer. In real life, things keep going, but when a good story ends, the audience feels that there is nothing more to say, at least nothing more of interest to say.

With poems that rhyme, the rhyme-scheme provides a pattern, a shape, a structure that seems inseparable from the content. If you recite a limerick, you will immediately see how the shape is inseparable from the content:

There was a young fellow from Lynn
Who was so exceedingly thin
That when he essayed
To drink lemonade
He slipped through the straw and fell in.

If you put the words in a different order, and you ignore meter and rhyme—that is, if you destroy the form and turn the passage into something like "A young man, so thin that he fell through a straw into a glass of lemonade, lived in Lynn"—you can instantly see the importance of form.

Let’s briefly look at a more serious example. You may recall Housman’s “Eight O’Clock” (page 720), a poem whose title corresponds to the hour at which executions used to take place in England.

He stood, and heard the steeple
Sprinkle the quarters on the morning town.
One, two, three, four, to market-place and people
It tossed them down.

Strapped, noosed, nighing his hour,
He stood and counted them and cursed his luck;
And then the clock collected in the tower
Its strength, and struck.

The rhyme of “struck” with “luck” (in this instance, bad luck) is conclusive. We don’t ask if the body was removed from the gallows and buried, or if the condemned man's wife (if he had one) grieved, or if his children (if he had any) turned out well or badly. None of these things is of any relevance. There is nothing more to say. The form and the content perfectly go together. In this example, the lines, each of which rhymes with another line—we might say that each line is tied to another line—seem especially appropriate for a man who is “strapped” and “noosed.”

But why do poets use forms established by rhyme? In an essay called “The Constant Symbol,” Robert Frost says that a poet regards rhymes as “stepping stones... The way will be zigzag, but it will be a straight crookedness like the walking stick he cuts in the bushes for an emblem.” Housman’s stepping-stones in the second stanza took Housman (and take the reader) from hour to luck, then to tower and then with great finality to the end of the walk, struck. We think this stanza is inspired, and we imagine that Housman’s inspiration was mightily helped by his need for rhymes—his need to get “stepping stones” that would allow him to continue the “straight crookedness” of his walk with this condemned man. His walk-with-words, or rather his walk with words—that-set-forth-ideas, produced “luck” and “struck,” and enabled him to give to his readers the memorable image of the clock as a machine that executes the man.

When you read Housman’s or Frost’s actual lines—or better, when you read them aloud and hear and feel the effect of these rhymes—you can understand why Frost more than once said he would as soon write unrhymed poetry as he would “play tennis with the net down.” The rules governing the game of tennis or the game of writing do not interfere with the game; rather, the rules allow the players to play a game. The rules allow poets to write poems; the rules—the restraints—provide the structure that allows poets to accomplish something.

Poets are somewhat like Houdini, who accepted shackles so that he could triumph over them. Without the handcuffs and other restraints, he could accomplish nothing. Or consider the string on a kite; far from impeding the kite’s flight, the string allows the kite to fly. Speaking in less high-flying terms, we can quote from a talk that Frost gave to college students in 1937, “The Poet’s Next of Kin in College.” He told them—and he was speaking not only to young poets but to all students—that in their endeavors, of whatever sort, they “must have form—performance. The thing itself is indescribable, but it is felt like athletic form. To have form, feel form in sports—and by analogy feel form in verse.”

Poets have testified that they use rhyme partly because, far from impeding them, it helps them to say interesting things in a memorable way. True, some rhymes have been used so often that although they were once rich in meaning—for instance—“love” and “dove” or “moon” and “June”—they have become clichés, their use indicating not an imaginative leap but a reliance on what has been said too often. But other rhymes—let’s say “earth” and “birth” or “law” and “flaw”—can lead poets to say interesting things that they might otherwise not have thought of.

In his “Letter of Advice to a Young Poet,” Jonathan Swift (whom you may know as the author of Gulliver’s Travels, 1726), said: “Verse without rhyme is a body without a soul.” A striking, and indeed surprising, comment: Swift dares to propose that the soul of a poem depends not on the content but, rather, on a crucial element of its form, the presence of rhyme. In part he is reminding us here of the importance of craft in the writing of a poem, of the sheer skill and deliberation that make the literary work feel exactly right, as though it bad to be this way.
Stanzaic Patterns

Lines of poetry are commonly arranged in a rhythmical unit called a stanza (from an Italian word meaning “room” or “stopping-place”). Usually all the stanzas in a poem have the same rhyme pattern. A stanza is sometimes called a verse, though verse may also mean a single line of poetry. In discussing stanzas, rhymes are indicated by identical letters. Thus, abab indicates that the first and third lines rhyme with each other, while the second and fourth lines are linked by a different rhyme. An unrhymed line is denoted by x. Common stanzaic forms in English poetry are the following:

Couplet: a stanza of two lines, usually but not necessarily with end-rhymes. Couplet is also used for a pair of rhyming lines. The octosyllabic couplet is iambic or trochaic tetrameter:

Had we but world enough and time,
This coyness, lady, were no crime.

—Andrew Marvell

Heroic couplet: a rhyming couplet of iambic pentameter, often “closed,” that is, containing a complete thought, with a fairly heavy pause at the end of the first line and a still heavier one at the end of the second. Commonly, there is a parallel or an antithesis (contrast) within a line or between the two lines. It is called heroic because in England, especially in the eighteenth century, it was much used for heroic (epic) poems.

Some foreign writers, some our own despise;
The ancients only, or the moderns, prize.

—Alexander Pope

Triplet (or tercet): a three-line stanza, usually with one rhyme.

Whenas in silks my Julia goes
Then, then (methinks) how sweetly flows
That liquefaction of her clothes.

—Robert Herrick

Quatrain: a four-line stanza, rhymed or unrhymed. The heroic (or elegiac) quatrain is iambic pentameter, rhyming abab. That is, the first and third lines rhyme (so they are designated a), and the second and fourth lines rhyme (so they are designated b).

THREE COMPLEX FORMS: THE SONNET, THE VILLANELLE, AND THE SESTINA

The Sonnet

A sonnet is a fourteen-line poem, predominantly in iambic pentameter. The rhyme is usually according to one of two schemes. The Italian or Petrarchan sonnet, named for the Italian poet Petrarch (1304–1374), has two divisions: The first eight lines (rhyming abba abba) are the octave, and the last six (rhyming cd cd cd, or a variant) are the sestet. Gerard Manley Hopkins’s “God’s Grandeur”
(page 910) is an Italian sonnet. The second kind of sonnet, the English or Shakespearean sonnet, is usually arranged into three quatrains and a couplet, rhyming abab cdcd efef gg. (For examples see the next two poems.) In many sonnets there is a marked correspondence between the rhyme scheme and the development of the thought. Thus an Italian sonnet may state a generalization in the octave and a specific example in the sestet. Or an English sonnet may give three examples—one in each quatrain—and draw a conclusion in the couplet.

Why poets choose to imprison themselves in fourteen tightly rhymed lines is something of a mystery. Tradition has a great deal to do with it: the form, having been handled successfully by major poets, stands as a challenge. In writing a sonnet a poet gains a little of the authority of Petrarch, Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, and other masters who showed that the sonnet is not merely a trick. A second reason perhaps resides in the very tightness of the rhymes, which can help as well as hinder. Many poets have felt, along with Richard Wilbur (in Mid-Century American Poets, ed. John Ciardi), that the need for a rhyme has suggested . . . arbitrary connections of which the mind may take advantage if it likes. For example, if one has to rhyme with tide, a great number of rhymewords at once come to mind (ride, bide, shied, confide, Akenside, etc.). Most of these, in combination with tide, will probably suggest nothing apropos, but one of them may reveal precisely what one wanted to say. If none of them does, tide must be dispensed with. Rhyme, austerely used, may be a stimulus to discovery and a stretcher of the attention.

Six Sonnets

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

William Shakespeare (1564–1616), born in Stratford-upon-Avon in England, is chiefly known as a dramatic poet, but he also wrote nondramatic poetry. In 1609 a volume of 154 of his sonnets was published, apparently without his permission. Probably he chose to keep his sonnets unpublished not because he thought that they were of little value, but because it was more prestigious to be an amateur (unpublished) poet than a professional (published) one. Although the sonnets were published in 1609, they were probably written in the mid-1590s, when there was a vogue for sonneteering. A contemporary writer in 1598 said that Shakespeare’s “sugred Sonnets [circulate] among bis private friends.”

Other sonnets by Shakespeare are on pages 930–931.

Sonnet 73

That time of year thou mayst in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruined choirs° where late the sweet birds sang.
In me thou see’st the twilight of such day

4 choir the part of the church where services were sung.
As after sunset fadeth in the west,
Which by-and-by black night doth take away,
Death's second self that seals up all in rest.
In me thou see'st the glowing of such fire
That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by.
This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
To love that well which thou must leave ere long.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. In the first quatrain (the first four lines) to what "time of year" does Shakespeare compare himself? In the second quatrain (lines 5–8) to what does he compare himself? In the third? If the sequence of the three quatrains were reversed, what would be gained or lost?

2. In line 8, what is "Death's second self"? What implications do you perceive in "seals up all in rest," as opposed, for instance, to "brings most welcome rest"?

3. In line 13, exactly what is "This"?

4. In line 14, suppose in place of "To love that well which thou must leave ere long," Shakespeare had written "To love me well whom thou must leave ere long." What, if anything, would have been gained or lost?

5. What is your personal response to this sonnet? Do you feel that its lessons apply to you? Please explain.

6. Did you find this sonnet hard to understand when you read it for the first time? After you reread and studied it, did it become more difficult, or less so? Do you like to read difficult poems?

Sonnet 146

Poor soul, the center of my sinful earth,
My sinful earth° these rebel pow'rs that thee array,
Why doest thou pine within and suffer dearth,
Painting thy outward walls so costly gay?
Why so large cost," having so short a lease,
Dost thou upon thy fading mansion spend?
Shall worms, inheritors of this excess,
Eat up thy charge? Is this thy body's end?
Then, soul, live thou upon thy servant's loss,
And let that pine to aggravate thy store;
Buy terms divine° in selling hours of dross;
Within be fed, without be rich no more.
So shalt thou feed on Death, that feeds on men,
And death once dead, there's no more dying then.

2 My sinful earth see the comment beneath the facsimile on page 735. 5 cost expense.
11 Buy terms divine buy ages of immortality.
Sonnet 146 as it appears in the first publication of Shakespeare’s sonnets, 1609. Notice that the first line ends with the words “my sinful earth,” and the second line begins with the same words. Virtually all readers agree that the printer mistakenly repeated the words. First of all, the line makes almost no sense; secondly, it has 12 syllables (“powres” is monosyllabic) where 10 syllables are normal. Among attractive suggested emendations—usually two syllables instead of the four of “My sinful earth”—are those that pick up imagery of conflict explicit in “rebell powres,” such as “Prey to,” “Thrall to,” “Foiled by,” and “Vexed by,” and emendations that pick up imagery of hunger explicit in “Eate” and “fed,” such as “Feeding” and “Starved by.” But there are plenty of other candidates, such as “Fooled by,” “Rebuke these,” and “Leagued with.”

Topics for Critical Thinking and Writing

1. As we indicate in our comment on the facsimile of this poem, the first three words of the second line probably should be replaced with other words. What words would you suggest? (We give some of the most widely accepted suggestions, but feel free to offer your own.)
2. In what tone of voice would you speak the first line? The last line? Trace the speaker’s shifts in emotion throughout the poem.
3. What is your personal response to this poem? Do you feel that its lessons apply to you? Do you find this sonnet more meaningful, or less meaningful, to you than Sonnet 73 (page 733)? Please explain.
4. Did you find this poem hard to understand when you read it for the first time? After you reread and studied it, did the poem become more difficult, or less so? Is this sonnet more difficult than Sonnet 73 (page 733)? What is the difference between a poem that is challenging, a poem that is difficult, and a poem that is obscure?
John Milton (1608–1674) was born into a well-to-do family in London, where from childhood he was a student of languages, mastering at an early age Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and a number of modern languages. Instead of becoming a minister in the Anglican Church, he resolved to become a poet and spent five years at his family’s country home, reading. His attacks against the monarchy secured him a position in Oliver Cromwell’s Puritan government as Latin secretary for foreign affairs. He became totally blind, but he continued his work through secretaries, one of whom was Andrew Marvell, author of “To His Coy Mistress” (page 707). With the restoration of the monarchy in 1660, Milton was for a time confined but was later pardoned in the general amnesty. Until his death he continued to work on many subjects, including his greatest poem, the epic Paradise Lost.

When I Consider How My Light Is Spent

When I consider how my light is spent
Ere half my days, in this dark world and wide,
And that one talent which is death to hide
Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent
To serve therewith my Maker, and present
My true account, lest he returning chide;
“Doth God exact day-labor, light denied?”
I fondly ask; but Patience to prevent
That murmur, soon replies,”God doth not need
Either man’s work or his own gifts; who best
Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best. His state
Is kingly. Thousands at his bidding speed
And post o’er land and ocean without rest:
They also serve who only stand and wait.”

3 There is a pun in talent, relating Milton’s literary talent to Christ’s Parable of the Talents (Matthew 25.14 ff.), in which a servant is rebuked for not putting his talent (a unit of money) to use. 4 useless a pun on use, i.e., usury, interest. 8 fondly foolishly. prevent forestall.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. This sonnet is sometimes called “On His Blindness,” though Milton never gave it a title. Do you think this title gets toward the heart of the poem? Explain. If you were to give it a title, what would the title be?
2. Read the parable in Matthew 25.14–30, and then consider how close the parable is to Milton’s life as Milton describes it in this poem.
3. Where is the turn? What characteristics are attributed to God after the turn?
4. Compare the tone of the first and the last sentences. How does the length of each of these sentences contribute to the tone?
5. Could you imagine someone saying, “This poem changed my life”? What kind of change in a person’s life might this sonnet produce?
6. What is your own experience of blindness? Have you ever lost your eyesight? For a long or a short period? Do you know a blind person? What is the nature of your interaction with him or her?

JOHN CROWE RANSOM

A graduate of Vanderbilt University and a Rhodes scholar at Oxford, John Crowe Ransom returned to teach at Vanderbilt, where he and others founded an important poetry journal, The Fugitive. In 1937 he moved to Kenyon College, where he founded and edited the Kenyon Review. Distinguished as a poet and a teacher, he also wrote significant literary criticism. One of his books, The New Criticism (1941), gave its name to a critical movement (see pages 1537–1539).

Piazza Piece

—I am a gentleman in a dustcoat trying
To make you hear. Your ears are soft and small
And listen to an old man not at all,
They want the young men’s whispering and sighing.
But see the roses on your trellis dying
And hear the spectral singing of the moon;
For I must have my lovely lady soon,
I am a gentleman in a dustcoat trying.

—I am a lady young in beauty waiting
Until my truelove comes, and then we kiss.
But what grey man among the vines is this
Whose words are dry and faint as in a dream?
Back from my trellis, Sir, before I scream!
I am a lady young in beauty waiting.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Who speaks the octave? What words especially characterize him? Characterize the speaker of the sestet.

2. In lines 9–10, the young lady is waiting for her “truelove.” Comment on the suggestions in this word. In line 14 she is still “waiting.” For whom does she think she is waiting? For whom does the reader know she is waiting? How do you know?

3. The first and last lines of the octave are identical, and so are the first and last lines of the sestet. What does this indicate about the degree to which the speakers communicate to each other?

4. What is the point of Ransom’s poem? Is this an appropriate question to ask about a poem—whether it does or does not make a point? Please explain.
X. J. KENNEDY

X. J. Kennedy was born in New Jersey in 1929. He has taught at Tufts University and is the author of several books of poems, books for children, and college textbooks.

Kennedy alludes (line 4) to Milton’s Paradise Lost, VII, 205–207: “Heaven opened wide / Her ever-during gates, harmonious sound / On golden hinges moving...” For an account of the slaughter of the innocents (line 5), see Matthew 2.16. The Venerable Bede (675–735), in line 6, was an English theologian and historian.

Nothing in Heaven Functions as It Ought

Nothing in Heaven functions as it ought:
Peter’s bifocals, blindly sat on, crack;
His gates lurch wide with the cackle of a cock,
Not turn with a hush of gold as Milton had thought;
Gangs of the slaughtered innocents keep huffing
The nimbus off the Venerable Bede
Like that of an old dandelion gone to seed;
And the beatific choir keep breaking up, coughing.

But Hell, sleek Hell hath no freewheeling part:
None takes his own sweet time, none quickens pace.
Ask anyone, How come you here, poor heart?—
And he will slot a quarter through his face,
You’ll hear an instant click, a tear will start
Imprinted with an abstract of his case.

TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

In the octave Kennedy uses off-rhymes (crack, cock; huffing, coughing), but in the sestet all the rhymes are exact. How do the rhymes help to convey the meaning? (Notice, too, that lines 3, 4, 5, 7, and 8 all have more than the usual ten syllables. Again, why?)

BILLY COLLINS

Born in New York City in 1941, Collins is a professor of English at Lehman College of the City University of New York. He is the author of nine books of poetry and the recipient of numerous awards, including one from the National Endowment for the Arts. Collins’s Sailing Alone Around the Room: New and Selected Poems was published in 2001; in the same year, he was appointed poet laureate of the United States.

The following sonnet uses the Petrarchan form of an octave and a sestet. (See page 732.) Petrarch is additionally present in the poem by the allusion in line 3 to “a little ship on love’s storm-tossed seas,” because Petrarch compared the hapless lover, denied the favor of his mistress, to a ship in a storm: The lover cannot guide his ship because the North Star is hidden (Petrarch’s... beloved Laura averts her eyes), and the sails of the ship are agitated by the lover's pitiful sighs. As you will see, Petrarch and Laura explicitly enter the poem in the last three lines.

In line 8 Collins refers to the stations of the cross. In Roman Catholicism, one of the devotions consists of prayers and meditations before each of fourteen crosses or images set up along a path that commemorates the fourteen places at which Jesus halted when, just before the Crucifixion, he was making his way in Jerusalem to Golgotha.

Sonnet

All we need is fourteen lines, well, thirteen now, and after this next one just a dozen to launch a little ship on love's storm-tossed seas, then only ten more left like rows of beans. How easily it goes unless you get Elizabethan and insist the iambic bongos must be played and rhymes positioned at the ends of lines, one for every station of the cross. But hang on here while we make the turn into the final six where all will be resolved, where longing and heartache will find an end, where Laura will tell Petrarch to put down his pen, take off those crazy medieval tights, blow out the lights, and come at last to bed.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. The headnote explains the stations of the cross (line 8), but what is the point of introducing this image into a sonnet?
2. Normally the “turn” (volta) in an Italian sonnet occurs at the beginning of the ninth line; the first eight lines (the octave) establish some sort of problem, and the final six lines (the sestet) respond, for instance by answering a question, or by introducing a contrasting emotion. In your view, how satisfactorily does Collins handle this form?
3. Does this sonnet interest you? Do you find it clever? Is that a good thing or a bad thing?
4. Do you think that you could have written this sonnet? Could you have written Shakespeare’s sonnets 73 and 146 (pages 733–734)? What do your responses to these questions suggest to you about the writing of poetry?

The Villanelle

The name comes from an Italian words, villanella, meaning “country song” or “peasant song,” and originally, in the sixteenth century, the subject was the supposedly simple life of the shepherd, but in France in the seventeenth century elaborate rules were developed. Variations occur, but usually a villanelle has the following characteristics:
Five stanzas with three lines each (tercets), rhyming aba, and a final stanza with four lines (a quatrain).
- The first line of the first stanza is repeated as the last line of the second stanza and the last line of the fourth stanza.
- The third line of the first stanza is repeated as the last line of the third stanza and the last line of the fifth stanza.
- The quatrain that concludes the villanelle rhymes abaa, using the first and third lines of the first stanza as the next-to-last and the last lines of the final stanza—i.e., the poem ends with a couplet.

Because the villanelle repeats one sound thirteen times (in the first and last line of each tercet, and in the first, third, and fourth lines of the quatrain), it strongly conveys a sense of return, a sense of not going forward, even a sense of dwelling on the past. We give four examples of the form.

If you are going to write a villanelle, here are two tips:

- Begin by writing a couplet (a pair of rhyming lines); in fact, write several couplets on different topics, and then decide which couplet you think is most promising. Next, insert between these two lines a line that makes sense in the context but that does not rhyme with them.
- Each line need not end with a pause, and in fact some run-on lines probably will help to prevent the poem from becoming too sing-songy.

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON

Edwin Arlington Robinson (1869–1935) was born in Head Tide, Maine, and raised in the nearby town of Gardner, which be later adapted as the setting, “Tilbury Town,” for many of his poems. His books of verse include The Torrent and the Night Before (1896), Captain Craig and Other Poems (1902), The Town Down the River (1910), and—his first major success—The Man Against the Sky (1916).

The House on the Hill

They are all gone away,
    The House is shut and still,
There is nothing more to say.

Through broken walls and gray
    The winds blow bleak and shrill:
They are all gone away.

Nor is there one to-day
    To speak them good or ill:
There is nothing more to say.

Why is it then we stray
    Around the sunken sill?
They are all gone away,
And our poor fancy-play
   For them is wasted skill:
There is nothing more to say. 15

There is ruin and decay
   In the House on the Hill:
They are all gone away.
There is nothing more to say.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Line 1 is repeated several times. Please explain your response to the line the first time you hear it. Now explain your response when you hear it the final time. What conclusions are you led to?
2. Were you surprised to encounter the pronoun “we” in stanza four? How does this “we” affect your response to the poem? And how does it bear on your understanding of the speaker?
3. Note, too, the use of “our” in stanza five. Does the poet need this “our” or not? Please explain.
4. In the first and last stanzas, “House” is capitalized. Does this choice add to or detract from the impact of the poem?
5. We have printed the version of “The House on the Hill” that Robinson gave in his Collected Poems, published in 1937. But the original printed version is somewhat different. Here, for example, is the original stanza three:

Are we more fit than they
   To meet the Master’s will?—
There is nothing more to say.

In your view, does the revision make the poem better or worse? Who is the “Master”? And what is the purpose of this reference?
6. Once a poem has been published, do you think that its author has the right to revise it? Isn’t it confusing for readers to have different versions of “the same poem”?

DYLAN THOMAS

Dylan Thomas (1914–1953) was born and grew up in Swansea, in Wales. His first volume of poetry, published in 1934, immediately made him famous. Endowed with a highly melodious voice, on three tours of the United States he was immensely successful as a reader both of his own and of other poets’ work. He died in New York City.

Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night [1952]

Do not go gentle into that good night,
Old age should burn and rave at close of day;
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.
Though wise men at their end know dark is right,
Because their words had forked no lightning they
Do not go gentle into that good night.

Good men, the last wave by, crying how bright
Their frail deeds might have danced in a green bay,
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

Wild men who caught and sang the sun in flight,
And learn, too late, they grieved it on its way,
Do not go gentle into that good night.

Grave men, near death, who see with blinding sight
Blind eyes could blaze like meteors and be gay,
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

And you, my father, there on the sad height,
Curse, bless, me now with your fierce tears, I pray.
Do not go gentle into that good night.
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. The intricate form of the villanelle might seem too fussy for a serious poem about dying. Do you find it too fussy? Or does the form here somehow succeed?

2. How would you describe the speaker’s tone? Is it accurate or misleading to say that “Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night” is an angry poem?

3. What is the speaker’s attitude toward death? Do you share this attitude or not? Please explain.

4. This is a famous poem. Why do you think that is the case?

ELIZABETH BISHOP

Elizabeth Bishop (1911–1979) was born in Worcester, Massachusetts. Because her father died when she was eight months old and her mother was confined to a sanitarium four years later, Bishop was raised by relatives in New England and Nova Scotia. After graduation from Vassar College in 1934, where she was co-editor of the student literary magazine, she lived (on a small private income) for a while in Key West, France, and Mexico, and then for much of her adult life in Brazil, before returning to the United States to teach at Harvard.

One Art

[1976]

The art of losing isn’t hard to master;
so many things seem filled with the intent to be lost that their loss is no disaster.

Lose something every day. Accept the fluster of lost door keys, the hour badly spent.
The art of losing isn’t hard to master.
Then practice losing farther, losing faster: places, and names, and where it was you meant to travel. None of these will bring disaster.

I lost my mother’s watch. And look! my last, or next-to-last, of three loved houses went. The art of losing isn’t hard to master.

I lost two cities, lovely ones. And, vaster, some realms I owned, two rivers, a continent. I miss them, but it wasn’t a disaster.

—Even losing you (the joking voice, a gesture I love) I shan’t have lied. It’s evident the art of losing’s not too hard to master though it may look like (Write it!) like disaster.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. What was your response to the title when you first read it? Did your response change after you read the poem and studied it further?
2. Is the form connected to the poem’s theme? If so, in what way?
3. Linger over line 1: Why is “losing” an “art”? And why does Bishop echo the phrasing of the first line in lines later in the poem? Does the echo make the poem feel repetitive?
4. Follow Bishop’s uses of the words “lose,” “losing,” and “loss” from one to the next. Do you find her reliance on these very closely related words to be important for the poem’s meaning, or does it strike you as a lot or a little confusing? Can a poem be a lot or a little confusing and yet still be a good poem?
5. Can we tell what kind of loss Bishop is exploring? If we can, where does this kind of loss become clear?
6. Whom is Bishop addressing when she says (note the exclamation point) “Write it!”? Why is this command in the poem, and why is it in parentheses?
7. Has this poem helped you to understand a loss or losses that you have experienced yourself? Something, perhaps, that you did not understand before about what “losing” someone or something important means? Do you have an insight of your own into losing and loss that Bishop has not considered, at least not in this poem? Is this an insight that you would want to share with others—in a poem, for example—or keep to yourself?

The Sestina

This fiendishly elaborate form developed in twelfth-century Europe, especially in southern France, among the troubadours, court poets who sang for nobles. (The name comes from the Italian sesto, “sixth,” because there are six stanzas of six lines each—but then, to complicate matters, there is a seventh stanza, a three-line “envoy” or “envoi,” a summing up that uses key words of the first six stanzas.)
More precisely—this is mind-boggling—the six words that end the six lines of the first stanza are used at the ends of all the following lines but in a different though fixed order in each stanza. (Rhyme is not used in this form.) This fixed order has been characterized as a sort of bottoms-up pattern, a term that will become clear as we describe the stanzas. In the second stanza the first line ends with the last word of the last line (the bottom) of the first stanza; the second line of the second stanza ends with the first line of the first; the third line ends with the last word of the fifth line of the first stanza—i.e., with the next-to-bottom line of the first stanza. The fourth line of the second stanza ends with the second line of the first, the fifth with the fourth line of the first, and the sixth with the third line of the first.

Thus, if we designate the final words of the first stanza, line by line, as 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, the final words of the second stanza are 6, 1, 5, 2, 4, 3;

the third stanza: 3, 6, 4, 1, 2, 5
the fourth stanza: 5, 3, 2, 6, 1, 4 the fifth stanza: 4, 5, 1, 3, 6, 2
the sixth stanza: 2, 4, 6, 5, 3, 1

The envoy of three lines must use these six words, but there are various possible patterns—for instance, 5, 3, 1 at the ends of the three lines, and 2, 4, 6 in the middle of the lines.

If you are going to write a sestina, two tips:

• Once you have settled on your topic—let’s say "loss" or “a restless spirit of adventure”—jot down six words that you think are relevant, and get going.
• You need not end each line with a pause, and in fact most good sestinas use considerable enjambment—i.e., the sense of the line runs over into the next line.

Sestina

September rain falls on the house.
In the failing light, the old grandmother sits in the kitchen with the child beside the Little Marvel Stove, reading the jokes from the almanac, laughing and talking to hide her tears.

She thinks that her equinoctial tears and the rain that beats on the roof of the house were both foretold by the almanac, but only known to a grandmother.
The iron kettle sings on the stove.
She cuts some bread and says to the child,
It’s time for tea now; but the child is watching the teakettle’s small hard tears dance like mad on the hot black stove, the way the rain must dance on the house.
Tidying up, the old grandmother hangs up the clever almanac on its string. Birdlike, the almanac hovers half open above the child, hovers above the old grandmother and her teacup full of dark brown tears.
She shivers and says she thinks the house feels chilly, and puts more wood in the stove.

It was to be, says the Marvel Stove.
I know what I know, says the almanac.
With crayons the child draws a rigid house and a winding pathway. Then the child puts in a man with buttons like tears and shows it proudly to the grandmother.

But secretly, while the grandmother busies herself about the stove, the little moons fall down like tears from between the pages of the almanac into the flower bed the child has carefully placed in the front of the house.

Time to plant tears, says the almanac.
The grandmother sings to the marvelous stove and the child draws another inscrutable house.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Does Bishop’s choice of title seem strange to you? Why would she use the name of the poetic form for her title? Do you think that a different title might be more effective? Please give examples, and explain why they would or would not be better.
2. As carefully as you can, describe the effect of line 1.
3. In the first stanza, why is the grandmother crying? How are her tears in lines 6 and 7 related to the “small hard tears” of the teakettle in line 14?
Note, too, the later references to tears. Please comment on these as well.
4. Several of the lines in this poem are italicized. Do the italics make the lines more forceful? Should Bishop have made the force of the lines clear without changing the “look” of the lines on the page?
5. What is an almanac? Have you ever seen one? Why would someone want an almanac? What is the significance of the almanac in this poem?
6. What is your response to the fact that this poem is a sestina? Do you think you could write a poem in this form? What would be the benefit to you of such an assignment?
SHAPED POETRY OR PATTERN POETRY

We have been talking about shapes or patterns determined by rhymes, but some poems—admittedly few—take their shape from the length of the lines, which form a simple image, such as a sphere, an egg, a vase, or a wing. We have already printed one poem of this sort in our first chapter, James Merrill’s “Christmas Tree,” which is shaped like—well, you can guess.

Here is a famous example of shaped poetry, a pair of wings. We print it sideways, as it was printed in the earliest edition, in 1633, though in that edition the first stanza was printed on the left-hand page, the second on the right-hand page.

GEORGE HERBERT

George Herbert (1593–1633), born into a distinguished Welsh family, studied at the University of Cambridge (England) and became a clergyman. By all accounts he lived an admirable life and was deservedly known in his community as “Holy Mr. Herbert.”

Note: In line 1, store means “abundance,” “plenty.” In line 10, the fall refers to the loss of innocence that resulted when Adam ate the forbidden fruit in the garden of Eden. In the next-to-last line, imp, a term from falconry, means “to graft, to insert feathers into a wing.”

We print the poem in the way that it was originally printed.

Easter-Wings

Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store, 5
Though foolishly he lost the same,
Decaying more and more,
Till he became
Most poor:5
With thee
O let me rise
As larks, harmoniously,
And sing this day thy victories:
Then shall the fall further the flight in me.10

My tender age in sorrow did begin:
And still with sicknesses and shame
Thou didst so punish sin,
That I became
Most thin.15
With thee
Let me combine,
And feel this day thy victory:
For, if I imp my wing on thine,
Affliction shall advance the flight in me.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Why are wings especially relevant to a poem about Easter?
2. We don’t think one can argue that the length of every line is exactly suited to the meaning of the line, but we do think that some of the lengths are parallel or reinforce some of the ideas within those lines. For instance, the first line, speaking of a man’s original “wealth and store,” is a long line. Why is this length more appropriate to the meaning than it would be to, say, “Lord, who created a man who soon would fall”? And note especially the fifth and sixth lines of each stanza: Would you agree that their length suits their meaning?
3. Do you think this poem is a mere novelty, or do you think it deserves close attention and indeed is memorable? Please explain.

LILLIAN MORRISON

Lillian Morrison, born in Jersey City, New Jersey, is an anthologist and folklorist and a writer of children’s books as well as a poet in her own right. The first books she published were collections of folk rhymes that she assembled and edited while working as a librarian at the New York Public Library. In 1987 Morrison received the Grolier Award for “outstanding contributions to the stimulation of reading by young people.” She lives in New York City.

The Sidewalk Racer

Or On the Skateboard

Skimming
an asphalt sea
I swerve, I curve, I sway; I speed to whirring sound an inch above the ground; I’m the sailor and the sail, I’m the driver and the wheel I’m the one and only single engine human auto mobile.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Is the poem really about a skateboard? If not, what is it about?
2. The first line is “Skimming.” Would the poem be improved or weakened if it began “I skim”? Please explain.
3. The second line rhymes with the fifth and seventh ("sea," "the") and with the ninth ("only"). What other rhymes do you find? What is the effect of using rhymes that are not at the ends of the lines?
4. From a grammatical point of view, a period could be put at the end of line 8. Why do you suppose Morrison did not put a period there?
5. Read the poem aloud, and then consider how the sounds add to the meaning.

BLANK VERSE AND FREE VERSE

A good deal of English poetry is unrhymed, much of it in blank verse—that is, unrhymed iambic pentameter. Introduced into English poetry by Henry Howard, the Earl of Surrey, in the middle of the sixteenth century, late in the century it became the standard medium (especially in the hands of Marlowe and Shakespeare) of English drama. In the seventeenth century, Milton used it for Paradise Lost, and it has continued to be used in both dramatic and non-dramatic literature. For an example see the first scene of Hamlet (page 1109). A passage of blank verse that has a rhetorical unity is sometimes called a verse paragraph.

The second kind of unrhymed poetry fairly common in English, especially in the twentieth century, is free verse (or vers libre): rhythmical lines varying in length, adhering to no fixed metrical pattern and usually unrhymed. Such poetry may seem formless; Robert Frost, who strongly preferred regular meter and rhyme, said that he would not consider writing free verse any more than he would consider playing tennis without a net. But free verse does have a form or pattern, often largely based on repetition and parallel grammatical structure. Whitman's "A Noiseless Patient Spider" (page 629) is an example; Arnold's "Dover Beach" (page 879) is another example, though less typical because it uses rhyme. Thoroughly typical is Whitman's "When I Heard the Learn'd Astronomer."

WALT WHITMAN

For a biography of the American poet Walt Whitman (1819–1892), see the note prefacing "A Noiseless Patient Spider" (page 629).

When I Heard the Learn'd Astronomer

When I heard the learn'd astronomer,
When the proofs, the figures, were ranged in columns before me,
When I was shown the charts and diagrams, to add, divide, and measure them,
When I sitting heard the astronomer where he lectured with much applause in the lecture-room,
How soon unaccountable I became tired and sick,
Till rising and gliding out I wander'd off by myself,
In the mystical moist night-air, and from time to time,
Look'd up in perfect silence at the stars.

What can be said about the rhythmic structure of this poem? Rhymes are absent, and the lines vary greatly in the number of syllables, ranging from 9 (the first line) to 23 (the fourth line), but when we read the poem we sense a rhythmic structure. The first four lines obviously hang together, each beginning with "When"; indeed, three of these four lines begin "When I." We may notice, too, that each of these four lines has more syllables than its predecessor (the numbers are 9, 14, 18, and 23); this increase in length, like the initial repetition, is a kind of pattern. But then, with the fifth line, which speaks of fatigue and surfeit, there is a shrinkage to 14 syllables, offering an enormous relief from the previous swollen line with its 23 syllables. The second half of the poem—the pattern established by "When" in the first four lines is dropped, and in effect we get a new stanza, also of four lines—does not relentlessly diminish the number of syllables in each succeeding line, but it almost does so: 14, 14, 13, 10.

The second half of the poem thus has a pattern too, and this pattern is more or less the reverse of the first half of the poem. We may notice too that the last line (in which the poet, now released from the oppressive lecture hall, is in communion with nature) is very close to an iambic pentameter line; that is, the poem concludes with a metrical form said to be the most natural in English. The effect of naturalness or ease in this final line, moreover, is increased by the absence of repetitions (e.g., not only of "When I," but even of such syntactic repetitions as "charts and diagrams," "tired and sick," "rising and gliding") that characterize most of the previous lines. This final effect of naturalness is part of a carefully constructed pattern in which rhythmic structure is part of meaning. Though at first glance free verse may appear unrestrained, as T. S. Eliot (a practitioner) said, "No vers is libre for the man who wants to do a good job"—or for the woman who wants to do a good job.

THE PROSE POEM

The term prose poem is sometimes applied to a short work that looks like prose but that is highly rhythmical or rich in images, or both. Here is a modern example.

CAROLYN FORCHÉ

What you have heard is true. I was in his house. His wife carried a tray of coffee and sugar. His daughter filed her nails, his son went out for the night. There were daily papers, pet dogs, a pistol on the cushion beside him. The moon swung bare on its black cord over the house. On the television was a cop show. It was in English. Broken bottles were embedded in the walls around the house to scoop the kneecaps from a man’s legs or cut his hands to lace. On the windows there were gratings like those in liquor stores. We had dinner, rack of lamb, good wine, a gold bell was on the table for calling the maid. The maid brought green mangoes, salt, a type of bread. I was asked how I enjoyed the country. There was a brief commercial in Spanish. His wife took everything away. There was some talk then of how difficult it had become to govern. The parrot said hello on the terrace. The colonel told it to shut up, and pushed himself from the table. My friend said to me with his eyes: say nothing. The colonel returned with a sack used to bring groceries home. He spilled many human ears on the table. They were like dried peach halves. There is no other way to say this. He took one of them in his hands, shook it in our faces, dropped it into a water glass. It came alive there. I am tired of fooling around he said. As for the rights of anyone, tell your people they can go fuck themselves. He swept the ears to the floor with his arm and held the last of his wine in the air. Something for your poetry, no? he said. Some of the ears on the floor caught this scrap of his voice. Some of the ears on the floor were pressed to the ground.

May 1978

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. How would you characterize the colonel in a few sentences?
2. We are told that the colonel spoke of “how difficult it had become to govern.” What do you suppose the colonel assumes is the purpose of government? What do you assume its purpose is?
3. How much do we know about the narrator? Can we guess the narrator’s purpose in visiting the colonel? How would you characterize the narrator’s tone? Do you believe the narrator?
4. What is your response to the last sentence?
5. What, if anything, is gained by calling this work a “prose poem” rather than a short story?
CHAPTER 19

Students Writing about Poems

If you are going to write about a fairly short poem (say, under 30 lines), it’s not a bad idea to copy out the poem, writing or typing it double-spaced. By writing it out you will be forced to notice details, down to the punctuation. After you have copied the poem, proofread it carefully against the original. Catching an error—even the addition or omission of a comma—may help you to notice a detail in the original that you might otherwise have overlooked. And now that you have the poem with ample space between the lines, you have a worksheet with room for jottings.

A good essay is based on a genuine response to a poem; a response may be stimulated in part by first reading the poem aloud and then considering the following questions.

Remember, even an explication—an unfolding of the implications of the poem—is an argument. In the example on page 591, the student begins by asserting a thesis, a claim: “Harlem” is only eleven lines long, but it is charged with power. The thesis, the arguable claim, of course is not that “the poem is only eleven lines long” but that “it is charged with power,” and the rest of the explication is devoted to supporting this claim, to pointing out almost word by word the sources of the power.

FIRST RESPONSE

What was your response to the poem on first reading? Did some parts especially please or displease you, or puzzle you? After some study—perhaps checking the meanings of some of the words in a dictionary and reading the poem several times—did you modify your initial response to the parts and to the whole?

SPEAKER AND TONE

1. Who is the speaker? (Consider age, sex, personality, frame of mind, and tone of voice.) Is the speaker defined fairly precisely (for instance, an older woman speaking to a child), or is the speaker simply a voice meditating? (Jot down your first impressions, then reread the poem and make further jottings, if necessary.)

2. Do you think the speaker is fully aware of what he or she is saying, or does the speaker unconsciously reveal his or her personality and values? What is your attitude toward this speaker?
3. Is the speaker narrating or reflecting on an earlier experience or attitude? If so, does he or she convey a sense of new awareness, such as regret for innocence lost?

AUDIENCE

To whom is the speaker speaking? What is the situation (including time and place)? (In some poems a listener is strongly implied, but in others, especially those in which the speaker is meditating, there may be no audience other than the reader, who “overhears” the speaker.)

STRUCTURE AND FORM

1. Does the poem proceed in a straightforward way, or at some point or points does the speaker reverse course, altering his or her tone or perception? If there is a shift, what do you make of it?
2. Is the poem organized into sections? If so, what are these sections—stanzas, for instance—and how does each section (characterized, perhaps, by a certain tone of voice, or a group of rhymes) grow out of what precedes it?
3. What is the effect on you of the form—say, quatrains (stanzas of four lines) or blank verse (unrhymed lines of ten syllables of iambic pentameter)? If the sense overflows the form, running without pause from (for example) one quatrain into the next, what effect is created?

CENTER OF INTEREST AND THEME

1. What is the poem about? Is the interest chiefly in a distinctive character, or is it in meditation? That is, is the poem chiefly psychological or chiefly philosophical?
2. Is the theme stated explicitly (directly) or implicitly? How might you state the theme in a sentence? What is lost by reducing the poem to a statement of a theme?

DICTION

1. How would you characterize the language? Colloquial, elevated, or what?
2. Do certain words have rich and relevant associations that relate to other words and help to define the speaker or the theme or both?
3. What is the role of figurative language, if any? Does it help to define the speaker or the theme?
4. What do you think is to be taken figuratively or symbolically, and what literally?

SOUND EFFECTS

1. What is the role of sound effects, including repetitions of sound (for instance, alliteration) and of entire words, and shifts in versification?
2. If there are off-rhymes (for instance, dizzy and easy, or home and come), what effect do they have on you? Do they, for instance, add a note of tentativeness or uncertainty?

3. If there are unexpected stresses or pauses, what do they communicate about the speaker’s experience? How do they affect you?

A NOTE ON EXPLICATION

On pages 64–68 we discuss the form known as explication, a line-by-line commentary seeking to make explicit or to explain the meaning that is implicit or hidden within the words. (Explication comes from the Latin explicare, meaning “to unfold,” from ex = out + plicare = to fold.) The implication of such an activity is that writers “fold” a meaning into their words, and the reader perceives or unfolds the message. (Implication, also from the Latin word for “fold,” means something entangled or involved in something else.)

An example will clarify these remarks. If we say to someone, “Shut the door,” obviously we are conveying a message through these words. Also obviously, the message in “Shut the door” is not exactly the same as the message in “Would you mind shutting the door, please?” An explication would point out that the first sentence contains an authoritative tone that is not found in the second. In effect, the first sentence “says” (in addition to the point about the door) that the speaker may give orders to the hearer; or, to put it the other way around, folded into the second sentence (but not the first) is the speaker’s awareness that the person receiving the words is the speaker’s social equal. A slightly more complicated and much more interesting example is Julius Caesar’s “I came, I saw, I conquered” (Latin: veni, vidi, vici). An explication would point out that in addition to the explicit meaning there are implicit meanings, for example that a man like Caesar does not waste words, that he is highly disciplined (the pattern of words suggests that he is a master of language), and that he is the sort of person who, on seeing something, immediately gets it under control by taking the appropriate action.

Because explication is chiefly concerned with making explicit what is implicit in a text, it is not concerned with such matters as the poet’s place in history or the poet’s biography, nor is it concerned with the reader’s response to the poem—except to the degree that the reader’s explication really may not be an objective decoding of the poem but may depend in large part on the reader’s private associations. (Some literary critics would argue that the underlying premise of explication—that a writer puts a specific meaning into a work and that a reader can objectively recover that meaning—is based on the mistaken belief that readers can be objective.) If you look at the sample explication on pages 64–68, you can decide for yourself whether the student unfolded implicit meanings that the author (William Butler Yeats) had tucked into the words of his poem or whether the explication really is a personal response to the poem.

SEVEN ESSAYS BY STUDENTS

The first student essay in this chapter is not only an explication but also, first, a more personal response to a poem by Louise Glück. Like an explication, it is concerned with the author’s meaning; but unlike an explication, it does not hesitate to go beyond the poem and into “the real world” that the writer of the paper lives in.
The essay is not so personal that the poem disappears (as it might in an essay that says something like “This poem reminds me of the time that I . . .”), but it does not claim merely to unfold meanings that Glück has embodied or entangled in her words.

First read the following biographical note and the poem.

LOUISE GLÜCK

One of the leading contemporary poets, Louise Glück was born in New York City in 1943, grew up on Long Island, and attended Sarah Lawrence College and Columbia University. She has taught at a number of colleges and universities, including the University of Iowa and Williams College. Firstborn, her first book of poems, was published in 1968. Her later books include The House on Marsland (1975), from which the following poem is taken; The Triumph of Achilles (1985); The Wild Iris (1992); and Vita Nova (1999). Glück’s poetry has been widely anthologized and translated. Proofs and Theories: Essays on Poetry (1995) is a collection of her literary criticism on Stanley Kunitz, T.S. Eliot, and other authors.

[1975]

This is the world we wanted.
All who would have seen us dead are dead. I hear the witch’s cry break in the moonlight through a sheet of sugar: God rewards.
Her tongue shrivels into gas. . . .

Now, far from women’s arms and memory of women, in our father’s hut we sleep, are never hungry.
Why do I not forget?
My father bars the door, bars harm from this house, and it is years.
No one remembers. Even you, my brother, summer afternoons you look at me as though you meant to leave.
as though it never happened.
But I killed for you. I see armed firs,
the spires of that gleaming kiln—
Nights I turn to you to hold me
but you are not there.
Am I alone? Spies
hiss in the stillness, Hansel,
we are there still and it is real, real,
that black forest and the fire in earnest.

Jennifer Anderson was assigned to write about this poem in an Introduction to Literature course. Anderson started her work by copying the poem on a sheet of paper and annotating it.

To follow up on these annotations and develop them, Anderson turned next to her writing journal. She jotted down responses and ideas and her questions about aspects of the poem and details of the language that intrigued and puzzled her.
Here are the pages from Anderson’s journal:

Great poem! Haunting, eerie. My favorite so far in the course.
Story of Hansel and Gretel—Look this up. Should I summarize the story in the paper? Speaker—Gretel. Why her, and not Hansel? Not both of them as speakers?
"in darkness"—really in darkness, or is darkness a metaphor?
Repetition in the poem: dead/dead, bar/bar, real/real.
The tone of the opening stanza—scary, ominous. Darkness, dead.
The reference to the witch. "Shrivels into gas"—creepy detail.

But the witch has been defeated. Through the power of God? Why is God mentioned in this line?—not mentioned elsewhere.

Women (not mothers) seem the enemy in stanza two. (Odd that the second stanza is indented.) The father provides safety. But safety is not enough. Gretel cannot forget the past: the real enemy is not the witch or the mothers, but her memory.

She has to talk about her memory, her experiences. "No one remembers," but she does. I think that this is a poem about Memory: "Why do I not forget?"

Gretel doesn't want her brother to forget. She reminds him.

"Killed"—such a strong word, very direct. Gretel is angry with her brother; she feels him pulling away from her.

Something disturbed, unnatural about the poem?—the detail about Gretel looking for her brother to hold her. But he is absent. Where is he?

Who are the "Spies"? Lots of "s" sounds in these lines—spies, hiss, stillness, Hansel, still. She addresses him by name.

She cannot escape, maybe she doesn't want to escape. Note that Gretel is describing her memories of what happened—not a poem that tells the story of Hansel and Gretel. Glück is interested in how Gretel remembers, how she feels about remembering.

Anderson knew the main features of the Hansel and Gretel story—the brother and sister, their abandonment, their capture by a witch, and their escape. But she wanted to remind herself about the details, as her note to herself in her journal indicates.

As an experiment, Anderson used one of the Internet search engines that her instructor had described during class. She went to:

Go2Net Network: Metacrawler
http://www.go2net.com/search.html

And she searched for "hansel and gretel." A number of the results looked promising, and she linked to this one:
Anderson had not reread “Hansel and Gretel” since she was a child. Rereading it now was very helpful, for it clarified a number of important details in Glück’s poem. It explained, for example, “the witch’s cry” in the first stanza, which alludes to the witch’s “horrible howl” when Gretel pushes her into the oven. It also fills out the reference to the “women” in the second stanza, who in the story include the children’s cruel stepmother as well as the evil witch. Anderson could have prepared and written her paper without taking the time to check on the story, but it was better that she did.

Here is the essay that Jennifer Anderson wrote.

A Memory Poem:
Louise Glück’s “Gretel in Darkness”

Everyone knows the story of Hansel and Gretel, one of the best-known of Grimm’s fairy tales. In her poem “Gretel in Darkness,” Louise Glück takes for granted that we know the story—the brother and sister who are mistreated by their father and, especially, by their stepmother; their abandonment in a forest; their capture by a witch who lives in a house made of cakes and candy; the witch’s plan to fatten them up (Hansel first) and then eat them; Gretel’s killing of the witch by pushing her into an oven; and, finally, the children’s discovery of the witch’s jewels that makes them and their father (the stepmother has died) rich and happy at last. Glück’s subject is not the story itself but, instead, Gretel’s memories. “Gretel in Darkness” is a haunting poem about horrors that Gretel, Glück’s speaker, cannot forget.

The poem takes place after the witch has been killed and Hansel and Gretel have returned to the safety of their father's cottage. Everything now should be fine, Gretel says: "This is the world we wanted." "God rewards": God has heard their prayers and saved them. But as if it were still present, Gretel hears "the witch's cry," the witch whom Gretel killed. And the image about the witch's death that she uses is graphic and disturbing: "Her tongue shrivels into gas..." The witch was horrible, but this image is horrifying; it sticks in Gretel's mind, and the reader's too, like a shocking detail from a nightmare.

In a way the entire poem reports on a nightmare that Gretel is doomed to live in forever. "Why do I not forget?"--the key line in the poem, I think--really means that she knows she will always remember what happened to her and her brother. For Gretel this fairy tale does not have a happy ending.

Yet it does for her brother, or so it seems to Gretel. She resents Hansel's failure to remember as she does, and, with a vivid, direct choice of verb, she reminds him: "I killed for you." The nightmarish quality of Gretel's thoughts and feelings is shown again in the next lines, which once more make clear how much her past dominates the present:

... I see armed firs,
the spires of that gleaming kiln--

Gretel is safe but threatened, sheltered at home but still in danger. She is caught by a terrifying and terrible past she cannot break free from. The repetitions--dead/dead, bars/bar, real/real--imply that she is trapped, not able to re-enter the present and look forward to the future. She turns to her brother for help, yet without finding the support she seeks:
Nights I turn to you to hold me
but you are not there.

Hansel (who is only named once) is not there for Gretel, and at first I felt her hurt. But Glück is not meaning to criticize Hansel for his distance, his separation from his sister. Or if Glück is, she is balancing that against Gretel's absorption in the terror of her experiences. She feels that she and her brother are still in the middle of them.

As I thought further about this poem, I wondered: Strange as it sounds, maybe Gretel prefers the past to the present because the past was so real. Life is all too safe and comfortable now, while then everything, like the fire in the oven, was so earnest, that is, so serious and intense. It was not the world she wanted--who would want to be in that house of horrors! Even now her life is menaced, as those snaky "s" sounds in the middle of the final stanza suggest. But perhaps the frightful feelings, in their intensity, were (and still are) keener and deeper than anything that Gretel knew before, or knows now, in the secure world she lives in with her father and brother. She and her brother then were so absolutely close, as they are not now. Gretel cannot let go of her past, and she does not want to.

1. Jennifer Anderson’s instructor told the class that the essay should be “about 500 words.” Anderson’s paper is more than that—about 650 words. Do you think that she uses her space well? Could she have shortened the essay to bring it closer to the assigned length? If you had to suggest cuts, where would you propose to make them?

2. Does Anderson omit important details in the poem that you think she should have included in the paper? Explain why these elements should be part of her response.

3. Give Anderson’s paper a grade, and in a paragraph written to her, highlight the strengths and limitations of this paper. Provide her, too, with one or two specific suggestions for improving her writing in the next paper.

A Student’s Annotations and Essay

ADRIENNE RICH

Aunt Jennifer’s Tigers

[Aunt Jennifer’s Tigers] [1951]

Aunt Jennifer’s tigers prance across a screen,
Bright topaz denizens of a world of green.
They do not fear the men beneath the tree;
They pace in sleek chivalric certainty.

Aunt Jennifer’s fingers fluttering through her wool
Find even the ivory needle hard to pull.
The massive weight of Uncle’s wedding band
Sits heavily upon Aunt Jennifer’s hand.

When Aunt is dead, her terrified hands will lie
Still ringed with ordeals she was mastered by.
The tigers in the panel that she made
Will go on prancing, proud and unafraid.
Here are the annotations that Maria Fuentes, a first-year student, produced in the course of thinking about the poem.

Aunt Jennifer's Screen and Adrienne Rich's Poem

What especially pleases me in Adrienne Rich's "Aunt Jennifer's Tigers" is the combination of neat, tight, highly disciplined stanzas of four rhyming lines (like marching squadrons) with the explosive rebellious content of the poem. Somehow the message seems especially powerful because it is so tightly packed, because the form is so restrained.

The poem is, on the surface at least, about what the title says it is about, "Aunt Jennifer's Tigers." Aunt Jennifer has made a screen, in embroidery or needlepoint, showing tigers that "prance." Presumably Aunt Jennifer was a sweet old lady, but she has created a picture of enormous energy, expressing, through her work of art, her own repressed energy.

We learn in the second stanza that she was repressed by the man she was married to:

The massive weight of Uncle's wedding band
Sits heavily upon Aunt Jennifer's hand.

The wedding band for her, as for many women in the present as well as in the past, is like a heavy chain. Rich tells us that Aunt Jennifer was "terrified" and was "mastered," obviously by Uncle. Rich makes a pun on the word "ringed," but the joke is very bitter:

When Aunt is dead, her terrified hands will lie
Still ringed with ordeals she was mastered by.

And yet, Rich points out, this "terrified" woman created something beautiful, a picture of tigers who "go on prancing, proud and unafraid." Apparently Aunt Jennifer was able, despite being oppressed by Uncle, to make something that gives pleasure to a later generation--just as the poet, however unhappy she may be, produces a work of art that gives pleasure to those who later read it.

Aunt Jennifer's work of art shows, in the prancing tigers, an energy that she apparently felt and understood, but because of her husband and perhaps because of the period in which she lived, she could express herself only in a "ladylike" activity such as embroidering. Aunt Jennifer was "mastered" (line 10), but she had nevertheless "made" (line 11) something depicting creatures who are "proud and unafraid."
She was "terrified" (line 9), as many women were terrified by the patriarchal society in which they lived (and still live), but in her art she created an image of energy. Adrienne Rich, too, makes a work of art—a highly patterned poem consisting of three rhymed quatrains—that is as elegantly crafted as a work of embroidery. Rich speaks matter-of-factly and in a disciplined way in her quatrains about Aunt Jennifer and her tigers, but in this elegant poem she conveys energy and outrage on behalf of her terrified aunt who could not openly protest against the role that society had assigned to her.

A Student's Essay on a Theme in Several Poems by One Poet
For a collection of poems by Emily Dickinson including the ones discussed in the following essay, see pages 819–830.

Emily Dickinson was not a preacher but a poet, so if we read her poetry about God we... should not be surprised if we do not find a simple, consistent view or even a clear development from one view—for instance, belief-- to another—for instance, loss of faith. Rather, judging from some examples of her poetry, she explored various views, and we should not try to convert this variety into unity.

We can begin by looking at extreme views, first two poems of faith, and then a poem of doubt. One of the poems of faith, "Papa above!" (820), begins with a childlike or almost playful version of the Lord's Prayer. (In Matthew 6.9 Jesus begins a prayer by saying, "Our father who art in heaven.") I think this poem says that God will see to it that even a mouse or rat will get into heaven and will remain there for eternity.
But Dickinson's God is not always concerned for all of the creatures of the world. In another poem that expresses belief in the existence of God, "Apparently with no surprise" (827), Dickinson describes the frost as beheading a flower—that is, beauty perishes—and she goes on to make the point that this occurs under the eyes of "an Approving God." Here she seems to be saying that evil takes place, and God approves of it. It is important to realize that in this poem Dickinson still says that God exists, even if he is indifferent to suffering.

In another poem, "Those--dying, then" (826), Dickinson expresses doubt that God exists. In olden days, she says, people mistakenly thought that God would protect them, but now, she says,
"God cannot be found." She uses a particularly terrifying image to convey the loss of God. In the past, Dickinson says, the faithful went to "God's Right Hand," but, she goes on to say,
"The Hand is amputated now. . . ." The faith in God that earlier people had was an illusion, but it was something, and it was "better" than the nothingness we now experience. This nothingness, or something not much more than nothingness, is the subject of "I heard a Fly buzz--when I died" (823). In this poem, the speaker expects "the King" (God) to appear to her as she dies, but all she sees is a fly, and then she hears its buzz. God ("the King") never appears.

Even these few poems show that Dickinson held a variety of views about God and religion, and it is difficult or perhaps impossible for us to say exactly what her religious beliefs were. But what is certain is that religious ideas were so important to her, so much a part of her mind, that even when she was not explicitly writing about the existence of a benevolent God or the absence of God, she used religious imagery--for instance, to describe impressive things in the natural world around her. In "These are the days when Birds come back" (819), she talks about what we call Indian summer, fall days that are like summer days. But the poem is filled with religious words: "belief," "Sacrament," "Communion," "consecrated bread," "immoral wine." The fifth stanza goes like this:

Oh Sacrament of summer days,
Oh Last Communion in the Haze--
Permit a child to join.

I don't think Dickinson is really talking about traditional religion here. Instead, she is using religious imagery to talk about a particular precious moment in the seasons. As a second example of her use of religious imagery in a poem that is about nature and not about God, we might look at "There's a certain Slant of light" (821). In this poem she says that on "Wintery Afternoons" this particular light has "the Heft / Of Cathedral Tunes." That is, the wintry light has the solidity, the feel, the "heft" of religious music. When we see this light, Dickinson says, we are moved in a way that we are moved by music in church. She is not saying anything here about whether God is benevolent or not, or whether he exists or not. Rather, she is drawing on experiences in church—probably experiences shared by many people even today—to help us to see nature more effectively.

Speaking as someone who was brought up with traditional religious beliefs but who does not go to church now, I can say that Dickinson effectively represents the ideas of a believer and also of a non-believer. But what I think is especially impressive is that she sees that someone who no longer is a believer can't help but still think in religious terms when he or she sees something exceptionally beautiful, for instance on a winter day "a certain Slant of light."

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. In this essay Gottsegen comments on the poems “Papa above!,” “Apparently with no surprise,” “Those—dying, then,” “I heard a Fly buzz—when I died,” “These are the days when Birds come back,” and “There’s a certain Slant of light.” Read or reread each of these poems to see if you agree with Gottsegen’s interpretations.

2. Are there other poems by Dickinson that you think Gottsegen could have used with better effect than poems he did use? Explain.

3. Reread the concluding paragraph. Do you think it is effective? Explain.

An Essay on the Structure of a Poem

The arrangement of its parts, the organization of an entire poem, is its structure. Sometimes a poem is divided into blocks of, say, four lines each, but even when the poem is printed as a solid block, it probably has some principle of organization—for example, from sorrow in the first two lines to joy in the next two, or from a question in the first three lines to an answer in the last line.

Consider this short poem by an English poet of the seventeenth century.

ROBERT HERRICK (1591–1674)

Upon Julia’s Clothes

When as in silks my Julia goes,
Then, then, methinks, how sweetly flows
That liquefaction of her clothes.

Next, when I cast mine eyes, and see
That brave vibration, each way free,
O how that glittering taketh me!

David Thurston, a student, began thinking about this poem by copying it, double-spaced, and by making the following notes on his copy.

Upon Julia's Clothes

Whenas in silks my Julia goes, cool tone?

Then, then, methinks, how sweetly flows

That liquefaction of her clothes. "Then, then"—more excited? almost at a loss for words?

Next, when I cast mine eyes, and see

That brave vibration, each way free, free to do what?

O how that glittering taketh me!

Thurston got further ideas by thinking about several of the questions that we have given earlier in this chapter, such as:

Does the poem proceed in a straightforward way, or at some point or points does the speaker reverse course, altering his or her tone or perception?

With various questions in mind, Thurston was stimulated to see if Herrick's poem has a reversal or change and, if so, how it is related to the structure. After rereading the poem several times, thinking about it in the light of these questions and perhaps others, he produced the following notes:

Two stanzas, each of three lines, with the same structure

Basic structure of 1st stanza: When X (one line), then Y (Two lines)

Basic structure of second stanza: Next (one line), then Z (two lines)

When he marked the text after reading the poem a few times, he noticed that the last line—an exclamation of delight ("O, how that glittering taketh me")—is much more personal than the rest of the poem. A little further thought enabled him to refine this last perception:

Although the pattern of stanzas is repeated, the somewhat analytic, detached tone of the beginning ("Whenas," "Then," "Next") changes to an open, enthusiastic confession of delight in what the poet sees.

Further thinking led to this:

Although the title is "Upon Julia's Clothes," and the first five lines describe Julia's silken dress, the poem finally is not only about Julia's clothing but about the effect of Julia (moving in silk that liquefies or seems to become a liquid) on the poet.

This is a nice observation, but when Thurston looked again at the poem the next day and started to write about it, he found that he was able to refine his observation.

Even at the beginning, the speaker is not entirely detached, for he speaks of "my Julia."

In writing about Herrick's "Upon Julia's Clothes," Thurston reported, the thoughts did not come quickly or neatly. After two or three thoughts, he started to write. Only after drafting a paragraph and rereading the poem did he notice that the personal element appears not only in the last line ("taketh me") but even in the first line ("my Julia"). In short, for almost all of us, the only way to get to a good final essay is to read, to think, to jot down ideas, to write a draft, and to revise and revise again. Having gone through such processes, David Thurston came up with the following excellent essay.

By the way, Thurston did not hit on the final version of his title until shortly before he typed his final version. His preliminary title was

Structure and Personality in Herrick's "Upon Julia's Clothes"

That's a bit heavy-handed, but at least it is focused, as opposed to such an uninformative title as "On a poem." He soon revised his tentative title to

Julia, Julia's Clothing, and Julia's Poet

That's a good title: It is neat, and it is appropriate; it moves (as the poem and the essay do) from Julia and her clothing to the poet. It doesn't tell the reader exactly what the essay will be about, and three uses of Julia may be one too many, but it does stimulate the reader's interest. The essayist's final title, however, is even better:

Herrick's Julia, Julia's Herrick

Again, it is neat (the balanced structure, and structure is part of the essay's topic), less repetitive, and it moves (as the poem itself moves) from Julia to the poet.
Despite the apparently objective or detached tone of the first stanza and the first two lines of the second stanza, the poem finally conveys a strong sense of the speaker's excitement.

The first stanza seems to say, "Whenas" X (one line), "Then" Y (two lines). The second stanza repeats this basic structure of one line of assertion and two lines describing the consequence: "Next" (one line), "then" (two lines). But the logic or coolness of "Whenas," "Then," and "Next," and of such rather scientific language as liquefaction (a more technical-sounding word than "melting") and vibration is undercut by the breathlessness or excitement of "Then, then" (that is very different from a simple "Then"). It is also worth mentioning that although there is a personal rather than a fully detached note even in the first line, in "my Julia," this expression scarcely reveals much feeling. In fact, it reveals a touch of male chauvinism, a suggestion that the woman is a possession of the speaker's. Not until the last line does the speaker reveal that, far from Julia's being his possession, he is possessed by Julia: "O how that glittering taketh me!" If he begins coolly, objectively, and somewhat complacently and uses a structure that suggests a somewhat detached mind, in the exclamatory "O" he nevertheless at last confesses (to our delight) that he is enraptured by Julia.

Other things might be said about this poem. For instance, the writer says nothing about the changes in the meter and their possible value in the poem. Nor does he say anything about the sounds of any of the words (he might have commented on the long vowels in "sweetly flows" and shown how the effect would have been different if instead of "sweetly flows" Herrick had written "swiftly flits"). But such topics might be material for another essay. Furthermore, another reader might have found the poem less charming—even offensive in its exclusive concern with Julia's appearance and its utter neglect of her mind. Still, this essay is, in itself, an interesting and perceptive discussion of the way the poet used a repeated structure to set forth a miniature drama in which observation is, at the end, replaced by emotion.

An Essay on Metrics

Here is an excellent analysis by a student, Julia Jeffords, of a poem by A. E. Housman that appears on page 720. Notice that she quotes the poem and indicates the metrical pattern and that she proceeds chiefly by explaining the effect of the variations or departures from the norm in the order in which they occur.

Notice, too, that although it is a good idea to announce your thesis early—that is, in the first paragraph—this writer does not say, "This paper will show that Housman effectively uses rhythm to support his ideas" or some such thing. It's sufficient that the writer announces her topic in the title and again, in slightly different words, in the first sentence (the paper will "analyze the effects of sounds and rhythms in Housman's 'Eight O'Clock'"). We know where we will be going, and we read even with a bit of suspense, looking to see what the analysis will produce.
discussion that follows the poem some other possible scansions will be proposed.

He stood, and heard the steeple
Sprinkle the quarters on the morning town.
One, two, three, four, to market-place and people
It tossed them down.
Strapped, noosed, nighing his hour.
He stood and counted them and cursed his luck;
And then the clock collected in the tower
Its strength, and struck.

As the first line of the second stanza makes especially clear, the poem is about a hanging at eight o'clock, according to the title. Housman could have written about the man's thoughts on the justice or injustice of his fate, or about the reasons for the execution, but he did not. Except for the second line of the second stanza—"He stood and counted them and cursed his luck"—he seems to tell us little about the man's thoughts. But the poem is not merely a narrative of an event; the sound effects in the poem help to convey an idea as well as a story.

The first line establishes an iambic pattern. The second line begins with a trochee ("Sprinkle"), not an iamb, and later in the line possibly "on" should not be stressed even though I marked it with a stress and made it part of an iambic foot, but still the line is mainly iambic. The poem so far is a fairly jingling description of someone's hearing the church clock chiming at each quarter of the hour. Certainly, even though the second line begins with a stress, there is nothing threatening in "Sprinkle," a word in which we almost hear a tinkle.

But the second half of the first stanza surprises us and maybe even jolts us. In "One, two, three, four" we get four consecutive heavy stresses. These stresses are especially emphatic because there is a pause, indicated by a comma, after each of them. Time is not just passing to the chimes of a clock: This is a countdown, and we sense that it may lead to something significant. Moreover, the third line, which is longer than the two previous lines, does not end with a pause. This long line (eleven syllables) runs on into the next line, almost as though once the countdown has begun there is no stopping it. But then we do stop suddenly, because the last line of the stanza has only four syllables--far fewer than we would have expected. In other words, this line stops unexpectedly because it has only two feet. The first line had three feet, and the second and third lines had five feet. Furthermore, this short, final line of the stanza ends with a heavy stress in contrast to the previous line, which ends with an unstressed syllable, "people." As we will see, the sudden stopping at the end is a sort of preview of a life cut short. Perhaps it is also a preview of a man dropping through a trapdoor and then suddenly stopping when the slack in the hangman's rope has been taken up.

In the first line of the second stanza the situation is made clear, and it is also made emphatic by three consecutive stresses: "Strapped, noosed, nighing his hour." The pauses before the first three stresses make the words especially emphatic. And though I have marked the first two words of the next line "He stood," possibly "He" should be stressed too. In any case even if "He" is not heavily stressed, it is certainly stressed more than the other unstressed syllables, "and," "-ed" (in "counted"), and "his." Similarly in the third line of the stanza an effective reading might even stress the first word as well as the second, thus: "And then." And although normal speech would stress only the second syllable in "collected," in this poem the word appears after "clock," and so one must pause after the k sound in "clock" (one simply can't say "clock collected" without pausing briefly between the two words), and the effect is to put more than usual stress on the first syllable, almost turning it into "collected." And so this line can reasonably be scanned like this:

And then the clock collected in the tower

And again the third line of the stanza runs over into the fourth, propelling us onward. The final line surely begins with a stress, even though "Its" is not a word usually stressed, and so in the final line we begin with two strong stresses, "Its strength." This line, like the last line of the first stanza, is unusually short, and it, too, ends with a heavy stress. The total effect, then, of the last two lines of this stanza is of a clock striking, not just sprinkling music but forcefully and emphatically and decisively striking. The pause after "strength" is almost like the suspenseful pause of a man's collecting his strength before he strikes a blow, and that is what the clock does:

And then the clock collected in the tower

It's strength and struck.

If "clock collected" has in its k sounds a sort of ticktock effect, the clock at the end shows its force, for when it strikes the hour, the man dies.

I said near the beginning of this essay that Housman did not write about the man’s thoughts about the justice or injustice of the sentence, and I think this is more or less true, but if we take into account the sound effects in the poem we can see that in part the poem is about the man’s thoughts: He sees himself as the victim not only of his “luck” but of this machine, this ticking, unstoppable contraption that strikes not only the hours but a man’s life.

A Brief Overview of the Essay
- The title suggests the writer’s topic, and the first sentence of the opening paragraph establishes it without doubt: “the effects of sounds and rhythms” in a particular poem. This paragraph also includes some sentences whereby the author quite reasonably indicates her awareness that not everyone will scan the poem exactly as she does. Willingness to concede differences of opinion is a good argumentative strategy; it establishes the reader as a person who is open-minded.
- Jeffords provides the reader with the text of the poem, marked with her sense of the stresses. Don’t expect your reader to read your paper and also to be thumbing through a book to find the poem.
- The organization is simple but adequate. Jeffords begins at the beginning and moves through the poem to its end.
- In her final paragraph Jeffords interestingly modifies an assertion she made earlier, that Housman “did not write about the man’s thoughts about the justice or injustice of the sentence.” She now shows that, in a way, the metrical effects—her chief topic—do tell us something about the victim’s thoughts. This modification is not a contradiction. If indeed she now sees that Housman did write about these topics, she of course should have revised the earlier passage. But the earlier passage remains true, at least in a broad sense. Housman did not write about the victim’s thoughts about justice. What Jeffords is saying, at the end of her essay, is that the metrical effects do in some degree get us into the mind of the victim, helping us to see him as someone struck down by an implacable machine.

Two Essays, for Evaluation, on Robert Frost’s “Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening”

Darrel MacDonald’s Annotations and Essay

Here are the annotations that a student, Darrel MacDonald, jotted down, followed by the final version of the essay that he developed from the annotations.

Whose woods these are I think I know.
His house is in the village, though;
He will not see me stopping here
To watch his woods fill up with snow.

My little horse must think it queer
To stop without a farmhouse near
Between the woods and frozen lake
The darkest evening of the year.

He gives his harness bells a shake
To ask if there is some mistake.
The only other sound’s the sweep
Of easy wind and downy flake.

The woods are lovely dark and deep,
But I have promises to keep,
And miles to go before I sleep,
And miles to go before I sleep.

Now for the essay that MacDonald developed out of these annotations.
Darrel MacDonald's Essay on Robert Frost

Stopping by Woods--and Going On

Robert Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" is about what the title says it is. It is also about something more than the title says.

When I say it is about what the title says, I mean that the poem really does give us the thoughts of a person who pauses (that is, a person who is "stopping") by woods on a snowy evening. (This person probably is a man, since Robert Frost wrote the poem and nothing in the poem clearly indicates that the speaker is not a man. But, and this point will be important, the speaker perhaps feels that he is not a very masculine man. As we will see, the word "queer" appears in the poem, and, also, the speaker uses the word "lovely," which sounds more like the word a woman would use than a man.) In line 3 the speaker says he is "stopping here," and it is clear that "here" is by woods, since "woods" is mentioned not only in the title but also in the first line of the poem, and again in the second stanza, and still again in the last stanza. It is equally clear that, as the title says, there is snow, and that the time is evening. The speaker mentions "snow" and "downy flake," and he says this is "The darkest evening of the year."

But in what sense is the poem about more than the title? The title does not tell us anything about the man who is "stopping by woods," but the poem--the man's meditation--tells us a lot about him. In the first stanza he reveals that he is uneasy at the thought that the owner of the woods may see him stopping by the woods. Maybe he is uneasy because he is trespassing, but the poem does not actually say that he has illegally entered someone else's property. More likely, he feels uneasy, almost ashamed, of watching the "woods fill up with snow." That is, he would not want anyone to see that he is enjoying a beautiful aspect of nature and is not hurrying about whatever his real business is in thrifty Yankee style.

The second stanza gives more evidence that he feels guilty about enjoying beauty. He feels so guilty that he even thinks the horse thinks there is something odd about him. In fact, he says that the horse thinks he is "queer," which of course may just mean odd, but also (as is shown by The American Heritage Dictionary) it can mean "gay," "homosexual." A real man, he sort of suggests, wouldn't spend time looking at snow in the woods.

So far, then, the speaker in two ways has indicated that he feels insecure, though perhaps he does not realize that he has given himself away. First, he expresses uneasiness that someone might see him watching the woods fill up with snow. Second, he expresses uneasiness when he suggests that even the horse thinks he is strange, maybe even "queer" or unmanly, or at least unbusinesslike. And so in the last stanza, even though he finds the woods beautiful, he decides not to stop and to see the woods fill up with snow. And his description of the woods as "lovely"--a woman's word--sounds as though he may be something less than a he-man. He seems to feel ashamed of himself for enjoying the sight of the snowy woods and for seeing them as "lovely," and so he tells himself that he has spent enough time looking at the woods and that he must go on about his business. In fact, he tells himself twice that he has business to attend to. Why?

Perhaps he is insisting too much. Just as we saw that he was excessively nervous in the first stanza, afraid that someone might see him trespassing and enjoying the beautiful spectacle, now at the end he is again afraid that someone might see him loitering, and so he very firmly, using repetition as a form of emphasis, tries to reassure himself that he is not too much attracted by beauty and is a man of business who keeps his promises.

Frost gives us, then, a man who indeed is seen "stopping by woods on a snowy evening," but a man who, afraid of what society will think of him, is also afraid to "stop" long enough to fully enjoy the sight that attracts him because he is driven by a sense that he may be seen to be trespassing and also may be thought to be unmanly.
So after only a brief stop in the woods he forces himself to go on, a victim (though he probably doesn't know it) of the work ethic and of an over-simple idea of manliness.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING
1. In a sentence or two state the thesis of the essay.
2. Is the thesis adequately supported? Explain, pointing out strengths, if any,
   and weaknesses, if any.
3. Do you find the organization satisfactory? Why, or why not?
4. Do you find the title and the opening paragraph of interest? If not, how might you improve them?
5. Given the thesis and the development of it, is the final paragraph satisfactory? Why, or why not?
6. If you think that, on the whole, the essay is effectively written, take two or three sentences and explain what their strengths are. If you think that, on the whole, the writing could be more effective, take two or three sentences and revise them into more effective sentences. (It's not a matter of agreeing or of disagreeing with the argument; we are talking chiefly about style.)

Sara Fong’s Journal Entry and Essay

The second student, Sara Fong, kept a journal. We give an entry from her journal concerning Frost’s poem and then the final version of her essay.

I think that when the class talked about "the death wish" in "Stopping by Woods," they were on to something, but they went too far. It's not really a "death wish." The poet wants to lose himself, so to speak, by merging himself with the woods ("the woods are lovely, dark and deep"), or maybe with the soft white snow ("downy flake"), but that's not really the same as saying he wishes for death. Still, the beauty of the woods--we might say the world of peaceful solitude--is set against the world of the living, the world of "promises" to other humans.

We have already studied short stories this term, and I think it is a good idea to see this poem as a very short short story. As I see it, the plot has three stages: (1) the character (the poet) has fairly ordinary thoughts as he looks at the wood (he thinks of the person who owns it and of the owner's house in the village), but soon he begins to feel that there is something special, something odd ("queer") in looking at the woods on what is, in fact, a special day ("The darkest evening of the year"). Then (2) he seems to get almost fully caught up with (or drawn in by) the beauty of the scene ("easy wind and downy flake," "The woods are lovely, dark and deep"), and then, finally, (3) he shakes off the pull of nature, the appeal of nature that has almost made him forget everything else.

I'm not so sure, come to think of it, that at the very end he does completely reject the impulse to give himself up to nature. He repeats the last line ("And miles to go before I sleep, / And miles to go before I sleep"), and it seems to me that maybe this repetition is sort of hypnotic, almost as though he is drowsing off. I feel this, and when I read the lines aloud I can make them sound almost as though the speaker is drowsing off, but I'm not really sure that I'm right. After all, I can also read them aloud so they sound sort of perky or chipper, with a sense of "Well, I've put that behind me." I wonder if there is any way of deciding exactly how the last two lines should be read.

Now for Sara Fong's essay. You'll notice that it draws heavily on her journal, but it differs in two important ways. First, whereas in the journal she saw the story as having three stages, in the final essay she sees four stages. (What in the journal is said to be the first stage of the poem, in the essay becomes two stages.) Second, you'll notice that the point made in the last paragraph of the journal is not included in the essay. Why? Here are three possibilities: (1) Fong came to feel that the point was not sound; (2) she came to feel that the point was sound but not worth making; (3) she came to feel that the point, though interesting and sound and worth making, required more space than was available. It was, so to speak, the material for a different paper. Doubtless you can think of other reasons why Fong omitted the point in the final paper.

"Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening"
as a Short Story

Robert Frost's "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening" can be read as a poem about a man who pauses to observe the beauty of nature, and it can also be read as a poem about a man with a death wish, a man who seems to long to give himself up completely to nature and thus escape his responsibilities as a citizen. Much depends, apparently, on what a reader wants to emphasize. For instance, a reader can emphasize especially appealing lines about the beauty of nature: "The only other sound's the sweep / Of easy wind and downy flake," and "The woods are lovely, dark and deep." On the other hand, a reader can emphasize lines that show the speaker is fully aware of the responsibilities that most of us agree we have. For instance, at the very start of the poem he recognizes that the woods are not his but are owned by someone else, and at the end of the poem he recognizes that he has "promises to keep" and that before he sleeps (dies?) he must accomplish many things (go for "miles").

Does a reader have to choose between these two interpretations? I don't think so; to the contrary, I think it makes sense to read the poem as a kind of very short story, with a character whose developing thoughts make up a plot with four stages. In the first stage, the central figure is an ordinary person with rather ordinary thoughts. His very first thought is of the owner of the woods. He knows who the owner is, and since the owner lives in the village, the poet feels safe in trespassing, or at least in watching the woods "fill up with snow." Then, very subtly, the poet begins to tell us that although this seems to be an ordinary person thinking ordinary thoughts, he is a somewhat special person in a special situation. First, the horse thinks something is strange. He shakes his bells, wondering why the driver doesn't keep moving, as presumably ordinary drivers would. Second, we are told that this is "The darkest evening of the year." Frost could simply have said that the evening is dark, but he goes out of his way to make the evening a special evening.

We are now through with the first ten lines, and only six lines remain, yet in these six lines the story goes through two additional phases. The first three of these lines ("The only other sound's the sweep / Of easy wind and downy flake" and "The woods are lovely, dark and deep") are probably the most beautiful lines, in the sense that they are the ones that make us say, "I wish I were there," or "I'd love to experience this." We feel that the poet has moved from the ordinary thoughts of the first stanza, about such business-like things as who owns the woods and where the owner's house is, to less materialistic thoughts, thoughts about the beauty of the non-human world of nature. And now, with the three final lines, we get the fourth stage of the story, the return to the ordinary world of people, the world of "promises." But this world that we get at the end is not exactly the same as the world we got at the beginning. The world at the beginning of the poem is a world of property (who owns the woods, and where the house is), but the world at the end of the poem is a world of unspecified and rather mysterious responsibilities ("promises to keep," "miles to go before I sleep"). It is almost as though the poet's experience of the beauty of nature—a beauty that for a moment made him forget the world of property—has in fact served to sharpen his sense that human beings have responsibilities. He clearly sees that "The woods are lovely, dark and deep," and then he says (I add the italics) "But I have promises to keep." The "but" would be logical if after saying that the woods are lovely, dark and deep, he had said something like "But in the daylight they look different," or "But one can freeze to death in them." The logic of what Frost says, however, is not at all clear: "The woods are lovely, dark and deep, / But I have promises to keep." What is the logical connection? We have to supply one, something like "but, because we are human beings we have responsibilities; we can refresh ourselves by perceiving the beauties of nature, and we can even for a moment get so caught up that we seem to enter an enchanted forest ('the woods are lovely, dark and deep'), but we cannot forget our responsibilities."

My point is not that Frost ends with an important moral, and it is also not that we have to choose between saying it is a poem about nature or a poem about a man with a death wish. Rather, my point is that the poem takes us through several stages and that, although the poem begins and ends with the speaker in the woods, the speaker has undergone mental experiences--has, we might say, gone through a plot with a conflict (the appeal of the snowy woods versus the call to return to the human world). It’s not a matter of good versus evil and of one side’s winning. Frost in no way suggests that it is wrong to feel the beauty of nature--even to the momentary exclusion of all other thoughts. But the poem is certainly not simply a praise of the beauty of nature. Frost shows us, in this mini-story or mini-drama, one character who sees the woods as property, then sees them as a place of almost overwhelming beauty, and then (maybe refreshed by this experience) rejoins the world of chores and responsibilities.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

We can ask of this essay the same questions we asked of the previous essay.
1. In a sentence or two state the thesis of the essay.
2. Is the thesis adequately supported? Explain, pointing out strengths, if any, and weaknesses, if any.
3. Do you find the organization satisfactory? Why, or why not?
4. Do you find the title and the opening paragraph of interest? If not, how might you improve them?
5. Given the thesis and the development of it, is the final paragraph satisfactory? Why, or why not?
Poets at Work

When we read a poem aloud, whether an anonymous nursery rhyme such as “Jack and Jill went up the hill” or a work by one of the great names, the words seem so right, so inevitable, that it is hard to believe they did not flow easily. Reading, say, Keats’s “On First Looking into Chapman’s Homer” (page 673), we may think that he must have sat down and simply let the words stream from his pen. And certainly Keats himself emphasized spontaneity: In a letter he says, “If poetry comes not as naturally as leaves to a tree it had better not come at all.” Yet Keats’s manuscripts indicated that he revised his work heavily, so heavily that some of the manuscripts are almost indecipherable. Probably William Butler Yeats was speaking for all poets when he said (in a poem called “Adam’s Curse”) that a poem must seem spontaneous but is the result of hard work:

A line will take us hours maybe;
Yet if it does not seem a moment’s thought,
Our stitching and unstitching has been naught.

In this chapter we give the following material:

1. Two versions of a poem by Walt Whitman.
2. Two versions of a poem by Cathy Song, introduced by her comments.
3. Three versions of a poem by Yeats.

Walt Whitman (1819–1892) was born in a farmhouse in rural Long Island, New York, but was brought up in Brooklyn, then an independent city in New York. He attended public school for a few years (1825–1830), apprenticed as a printer in the 1830s, and then worked as a typesetter, journalist, and newspaper editor. In 1855 he published the first edition of a collection of his poems, Leaves of Grass, a book that he revised and published in one edition after another throughout the remainder of his life. During the Civil War he served as a volunteer nurse for the Union army.

In the third edition of Leaves of Grass (1860) Whitman added two groups of poems, one called “Children of Adam” and the other (named for an aromatic grass that grows near ponds and swamps) called “Calamus.” “Children of Adam” celebrates heterosexual relations, whereas “Calamus” celebrates
Chapter 20 / Poets at Work

Walt Whitman, 1860 manuscript of the poem “Once I Passed Through a Populous City,” included in the “Enfans d’Adam” (Children of Adam) section of Leaves of Grass (1860 ed.). The extensive markings on this page, some of them in dark ink and others in light pencil, show that Whitman revised this poem carefully. Notice, for example, that Whitman wrote and crossed out both “great” and “populous” and then seemed to settle on the word “celebrated,” only to write (barely visible in the upper right corner) “populous” again, which became his final choice for the phrase “a populous city.” Note, too, the changes in gender from “only a man” and “that youth” (crossed out) and “one rude and ignorant man” to—in the published poem—that “woman” and “she holds me.” (Manuscript of Walt Whitman’s “Once I Passed Through a Populous City” in Leaves of Grass, Walt Whitman, MSS 3829, Clifton Waller Barrett Library of American Literature, Special Collections, University of Virginia Library. what Whitman called “manly love.” Although many of the “Calamus” poems seem clearly homosexual, perhaps the very fact that Whitman published them made them seem relatively innocent; in any case, those nineteenth-century critics who condemned Whitman for the sexuality of his writing concentrated on the poems in “Children of Adam.”

Enfans d’Adam, number 9

[Leaves of Grass, 1860 edition]

Once, I passed through a populous city, imprinting my brain, for future use, with its shows, architecture, customs and traditions; Yet now, of all that city, I remember only a woman I casually met there, who detained me for love of me,

Day by day and night by night we were together,—All else has long been forgotten by me,

I remember I say only that woman that passionately clung to me,

Again we wander—we love—we separate again,

Again she holds me by the hand—I must not go!
I see her close beside me, with silent lips, sad and tremulous.

CATHY SONG

Cathy Song, born in Honolulu in 1955 of a Chinese-American mother and a Korean-American father, holds a bachelor’s degree from Wellesley College and a master’s degree in creative writing from Boston University. She is the author of three books of poems, the first of which, Picture Bride (1983), was the winner in the Yale Series of Younger Poets. She has also won the Hawaii Award for Literature and the Shelley Memorial Award from the Poetry Society of America.

Here we print a draft of an untitled poem and the final version, now titled “Out of Our Hands.” Ms. Song has kindly provided us with a comment on the origins of the poem.

“Out of Our Hands” was written for the poet Wing Tek Lum. Long before Wing Tek and I became friends, I had already encountered his work. The poem is informed by our friendship; my abiding respect for the poet is deepened by my affection for the man. Knowing the reality of his warm humanity allowed me to imagine the poem in a larger context—what I had felt in his poems was present and true—and in a sense, when I first encountered his work, I was ready to receive the “seeds of a language / I needed to know.” I was ready for this poet who had something to teach me.

The sense of magic and transformation is alive and well in the poem because his poems, his presence allowed that to happen with me. The images of birds and flight, children and language have everything to do with the way gifts are given and received—serendipitous and yet, there are no coincidences. When a poem is written there is someone out there waiting to read it, to have the gift descend, touch you like a leaf, a feather, a letter written just for you.

dismantling the air
above the school.
I watched the letters form the bird
seeds of a language
I needed to know,
a language borrowed from the children I taught who shivered in borrowed coats.
Toward evening they scattered outside the school, red-bricked and torn on the edge of Chinatown.
I watched them disappear into their lives,
undisciplined like starlings,
they disappeared
in the broken shoes of the wind.
One day your name came back

writing in another city, a poem you were determined to write for the rest of your life.
The poem a subversive act.
The poem about being Chinese,

WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS:
“LEDA AND THE SWAN” (THREE VERSIONS)

William Butler Yeats (1865–1939) was born in Dublin, Ireland. The young Yeats was much interested in highly lyrical, romantic poetry, often drawing on Irish mythology. The later poems, from about 1910 (and especially after Yeats met Ezra Pound in 1911), are often more colloquial. Although these later poems often employ mythological references, too, one feels that the poems are more down-to-earth. Yeats was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1923.

According to Greek mythology, Zeus fell in love with Leda, disguised himself as a swan, and ravished her. Among the offspring of this union were Helen and Clytemnestra. Paris abducted Helen, causing the Greeks to raze Troy; Clytemnestra, wife of Agamemnon, murdered her husband on his triumphant return to Greece. Yeats saw political significance in the myth of beauty and war engendered by a god;
but, as he tells us, when he was composing “Leda and the Swan” the political significance evaporated:

After the individualistic, demagogic movements, founded by Hobbes and popularized by the Encyclopaedists and the French Revolution, we have a soil so exhausted that it cannot grow that crop again for centuries. Then I thought “Nothing is now possible but some movement, or birth from above, preceded by some violent annunciation.” My fancy began to play with Leda and the Swan for metaphor, and I began this poem, but as I wrote, bird and lady took such possession of the scene that all politics went out of it.

The first version of the poem, titled “Annunciation,” is from a manuscript dated 18 September 1923; the second version was printed in a magazine, June 1924; the third version, first published in his Collected Poems of 1933, is Yeats’s final one. But this third version had been almost fully achieved by 1925; the 1933 version differs from the 1925 version only in two punctuation marks: The question marks at the ends of lines 6 and 8 in the latest version were, in 1925, respectively, a comma and a semicolon.
Annunciation [1923]

Now can the swooping Godhead have his will Yet hovers, though her helpless thighs are pressed
By the webbed toes; and that all powerful bill
Has suddenly bowed her face upon his breast,
How can those terrified vague fingers push
The feathered glory from her loosening thighs?
All the stretched body’s laid on that white rush
And feels the strange heart beating where it lies
A shudder in the loins engenders there
The broken wall, the burning roof and tower
And Agamemnon dead . . .

Being so caught up
Did nothing pass before her in the air?
Did she put on his knowledge with his power
Before the indifferent beak could let her drop.

Leda and the Swan [1924]

A rush, a sudden wheel, and hovering still
The bird descends, and her frail thighs are pressed
By the webbed toes, and that all-powerful bill
Has laid her helpless face upon his breast.
How can those terrified vague fingers push
The feathered glory from her loosening thighs!
All the stretched body’s laid on the white rush
And feels the strange heart beating where it lies;
A shudder in the loins engenders there
The broken wall, the burning roof and tower
And Agamemnon dead.

Being so caught up,
So mastered by the brute blood of the air,
Did she put on his knowledge with his power
Before the indifferent beak could let her drop?
Leda and the Swan

A sudden blow: the great wings beating still Above the staggering girl, her thighs caressed
By the dark webs, her nape caught in his bill,
He holds her helpless breast upon his breast.

How can those terrified vague fingers push
The feathered glory from her loosening thighs?
And how can body, laid in that white rush,
But feel the strange heart beating where it lies?

A shudder in the loins engenders there
The broken wall, the burning roof and tower
And Agamemnon dead.

Being so caught up,
So mastered by the brute blood of the air,
Did she put on his knowledge with his power
Before the indifferent beak could let her drop?
CHAPTER 21

Variations on Themes: Poems and Paintings

WRITING ABOUT POEMS AND PAINTINGS

Are there, one may ask, significant correspondences among the arts? If we talk about rhythm in a painting, are we talking about a quality similar to rhythm in a poem? Are the painter’s colors comparable to the poet’s images? Does it make sense to say, as Goethe (1749–1832) said, that architecture is frozen music? Or to call architecture “music in space”? Many artists of one sort have felt that their abilities ought to enable them to move into a “sister art,” and they have tried their hand at something outside their specialty, usually with no great success. (William Blake, represented in this book by several poems and pictures, is often said to be the only figure in English arts who is significant both as a poet and as a painter.) For instance, the painter Edgar Degas (1834–1917) tried to write sonnets, but could not satisfy even himself. When he complained to his friend, the poet Stéphane Mallarmé, that he couldn’t write poems even though he had plenty of ideas, Mallarmé replied, “You don’t write poems with ideas; you write them with words.”

Painters have been moved, for many centuries, to illustrate texts. More than two thousand years ago the painters of Greek vases illustrated the Greek myths, and from the Middle Ages onward artists have illustrated the Bible. Conversely, poets have been moved to write about paintings or sculptures. In this chapter we reprint several poems about paintings by Brueghel, van Gogh, and others.

Despite Mallarmé’s witty remark that poems are made not with ideas but with words (and despite Archibald MacLeish’s assertion, on page 918, that “A poem should not mean/But be”), of course poems use ideas, and of course they have meanings. When you read the poems that we print along with paintings, you might think about some of the following questions:

- What is your own first response to the painting? In interpreting the painting, consider the subject matter, the composition (for instance, balanced masses, as opposed to an apparent lack of equilibrium), the technique (for instance, vigorous brushstrokes of thick paint, as opposed to thinly applied strokes that leave no trace of the artist’s hand), the color, and the title.
Now that you have read the poem, do you see the painting in a somewhat different way?
• To what extent does the poem illustrate the painting, and to what extent does it depart from the painting and make a very different statement?
• Beyond the subject matter, what (if anything) do the two works have in common?

A SAMPLE STUDENT ESSAY

On page 805 read (preferably aloud) Anne Sexton’s “The Starry Night,” which was inspired by van Gogh’s painting of the same name. Then read the following essay.

Two Ways of Looking at a Starry Night

About a hundred years ago Vincent van Gogh looked up into the sky at night and painted what he saw, or what he felt. We know that he was a very religious man, but even if we had not heard this in an art course or read it in a book we would know it from his painting The Starry Night, which shows a glorious heaven, with stars so bright that they all have halos. Furthermore, almost in the lower center of the picture is a church, with its steeple rising above the hills and pointing to the heavens.

Anne Sexton’s poem is about this painting, and also (we know from the line she quotes above the poem) about van Gogh’s religious vision of the stars. But her poem is not about the heavenly comfort that the starry night offered van Gogh. It is a poem about her wish to die. As I understand the poem, she wants to die in a blaze of light, and to become extinct. She says, in the last line of the poem, that she wants to disappear with "no cry" (805), but this seems to me to be very different from anything van Gogh is saying. His picture is about the glorious heavens, not about himself. Or if it is about himself, it is about how wonderful he feels when he sees God's marvelous creation. Van Gogh is concerned with praising God as God expresses himself in nature; Anne Sexton is concerned with expressing her anguish and with her hope that she can find extinction. Sexton's world is not ruled by a benevolent God but is ruled by an "old unseen serpent." The night is a "rushing beast," presided over by a "great dragon."

Sexton has responded to the painting in a highly unique way. She is not trying to put van Gogh's picture into words that he might approve of. Rather, she has boldly used the picture as a point of departure for her own word-picture.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Do you agree with this student's analysis, especially her point about Sexton's poem?
2. Has the student cited and examined passages from the poem in a convincing way?
3. A general question: Do you think poets are obliged to be faithful to the paintings that they write about, or do poets enjoy the freedom—a kind of poetic license—to interpret a painting just as they choose, doing with it whatever the purpose of the poem requires?

JANE FLANDERS

Jane Flanders, born in Waynesboro, Pennsylvania, in 1940, and educated at Bryn Mawr College and Columbia University, is the author of three books of poems. Among her awards are poetry fellowships from the National Endowment for the Arts and the New York Foundation for the Arts.

Van Gogh’s Bed

is orange,
like Cinderella’s coach, like the sun when he looked it straight in the eye.

is narrow,
he slept alone, tossing between two pillows, while it carried him bumpily to the ball.

is clumsy,
but friendly. A peasant built the frame; an old wife beat the mattress till it rose like meringue.

Vincent van Gogh, Vincent’s Bed in Arles, oil on canvas, 72 × 90 cm. (Vincent van Gogh Museum, Amsterdam, Vincent van Gogh Foundation.)
is empty,
morning light pours in like wine, melody, fragrance,
the memory of happiness.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

Jane Flanders has told us that the poem is indebted not only to the painting but also to two comments in letters that van Gogh wrote to his brother, Theo:

I can tell you that for my part I will try to keep a straight course, and will paint the most simple, the most common things.

(December 1884)

My eyes are still tired, but then I had a new idea in my head and here is the sketch of it. . . . It’s just simply my bedroom, only here color is to do everything, and giving by its simplification a grander style to things, is to be suggestive here of rest or of sleep in general. In a word, to look at the picture ought to rest the brain or rather the imagination.

(September 1888)

1. Does the painting convey “rest” to you? If not, has van Gogh failed to paint a picture of interest? What does the picture convey to you?
2. In an earlier version, the last stanza of the poem went thus:

   empty,
   morning light pours in like wine; the sheets are what they are, casting no shadows.

Which version do you prefer? Why?

Mourning Picture [1965]

They have carried the mahogany chair and the cane rocker out under the lilac bush, and my father and mother darkly sit there, in black clothes. Our clapboard house stands fast on its hill, my doll lies in her wicker pram gazing at western Massachusetts. This was our world. I could remake each shaft of grass feeling its rasp on my fingers, draw out the map of every lilac leaf or the net of veins on my father’s grief-tranced hand.

Out of my head, half-bursting, still filling, the dream condenses— shadows, crystals, ceilings, meadows, globes of dew. Under the dull green of the lilacs, out in the light carving each spoke of the pram, the turned porch-pillars, under high early-summer clouds, I am Effie, visible and invisible, remembering and remembered.

They will move from the house, give the toys and pets away. Mute and rigid with loss my mother will ride the train to Baptist Corner, the silk-spool will run bare. I tell you, the thread that bound us lies faint as a web in the dew. Should I make you, world, again, could I give back the leaf its skeleton, the air its early-summer cloud, the house its noonday presence, shadowless, and leave this out? I am Effie, you were my dream.

CATHY SONG

Cathy Song, born in Honolulu in 1955 of a Chinese-American mother and a Korean-American father, holds a bachelor’s degree from Wellesley College and a master’s degree in creative writing from Boston University. She is the author of three books of poems, the first of which, Picture Bride (1983), was the winner in the Yale Series of Younger Poets. She has also won the Hawaii Award for Literature and the Shelley Memorial Award from the Poetry Society of America. Another poem by Song appears on page 788.

*Kitagawa Utamaro (1754–1806) lived in Edo (now called Tokyo). He specialized in designing pictures of courtesans and actors that were then used to make woodblock prints. Brothels and the theater were important parts of what was called the Floating World—that is, the world of transient pleasure.
Beauty and Sadness

for Kitagawa Utamaro

He drew hundreds of women in studies unfolding like flowers from a fan. Teahouse waitresses, actresses, geishas, courtesans and maids. They arranged themselves before this quick, nimble man whose invisible presence one feels in these prints is as delicate as the skinlike paper he used to transfer and retain their fleeting loveliness. Crouching like cats, they purred amid the layers of kimono swirling around them as though they were bathing in a mountain pool with irises growing in the silken sunlit water. Or poised like porcelain vases, slender, erect and tall: their heavy brocaded hair was piled high with sandalwood combs and blossom sprigs poking out like antennae. They resembled beautiful iridescent insects, creatures from a floating world. Utamaro absorbed these women of Edo in their moments of melancholy. He captured the wisp of shadows, the half-draped body emerging from a bath; whatever skin was exposed was powdered white as snow. A private space disclosed. Portraying another girl catching a glimpse of her own vulnerable face in the mirror, he transposed the trembling plum lips like a drop of blood soaking up the white expanse of paper. At times, indifferent to his inconsolable eye, the women drifted through the soft gray feathered light, maintaining stillness, the moments in between. Like the dusty ash-winged moths that cling to the screens in summer and that the Japanese venerate as ancestors reincarnated; Utamaro graced these women with immortality in the thousand sheaves of prints fluttering into the reverent hands of keepers: the dwarfed and bespectacled painter holding up to a square of sunlight what he had carried home beneath his coat one afternoon in winter.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. In the first stanza the women in Utamaro’s prints possess a “fleeting loveliness.” What does “fleeting” suggest here? What are Utamaro’s characteristics in this stanza?
2. In the second stanza would you say that the women are beautiful, or not? And in the third stanza? What do they look like in each stanza?
3. In the last stanza, in the last few lines, we learn that Utamaro was a “dwarfed and bespectacled painter.” We might have learned this earlier or not at all. Why does Song wait until this late in the poem to tell us?
CARL PHILLIPS

Carl Phillips was born in 1959 in Everett, Washington, and educated at Harvard and at Boston University. African-American, gay, a scholar of classical Greek and Latin, and the author of several books of poetry, he has taught creative writing at Harvard, and he now teaches English and African-American Studies at Washington University in St. Louis.

Luncheon on the Grass  [1993]

They’re a curious lot, Manet’s scandalous lunch partners. The two men, lost in cant and full dress, their legs sprawled subway-style, as men’s legs invariably are, seem remarkably unruffled, all but oblivious to their nude female companion. Her nudity is puzzling and correct; clothes for her are surely only needed to shrug a shoulder out of. She herself appears baldly there-for-the-ride; her eyes, moving out toward the viewer, are wide with the most banal, detached surprise, as if to say, “where’s the real party?”

Edouard Manet, Déjeuner sur l’Herbe, 1863, oil on canvas, 6'9" × 8'10". (Musée d’Orsay, Paris/Art Resource.)
Now, in a comparable state of outdoor undress, I’m beginning to have a fair idea of what’s going on in that scene. Watching you, in clothes, remove one boot to work your finger toward an itch in your athletic sock, I look for any similarities between art and our afternoon here on abandoned property. The bather in the painting’s background, presumably there for a certain balance of composition, is for us an ungainly, rusted green dumpster, rising from overgrown weeds that provide a contrast only remotely pastoral. We are two to Manet’s main group of three, but the hum of the odd car or truck on the highway below us offers a transient third. Like the nude, I don’t seem especially hungry, partly because it’s difficult eating naked when everyone else is clothed, partly because you didn’t remember I hate chicken salad. The beer you opened for me sits untouched, going flat in the sun. I stroke the wet bottle fitfully, to remind myself just how far we’ve come or more probably have always been from the shape of romance. My dear, this is not art; we’re not anywhere close to Arcadia.

38 Arcadia an ancient region in Greece, traditionally associated in art and literature with the simple, pastoral life, a Golden Age of unfailing romantic love.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. The author is openly gay. Does knowledge of his sexual orientation affect the way in which you read the poem? Explain.
2. Do you agree that the speaker and the partner are “not anywhere close / to Arcadia”? Support your response with evidence.
Anne Sexton (1928–1974) was born in Newton, Massachusetts. She attended Garland Junior College, married at 20, and began a life as a housewife. After a mental breakdown at the age of 28 she took up writing poetry at the suggestion of a therapist. She published eight books of poetry, the third of which won a Pulitzer Prize. Despite her literary success, her life was deeply troubled. She committed suicide in 1974.

Another poem by Anne Sexton appears on page 930.
The Starry Night

[1961]

That does not keep me from having a terrible need of—shall I say the word—religion. Then I go out at night to paint the stars.

—Vincent van Gogh in a letter to his brother

The town does not exist except where one black-haired tree slips up like a drowned woman into the hot sky. The town is silent. The night boils with eleven stars. Oh starry starry night! This is how I want to die.

It moves. They are all alive. Even the moon bulges in its orange irons to push children, like a god, from its eye. The old unseen serpent swallows up the stars. Oh starry starry night! This is how I want to die:

into that rushing beast of the night, sucked up by that great dragon, to split from my life with no flag, no belly, no cry.

TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

Sexton calls her poem “The Starry Night” and uses an epigraph from van Gogh. In what ways does her poem not describe or evoke van Gogh’s painting? In what ways does it describe the painting?
W. H. AUDEN

Wystan Hugh Auden (1907–1973) was born in York, England, and educated at Oxford. In the 1930s his witty left-wing poetry earned him wide acclaim as the leading poet of his generation. He went to Spain during the Spanish Civil War, intending to serve as an ambulance driver for the Republicans in their struggle against Fascism, but he was so distressed by the violence of the Republicans that he almost immediately returned to England. In 1939 he came to America, and in 1946 he became a citizen of the United States, though he spent his last years in England. Much of his poetry is characterized by a combination of colloquial diction and technical dexterity.

In the following poem, Auden offers a meditation triggered by a painting in the Museum of Fine Arts in Brussels. The painting, by Pieter Brueghel (c. 1525–1569), is based on the legend of Icarus, told by the Roman poet Ovid (43 BCE–17 CE) in his Metamorphoses. The story goes thus: Daedalus, father of Icarus, was confined with his son on the island of Crete. In order to escape, Daedalus made wings for himself and for Icarus by fastening feathers together with wax, but Icarus flew too near the sun, the wax melted, and Icarus fell into the sea. According to Ovid, the event—a boy falling through the sky—was witnessed with amazement by a ploughman, a shepherd, and an angler. In the painting, however, these figures seem to pay no attention to Icarus, who is represented not falling through the sky but already in the water (in the lower right corner, near the ship), with only his lower legs still visible.
Musée des Beaux Arts

[1940]

About suffering they were never wrong,
The Old Masters: how well they understood
Its human position; how it takes place
While someone else is eating or opening a window or just walking dully along:

How, when the aged are reverently, passionately waiting
For the miraculous birth, there always must be Children who did not specially want it to happen, skating
On a pond at the edge of the wood;

They never forgot
That even the dreadful martyrdom must run its course
Anyhow in a corner, some untidy spot
Where the dogs go on with their doggy life and the torturer's horse
Scratches its innocent behind on a tree.

In Brueghel's Icarus, for instance: how everything turns away
Quite leisurely from the disaster; the plowman may
Have heard the splash, the forsaken cry.
But for him it was not an important failure; the sun shone
As it had to on the white legs disappearing into the green
Water, and the expensive delicate ship that must have seen
Something amazing, a boy falling out of the sky,
Had somewhere to get to and sailed calmly on.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. In your own words sum up what, according to the speaker (in lines 1–13), the Old Masters understood about human suffering. (The Old Masters were the great European painters who worked from about 1500 to about 1750.)

2. Suppose the first lines read:
The Old Masters were never wrong about suffering.
They understood its human position well.

What (beside the particular rhymes) would change or be lost?

3. Reread the poem (preferably over the course of several days) a number of times, jotting down your chief responses after each reading. Then, in connection with a final reading, study your notes, and write an essay of 500 words setting forth the history of your final response to the poem. For example, you may want to report that certain difficulties soon were clarified and that your enjoyment increased. Or, conversely, you may want to report that the poem became less interesting (for reasons you will set forth) the more you studied it. Probably your history will be somewhat more complicated than these simple examples. Try to find a chief pattern in your experience, and shape it into a thesis.

4. Consider a picture, either in a local museum or reproduced in a book, and write a 500-word reflection on it. If the picture is not well known, include a reproduction (a postcard from the museum or a photocopy of a page of a book).

X. J. Kennedy was born in New Jersey in 1929. He has taught at Tufts University and is the author of several books of poems, books for children, and college textbooks.

Marcel Duchamp’s Nude Descending a Staircase, No. 2 (1912) was exhibited in 1913 in the Armory Show, an international exhibition held at an armory in New York, and later in Chicago and Boston. The Armory Show gave America its first good look at contemporary European art—for instance, Cubism, which had influenced Duchamp’s painting.

Toe upon toe, a snowing flesh,
A gold of lemon, root and rind,
She sifts in sunlight down the stairs
With nothing on. Nor on her mind. 4

A constant thresh of thigh on thigh—
Her lips imprint the swinging air
That parts to let her parts go by. 8

One-woman waterfall, she wears
Her slow descent like a long cape
And pausing, on the final stair
Collects her motions into shape. 12

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. To what extent does the poem describe the painting? To what extent does it do something else?

2. Some viewers have found Duchamp’s painting strange and confusing. Does Kennedy’s poem help you to understand Duchamp’s style of art? Explain.

Sherman Alexie

The short-story writer, essayist, poet, and film director Sherman J. Alexie, Jr., was born in October 1966. He was raised on the Spokane Indian Reservation in Wellpinit, Washington, located fifty miles northwest of Spokane. He went to high school off reservation in Reardan, Washington, where he was an excellent student and played on the basketball team. He attended Gonzaga University in Spokane for two years and then transferred to Washington State University in Pullman, where he began writing poetry, graduating with a degree in American Studies. His books include The Business of Fancydancing: Stories and Poems (1992), The Lone Ranger and Tonto Fistfight in Heaven (1994), and Reservation Blues (1995).

For another poem by Alexie, see page 714.
At Navajo Monument Valley Tribal School

the football field rises to meet the mesa. Indian boys gallop across the grass, against the beginnings of their body.
On those Saturday afternoons, unbroken horses gather to watch their sons growing larger in the small parts of the world.
Everyone is the quarterback.
There is no thin man in a big hat writing down all the names in two columns: winners and losers.
This is the eternal football game, Indians versus Indians. All the Skins in the wooden bleachers fancydancing, stomping red dust straight down into nothing. Before the game is over, the eighth-grade girls’ track team comes running, circling the field, their thin and brown legs echoing wild horses, wild horses, wild horses.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. What do you make of “the small parts of the world” and of “Everyone is the quarterback” (lines 9–10)?
2. Why do you think Alexie ended the poem by introducing the girls’ track team? And what function(s) does the repetition serve in the final line?
3. Some readers find the poem’s tone affirmative, even celebratory; others hear it as melancholy, even mournful. Do you agree with either of these descriptions, or would you use a different term or set of terms? Point to evidence in the text to explain and support your interpretation.
4. Look again at the photograph. Do you think that the creation of a playing field on this site is a desecration of the environment? Why, or why not?
John Updike, born in 1932, grew up in Shillington, Pennsylvania, where his father was a teacher and his mother was a writer. After receiving a B.A. degree from Harvard he studied drawing at Oxford for a year, but an offer from The New Yorker magazine brought him back to the United States. He at first served as a reporter for the magazine, but soon began contributing poetry, essays, and fiction. Today he is one of America’s most prolific and well-known writers.

For two other poems by Updike, see pages 645 and 935.
Before the Mirror

How many of us still remember when Picasso’s Girl Before a Mirror hung at the turning of the stairs in the pre-expansion Museum of Modern Art?
Millions of us, probably, but we form a dwindling population. Garish and brush-slashed and yet as balanced as a cardboard Queen in a deck of giant cards, the painting proclaimed, Enter here and abandon preconception. She bounced the erotic balls of herself back and forth between reflection and reality.

Now I discover, in the recent retrospective at the same establishment, that the dazzling painting dates from March of 1932,
the very month in which I first saw light,
squinting in quick nostalgia for the womb.
Inspecting, I bend closer. The blacks,
the stripy cyanide greens are still uncracked,
I note with satisfaction; the cherry reds and lemon yellows full of childish juice.
No sag, no wrinkle. Fresh as paint. Back then,
I reflect, they knew just how to lay it on.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. The painting shows a young woman looking into a mirror. In viewing a picture with this subject, what associations might reasonably come to
2. The woman (at the left) has two faces, one in profile. Do you think Picasso is showing us two views of the same face, or perhaps two stages in the woman’s life? And what of the face in the mirror? Do you think it shows either or both of the faces at the left, or a third face or stage?
3. Why do you suppose the woman is reaching out toward the mirror?
(There cannot be any way of proving whatever you or anyone else might offer as an answer, but why do you offer the explanation that you do offer?)
4. What do you think the poem is chiefly about? The distinctiveness of modern art (meaning the age of Picasso)? The excellent condition of the picture? The speaker’s response to the picture? Explain.
5. The first twelve lines of this poem describe the speaker’s thoughts “then,” when he first saw Girl Before a Mirror; the last twelve lines describe his ideas and feelings “now.” In two paragraphs, or in one extended paragraph, write a “Then and Now,” describing a picture or a song or a scene—a lake, a house, a kitchen—or a person, then and now.
GREG PAPE

Greg Pape was born in 1947 in Eureka, California, and educated at Fresno State College (now California State University, Fresno) and the University of Arizona. The author of several books of poems, he has served as writer-in-residence at several colleges and universities, and now teaches at Northern Arizona University, in Flagstaff.
American Flamingo

it seems to look out, wary, intense,

like a rose-colored fog on the pond.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Why is the speaker preoccupied with the flamingo’s eyes?
2. A transition occurs in lines 14–15, with the italicized quotation from Robert Penn Warren. What is the relationship of this to the description of the flamingo (and the speaker’s reflections) that precede it?
3. From line 25 to the end, the speaker carefully describes a scene at Hialeah. Take note of the specific details and terms that the speaker presents, and explain how these make the poem both a vivid description and something more than that.
CHAPTER 22

Three Poets in Depth: Emily Dickinson, Robert Frost, and Langston Hughes

ON READING AUTHORS REPRESENTED IN DEPTH

If you have read several works by an author, whether tragedies by Shakespeare or detective stories about Sherlock Holmes by Arthur Conan Doyle, you know that authors return again and again to certain themes (tragedy for Shakespeare, crime for Conan Doyle), yet each treatment is different. Hamlet, Macbeth, and Romeo and Juliet are all tragedies, and they all share certain qualities that we think of as Shakespearean, yet each is highly distinctive.

When we read several works by an author, we find ourselves thinking about resemblances and differences. We enjoy seeing the author return to some theme (for instance, God, or nature, or love) or to some literary form (for instance, the sonnet, or blank verse, or pairs of rhyming lines); and we may find, to our delight, that the author has handled things differently and that we are getting a sense of the writer’s variety and perhaps even of the writer’s development. Indeed, we sometimes speak of the shape or design of the author’s career, meaning that our careful study of the writings has led us to an understanding of the story—with its beginning, middle, and end—that the writings tell across a period of time. Often, once we read one poem by an author and find it intriguing or compelling, we want to read more: Are there other poems like this one? What kinds of poems were written before or after this one? Our enjoyment and understanding of one poem help us to enjoy and understand others, and make us curious about the place that each one occupies in a larger structure, the shape of the author’s career.

We can go further and say that the reading of a second author can help us—perhaps by way of contrast—to understand the first. In the preface to one of his volumes of poetry, Robert Frost put it this way:

A poem is best read in the light of all the other poems ever written. We read A the better to read B (we have to start somewhere; we may get very little out of A). We read B the better to read C, C the better to read D, D the better to go back and get something more out of A. Progress is not the aim, but circulation. The thing is to get among the poems where they hold each other apart in their places as the stars do.

In an Introduction to Literature course, although you'll often be asked to write analytical papers about a single poem, story, or play, sometimes you'll be assigned a paper that requires a comparison and contrast of, for example, two poems by different authors. Less frequent perhaps, but equally important, is the paper that examines a central theme or idea as it is expressed and explored in three or more works.

At first this might seem a daunting task, but there are helpful ways of getting in control of the assignment. One of the best is to begin with a single work and then to move outward from it, making connections to works that show interesting similarities to, or differences from, it.

One of our students, Mark Bradley, was assigned to write on a theme (which he had to define himself) in a selection of poems by Langston Hughes. Mark started by closely studying a poem by Hughes that had caught his attention when he made his way through the group of poems for the first time. In one of his journal entries, Mark wrote:

The poem "The South" surprised me. It wasn't what I expected. I thought Hughes would attack the South for being so racist—he wrote the poem in the 1920s, when segregation was everywhere in the South. He says some tough stuff about the South, that's for sure: "Beast strong, / Idiot-brained." But he also says that the South is attractive in some ways, and I'm not convinced that when he brings in the North at the end, he really believes that the North is superior.

Intrigued by this poem, Mark made it his point of departure for the thematic paper he was assigned. He judged that if he worked intensively on this poem and came to know it well, he could review other Hughes poems and see how they were both like and unlike the poem with which he began.

When you write an essay on several works, keep two points especially in mind: the length of the assignment, and the choice of examples. You want to treat the right number of examples for the space you are given, and, furthermore, to provide sufficient detail in your analysis of each of them. You might call this the principle of proportion.

Preparing an outline can be valuable. It will lead you to think carefully about which examples you have selected for your argument and the main idea about each one that you will present. You might begin by examining one poem in depth, and then proceed to relate it to key passages in other poems. Or maybe you'll find one passage in a poem so significant that it—rather than the poem in its entirety—can serve as a good beginning. Whichever strategy you choose, when you review the rough draft, use a pen to mark off the amount of space that you have devoted to each example. Ask yourself:

- Is this example clearly connected to my argument in the paper as a whole?
• Have I not only referred to the example but also provided adequate quotation from it?
• Have I made certain to comment on the passage? (Remember that passages do not interpret themselves. You have to explicate and explain them.)
• Has each example received its due?

There is no easy rule of thumb for knowing how much space each example should be given. Some passages are more complicated than others; some demand more intensive scrutiny. But you’ll be well on the way toward handling this aspect of the paper effectively if you are self-aware about your choices, alert to the principle of proportion.

EMILY DICKINSON

Emily Dickinson (1830–1886) was born into a proper New England family in Amherst, Massachusetts. Although she spent her seventeenth year a few miles away, at Mount Holyoke Seminary (now Mount Holyoke College), in the next twenty years she left Amherst only five or six times, and in her last twenty years she may never have left her house. Her brother was probably right when he said that having seen something of the rest of the world—she had visited Washington with her father, when he was a member of Congress—“she could not resist the feeling that it was painfully hollow. It was to her so thin and unsatisfying in the face of the Great Realities of Life.”

Dickinson lived with her parents (a somewhat reclusive mother and an austere, remote father) and a younger sister; a married brother lived in the house next door. She formed some passionate attachments, to women as well as men, but there is no evidence that they found physical expression.

By the age of twelve Dickinson was writing witty letters, but she apparently did not write more than an occasional poem before her late twenties. At her death—she died in the house where she was born—she left 1,789 poems, only seven of which had been published (anonymously) during her lifetime.

We begin this section with sixteen poems by Dickinson. Next, we present a seventeenth poem, “I felt a Funeral, in my Brain,” in multiple versions: the poem as we know it today; the poem in manuscript; and the poem in its first published version. Then, two more poems, which are similar in phrasing to one another and show an affinity to “I Felt a Funeral, in my Brain.” We conclude with three of Dickinson’s letters about poetry.

These are the days when Birds come back

And opens further on—

He likes a Boggy Acre
A Floor too cool for Corn—
Yet when a Boy, and Barefoot—
I more than once at Noon
Have passed, I thought, a Whip lash
Unbraiding in the Sun
When stopping to secure it
It wrinkled, and was gone—

We reprint here and on the next page Dickinson’s manuscript for “I felt a Funeral, in my Brain,” and we follow it with the version of the poem as we know it today, where it is #280 in The Complete Poems of Emily Dickinson, ed. Thomas H. Johnson (Boston: Little, Brown, 1957). This edition follows the text that Johnson presented in his three-volume scholarly edition, The Poems of Emily Dickinson’s manuscript for “I felt a Funeral, in my Brain.” (Manuscript for Emily Dickinson’s “I felt a Funeral, in my Brain.” By permission of The Houghton Library, Harvard University, MS Am 1118.3 (53c) © The President and Fellows of Harvard College.)

I felt a Funeral, in my Brain

I felt a Funeral, in my Brain,
And Mourners to and fro
Kept treading—treading—till it seemed
That Sense was breaking through—

And when they all were seated,
A Service, like a Drum—
Kept beating—beating—till I thought
My Mind was going numb—
And then I heard them lift a Box
And creak across my Soul
With those same Boots of Lead, again,
Then Space—began to toll,

As all the Heavens were a Bell,
And Being, but an Ear,
And I, and Silence, some strange Race
Wrecked, solitary, here—

And then a Plank in Reason, broke,
And I dropped down, and down—
And hit a World, at every plunge,
And Finished knowing—then—

Pages 827–828 reproduce the poem as it appears in Dickinson’s own hand. Our copy is taken from The Manuscript Books of Emily Dickinson, edited by R. W. Franklin and published in 1981. Like nearly all of Dickinson’s poems, this one was not published in her lifetime. She wrote her poems on sheets of letter paper, which she then bound together with string into packets. Perhaps these personal manuscript books or “fascicles” (that is, a small bundle, or the divisions of a book published in parts) represented for Dickinson a form of publication—though a very private one.

Notice that in line 10, Dickinson wrote “Brain,” but then crossed it out and selected the word “Soul” instead. Notice also that in manuscript, the poem concludes with a line not in the poem, but that seems to give alternatives for words in lines 19 and 20. Refer to the poem as we know it (pages 828–829) to see how Thomas Johnson has worked from the manuscript to make his choices about how the poem should read.

In her will Dickinson stipulated that upon her death, her papers and letters should be burned. Her sister, Lavinia, however, who discovered the poems, decided that her sister’s request did not include them, and she soon became determined to see the poems published. This task was taken up by Mabel Loomis Todd (1856–1932), who was a friend of Dickinson’s—and the lover of Austin Dickinson, Emily’s older (and already married) brother. With help from the critic and man of letters Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Todd edited two series of Dickinson’s poems (1890, 1891), and then edited a third series (1896) and the Letters of Emily Dickinson (2 vols., 1894) herself. Both Todd and Higginson removed many of the boldly original features of the poems’ language, structure, and punctuation. They sought to make Dickinson more conventional, more like other poets of the age. This, in their view, was the best way to make her less difficult and hence more accessible to readers. But the result was that they eliminated the daring, brilliant innovations that make Dickinson extraordinary. This first published version of “I felt a Funeral, in my Brain” is taken from Poems by Emily Dickinson, third series (Boston: Little, Brown, 1896).

I felt a funeral in my brain,
And mourners, to and fro,
Kept treading, treading, till it seemed
That sense was breaking through.

And when they all were seated,
A service like a drum
Kept beating, beating, till I thought
My mind was going numb.

And then I heard them lift a box,
And creak across my soul
With those same boots of lead, again.
Then space began to toll
As all the heavens were a bell,
And Being but an ear,
And I and silence some strange race,
Wrecked, solitary, here.

Here are two more poems, similar to one another and somewhat similar to
"I felt a Funeral, in my Brain." Thomas Johnson dates the first one as having been written in 1864, and the second in the following year. The second, Johnson explains, is not so much a separate poem as a variant on the first, a variant that Dickinson probably sent to her sister-in-law Susan Gilbert Dickinson, who was married to Dickinson's brother, Austin. In his more recent edition, R.W . Franklin says more firmly that the first poem was written in early 1864 and that, without address or signature, Dickinson sent a version of its second stanza to Susan.

LETTERS ABOUT POETRY

We include three of Dickinson's letters, the first of which is addressed to Susan Gilbert, probably her dearest friend and the wife of Dickinson's brother, Austin.
The two other letters are addressed to Thomas Wentworth Higginson, a writer and leading abolitionist. After reading in Atlantic Monthly (April 1862) Higginson's article offering advice to young authors, Dickinson (31 at the time) sent Higginson some of her poems along with a letter, and a correspondence ensued, lasting until Dickinson's death.
To Susan Gilbert (Dickinson) [late April 1852]

So sweet and still, and Thee, Oh Susie, what need I more, to make my heaven whole?

Sweet Hour, blessed Hour, to carry me to you, and to bring you back to me, long enough to snatch one kiss, and whisper Good bye, again.

I have thought of it all day, Susie, and I fear of but little else, and when I was gone to meeting it filled my mind so full, I could not find a chink to put the worthy pastor; when he said “Our Heavenly Father,” I said “Oh Darling Sue”; when he read the 100th Psalm, I kept saying your precious letter all over to myself, and Susie, when they sang—it would have made you laugh to hear one little voice, piping to the departed. I made up words and kept singing how I loved you, and you had gone, while all the rest of the choir were singing Hallelujahs. I presume nobody heard me, because I sang so small, but it was a kind of a comfort to think I might put them out, singing of you. I a’nt there this afternoon, tho’, because I am here, writing a little letter to my dear Sue, and I am very happy. I think of ten weeks—Dear One, and I think of love, and you, and my heart grows full and warm, and my breath stands still. The sun does’nt shine at all, but I can feel a sunshine stealing into my soul and making it all summer, and every thorn, a rose. And I pray that such summer’s sun shine on my Absent One, and cause her bird to sing!

You have been happy, Susie, and now are sad—and the whole world seems lone; but it wont be so always, “some days must be dark and dreary”! You wont cry any more, will you, Susie, for my father will be your father, and my home will be your home, and where you go, I will go, and we will lie side by side in the kirkyard.

I have parents on earth, dear Susie, but your’s are in the skies, and I have an earthly fireside, but you have one above, and you have a “Father in Heaven,” where I have none—and sister in heaven, and I know they love you dearly, and think of you every day.

Oh I wish I had half so many dear friends as you in heaven—I couldn’t spare them now—but to know they had got there safely, and should suffer nevermore—Dear Susie! . . .

Emilie—

To T. W. Higginson [25 April 1862]

I had a terror—since September—I could tell to none—and so I sing, as the Boy does by the Burying Ground—because I am afraid—You inquire my Books—For Poets—I have Keats—and Mr and Mrs Browning. For Prose—Mr Ruskin—Sir Thomas Browne—and the Revelations.\(^2\) I went to school—but in your manner of the phrase—had no education. When a little Girl, I had a friend, who taught me Immortality—but venturing too near, himself—he never returned—Soon after, my Tutor, died—and for several years, my Lexicon—was my only companion—Then I found one more—but he was not contented I be his scholar—so he left the Land.

You ask of my Companions Hills—Sir—and the Sundown—and a Dog—large as myself, that my Father bought me—They are better than Beings—because they know—but do not tell—and the noise in the Pool, at Noon—exceLS my Piano. I have a Brother and Sister—My Mother does not care for thought—and Father, too busy with his Briefs\(^3\)—to notice what we do—He buys me many Books—but begs me not to read them—because he fears they joggle the Mind. They are religious—except me—and address an Eclipse, every morning—whom they call their "Father." But I fear my story fatigues you—I would like to learn—Could you tell me how to grow—or is it unconveyed—like Melody—or Witchcraft?

You speak of Mr Whitman—I never read his Book\(^4\)—but was told that he was disgraceful—

I read Miss Prescott's "Circumstance,"\(^5\) but it followed me, in the Dark—so I avoided her—

Two Editors of Journals came to my Father's House, this winter—and asked me for my Mind—and when I asked them "Why," they said I was penurious—and they, would use it for the World—

I could not weigh myself—Myself—

My size felt small—to me—I read your Chapters in the Atlantic—and experienced honor for you—I was sure you would not reject a confiding question—

Is this—Sir—what you asked me to tell you?

Your friend,
E—Dickinson.

\(^2\)Keats . . . Revelations John Keats, Robert Browning, and Elizabeth Barrett Browning were nineteenth-century English poets; Thomas Browne was a seventeenth-century English writer of prose; John Ruskin was a nineteenth-century English art critic and social critic; Revelation, which Dickinson calls Revelations, is the last book of the New Testament. \(^3\)Briefs legal documents (Dickinson's father was a lawyer). \(^4\)Mr Whitman . . . Book Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass was first published in 1855. Its unconventional punctuation and its celebration of Whitman's passions shocked many readers. \(^5\)Miss Prescott's "Circumstance" Harriet Prescott Spofford's story, published in Atlantic Monthly in May 1860. It tells of a woman who, returning from a visit to a sick friend, is held hostage by a beast who is calmed only when she sings to him. Her husband eventually rescues her, but when they arrive home they find that their house has been burned down.

To T. W. Higginson

[1876] Nature is a Haunted House—but Art—a House that tries to be haunted.
Robert Frost (1874–1963) was born in California. After his father’s death in 1885, Frost’s mother brought the family to New England, where she taught in high schools in Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Frost studied for part of one term at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire, then did odd jobs (including teaching), and from 1897 to 1899 was enrolled as a special student at Harvard. He then farmed in New Hampshire, published a few poems in local newspapers, left the farm and taught again, and in 1912 left for England, where he hoped to achieve more popular success as a writer. By 1915 he had won a considerable reputation, and he returned to the United States, settling on a farm in New Hampshire and cultivating the image of the country-wise farmer-poet. In fact he was well read in the classics, the Bible, and English and American literature.

Among Frost’s many comments about literature, here are three: “Writing is unboring to the extent that it is dramatic”; “Every poem is . . . a figure of the will braving alien entanglements”; and, finally, a poem “begins in delight and ends in wisdom. . . . It runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion.”

And for good measure, here is Frost, in a letter, writing about his own work.

You get more credit for thinking if you restate formulae or cite cases that fall in easily under formulae, but all the fun is outside[,] saying things that suggest formulae that won’t formulate—that almost but don’t quite formulate. I should like to be so subtle at this game as to seem to the casual person altogether obvious. The casual person would assume I meant nothing or else I came near enough meaning something be was familiar with to mean it for all practical purposes. Well, well, well.

We give sixteen of Frost’s poems, arranged in chronological order, and we follow these poems with some of Frost’s comments about poetry. The first poem, “The Pasture,” is one that Frost customarily put at the beginning of his collected poems. The last words of each stanza, “You come too,” are an invitation to the reader to join him.

The Pasture

I’m going out to clean the pasture spring;
I’ll only stop to rake the leaves away
(And wait to watch the water clear, I may):
I shan’t be gone long.—You come too. 4

I’m going out to fetch the little calf
That’s standing by the mother. It’s so young,
It totters when she licks it with her tongue.
I shan’t be gone long.—You come too. 8
Something there is that doesn’t love a wall,
That sends the frozen-ground-swell under it,
And spills the upper boulder in the sun;
And makes gaps even two can pass abreast.
The work of hunters is another thing:
I have come after them and made repair
Where they have left not one stone on a stone,
But they would have the rabbit out of hiding,
To please the yelping dogs. The gaps I mean,
No one has seen them made or heard them made,
But at spring mending-time we find them there.
I let my neighbor know beyond the hill;
And on a day we meet to walk the line
And set the wall between us once again.
We keep the wall between us as we go.
To each the boulders that have fallen to each.
And some are loaves and some so nearly balls
We have to use a spell to make them balance:
“Stay where you are until our backs are turned!”
We wear our fingers rough with handling them.
Oh, just another kind of outdoor game,
One on a side. It comes to little more:
There where it is we do not need the wall:
He is all pine and I am apple orchard.
My apple trees will never get across
And eat the cones under his pines, I tell him.
He only says, “Good fences make good neighbors.”
Spring is the mischief in me, and I wonder
If I could put a notion in his head:
"Why do they make good neighbors? Isn’t it
Where there are cows? But here there are no cows.
Before I built a wall I’d ask to know
What I was walling in or walling out,
And to whom I was like to give offense.
Something there is that doesn’t love a wall,
That wants it down.” I could say “Elves” to him,
But it’s not elves exactly, and I’d rather
He said it for himself. I see him there
Bringing a stone grasped firmly by the top
In each hand, like an old-stone savage armed.
He moves in darkness as it seems to me,
Not of woods only and the shade of trees.
He will not go behind his father’s saying,
And he likes having thought of it so well
He says again, “Good fences make good neighbors.”
The Wood-Pile

[1914]

Out walking in the frozen swamp one gray day,
I paused and said, “I will turn back from here.
No, I will go on farther—and we shall see.”
The hard snow held me, save where now and then
One foot went through. The view was all in lines
Straight up and down of tall slim trees
Too much alike to mark or name a place by
So as to say for certain I was here
Or somewhere else: I was just far from home.
A small bird flew before me. He was careful
To put a tree between us when he lighted,
And say no word to tell me who he was
Who was so foolish as to think what he thought.
He thought that I was after him for a feather—
The white one in his tail; like one who takes Everything said as personal to himself.
One flight out sideways would have undeceived him.
And then there was a pile of wood for which
I forgot him and let his little fear
Carry him off the way I might have gone,
Without so much as wishing him good-night.
He went behind it to make his last stand.
It was a cord of maple, cut and split
And piled—and measured, four by four by eight.
And not another like it could I see.
No runner tracks in this year’s snow looped near it.
And it was older sure than this year’s cutting,
Or even last year’s or the year’s before.
The wood was gray and the bark warping off it
And the pile somewhat sunken. Clematis
Had wound strings round and round it like a bundle.
What held it though on one side was a tree
Still growing, and on one a stake and prop.
These latter about to fall. I thought that only Someone who lived in turning to fresh tasks
Could so forget his handiwork on which
He spent himself, the labor of his ax,
And leave it there far from a useful fireplace
To warm the frozen swamp as best it could
With the slow smokeless burning of decay.

The Road Not Taken

[1916]

Two roads diverged in a yellow wood,
And sorry I could not travel both
And be one traveler, long I stood
And looked down one as far as I could
To where it bent in the undergrowth;
Then took the other, as just as fair,
And having perhaps the better claim,
Because it was grassy and wanted wear;
Though as for that the passing there
Had worn them really about the same,

And both that morning equally lay
In leaves no step had trodden black.
Oh, I kept the first for another day!
Yet knowing how way leads on to way,
I doubted if I should ever come back.

I shall be telling this with a sigh
Somewhere ages and ages hence:
Two roads diverged in a wood, and I—
I took the one less traveled by,
And that has made all the difference.

The Telephone

[1916]

“When I was just as far as I could walk
From here today
There was an hour
All still
When leaning with my head against a flower
I heard you talk.
Don’t say I didn’t, for I heard you say—
You spoke from that flower on the window sill—
Do you remember what it was you said?”

“First tell me what it was you thought you heard.”

“Having found the flower and driven a bee away,
I leaned my head,
And holding by the stalk,
I listened and I thought I caught the word—
What was it? Did you call me by my name?
Or did you say—
Someone said ‘Come’—I heard it as I bowed.”

“I may have thought as much, but not aloud.”

“Well, so I came.”

The Oven Bird

[1916]

There is a singer everyone has heard,
Loud, a mid-summer and a mid-wood bird,
Who makes the solid tree trunks sound again.
He says that leaves are old and that for flowers
Mid-summer is to spring as one to ten.
He says the early petal-fall is past
When pear and cherry bloom went down in showers
On sunny days a moment overcast;
And comes that other fall we name the fall.
He says the highway dust is over all.
The bird would cease and be as other birds
But that he knows in singing not to sing.
The question that he frames in all but words
Is what to make of a diminished thing.

The Vanishing Red

[1916]

He is said to have been the last Red Man
In Acton.° And the Miller is said to have laughed—
If you like to call such a sound a laugh.
But he gave no one else a laugher's license.
For he turned suddenly grave as if to say,
"Whose business,—if I take it on myself,
Whose business—but why talk round the barn?—
When it's just that I hold with getting a thing done with."
You can't get back and see it as he saw it.
It's too long a story to go into now.
You'd have to have been there and lived it.
Then you wouldn't have looked on it as just a matter
Of who began it between the two races.
Some guttural exclamation of surprise
The Red Man gave in poking about the mill
Over the great big thumping shuffling millstone
Disgusted the Miller physically as coming From one who had no right to be heard from.
"Come, John," he said, 'you want to see the wheel-pit?"°
He took him down below a cramping rafter,
And showed him, through a manhole in the floor,
The water in desperate straits like frantic fish,
Salmon and sturgeon, lashing with their tails.
Then he shut down the trap door with a ring in it
That jangled even above the general noise,
And came upstairs alone—and gave that laugh,
And said something to a man with a meal-sack
That the man with the meal-sack didn't catch—then.
Oh, yes, he showed John the wheel-pit all right.

2 Acton a town in Massachusetts, not far from where Frost spent part of his childhood.
19 wheel pit the pit containing the wheel that, agitated by the water, drives the mill.
The Aim Was Song

Before man came to blow it right
   The wind once blew itself untaught,
And did its loudest day and night
   In any rough place where it caught.

Man came to tell it what was wrong:
   It hadn't found the place to blow;
It blew too hard—the aim was song.
   And listen—how it ought to go!

He took a little in his mouth,
   And held it long enough for north
To be converted into south,
   And then by measure blew it forth.

By measure. It was word and note,
   The wind the wind had meant to be—
A little through the lips and throat.
   The aim was song—the wind could see.

The Need of Being Versed in Country Things

The house had gone to bring again
   To the midnight sky a sunset glow.
Now the chimney was all of the house that stood,
   Like a pistil after the petals go.

The barn opposed across the way,
   That would have joined the house in flame
Had it been the will of the wind, was left
   To bear forsaken the place's name.

No more it opened with all one end
   For teams that came by the stony road
To drum on the floor with scurrying hoofs
   And brush the mow with the summer load.

The birds that came to it through the air
   At broken windows flew out and in,
Their murmur more like the sigh we sigh
   From too much dwelling on what has been.

Yet for them the lilac renewed its leaf,
   And the aged elm, though touched with fire;
And the dry pump flung up an awkward arm;
   And the fence post carried a strand of wire.

For them there was really nothing sad.
But though they rejoiced in the nest they kept,
   One had to be versed in country things
Not to believe the phoebes\(^1\) wept.

Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening

[1923]

Whose woods these are I think I know.
His house is in the village though;
He will not see me stopping here
To watch his woods fill up with snow.

4

My little horse must think it queer
To stop without a farmhouse near
Between the woods and frozen lake
The darkest evening of the year.

8

He gives his harness bells a shake
To ask if there is some mistake.
The only other sound's the sweep
Of easy wind and downy flake.

12

The woods are lovely, dark and deep,
But I have promises to keep,
And miles to go before I sleep,
And miles to go before I sleep.
Acquainted with the Night

I have been one acquainted with the night.
I have walked out in rain—and back in rain.
I have outwalked the furthest city light.
I have looked down the saddest city lane.
I have passed by the watchman on his beat
And dropped my eyes, unwilling to explain.
I have stood still and stopped the sound of feet
When far away an interrupted cry
Came over houses from another street,
But not to call me back or say good-by;
And further still at an unearthly height,
One luminary clock against the sky
Proclaimed the time was neither wrong nor right.
I have been one acquainted with the night.

Desert Places

Snow falling and night falling fast, oh, fast
In a field I looked into going past,
And the ground almost covered smooth in snow,
But a few weeds and stubble showing last.
The woods around it have it—it is theirs.
All animals are smothered in their lairs.
I am too absent-spirited to count;
The loneliness includes me unawares.
And lonely as it is that loneliness
Will be more lonely ere it will be less—
A blanker whiteness of benighted snow
With no expression, nothing to express.
They cannot scare me with their empty spaces
Between stars—on stars where no human race is.
I have it in me so much nearer home
To scare myself with my own desert places.
Design

I found a dimpled spider, fat and white,
On a white heal-all, holding up a moth
Like a white piece of rigid satin cloth—
Assorted characters of death and blight
Mixed ready to begin the morning right,
Like the ingredients of a witches' broth—
A snow-drop spider, a flower like froth,
And dead wings carried like a paper kite.

What had that flower to do with being white,
The wayside blue and innocent heal-all?
What brought the kindred spider to that height,
Then steered the white moth thither in the night?
What but design of darkness to appall?
If design govern in a thing so small.

Come In

As I came to the edge of the woods,
Thrush music—hark!
Now if it was dusk outside,
Inside it was dark.

Too dark in the woods for a bird
By sleight of wing
To better its perch for the night,
Though it still could sing.

The last of the light of the sun
That had died in the west
Still lived for one song more
In a thrush's breast.

Far in the pillared dark Thrush music went—
Almost like a call to come in
To the dark and lament.

But no, I was out for stars:
I would not come in.
I meant not even if asked,
And I hadn’t been.
The Silken Tent

She is as in a field a silken tent
At midday when a sunny summer breeze
Has dried the dew and all its ropes relent,
So that in guys it gently sways at ease,
And its supporting central cedar pole,
That is its pinnacle heavenward
And signifies the sureness of the soul,
Seems to owe naught to any single cord,
But strictly held by none, is loosely bound
By countless silken ties of love and thought
To everything on earth the compass round,
And only by one’s going slightly taut
In the capriciousness of summer air
Is of the slightest bondage made aware.
The Most of It

He thought he kept the universe alone;
For all the voice in answer he could wake
Was but the mocking echo of his own
From some tree-hidden cliff across the lake.
Some morning from the boulder-broken beach
He would cry out on life, that what it wants
Is not its own love back in copy speech,
But counter-love, original response.
And nothing ever came of what he cried
Unless it was the embodiment that crashed
In the cliff’s talus on the other side,
And then in the far distant water splashed,
But after a time allowed for it to swim,
Instead of proving human when it neared
And someone else additional to him,
As a great buck it powerfully appeared,
Pushing the crumpled water up ahead,
And landed pouring like a waterfall,
And stumbled through the rocks with horny tread,
And forced the underbrush—and that was all.

ROBERT FROST ON POETRY

The Figure a Poem Makes

Abstraction is an old story with the philosophers, but it has been like a new toy in the hands of the artists of our day. Why can’t we have any one quality of poetry we choose by itself? We can have in thought. Then it will go hard if we can’t in practice. Our lives for it.

Granted no one but a humanist much cares how sound a poem is if it is only a sound. The sound is the gold in the ore. Then we will have the sound out alone and dispense with the inessential. We do till we make the discovery that the object in writing poetry is to make all poems sound as different as possible from each other, and the resources for that of vowels, consonants, punctuation, syntax, words, sentences, meter are not enough. We need the help of context—meaning—subject matter. That is the greatest help towards variety. All that can be done with words is soon told. So also with meters—particularly in our language where there are virtually but two, strict iambic and loose iambic. The ancients with many were still poor if they depended on meters for all tune. It is painful to watch our sprung-rhythmists straining at the point of omitting one short from a foot for relief from monotony. The possibilities for tune from the dramatic tones of meaning struck across the rigidity of a limited meter are endless. And we are back in poetry as merely one more art of having something to say, sound or unsound. Probably better if sound, because deeper and from wider experience.

Then there is this wildness whereof it is spoken. Granted again that it has an equal claim with sound to being a poem’s better half. If it is a wild tune, it is a poem. Our problem then is, as modern abstractionists, to have the wildness pure; to be wild with nothing to be wild about. We bring up as aberrationists, giving way to undirected associations and kicking ourselves from one chance suggestion to another in all directions as of a hot afternoon in the life of a grasshopper. Theme alone can steady us down. Just as the first mystery was how a poem could have a tune in such a straightness as meter, so the second mystery is how a poem can have wildness and at the same time a subject that shall be fulfilled.

It should be of the pleasure of a poem itself to tell how it can. The figure a poem makes. It begins in delight and ends in wisdom. The figure is the same as for love. No one can really hold that the ecstasy should be static and stand still in one place. It begins in delight, it inclines to the impulse, it assumes direction with the first line laid down, it runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion. It has denouement. It has an outcome that though unforeseen was predestined from the first image of the original mood—and indeed from the very mood. It is but a trick poem and no poem at all if the best of it was thought of first and saved for the last. It finds its own name as it goes and discovers the best waiting for it in some final phrase at once wise and sad—the happy-sad blend of the drinking song.

No tears in the writer, no tears in the reader. No surprise for the writer, no surprise for the reader. For me the initial delight is in the surprise of remembering something I didn’t know I knew. I am in a place, in a situation, as if I had materialized from cloud or risen out of the ground. There is a glad recognition of the long lost and the rest follows. Step by step the wonder of unexpected supply keeps growing. The impressions most useful to my purpose seem always those I was unaware of and so made no note of at the time when taken, and the conclusion is come to that like giants we are always hurling experience ahead of us to pave the future with against the day when we may want to strike a line of purpose across it for somewhere. The line will have the more charm for not being mechanically straight. We enjoy the straight crookedness of a good walking stick. Modern instruments of precision are being used to make things crooked as if by eye and hand in the old days.

I tell how there may be a better wildness of logic than of inconsequence. But the logic is backward, in retrospect, after the act. It must be more felt than seen ahead like prophecy. It must be a revelation, or a series of revelations, as much for the poet as for the reader. For it to be that there must have been the greatest freedom of the material to move about in it and to establish relations in it regardless of time and space, previous relation, and everything but affinity. We prate of freedom. We call our schools free because we are not free to stay away from them till we are sixteen years of age. I have given up my democratic prejudices and now willingly set the lower classes free to be completely taken care of by the upper classes. Political freedom is nothing to me. I bestow it right and left. All I would keep for myself is the freedom of my material—the condition of body and mind now and then to summons aptly from the vast chaos of all I have lived through.

Scholars and artists thrown together are often annoyed at the puzzle of where they differ. Both work from knowledge; but I suspect they differ most importantly in the way their knowledge is come by. Scholars get theirs with conscientious thoroughness along projected lines of logic; poets theirs cavalierly and as it happens in and out of books. They stick to nothing deliberately, but let what will stick to them like burrs where they walk in the fields. No acquirement is on assignment, or even self-assignment. Knowledge of the second kind is much more available in the wild free ways of wit and art. A school boy may be defined as one who can tell you what he knows in the order in which he learned it. The artist must value himself as he snatches a thing from some previous order in time and space into a new order with not so much as a ligature clinging to it of the old place where it was organic.

More than once I should have lost my soul to radicalism if it had been the originality it was mistaken for by young converts. Originality and initiative are what I ask for my country. For myself the originality need be no more than the freshness of a poem run in the way I have described: from delight to wisdom. The figure is the same as for love. Like a piece of ice on a hot stove the poem must ride on its own melting. A poem may be worked over once it is in being, but may not be worried into being. Its most precious quality will remain its having run itself and carried away the poet with it. Read it a hundred times: it will forever keep its freshness as a metal keeps its fragrance. It can never lose its sense of a meaning that once unfolded by surprise as it went.

From “The Constant Symbol”

[T]here are many other things I have found myself saying about poetry, but the chieftest of these is that it is metaphor, saying one thing and meaning another, saying one thing in terms of another, the pleasure of ulteriority. Poetry is simply made of metaphor. So also is philosophy—and science, too, for that matter, if it will take the soft impeachment from a friend. Every poem is a new metaphor inside or it is nothing. And there is a sense in which all poems are the same old metaphor always.

Every single poem written regular is a symbol small or great of the way the will has to pitch into commitments deeper and deeper to a rounded conclusion and then be judged for whether any original intention it had has been strongly spent or weakly lost; be it in art, politics, school, church, business, love, or marriage—in a piece of work or in a career. Strongly spent is synonymous with kept.

LANGSTON HUGHES

Langston Hughes (1902–1967) was an accomplished poet, short-story writer, dramatist, essayist, and editor. He was born in Joplin, Missouri; he grew up in Lawrence, Kansas, and Cleveland, Ohio; and he spent a year living in Mexico before entering Columbia University in 1921. He left Columbia the following year and traveled extensively in Europe, returning to the United States in the mid-1920s. During these years, Hughes pursued his academic studies at Lincoln University in Pennsylvania (graduating in 1929) and published his first two books of verse, The Weary Blues (1926) and Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927). His many achievements in literature, drawing upon spirituals, blues, jazz, and folk expression, and his rich, productive career have led his biographer Arnold Rampersad, to describe him as “perhaps the most representative black American writer.” Here we provide a selection of Hughes’s poetry that shows the range of his themes and the variety of his speaking voices. We begin with one of his best-known works, “The Negro Speaks of Rivers,” a poem first published in the June 1921 issue of The Crisis, the official magazine of the NAACP. We give eleven of Hughes’s poems here (and we have already given some of his poems in earlier chapters), and two selections from his prose.

The Negro Speaks of Rivers

[1921]

I’ve known rivers:
I’ve known rivers ancient as the world and older than the flow of human blood in human veins.
My soul has grown deep like the rivers.
I bathed in the Euphrates when dawns were young,
I built my hut near the Congo and it lulled me to sleep.
I looked upon the Nile and raised the pyramids above it.
I heard the singing of the Mississippi when Abe Lincoln went down to New Orleans, and I’ve seen its muddy bosom turn all golden in the sunset.

I’ve known rivers:
Ancient, dusky rivers.
My soul has grown deep like the rivers.

Mother to Son

[1922]

Well, son, I’ll tell you:
Life for me ain’t been no crystal stair.
It’s had tacks in it,
And splinters,
And boards torn up,
And places with no carpet on the floor—Bare.
But all the time
I’se been a-climbin’ on,
And reachin’ landin’s,
And turnin’ corners,
And sometimes goin’ in the dark
Where there ain’t been no light.
So boy, don’t you turn back.
Don’t you set down on the steps
’Cause you finds it’s kinder hard.
Don’t you fall now—
For I’se still goin’, honey,
I’se still climbin’,
And life for me ain’t been no crystal stair.
The Weary Blues

[1925]

Droning a drowsy syncopated tune,
Rocking back and forth to a mellow croon,
I heard a Negro play.
Down on Lenox Avenue the other night
By the pale dull pallor of an old gas light
He did a lazy sway.
He did a lazy sway.
To the tune o’ those Weary Blues.
With his ebony hands on each ivory key
He made that poor piano moan with melody.
O Blues!
Swaying to and fro on his rickety stool
He played that sad raggy tune like a musical fool.
Sweet Blues!
Coming from a black man’s soul.
O Blues!
In a deep song voice with a melancholy tone
I heard that Negro sing, that old piano moan—“Ain’t got nobody in all this world,
Ain’t got nobody but ma self.
I’s gwine to quit ma frownin’
And put ma troubles on the shelf.”
Thump, thump, thump, went his foot on the floor.
He played a few chords then he sang some more—
“I got the Weary Blues
And I can’t be satisfied.
Got the Weary Blues
And can’t be satisfied—
I ain’t happy no mo’
And I wish that I had died.”
And far into the night he crooned that tune.
The stars went out and so did the moon.
The singer stopped playing and went to bed
While the Weary Blues echoed through his head.
He slept like a rock or a man that’s dead.

The South

[1922]

The lazy, laughing South
With blood on its mouth.
The sunny-faced South,
   Beast-strong,
   Idiot-brained.
The child-minded South
Scratching in the dead fire’s ashes
For a Negro’s bones.
   Cotton and the moon,
   Warmth, earth, warmth,
The sky, the sun, the stars,
The magnolia-scented South.
Beautiful, like a woman,
Seductive as a dark-eyed whore,
Passionate, cruel,
Honey-lipped, syphilitic—
That is the South.
And I, who am black, would love her
But she spits in my face.
And I, who am black,
Would give her many rare gifts
But she turns her back upon me.
So now I seek the North—
The cold-faced North,
For she, they say,
Is a kinder mistress,
And in her house my children
May escape the spell of the South.

Ruby Brown

[1926]
She was young and beautiful
And golden like the sunshine
That warmed her body.
And because she was colored
Mayville had no place to offer her,
Nor fuel for the clean flame of joy
That tried to burn within her soul.
One day,
Sitting on old Mrs. Latham’s back porch
Polishing the silver,
She asked herself two questions
And they ran something like this:
What can a colored girl do
On the money from a white woman’s kitchen?
And ain’t there any joy in this town?
Now the streets down by the river
Know more about this pretty Ruby Brown,
And the sinister shuttered houses of the bottoms
Hold a yellow girl
Seeking an answer to her questions.
The good church folk do not mention
Her name any more.
But the white men,
Habitués of the high shuttered houses,
Pay more money to her now
Than they ever did before,
When she worked in their kitchens.
Poet to Patron

What right has anyone to say
That I
Must throw out pieces of my heart
For pay?

For bread that helps to make
My heart beat true,
I must sell myself
To you?

A factory shift’s better,
A week’s meagre pay,
Than a perfumed note asking:
What poems today?

Ballad of the Landlord

Landlord, landlord,
My roof has sprung a leak.
Don’t you member I told you about it
Way last week?

Landlord, landlord,
These steps is broken down.
When you come up yourself
It’s a wonder you don’t fall down.

Ten Bucks you say I owe you?
Ten Bucks you say is due?
Well, that’s Ten Bucks more’n I’ll pay you
Till you fix this house up new.

What? You gonna get eviction orders?
You gonna cut off my heat?
You gonna take my furniture and
Throw it in the street?

Um-huh! You talking high and mighty.
Talk on—till you get through.
You ain’t gonna be able to say a word
If I land my fist on you.

*Police! Police!
Come and get this man!
He’s trying to ruin the government
And overturn the land!*

Copper’s whistle!
Patrol bell!
Arrest.

Precinct Station.
Iron cell.

Too Blue

I got those sad old weary blues.
I don’t know where to turn.
I don’t know where to go.
Nobody cares about you
When you sink so low.

What shall I do?
What shall I say?
Shall I take a gun
And put myself away?

I wonder if
One bullet would do?
As hard as my head is,
It would probably take two.

But I ain’t got
Neither bullet nor gun—
And I’m too blue
To look for one.

Harlem [1]

Here on the edge of hell
Stands Harlem—
Remembering the old lies,
The old kicks in the back,
The old “Be patient”
They told us before.

Sure, we remember.
Now when the man at the corner store
Says sugar’s gone up another two cents,
And bread one,
And there’s a new tax on cigarettes—
We remember the job we never had,
Never could get,
And can’t have now
Because we’re colored.

So we stand here
On the edge of hell
In Harlem
And look out on the world
And wonder
What we’re gonna do
In the face of what
We remember.

Theme for English B

The instructor said,

戈 home and write a page tonight.
And let that page come out of you—
Then, it will be true.

I wonder if it’s that simple?
I am twenty-two, colored, born in Winston-Salem.
I went to school there, then Durham, then here to this college on the hill above Harlem.
I am the only colored student in my class.
The steps from the hill lead down into Harlem, through a park, then I cross St. Nicholas, Eighth Avenue, Seventh, and I come to the Y,
the Harlem Branch Y, where I take the elevator up to my room, sit down, and write this page:

It’s not easy to know what is true for you or me at twenty-two, my age. But I guess I’m what I feel and see and hear, Harlem, I hear you:
hear you, hear me—we two—you, me, talk on this page.
(I hear New York, too.) Me—who?
Well, I like to eat, sleep, drink, and be in love.
I like to work, read, learn, and understand life.
I like a pipe for a Christmas present,
or records—Bessie, bop, or Bach.
I guess being colored doesn’t make me not like the same things other folks like who are other races.
So will my page be colored that I write?
Being me, it will not be white.
But it will be a part of you, instructor.

You are white—
yet a part of me, as I am a part of you.
That’s American.
Sometimes perhaps you don’t want to be a part of me.
Nor do I often want to be a part of you.
But we are, that’s true!
As I learn from you,
I guess you learn from me—
although you’re older—and white—and somewhat more free.

This is my page for English B.
Poet to Bigot

I have done so little
For you,
And you have done so little
For me,
That we have good reason
Never to agree.

I, however,
Have such meagre
Power,
Clutching at a Moment,
While you control
An hour.

But your hour is
A stone.

My moment is
A flower.

LANGSTON HUGHES ON POETRY

The Negro and the Racial Mountain

Hughes often examined the challenges he faced in writing both as an American and an African-American, as in this provocative essay published in 1926.

One of the most promising of the young Negro poets said to me once, “I want to be a poet—not a Negro poet,” meaning, I believe, “I want to write like a white poet”; meaning subconsciously, “I would like to be a white poet”; meaning behind that, “I would like to be white.” And I was sorry the young man said that, for no great poet has ever been afraid of being himself. And I doubted then that, with his desire to run away spiritually from his race, this boy would ever be a great poet. But this is the mountain standing in the way of any true Negro art in America—this urge within the race toward whiteness, the desire to pour racial individuality into the mold of American standardization, and to be as little Negro and as much American as possible.

But let us look at the immediate background of this young poet. His family is of what I suppose one would call the Negro middle class: people who are by no means rich yet never uncomfortable nor hungry—smug, contented, respectable folk, members of the Baptist church. The father goes to work every morning. He is a chief steward at a large white club. The mother sometimes does fancy sewing or supervises parties for the rich families of the town. The children go to a mixed school. In the home they read white papers and magazines. And the mother often says “Don’t be like niggers” when the children are bad. A frequent phrase from the father is, “Look how well a white man does things." And so the word white comes to be unconsciously a symbol of all the virtues. It holds for the children beauty, morality, and money. The whisper of "I want to be white" runs silently through their minds. This young poet's home is, I believe, a fairly typical home of the colored middle class. One sees immediately how difficult it would be for an artist born in such a home to interest himself in interpreting the beauty of his own people. He is never taught to see that beauty. He is taught rather not to see it, or if he does, to be ashamed of it when it is not according to Caucasian patterns.

For racial culture the home of a self-styled "high-class" Negro has nothing better to offer. Instead there will perhaps be more aping of things white than in a less cultured or less wealthy home. The father is perhaps a doctor, lawyer, landowner, or politician. The mother may be a social worker, or a teacher, or she may do nothing and have a maid. Father is often dark but he has usually married the lightest woman he could find. The family attend a fashionable church where few really colored faces are to be found. And they themselves draw a color line. In the North they go to white theaters and white movies. And in the South they have at least two cars and a house "like white folks." Nordic manners, Nordic faces, Nordic hair, Nordic art (if any), and an Episcopal heaven. A very high mountain indeed for the would-be racial artist to climb in order to discover himself and his people.

But then there are the low-down folks, the so-called common element, and they are the majority—may the Lord be praised! The people who have their nip of gin on Saturday nights and are not too important to themselves or the community, or too well fed, or too learned to watch the lazy world go round. They live on Seventh Street in Washington or State Street in Chicago and they do not particularly care whether they are like white folks or anybody else. Their joy runs, bang! into ecstasy. Their religion soars to a shout.
Work maybe a little today, rest a little tomorrow. Play awhile. Sing awhile.
O, let's dance! These common people are not afraid of spirituals, as for a long time their more intellectual brethren were, and jazz is their child. They furnish a wealth of colorful, distinctive material for any artist because they still hold their own individuality in the face of American standardizations.
And perhaps these common people will give to the world its truly great Negro artist, the one who is not afraid to be himself. Whereas the better-class Negro would tell the artist what to do, the people at least let him alone when he does appear. And they are not ashamed of him—if they know he exists at all. And they accept what beauty is their own without question.

Certainly there is, for the American Negro artist who can escape the restrictions the more advanced among his own group would put upon him, a great field of unused material ready for his art. Without going outside his race and even among the better classes with their "white" culture and conscious American manners, but still Negro enough to be different, there is sufcient matter to furnish a black artist with a lifetime of creative work. And when he chooses to touch on the relations between Negroes and whites in this country with their innumerable overtones and undertones, surely, and especially for literature and the drama, there is an inexhaustible supply of themes at hand. To these the Negro artist can give his racial individuality, his heritage of rhythm and warmth, and his incongruous humor that so often, as in the Blues, becomes ironic laughter mixed with tears. But let us look again at the mountain.
A prominent Negro clubwoman in Philadelphia paid eleven dollars to hear Raquel Meller sing Andalusian popular songs. But she told me a few weeks before she would not think of going to hear “that woman,” Clara Smith, a great black artist, sing Negro folksongs. And many an upper-class Negro church, even now, would not dream of employing a spiritual in its services. The drab melodies in white folks’ hymnbooks are much to be preferred. “We want to worship the Lord correctly and quietly. We don’t believe in ‘shouting.’ Let’s be dull like the Nordics,” they say, in effect.

The road for the serious black artist, then, who would produce a racial art is most certainly rocky and the mountain is high. Until recently he received almost no encouragement for his work from either white or colored people. The fine novels of Chesnutt1 go out of print with neither race noticing their passing. The quaint charm and humor of Dunbar’s2 dialect verse brought to him, in his day, largely the same kind of encouragement one would give a sideshow freak (A colored man writing poetry! How odd!) or a clown (How amusing!).

The present vogue in things Negro, although it may do as much harm as good for the budding colored artist, has at least done this: it has brought him forcibly to the attention of his own people among whom for so long, unless the other race had noticed him beforehand, he was a prophet with little honor. I understand that Charles Gilpin acted for years in Negro theaters without any special acclaim from his own, but when Broadway gave him eight curtain calls, Negroes, too, began to beat a tin pan in his honor. I know a young colored writer, a manual worker by day, who had been writing well for the colored magazines for some years, but it was not until he recently broke into the white publications and his first book was accepted by a prominent New York publisher that the “best” Negroes in his city took the trouble to discover that he lived there. Then almost immediately they decided to give a grand dinner for him. But the society ladies were careful to whisper to his mother that perhaps she’d better not come. They were not sure she would have an evening gown.

The Negro artist works against an undertow of sharp criticism and misunderstanding from his own group and unintentional bribes from the whites. “O, be respectable, write about nice people, show how good we are,” say the Negroes. “Be stereotyped, don’t go too far, don’t shatter our illusions about you, don’t amuse us too seriously. We will pay you,” say the whites. Both would have told Jean Toomer not to write “Cane.” The colored people did not praise it. The white people did not buy it. Most of the colored people who did read “Cane” hate it. They are afraid of it. Although the critics gave it good reviews the public remained indifferent. Yet (excepting the work of Du Bois3) “Cane” contains the finest prose written by a Negro in America. And like the singing of Robeson,4 it is truly racial.

But in spite of the Nordicized Negro intelligentsia and the desires of some white editors we have an honest American Negro literature already with us. Now I await the rise of the Negro theater. Our folk music, having achieved world-wide fame, offers itself to the genius of the great individual American Negro composer who is to come. And within the next decade I expect to see the work of a growing school of colored artists who paint and model the beauty of dark faces and create with new technique the expressions of their own soul-world. And the Negro dancers who will dance like flame and the singers who will continue to carry our songs to all who listen—they will be with us in even greater numbers tomorrow.

Most of my own poems are racial in theme and treatment, derived from the life I know. In many of them I try to grasp and hold some of the meanings and rhythms of jazz. I am as sincere as I know how to be in these poems and yet after every reading I answer questions like these from my own people: Do you think Negroes should always write about Negroes? I wish you wouldn’t read some of your poems to white folks. How do you find anything interesting in a place like a cabaret? Why do you write about black people? You aren’t black. What makes you do so many jazz poems?

But jazz to me is one of the inherent expressions of Negro life in America: the eternal tom-tom beating in the Negro soul—the tom-tom of revolt against weariness in a white world, a world of subway trains, and work, work, work; the tom-tom of joy and laughter, and pain swallowed in a smile. Yet the Philadelphia clubwoman is ashamed to say that her race created it and she does not like me to write about it. The old subconscious “white is best” runs through her mind. Years of study under white teachers, a lifetime of white books, pictures, and papers, and white manners, morals, and Puritan standards made her dislike the spirituals. And now she turns up her nose at jazz and all its manifestations—likewise almost everything else distinctly racial. She doesn’t care for the Winold Reiss portraits of Negroes because they are “too Negro.” She does not want a true picture of herself from anybody. She wants the artist to flatter her, to make the white world believe that all Negroes are as smug and as near white in soul as she wants to be. But, to my mind, it is the duty of the younger Negro artist, if he accepts any duties at all from outsiders, to change through the force of his art that old whispering “I want to be white,” hidden in the aspirations of his people, to “Why should I want to be white? I am a Negro—and beautiful!”

So I am ashamed for the black poet who says, “I want to be a poet, not a Negro poet,” as though his own racial world were not as interesting as any other world. I am ashamed, too, for the colored artist who runs from the painting of Negro faces to the painting of sunsets after the manner of the academicians because he fears the strange un-whiteness of his own features. An artist must be free to choose what he does, certainly, but he must also never be afraid to do what he might choose.

Let the blare of Negro jazz bands and the bellowing voice of Bessie Smith singing Blues penetrate the closed ears of the colored near-intellectuals until they listen and perhaps understand. Let Paul Robeson singing “Water Boy,” and Rudolph Fisher writing about the streets of Harlem, and Jean Toomer holding the heart of Georgia in his hands, and Aaron Douglas drawing strange black fantasies cause the smug Negro middle class to turn from their white, respectable, ordinary books and papers to catch a glimmer of their own beauty. We younger Negro artists who create now intend to express our individual dark-skinned selves without fear or shame. If white people are pleased we are glad. If they are not, it doesn’t matter. We know we are beautiful. And ugly too. The tom-tom cries and the tom-tom laughs.
If colored people are pleased we are glad. If they are not, their displeasure doesn’t matter either. We build our temples for tomorrow, strong as we know how, and we stand on top of the mountain, free within ourselves.

On the Cultural Achievements of African-Americans

Without them, on my part, there would have been no poems; without their hopes and fears and dreams, no stories; without their struggles, no dramas; without their music, no songs.

Had I not heard as a child in the little churches of Kansas and Missouri, “Deep river, my home is over Jordan,” or “My Lord, what a morning when the stars begin to fall,” I might not have come to realize the lyric beauty of living poetry.

There is so much richness in Negro humor, so much beauty in black dreams, so much dignity in our struggle, and so much universality in our problems, in us—in each living human being of color—that I do not understand the tendency today that some American Negro artists have of seeking to run away from themselves, of running away from us, of being afraid to sing our own songs, paint our pictures, write about ourselves—when it is our music that has given America its greatest music, our humor that has enriched its entertainment media for the past 100 years, our rhythm that has guided its dancing feet from plantation days to the Charleston. . . . Yet there are some of us who say, “Why write about Negroes? Why not be just a writer?” And why not—if one wants to be “just a writer?” Negroes in a free world should be whatever each wants to be—even if it means being “just a writer. . . .”

There is nothing to be ashamed of in the strength and dignity and laughter of the Negro people. And there is nothing to be afraid of in the use of their material.

Could you be possibly afraid that the rest of the world will not accept it? Our spirituals are sung and loved in the great concert halls of the whole world. Our blues are played from Topeka to Tokyo. Harlem’s jive talk delights Hong Kong and Paris. Those of our writers who have most concerned themselves with our very special problems are translated and read around the world. The local, the regional can—and does—become universal. Sean O’Casey’s Irishmen are an example. So I would say to young Negro writers, do not be afraid of yourself. You are the world. . . .
García Lorca’s “Despedida”

My father sometimes quotes, half-jokingly although it is a serious poem, Federico García Lorca’s “Despedida,” which he learned when he was a schoolboy in Cuba. Because it is short and because he quotes it so often, I know it by heart. In Spanish it goes like this:
Despedida

Si muero,
dejad el balcón abierto.

El niño come naranjas.
(Desde mi balcón lo veo.)

El segador siega el trigo.
(Desde mi balcón lo siento.)

¡Si muero,
dejad el balcón abierto!

When I translated the poem for this assignment, I didn’t find any serious difficulties—probably because the poem does not rhyme. The only word in the poem that I think is especially hard to translate is the title, “Despedida.” It comes from a verb, “despedir,” which Spanish-English dictionaries define as “to take one’s leave.” In English, however, no one “takes one’s leave”; we just say “Goodbye,” and go. But “Goodbye” is too informal for “Despedida,” so I settled on “Farewell.” No one speaking English ever says “Farewell,” but I think it catches the slight formality of the Spanish, and it has the right tone for this poem about a man who is talking about leaving the world. Still another possibility that seems good to me is “parting.”

Aside from the title, I at first found the poem easy to translate, but on further thinking about my translation, I found a few things that I wish I could do better. Here, for a start, is my literal translation.

Farewell

If I die,
leave the balcony open.

The boy eats oranges.
(From my balcony I see him.)
The reaper reaps the wheat.

(From my balcony I hear him.)

If I die,
leave the balcony open!

There are subtle things in this poem, but most of them can be translated easily. For instance, in the first and last stanzas the poet speaks of “el balcón” (the balcony), but in the middle two stanzas he speaks of “mi balcón” (my balcony). That is, in the first and last stanzas, where he imagines himself dead, he realizes the balcony is not his anymore, but is simply “the balcony.” There is no difficulty in translating this idea from Spanish into English.

Because I knew the poem by heart, I translated it without first looking at the original on the page. But when I wrote it out in Spanish, too, I became aware of a small difficulty. In Spanish if a sentence ends with an exclamation point (or a question mark) it also begins with one, so the reader knows at the beginning of a sentence what sort of sentence it will be. We don’t do this in English, and I think something is lost in English. The two exclamation marks in García Lorca’s last sentence, one at the beginning and one at the end, seem to me to call more attention to the sentence, and make it more sad. And since the first and last sentences are identical except for the exclamation marks around the last sentence, the punctuation makes the last sentence different from the first. Superficially the poem begins and ends with the same sentence, but the last sentence is much more final.

A second difficulty is this: On rereading my translation, I wondered if it should try to catch the o sounds that in the original are at the end of every line except the third. It’s hard to explain, but I think this repeated o sound has several effects. Certainly the repetition of the sound gives unity to the poem. But it also is part of the meaning, in two ways. First of all, the sound of o is like a lament or a cry. Second, because the sound is repeated again and again, in line after line, it is as if the poet wants the present to continue, doesn’t want to stop, wants to keep living. Obviously he is not looking forward to dying. He doesn’t say anything about hoping to go to heaven. All he thinks of is what he sees now, and he suggests that he would like to keep seeing it from his balcony.

Balcón in Spanish means, as I have translated it, “balcony,” but to say “leave the balcony open”--which is perfectly all right in Spanish--sounds a little funny in English, maybe especially because we don’t have many balconies here, unlike (I am told) Spain. The idea of course is to leave open the door, or if it is glass it is also a window, that leads to the balcony. Maybe, then, it makes better sense to be a little free in the translation, and to say, “Leave the window open,” or even “Do not draw the curtain,” or some such thing. In fact, if we can put “window” at the end of the line, we get the o sound of the original.

If I die, Leave open the window. But in the original the first line (“Si muero,” literally “If I die”) has this o sound also, and I can’t think of any way of getting this into the translation. For a moment I thought of beginning,
If I go,
Leave open the window,
but "If I go" just isn’t a moving way of saying "If I die," which is what “Si muero” means.
Still, we might translate line 4 as “I see him from my window," and line 6 as "I hear him from my window." In the end, I decided not to begin by saying “If I go,” but (even though I lose the o sound in the first line) to substitute “window” for the “balcony” in lines 2, 4, and 6, in order to get the repetition and the sad o sound. My final version goes like this:
Farewell
If I die,
leave open the window.
The boy eats oranges.
(I see him from my window.)
The reaper reaps the wheat.
(I hear him from my window.)
If I die,
leave open the window!

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

Here are our responses. If yours differ, consider putting them into writing.

1. This seems like an excellent translation to us. Do you agree?
2. When the student shared his essay with others in the class, it was praised for being “thoughtful." What gives the essay this quality?

A Note on Using the First-Person Singular Pronoun in Essays

Some handbooks on writing tell students never to use I in an essay. But this rule is too rigid; in the case of the essay you have just read, the personal touches make it all the more interesting and engaging. Often the problem is not really with the use of I, but, rather, with the absence of explanation and evidence that make clear what prompted the “I” to respond as he or she does. This student does a good job of focusing on the poem, commenting on details of language, and keeping the nature of the assignment in mind. His use of I occurs as part of a careful analysis and argument.

TRANSLATING A POEM OF YOUR CHOICE, AND COMMENTING ON THE TRANSLATION

If you are at ease in a language other than English, translate a short poem from that language into English. It may be a poem that you learned in school or at home or on the street.

We suggest that you begin by jotting down a line-for-line prose translation, and then work on a poetic version. Your prose version of course will not be a word-for-word translation. After all, a word-for-word translation of the Spanish “Me llamo Juan” is “Me [or ‘Myself’] I call John,” but no one speaking English says this. The English version of these words is “My name is John”—even though the Spanish word for name (nombre) does not appear in the original sentence. Similarly, a native speaker of French, when asked whether he or she is going to class this morning, may reply “Mais oui,” which in a word-for-word translation would be “But yes.” In English, however, we would simply say “Yes” or “Certainly,” and therefore the “But” ought to be omitted in a translation. Or consider the phrase “les hommes d’équipage” in the first line of Baudelaire’s “L’Albatros” (see page 871). A word-for-word translation would be “men of the crew,” but does one say this? Perhaps “members of the crew” is better? Or perhaps simply “the crew”? Or “crewmens”? Or, perhaps best of all, “sailors”? In any case, the French equipage certainly cannot be translated as “equipment.” (Translators call words that look alike but have different meanings “false friends.” Examples: French advertissement means “warning”; German also means “therefore”; Spanish constipado means “having a head cold.”)

The prose translation ought to sound like English, and this means going beyond a word-for-word translation, at least to a phrase-by-phrase translation. If English is not your native language, you may want to check your prose version with a native-born speaker of English. In any case, once you have a prose version that is in idiomatic English, try to put it into a poetic form.

This does not mean that (assuming your original uses rhyme) you must preserve the exact rhyme scheme. If the original rhymes abab, you may find it satisfactory to produce a version in which only the second and fourth lines rhyme. Similarly, even if the original line has 11 or 12 syllables, you may prefer to reduce the line to 10 syllables because the pentameter line (10 syllables) is so widely used in English that it seems natural. Admittedly, your task is easier if you choose an unrhymed poem, and much of the world’s poetry—to cite only two instances, Native American poetry and Japanese poetry—does not use rhyme. (We discuss one Japanese form, the haiku, on page 865.)

When you have done your best, relax for a while, and then jot down (in preparation for drafting an essay that will accompany your translation) some notes about the particular problems involved in translating the work. Is there a pun in the original that is impossible to translate? Are there historical or mythological allusions that are clear to people who belong to the culture that produced the poem but that are obscure to outsiders? Are there qualities in the original language (specialists call it “the source language”) that simply cannot be reproduced in the “host” (or “target”) language? For instance, Japanese has several verbs meaning “to give”; the word used in “I gave you a book” differs from the word in “You gave me a book.” It is rather as if one had to say, “You bestowed a book on me”—but of course no one does say this in English. What, then, is a translator to do?

In the end, you will produce a translation, and an essay of some 500 words, explaining the particular difficulties you encountered, and perhaps explaining the hardest decisions that you ultimately made.

LAST-MINUTE HELP: THREE SPANISH POEMS

If you don’t know a poem in a language other than English, consider translating one or both of these Spanish folk songs, or, finally, the poem we print by the Chilean poet Gabriela Mistral.

Ya se van los pastores, alla Estremadura
Ya se queda la Sierra triste y obscura.
Ya se van los pastores ya se van marchando
Ya las pobres niñas se queden llorando.

The shepherds are already leaving on their way to Estremadura
And the mountain ridge is already sad and gloomy.
The shepherds are already going, they are already departing
And the poor girls remain there, crying.

Una gallina con pollos cinco duro me costó
Corrocloclo corrocloclo
La compré por la mañana, y a la tarde se perdió
Corrocloclo corrocloclo
Yo no siento la gallina ni el dinero que costó
Corrocloclo corrocloclo
Solo siento los pollitos que sin madre los quedó
Corrocloclo corrocloclo.

I bought a hen and chicks for five duros
Corrocloclo corrocloclo
I bought her in the morning and in the afternoon it lost its way
Corrocloclo corrocloclo
I’m not sorry about the hen or the money it cost
Corrocloclo corrocloclo
I’m only sorry for the chicks who are left without a mother
Corrocloclo corrocloclo.

GABRIELA MISTRAL

Lucila Godoy Alacayaga (1889–1957) adopted the pseudonym Gabriela Mistral. A teacher and a director of schools in Chile, she achieved fame there in 1914, when she won first prize in a national poetry contest; she received international fame in 1945, when she was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature, the first Latin-American writer to win the award. She was also distinguished in two other careers, as an educator—she is esteemed for her revision of the Mexican school system and she was a beloved professor at Barnard
Chapter 23 / Poetry and Translation

College in New York—and as a figure in the world of international politics, representing Chile in the League of Nations and the United Nations.

The following poem originates in a response to a statue, Rodin’s The Thinker. If you do work on a translation of Mistral’s poem, you might keep in mind a comment by an earlier translator of her work, the poet Langston Hughes, who in his Introduction to Selected Poems of Gabriela Mistral (1957) wrote: “I have no theories of translation. I simply try to transfer into English as much as I can of the literal content, emotion, and style of each poem.” Unfortunately, Hughes did not include a translation of the following poem.

El Pensador de Rodin

Con el mentón caído sobre la mano ruda, el Pensador se acuerda que es carne de la huesa,
carne fatal, delante del destino desnuda, carne que odia la muerte, y tembló de belleza.

Y tembló de amor, toda su primavera ardiente,y ahora, al otoño, anégase de verdad y tristeza.
El “de morir tenemos” pasa sobre su frente,en todo agudo bronce, cuando la noche empieza.

Y en la angustia, sus músculos se hienden, sufridores.
Los surcos de su carne se llenan de terrores.
Se hiende, como la hoja de otoño, al Señor fuerte que le llama en los broncees . . . Y no hay árbol torcido de sol en la llanura, ni león de flanco herido, crispados como este hombre que medita en la muerte.

Rodin’s Thinker

Translated by Gustavo Alfaro

With his chin fallen on his rough hand,
the Thinker, remembering that his flesh is of the grave, mortal flesh, naked before its fate,
flesh that hates death, trembled for beauty.

And he trembled for love, his whole ardent spring,
and now in autumn, he is overcome with truth and sadness.
“We must die” passes across his brow, in every piercing trumpet sound, when night begins to fall.

Translator’s note: Mistral’s bronce in line 8 and bronces in line 12 I translate as trumpet sound and trumpet calls. Given the context, this reading seems to me to be more plausible than a reading that takes bronce and bronces to refer to the bronze sculpture itself.
And in his anguish, his long suffering muscles split.
The furrows of his flesh are filled with terrors
It splits, like the autumn leaf before the mighty Lord who calls it with trumpet calls . . . And there is no tree twisted by the sun in the plain, nor lion wounded on its side, as tense as this man who meditates on death.

TRANSLATING HAIKU

Earlier in this book (pages 701–704) we looked at some haiku, a Japanese poetic form that consists of 17 syllables, arranged into lines of 5, 7, and 5 syllables. (Strictly speaking, it is written in a continuous line, as we write prose, but it is conceived as three units, 5-7-5.) It is unrhymed, but some English translations and imitations use rhyme.

Here is the most famous of all haiku, in Japanese and with a word-by-word literal translation:

BASHO (1644–1694)

Furuike ya

kawazu tobikomu

mizu no oto

old pond

frog jumps in

water's sound
One of the things that made this poem remarkable was that it probably was the first Japanese poem about a frog that did not talk about the noise of the frog croaking, but instead talked about the noise of the water. (By the way, for an American poem that calls attention to the croaking of a frog, see Emily Dickinson’s “I’m Nobody! Who are you?” on page 639.)

How to translate Basho’s poem? We have already given a literal translation, but here are some efforts at more literary versions:

The old pond
A frog jumps in
The sound of water.

An old pond
A frog jumps in—
Plop.

Old garden lake!
The frog jumps in,
And the waters wake.

A bog
A frog
A sound Drowned.

The old pond
A frog jumps; The water slurps.

TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

Offer your own translation or adaptation of the haiku, perhaps keeping the 5-7-5 arrangement of the original; or compose an original poem that responds to Basho’s. Here are two examples of responses that our students have produced:

An old pond—
Basho jumps in;
No more noise.

An old pond—
If Basho were here
I’d push him in.

Here is another haiku by Basho, in Japanese and with a graceless word-by-word translation. (The original has, unusually, nine syllables in the second line, a permissible variation.)

Kare-eda ni withered branch on karasu no tomari-keri crow is perched aki no kure autumn evening

Japanese does not usually distinguish between the singular and the plural, so what we translate as “crow is perched” could equally be translated “crows are perched.” Further, what we translated as “autumn evening” may equally be translated “late autumn.”
Further Thoughts about Translating Poetry

The next poem, also by Basho, was composed at the site of a battle where one of Japan's most famous warriors committed suicide after being defeated by forces acting on behalf of his own brother. It is impossible to find an exact parallel in American history, but perhaps the death of Stonewall Jackson at the Battle of Chancellorsville (1863) comes close in feeling, especially because Jackson was mortally wounded by his own men.

Natsu-gusa ya  Summer grasses tsuwamono-domo ga  strong warriors' yume no ato  dreams' relics

In the second line, we use “warriors” rather than “soldiers” because the Japanese word has an archaic flavor. (By the way, in this instance, unlike the poem about the crow or crows, the word for “warriors” is plural.) The gist of the idea of the poem is that grasses (or weeds) now flourish where strong soldiers once fought; all that is left of the dreams (or ambitions) of the soldiers is the summer grass. Here are two versions that students produced, using off-rhymes:

Summer grasses  Weeds flourish
All that is left  where soldiers nourished where warriors passed  dreams of glory.

Here are two versions, again by students, that retain the 5-7-5 pattern of the original.

On this grassy spot  Grasses grow today
Here once a noble army  Where heroic soldiers died Dreamed its dream and died.  Leaving bones and dreams.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Try your hand at translating Basho’s poems about the crow(s) and about the dead warriors, or invent an adaptation of each poem. You might, for instance, write a poem about a bird in a season other than the fall, and a poem about the ironic implications of some local site.

2. Here are literal translations of two more haiku by Basho. Create versions that are more memorable.

If you have read the preceding pages and have had the pleasures of wrestling with a translation and of writing an essay about your efforts, you are ready for an advanced course—the next few pages. But even if you have not engaged in the preliminaries, you may find that the following discussion of poems and translations will help you to think about the language and structure of poetry.
We begin these supplementary remarks by looking at a very short poem by the Roman author Catullus (87?–55? BCE). The subject is the paradoxical quality of the feelings of a lover. (There are countless poems about love as a pleasing pain, a heavenly hell, and about the lover as both active and passive, eagerly loving and yet tormented by love. See, for instance, Aphra Behn’s poem on page 594.) Here is Catullus’ poem:

Odi et amo: quare id faciam, fortasse requiris?
Nescio, sed fieri sentio et excrucior.

This can be translated more or less literally as:

I hate and I love. Why do I do that, perhaps you ask.
I don’t know, but I feel it to be happening, and I am tortured.

Notice that the language of this poem is not so remote from English as it may seem at first glance:

• In the first line, the Latin odi (“I hate”) is related to the English word odious; amo (“I love”) to our word amorous; and requiris (“you ask”) to our require and inquire.
• In the second line, sentio (“I feel”) is related to our sentient, and excrucior (“I am crucified” or “I am tortured”) to our excruciare. (This last word includes crux, or “cross.”)

Next—and here we get closer to our topic, poetry—notice the arrangement or pattern of the words, since one of the things literature does is to put experience into a pattern. In Catullus’ little poem, there is a pattern of long and short syllables (but we need not discuss classical versification here), and also a pattern of verbs. Each line contains four verbs. Those in the first line are active (“I hate,” “I love,” “I do,” “you ask”), whereas those in the second line are passive or describe a passive condition (“I don’t know,” “I feel it to be happening,” “I am tortured”). And so we can say that Catullus catches an aspect—or rather, two aspects—of love,

• the sense of activity and also
• the sense of helplessness.

Each verb in the first line is echoed or balanced in the second; thus Odi et amo (“I hate and I love”) at the beginning of the first line chimes with sentio et excrucior (“I feel . . . and I am tortured”) at the end of the second. Moreover, the active faciam (“I do”) in the first line connects with the passive form of the verb, fieri (“to be done,” “to happen”) in the second.

Having tried to convey something of the poetry of Catullus’ two lines—something of their artful expressiveness—let’s look at a few translations. The original does not rhyme, but many translators have believed that an English version needs to rhyme if it is to be seen and felt as a poem.

I hate and love—the why I cannot tell,
But by my tortures know the fact too well.
—Theodore Martin

In the next two versions the translators suggest particular tortures:

I hate and love. Why do that? Good question.
No answer save “I do.” Nailed, through either hand.
—Frederic Raphael and Kenneth McLeish
I hate and I love. And if you ask me how,
I do not know—I only feel it, and I’m torn in two.
—Peter Whigham

The first of these versions, by Raphael and McLeish, clearly—perhaps too clearly—evokes crucifixion. The second, with “I’m torn in two,” catches the double nature of love that is the subject of Catullus’ poem, and it evokes visions of the instrument of torture known as the rack, or perhaps of a victim whose limbs were tied to two or more horses that were then whipped into flight.

Here is one more version:

“At once I hate and love as well.”
—“In heaven’s name, Catullus, how?”
—“God knows! And yet I feel it now Here in my heart: the whole of hell.”
—M. H. Tattersall

Tattersall’s version is free in that it converts the poem into a dialogue and names Catullus, but one can argue that it is true to the spirit of the poem. It is widely agreed that in the translation of poetry the spirit is more important than the letter. Some of the worst—least moving, indeed least readable—translations are word-by-word translations that can claim to be very close to the original but that are unlike anything we can imagine being spoken in English.

CAN POETRY BE TRANSLATED?

Having looked at a range of translations, we can perhaps now move from a particular work to a general problem or question. To translate is (literally) “to carry across”; a text is carried from one language into another. But can poetry be translated? Robert Frost once defined poetry as “what gets lost in translation.” He was not the only person to think that poetry can’t be translated. An Italian proverb generalizes, “Traduttori, traditori”—that is, “Translators are traitors,” or, more freely, “Translation betrays”—but as you can see, much is lost in our translation.

The idea that poetry can’t be translated is rooted in the fact that poets make use not only of the gist of the obvious meaning of a word but also of patterns of sound. We can see this most easily by first looking at a statement that is not a poem but that relies heavily on its sounds. Consider

Look before you leap.

The most obvious pattern is the alliteration (words that begin with the same sound), “look” and “leap,” but there is also a pattern of stresses. The sentence begins and ends with a stress, and “before” and “you leap” each consist of an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed syllable. If you compare “Look before you leap” with “Watch out before you leap,” or with “Before leaping, look around,” you’ll see that these translations of English words into other English words lose much of what counts in the original.

You might take a moment to try to put into other words such expressions as “There’s no fool like an old fool,” “Penny wise and pound foolish,” or “A penny saved is a penny earned.” Even better, if you are familiar with a memorable saying in a language other than English, try to capture its effectiveness in an English translation of your own.
Let’s think now of some issues specific to translating poetry. Rhyme of course is a kind of pattern (a recurring sound), and it can cause a translator difficulty, since effective rhyme often conveys some sort of meaning. It may bring together two words that not only sound alike but have some association in common, as in the greeting-card rhymes of moon and June, or dove and love. Or a rhyme may achieve a poignant ironic effect by bringing together two words that sound alike but that differ sharply in meaning, such as light (with its associations of life) and night (with its associations of death). “Look before you leap” doesn’t contain rhyme in the usual sense of the word, but the alliterating l sounds can be called initial rhyme. And like rhyme, alliteration—because of the identity in sound—can imply some sort of identity between the alliterating words, or as here, it can make an effective contrast: “Look” implies caution and probably motionless, whereas “leap” implies reckless activity.

Probably everyone will agree that translators should strive to capture the subtleties of the original, and probably everyone will agree—here we get back to Robert Frost’s view—that inevitably much will be lost. But what is gained in translation, or what may be gained, is a new poem.

Something along these lines is suggested by Edwin Cranston, a leading translator of classical Japanese poetry, in A Waka Anthology. Translators have duties to their authors, but they also have duties to their own powers. Cranston makes this point by calling attention to a tenth-century Japanese poet’s assertion that poems “have their seed in the human heart, and burgeon forth into the myriad leaves of words.” In similar fashion, Cranston says, the translator “descends into the poem and lets something happen”; the translator serves “as a medium for the new growth.” But of course the process of translating is not passive. As Cranston says, if translators enter into the work and listen to it, they also have their own ideas. The original is strongly there, but so is the translator’s creative impulse, which has its own direction and has “its own life and integrity. Nothing is more persuasive than something that works, and if a line somehow works, it is hard to abandon it.”

The result may be a translation that is free rather than faithful. Or if it is faithful, it is faithful to the spirit of literature rather than to the letter of the original work. If we push this view further than Cranston himself does, the translation—perhaps better called a version or an adaptation—is a success if it has life as a poem, however removed it may be from the original. More than one translator has defended his or her work as Edward FitzGerald (translator of The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam) did, by quoting from Ecclesiastes, “Better a live dog than a dead lion.” One translator we know tells us he likes to think of the original as a “control.” The original serves as a control on the act of translation, though it rests with the translator to decide whether he or she allows the original to control a lot or a little. Translators can give themselves a great deal of freedom, or only a little. But in either case, because their work is a translation of something else, they are always referring back to another text while they compose a new one.

LOOKING AT TRANSLATIONS OF A POEM
BY CHARLES BAUDELAIRE

In the following poem the French poet Charles Baudelaire (1821–1867) compares the albatross—majestic when soaring above ocean-going ships, but pitiful when captured and flopping on the deck—with the poet, whose lofty imagination makes him unsuited for the workaday world. The poem was first published in the 1859 edition of Baudelaire’s book Les Fleurs du mal (The Flowers of Evil).

L’Albatros

[1859]

Souvent, pour s’amuser, les hommes d’équipage
Prennent des albatros, vastes oiseaux des mers,
Qui suivent, indolents compagnons de voyage,
Le navire glissant sur les gouffres amers.

À peine les ont-ils déposés sur les planches,
Que ces rois de l’azur, maladroits et honteux,
Laissent piteusement leurs grandes ailes blanches
Comme des aviron traîner à côté d’eux.

Ce voyager ailé, comme il est gauche et veule!
Lui, naguère si beau, qu’il est comique et laid!
L’un agace son bec avec un brûle-gueule,
L’autre mime, en boitant, l’infirme qui volait!

Le Poète est semblable au prince des nuées
Qui hante la tempête et se rit de l’archer;
Exilé sur le sol au milieu des huées,
Ses ailes de géant l’empêchent de marcher.

A literal translation, almost word by word, would go something as follows. (We retain the lineation of the original, and we offer it not as a satisfactory version of the poem but only as a starting point, in order to help readers who do not know French to follow the poem.)

Often, to amuse themselves, sailors capture albatrosses, great sea birds, who follow, indolent companions of the journey,
the ship, gliding on the bitter deeps.

As soon as they stretch them out on the deck these monarchs of the blue, awkward and ashamed, pitifully let their large white wings like oars drag by their sides.

The winged traveler, how awkward and feeble!
He who a short time ago was so beautiful,
one sailor teases his beak with a clay pipe,
and another, limping, mimics the cripple who flew.

The Poet is like the prince of the clouds who is at home in the tempest and who scorns the archer;
exiled on the earth, an object of scorn,
his giant wings hinder him as he walks.

Let’s look now at some verse translations of the first stanza. In the original, the first and third lines of each stanza rhyme, as do the second and fourth, the rhyme scheme thus being abab. The task of following Baudelaire’s rhyme scheme is difficult, and it can lead to very strained lines; some translators therefore prefer to rhyme only two of the four lines, or to settle for an off-rhyme, as in the first example here, where sea and indolently rhyme, and where selves and gulfs chime less precisely:

Sometimes, sailors to amuse themselves catch albatrosses, great birds of the sea, which as companions follow indolently
the vessel gliding over bitter gulfs.
—C. F. MacIntyre

In the next version, all four lines rhyme closely, but, not surprisingly, the translation is somewhat freer:

Often, when bored, the sailors of the crew
Trap albatross, the great birds of the seas,
Mild travelers escorting in the blue
Ships gliding on the ocean’s mysteries.
—James McGowan

We say this version is freer because, after all, Baudelaire spoke not of “the ocean’s mysteries” but of les gouffres amers, the bitter deeps. In short, there often is a trade-off between closely following what might be called the formal properties of the poem (in this case, rhyme) and the precise meaning. On the other hand, here is a rhymed translation that is remarkably faithful to the original. We quote the entire version:

Often, for pastime, mariners will ensnare
The albatross, that vast sea-bird who sweeps
On high companionable pinion where
Their vessel glides upon the bitter deeps.
Torn from his native space, this captive king
Flounders upon the deck in stricken pride,
And pitiably lets his great white wing
Drag like a heavy paddle at his side.
This rider of winds, how awkward he is, and weak!
How droll he seems, who lately was all grace!
A sailor pokes a pipestem into his beak;
Another, hobbling, mocks his trammeled pace.
The Poet is like this monarch of the clouds,
Familiar of storms, of stars, and of all high things;
Exiled on earth amidst its hooting crowds,
He cannot walk, borne down by his giant wings.
—Richard Wilbur

TOPIC FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

Produce your own version—rhymed or unrhymed—of the final stanza of “The Albatross.” For your convenience we offer some rhymes that other translators have used, but you are under no compulsion to use them. MacIntyre used mocks, clouds, crowds, walk; McGowan used clouds, day, crowds, way. George Dillon (who collaborated with Edna St. Vincent Millay on a translation of The Flowers of Evil) used cloud, slings, crowd, wings. Francis Duke, in his translation of Flowers of Evil, used clouds, defiant, crowds, giant.

John Henry*

John Henry was a very small boy,
   Sitting on his mammy's knee;
He picked up a hammer and a little piece of steel,
   Saying, "A hammer'll be the death of me, O Lord,
A hammer'll be the death of me."

John Henry went up on the mountain
   And he came down on the side,
The mountain was so tall and John Henry was so small
   That he laid down his hammer and he cried, "O Lord,
He laid down his hammer and he cried.

John Henry was a man just six feet in height,
   Nearly two feet and a half across the breast.
He'd take a nine-pound hammer and hammer all day long
   And never get tired and want to rest, O Lord,
And never get tired and want to rest.

John Henry was a steel-driving man, O Lord,
   He drove all over the world.
He come to Big Bend Tunnel on the C. & O. Road
   Where he beat the steam drill down, O Lord,
Where he beat the steam drill down.

John Henry said to the captain,
   "Captain, you go to town,
Bring me back a twelve-pound hammer
   And I'll beat that steam drill down, O Lord,
And I'll beat that steam drill down."

They placed John Henry on the right-hand side,
   The steam drill on the left;
He said, "Before I let that steam drill beat me down
   I'll die with my hammer in my hand, O Lord,
And send my soul to rest."

The white folks all got scared,
   Thought Big Bend was a-fallin' in;
John Henry hollered out with a very loud shout,
   "It's my hammer a-fallin' in the wind, O Lord,
It's my hammer a-fallin' in the wind."

John Henry said to his shaker,
   "Shaker, you better pray,
For if I miss that little piece of steel

---

*John Henry, a black steel driver from West Virginia, worked on the Chesapeake & Ohio’s Big Bend Tunnel around 1870. The steel driver hammered a drill (held by his assistant, the “shaker”) into rocks so that explosives could then be poured in. In the 1870s, mechanical steel drills were introduced, displacing the steel driver.
Tomorrow'll be your buryin’ day, O Lord,
Tomorrow’ll be your buryin’ day.”

The man that invented that steam drill
He thought he was mighty fine.
John Henry sunk the steel fourteen feet
While the steam drill only made nine, O Lord,
While the steam drill only made nine.

John Henry said to his loving little wife,
“I’m sick and want to go to bed.
Fix me a place to lay down, Child;
There’s a roarin’ in my head, O Lord,
There’s a roarin’ in my head.”

SHERMAN ALEXIE

Sherman Alexie, born in 1966 in Spokane, Washington, holds a B.A. from Washington State University. Author of novels, stories, and poems, Alexie has been awarded a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts. Of his life and his work he says, “I am a Spokane Coeur d’Alene Indian. . . . I live on the Spokane Indian Reservation. Everything I do now, writing and otherwise, has its origin in that.”

For another poem by Alexie see page 714.

On the Amtrak from Boston to New York City

The white woman across the aisle from me says, “Look, look at all the history, that house on the hill there is over two hundred years old,”
as she points out the window past me into what she has been taught. I have learned little more about American history during my few days back East than what I expected and far less of what we should all know of the tribal stories whose architecture is 15,000 years older than the corners of the house that sits museumed on the hill. “Walden Pond,” the woman on the train asks, “Did you see Walden Pond?”
and I don’t have a cruel enough heart to break her own by telling her there are five Walden Ponds on my little reservation out West and at least a hundred more surrounding Spokane, the city I pretend to call my home. “Listen,”
I could have told her. “I don’t give a shit

11 Walden Pond site in Massachusetts where Henry David Thoreau (1817–1862) lived from 4 July 1845 to 6 September 1847, and about which he wrote in his most famous book, Walden (1854).
about Walden. I know the Indians were living stories around that pond before Walden's grandparents were born and before his grandparents' grandparents were born.
I'm tired of hearing about Don-fucking-Henley saving it, too, because that's redundant. If Don Henley's brothers and sisters and mothers and fathers hadn't come here in the first place then nothing would need to be saved."
But I didn't say a word to the woman about Walden
Pond because she smiled so much and seemed delighted that I thought to bring her an orange juice back from the food car. I respect elders of every color. All I really did was eat my tasteless sandwich, drink my Diet Pepsi and nod my head whenever the woman pointed out another little piece of her country's history while I, as all Indians have done since this war began, made plans for what I would do and say the next time somebody from the enemy thought I was one of their own.

MATTHEW ARNOLD

Matthew Arnold (1822–1888) was the son of a famous educator, Dr. Thomas Arnold, the headmaster of Rugby School. After graduating from Oxford, Matthew Arnold became an inspector of schools, a post he held until two years before his death. Besides writing poetry, Arnold wrote literary criticism and was appointed professor of poetry at Oxford from 1857 to 1867. He traveled widely on the Continent and lectured in the United States.

Dover Beach
[c. 1851]

The sea is calm to-night.
The tide is full, the moon lies fair
Upon the straits;—on the French coast the light
Gleams and is gone; the cliffs of England stand,
Glimmering and vast, out in the tranquil bay.

Come to the window, sweet is the night-air!
Only, from the long line of spray
Where the sea meets the moon-blanch'd land,
Listen! you hear the grating roar
Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling,
At their return, up the high strand,
Begin, and cease, and then again begin,
With tremulous cadence slow, and bring
The eternal note of sadness in.
Chapter 24 / A Collection of Poems

Sophocles long ago
Heard it on the Ægean, and it brought Into his mind the turbid ebb and flow
Of human misery; we
Find also in the sound a thought,
Hearing it by this distant northern sea.

The Sea of Faith
Was once, too, at the full, and round earth’s shore
Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furl’d.
But now I only hear
Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
Retreating, to the breath
Of the night-wind, down the vast edges drear
And naked shingles° of the world.

Ah, love, let us be true
To one another! for the world, which seems
To lie before us like a land of dreams,
So various, so beautiful, so new,
Hath really neither joy, nor love, nor light,
Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain;
And we are here as on a darkling plain
Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight,
Where ignorant armies clash by night.

W. H. AUDEN

Wystan Hugh Auden (1907–1973) was born in York, England, and educated at Oxford. In the 1930s his left-wing poetry earned him wide acclaim as the leading poet of his generation. He went to Spain during the Spanish Civil War, intending to serve as an ambulance driver for the Republicans in their struggle against fascism, but he was so distressed by the violence of the Republicans that he almost immediately returned to England. In 1939 he came to America, and in 1946 he became a citizen of the United States, though he returned to England for his last years. Much of his poetry is characterized by a combination of colloquial diction and technical dexterity.

For other poems by Auden see pages 620 and 807.

The Unknown Citizen

[1940]

(To JS/07/M378
This Marble Monument Is Erected by the State)

He was found by the Bureau of Statistics to be
One against whom there was no official complaint,
And all the reports on his conduct agree
That, in the modern sense of an old-fashioned word, he was a saint,
For in everything he did he served the Greater Community.
Except for the War till the day he retired
He worked in a factory and never got fired,
But satisfied his employers, Fudge Motors Inc.
Yet he wasn’t a scab or odd in his views,
For his Union reports that he paid his dues,
(Our report on his Union shows it was sound)
And our Social Psychology workers found
That he was popular with his mates and liked a drink.
The Press are convinced that he bought a paper every day
And that his reactions to advertisements were normal in every way.
Policies taken out in his name prove that he was fully insured,
And his Health-card shows he was once in hospital but left it cured.
Both Producers Research and High-Grade Living declare
He was fully sensible to the advantages of the Installment Plan
And had everything necessary to the Modern Man,
A phonograph, a radio, a car and a frigidaire.
Our researchers into Public Opinion are content
That he held the proper opinions for the time of year;
When there was peace, he was for peace; when there was war,
he went.
He was married and added five children to the population,
Which our Eugenist says was the right number for a parent of his generation,
And our teachers report that he never interfered with their education.
Was he free? Was he happy? The question is absurd:
Had anything been wrong, we should certainly have heard.

JIMMY SANTIAGO BACA

Jimmy Santiago Baca, of Chicano and Apache descent, was born in 1952. When he was 2 his parents divorced, and a grandparent brought him up until he was 5, when he was placed in an orphanage in New Mexico. He ran away when he was 11, lived on the streets, took drugs, and at the age of twenty was convicted of drug possession. In prison he taught himself to read and write, and at the age of twenty was convicted of drug possession. In prison he taught himself to read and write, and began to compose poetry. A fellow inmate urged him to send some poems to Mother Jones magazine, and the work was accepted. In 1979 Louisiana State University Press published a book of his poems, Immigrants in Our Own Land. He has since published several other books.

So Mexicans Are Taking Jobs from Americans

O Yes? Do they come on horses with rifles, and say,
Ese gringo," gimmee your job?

3 Ese gringo Hey, whitey.
And do you, gringo, take off your ring, drop your wallet into a blanket spread over the ground, and walk away?

I hear Mexicans are taking your jobs away.
Do they sneak into town at night,
and as you’re walking home with a whore,
do they mug you, a knife at your throat,
saying, I want your job?

Even on TV, an asthmatic leader crawls turtle heavy, leaning on an assistant, and from a nest of wrinkles on his face,
a tongue paddles through flashing waves of lightbulbs, of cameramen, rasping
“They’re taking our jobs away.”

Well, I’ve gone about trying to find them, asking just where the hell are these fighters.

The rifles I hear sound in the night are white farmers shooting blacks and browns whose ribs I see jutting out and starving children,
I see the poor marching for a little work,
I see small white farmers selling out to clean-suited farmers living in New York, who’ve never been on a farm,
don’t know the look of a hoof or the smell of a woman’s body bending all day long in fields.

I see this, and I hear only a few people got all the money in this world, the rest count their pennies to buy bread and butter.

Below that cool green sea of money, millions and millions of people fight to live,
search for pearls in the darkest depths of their dreams, hold their breath for years trying to cross poverty to just having something.

The children are dead already. We are killing them, that is what America should be saying;
on TV, in the streets, in offices, should be saying,
“We aren’t giving the children a chance to live.”

Mexicans are taking our jobs, they say instead.
What they really say is, let them die,
and the children too.
Amiri Baraka (b. 1934) in his early years was Everett LeRoi (or LeRoy) Jones, but with an increasing awareness of his African heritage he altered his name, first to Imamu (“spiritual leader”) Ameer (“blessed”) Baraka (“prince”) and then to Amiri Baraka. Baraka was educated at Howard University, Columbia University, and the New School for Social Research.

After serving in the United States Air Force, he settled in Greenwich Village, in New York City, and became part of the (chiefly white) literary scene; he and his wife published a journal that included works by Jack Kerouac, Allen Ginsberg, and others. The assassination of Malcolm X in 1965 had a profound effect on Baraka, and in this year he left his white wife and the artistic life of Greenwich Village and moved to Harlem, where he established the Black Arts Repertory Theater/School. In 1966 he returned to Newark, where he founded a similar school and, perhaps because of his heightened socialism, dropped Imamu from his name. The author of many plays and books of poetry, he is an emeritus professor at the State University of New York, Stony Brook.

Malcolm X (1925–1965), the subject of the following poem, was a militant black leader who rose to prominence in the Black Muslims. When in 1963 Elijah Muhammad suspended him, Malcolm formed his own organization, the Muslim Mosque. In 1964 he converted to orthodox Islam, and he proclaimed the brotherhood of blacks and whites, although he continued to support black nationalism. In February 1965 he was shot to death by an unidentified assassin.

A Poem for Black Hearts

[1965]

For Malcolm’s eyes, when they broke the face of some dumb white man, For Malcolm’s hands raised to bless us all black and strong in his image of ourselves, For Malcolm’s words fire darts, the victor’s tireless thrusts, words hung above the world change as it may, he said it, and for this he was killed, for saying, and feeling, and being / change, all collected hot in his heart, For Malcolm’s heart, raising us above our filthy cities, for his stride, and his beat, and his address to the gray monsters of the world, For Malcolm’s pleas for your dignity, black men, for your life, black man, for the filling of your minds with righteousness, For all of him dead and gone and vanished from us, and all of him which clings to our speech black god of our time.
For all of him, and all of yourself, look up,
black man, quit stuttering and shuffling, look up,
black man, quit whining and stooping, for all of him,
For Great Malcolm a prince of the earth, let nothing in us rest until we avenge ourselves for his death, stupid animals that killed him, let us never breathe a pure breath if we fail, and white men call us faggots till the end of the earth.

ELIZABETH BISHOP

Elizabeth Bishop (1911–1979) was born in Worcester, Massachusetts. Because her father died when she was eight months old and her mother was confined to a sanitarium four years later, Bishop was raised by relatives in New England and Nova Scotia. After graduating from Vassar College in 1934, where she was co-editor of the student literary magazine, she lived (on a small private income) for a while in Key West, France, and Mexico, and then for much of her adult life in Brazil, before returning to the United States to teach at Harvard. Her financial independence enabled her to write without worrying about the sales of her books and without having to devote energy to distracting jobs.

For other poems by Bishop see pages 742 and 744.

The Fish

I caught a tremendous fish and held him beside the boat half out of water, with my hook fast in a corner of his mouth.
He didn't fight.
He hadn't fought at all.
He hung a grunting weight, battered and venerable and homely. Here and there his brown skin hung in strips like ancient wallpaper, and its pattern of darker brown was like wallpaper:
shapes like full-blown roses
stained and lost through age.
He was speckled with barnacles,
fine rosettes of lime,
and infested
with tiny white sea-lice, and underneath two or three rags of green weed hung down.
While his gills were breathing in the terrible oxygen
— the frightening gills,
fresh and crisp with blood,
that can cut so badly—
I thought of the coarse white flesh packed in like feathers,
the big bones and the little bones,
the dramatic reds and blacks
of his shiny entrails, and the pink swim-bladder
like a big peony.
I looked into his eyes
which were far larger than mine but shallower, and yellowed, the irises backed and packed with tarnished tinfoil seen through the lenses
of old scratched isinglass.
They shifted a little, but not to return my stare.
—It was more like the tipping of an object toward the light.
I admired his sullen face,
the mechanism of his jaw,
and then I saw that from his lower lip
—if you could call it a lip—
grim, wet, and weaponlike, hung five old pieces of fish-line,
or four and a wire leader
with the swivel still attached, with all their five big hooks grown firmly in his mouth.
A green line, frayed at the end where he broke it, two heavier lines, and a fine black thread
still crimped from the strain and snap when it broke and he got away.
Like medals with their ribbons
frayed and wavering,
a five-haired beard of wisdom
trailing from his aching jaw.
I stared and stared and victory filled up
the little rented boat,
from the pool of bilge
where oil had spread a rainbow around the rusted engine to the bailer rusted orange,
the sun-cracked thwarts,
the oarlocks on their strings,
the gunnels—until everything was rainbow, rainbow, rainbow!
And I let the fish go.
WILLIAM BLAKE

William Blake (1757–1827) was born in London and at fourteen was apprenticed for seven years to an engraver. A Christian visionary poet, he made his living by giving drawing lessons and by illustrating books, including his own Songs of Innocence (1789) and Songs of Experience (1794). These two books represent, he said, "two contrary states of the human soul." ("Infant Joy" comes from Innocence, "Infant Sorrow" from Experience.) In 1809 Blake exhibited his art, but the show was a failure. Not until he was in his sixties, when he stopped writing poetry, did he achieve any public recognition—and then it was as a painter.

Infant Joy

[1789]

"I have no name, I am but two days old." What shall I call thee?
"I happy am, Joy is my name." 5
Sweet joy befall thee!

Pretty joy!
Sweet joy but two days old,
Sweet joy I call thee:
Thou dost smile, 10
I sing the while—
Sweet joy befall thee.

Infant Sorrow

[1794]

My mother groaned! my father wept.
Into the dangerous world I leapt,
Helpless, naked, piping loud;
Like a fiend hid in a cloud. 4

Struggling in my father's hands,
Striving against my swaddling bands;
Bound and weary I thought best
To sulk upon my mother's breast. 8

The Lamb

[1789]

Little Lamb, who made thee? Dost thou know who made thee?
Gave thee life, and bid thee feed
By the stream and o'er the mead;
Gave thee clothing of delight, 5
Softest clothing, wooly, bright;
Gave thee such a tender voice,
Making all the vales rejoice?
Little Lamb, who made thee?
Dost thou know who made thee?

Little Lamb, I'll tell thee,
Little Lamb, I'll tell thee:
He is called by thy name,
For he calls himself a Lamb.
He is meek, and he is mild;
He became a little child.
I a child, and thou a lamb,
We are called by his name.
Little Lamb, God bless thee!
Little Lamb, God bless thee!

The Tyger

Tyger! Tyger! burning bright
In the forests of the night,
What immortal hand or eye
Could frame thy fearful symmetry?

In what distant deeps or skies
Burnt the fire of thine eyes?
On what wings dare he aspire?
What the hand dare seize the fire?

And what shoulder, and what art,
Could twist the sinews of thy heart?
And, when thy heart began to beat,
What dread hand? and what dread feet?

What the hammer? what the chain?
In what furnace was thy brain?
What the anvil? what dread grasp
Dare its deadly terrors clasp?

When the stars threw down their spears,
And water'd heaven with their tears,
Did he smile his work to see?
Did he who made the lamb make thee?

Tyger! Tyger! burning bright
In the forests of the night,
What immortal hand or eye,
Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?

London

I wander thro' each charter'd street,
Near where the charter'd Thames does flow,
And mark in every face I meet
Marks of weakness, marks of woe.
In every cry of every Man,
In every Infant's cry of fear,
In every voice, in every ban,
The mind-forg'd manacles I hear. 8

How the Chimney-sweeper's cry
Every black'ning Church appalls;
And the hapless Soldier's sigh
Runs in blood down Palace walls. 12

But most thro' midnight streets I hear
How the youthful Harlot's curse
Blasts the new-born Infant's tear,
And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse. 16

ROBERT BLY

Robert Bly, born in 1926 in Madison, Minnesota, is one of the few poets who have been able to support themselves by writing and by giving readings, rather than by teaching. In 1990 his Iron John, a book about male identity, became a bestseller.

Driving to Town Late to Mail a Letter [1962]

It is a cold and snowy night. The main street is deserted.
The only things moving are swirls of snow.
As I lift the mailbox door, I feel its cold iron.
There is a privacy I love in this snowy night.
Driving around, I will waste more time.

GWENDOLYN BROOKS

Gwendolyn Brooks (1917–2000) was born in Topeka, Kansas, but was raised on Chicago's South Side, where she spent most of her life. Brooks taught in several colleges and universities and wrote a novel (Maud Martha, 1953) and a memoir (Report from Part One, 1972), but she is best known as a poet. In 1950, when she won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, she became the first African-American writer to win a Pulitzer Prize. In 1985 Brooks became Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress.

The subject of Brooks's poem, the civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. (1929–1968), was assassinated at the height of his career.

For other poems by Brooks see page 641.

Martin Luther King Jr. [1970]

A man went forth with gifts.
He was a prose poem.
He was a tragic grace.
He was a warm music.
He tried to heal the vivid volcanoes. 5

His ashes are reading the world.
His Dream still wishes to anoint
the barricades of faith and of control.

His word still burns the center of the sun, above the thousands and the hundred thousands.

The word was Justice. It was spoken.
So it shall be spoken.
So it shall be done.

The Bean Eaters

[1960]

They eat beans mostly, this old yellow pair.
Dinner is a casual affair.
Plain chipware on a plain and creaking wood,
Tin flatware.

Two who are Mostly Good.
Two who have lived their day,
But keep on putting on their clothes
And putting things away.
And remembering . . .
Remembering, with twinklings and twinges,
As they lean over the beans in their rented back room that is full of beads and receipts and dolls and cloths, tobacco crumbs, vases and fringes.

ROBERT BROWNING

Born in a suburb of London into a middle-class family, Browning (1812–1889) was educated primarily at home, where he read widely. For a while he wrote for the English stage, but after marrying Elizabeth Barrett—she too was a poet—he lived with her in Italy until her death in 1861. He then returned to England and settled in London with their son. Regarded as one of the most distinguished poets of the Victorian period, he is buried in Westminster Abbey.

Porphyria’s Lover

[1834]

The rain set early in tonight,
The sullen wind was soon awake,
It tore the elm-tops down for spite,
And did its worst to vex the lake:
I listened with heart fit to break.
When glided in Porphyria; straight
She shut the cold out and the storm,
And kneeled and made the cheerless grate
Blaze up, and all the cottage warm;
Which done, she rose, and from her form
Withdrew the dripping cloak and shawl,
And laid her soiled gloves by, untied
Her hat and let the damp hair fall,
And, last, she sat down by my side
And called me. When no voice replied,
She put my arm around her waist,
And made her smooth white shoulder bare,
And all her yellow hair displaced,
And stooping, made my cheek lie there,
And spread, o’er all, her yellow hair,
Murmuring how she loved me—she
Too weak, for all her heart’s endeavor,
To set its struggling passion free
From pride, and vainer ties dissecver,
And give herself to me forever.
But passion sometimes would prevail,
Nor could tonight’s gay feast restrain
A sudden thought of one so pale
For love of her, and all in vain:
So, she was come through wind and rain.
Be sure I looked up at her eyes
Happy and proud; at last I knew
Porphyria worshipped me; surprise
Made my heart swell, and still it grew
While I debated what to do.
That moment she was mine, mine, fair,
Perfectly pure and good: I found
A thing to do, and all her hair
In one long yellow string I wound
Three times her little throat around,
And strangled her. No pain felt she;
I am quite sure she felt no pain.
As a shut bud that holds a bee,
I warily oped her lids: again
Laughed the blue eyes without a stain.
And I untightened next the tress
About her neck; her cheek once more
Blushed bright beneath my burning kiss:
I propped her head up as before,
Only, this time my shoulder bore
Her head, which droops upon it still:
The smiling rosy little head,
So glad it has its utmost will,
That all it scorned at once is fled,
And I, its love, am gained instead!
And thus we sit together now,
And all night long we have not stirred,
And yet God has not said a word!

GEORGE GORDON, LORD BYRON

Byron (1788–1824), an English romantic poet of approximately the same generation as John Keats, wrote not only lyrical poems—we reprint one of his lyrics here—but also satiric verse.

“She Walks in Beauty” is from a volume entitled Hebrew Melodies (1815), written to be set to adaptations of traditional Hebrew tunes. Byron wrote the poem the day after seeing at a party a cousin by marriage who wore a black mourning gown with spangles.

She Walks in Beauty

She walks in beauty, like the night
Of cloudless climes and starry skies;
And all that’s best of dark and bright
Meet in her aspect and her eyes:
Thus mellow’d to that tender light
Which heaven to gaudy day denies.
Chapter 24 / A Collection of Poems

2

One shade the more, one ray the less,
Had half impair'd the nameless grace
Which waves in every raven tress,
Or softly lightens o'er her face;
Where thoughts serenely sweet express
How pure, how dear their dwelling place.

3

And on that cheek, and o'er that brow,
So soft, so calm, yet eloquent,
The smiles that win, the tints that glow,
But tell of days in goodness spent,
A mind at peace with all below,
A heart whose love is innocent!

LUCILLE CLIFTON

Lucille Clifton (née Sayles) was born in New York State in 1936 and was educated at Howard University and Fredonia State Teachers College. In addition to publishing seven books of poetry, she has written fifteen children's books. Clifton has received numerous awards, including a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts. She served as poet laureate of Maryland from 1979 to 1982.

in the inner city

[1969] in the inner city or like we call it home
we think a lot about uptown and the silent nights and the houses straight as dead men
and the pastel lights and we hang on to our no place happy to be alive
and in the inner city
or like we call it

JUDITH ORTIZ COFER

Born in Puerto Rico in 1952 of a Puerto Rican mother and a United States mainland father who served in the Navy, Judith Ortiz Cofer was educated both in Puerto Rico and on the mainland. After earning a bachelor’s and a master’s degree in English, she did further graduate work at Oxford and then taught English in Florida. The author of poems, essays, and a novel, she is now the Director of the Creative Writing Program at the University of Georgia.

My Father in the Navy

A Childhood Memory

Stiff and immaculate in the white cloth of his uniform and a round cap on his head like a halo, he was an apparition on leave from a shadow-world and only flesh and blood when he rose from below the waterline where he kept watch over the engines and dials making sure the ship parted the waters on a straight course.

Mother, brother and I kept vigil on the nights and dawns of his arrivals, watching the corner beyond the neon sign of a quasar for the flash of white our father like an angel heralding a new day.

His homecomings were the verses we composed over the years making up the siren’s song that kept him coming back from the bellies of iron whales and into our nights like the evening prayer.

JOHN DONNE

John Donne (1572–1631) was born into a Roman Catholic family in England, but in the 1590s be abandoned that faith. In 1615 he became an Anglican priest and soon was known as a great preacher. Of his sermons 160 survive, including one with the famous line, "No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main; if a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less . . . ; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee." From 1621 until his death he was dean of St. Paul’s Cathedral in London. Most of his love poems (often bawdy and cynical) are said to be his early work, and his "Holy Sonnets" (among the greatest religious poems written in English) his later work.

A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning

As virtuous men pass mildly away; And whisper to their souls, to go, Whilst some of their sad friends do say, "The breath goes now," and some say, "No":
So let us melt, and make no noise.
   No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move.
'Twere profanation of our joys
   To tell the laity our love.

Moving of the earth° brings harms and fears,
   Men reckon what it did and meant;
But trepidation of the spheres,
   Though greater far, is innocent.°

Dull sublunary° lovers' love
   (Whose soul is sense) cannot admit Absence, because it doth remove
   Those things which elemented it.

But we, by a love so much refined
   That our selves know not what it is,
Inter-assured of the mind,
   Care less, eyes, lips, and hands to miss.

Our two souls therefore, which are one,
   Though I must go, endure not yet
A breach, but an expansion,
   Like gold to airy thinness beat.

If they be two, they are two so
   As stiff twin compasses° are two:
Thy soul, the fixed foot, makes no show
   To move, but doth, if the other do.

And though it in the center sit,
   Yet when the other far doth roam,
It leans, and hearkens after it,
   And grows erect, as that comes home.

Such wilt thou be to me, who must
   Like the other foot, obliquely run:
Thy firmness makes my circle just,
   And makes me end where I begun.

9 Moving of the earth an earthquake. 12 But . . . innocent But the movement of the heavenly spheres (in Ptolemaic astronomy), though far greater, is harmless. 13 sublunary under the moon (i.e., earthly). 26 twin compasses a carpenter's compass, used for making circles.

The Flea

Mark but this flea, and mark in this
How little that which thou deny'st me is;
It sucked me first, and now sucks thee,
And in this flea our two bloods mingled be;
Thou know'st that this cannot be said
A sin, nor shame, nor loss of maidenhead;
Yet this enjoys before it woo,
And pampered swells with one blood made of two,
And this, alas, is more than we would do.

Oh stay, three lives in one flea spare,
Where we almost, yea, more than married are.
This flea is you and I, and this
Our marriage bed and marriage temple is;
Though parents grudge, and you, we are met
And cloistered in these living walls of jet.

Though use° make you apt to kill me,
Let not to that, self-murder added be,
And sacrilege, three sins in killing three.

Cruel and sudden, has thou since
Purpled thy nail in blood of innocence?
Wherein could this flea guilty be,
Except in that drop which it sucked from thee?
Yet thou triumph’st and say’st that thou
Find’st not thyself, nor me the weaker now.
‘Tis true. Then learn how false fears be:
Just so much honor, when thou yield’st to me,
Will waste, as this flea’s death took life from thee.

16 use custom.

Death, Be Not Proud

Death, be not proud, though some have called thee
Mighty and dreadful, for thou art not so;
For those whom thou think’st thou dost overthrow
Die not, poor Death, not yet canst thou kill me.
From rest and sleep, which but thy pictures be,
Much pleasure; then from thee much more must flow,
And soonerest our best men with thee do go,
Rest of their bones, and soul’s delivery.
Thou art slave to fate, chance, kings, and desperate men,
And dost with poison, war, and sickness dwell,
And poppy,° or charms can make us sleep as well
And better than thy stroke; why swell’st thou then?
One short sleep past, we wake eternally
And death shall be no more; Death, thou shalt die.

10 poppy opium.

RITA DOVE

Rita Dove was born in 1952 in Akron, Ohio. After graduating summa cum laude from Miami University (Ohio) she earned an M.F.A. at the Iowa Writers’ Workshop. She has been awarded fellowships from the Guggenheim Foundation and the National Endowment for the Arts, and she now teaches at the University of Virginia. In 1987 she was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in Poetry.
Her other honors include U.S. Poet Laureate (1993–1995), the Heinz Award in the Arts (1996), and the National Humanities Medal (1996).

Daystar

[1986]

She wanted a little room for thinking:
but she saw diapers steaming on the line,
a doll slumped behind the door.

So she lugged a chair behind the garage to sit out the children’s naps.

Sometimes there were things to watch—
the pinched armor of a vanished cricket, a floating maple leaf. Other days she stared until she was assured when she closed her eyes
she’d see only her own vivid blood.

She had an hour, at best, before Liza appeared pouting from the top of the stairs.
And just what was mother doing out back with the field mice? Why, building a palace. Later that night when Thomas rolled over and lurched into her, she would open her eyes and think of the place that was hers for an hour—where she was nothing,
pure nothing, in the middle of the day.

BOB DYLAN

Bob Dylan, born Robert Zimmerman in 1941 in Duluth, Minnesota, played the guitar as a child and learned the harmonica when he was 15. Among his chief models were Huddie Ledbetter (better known as Leadbelly), an African-American folk singer and guitarist, and Woody Guthrie, a white folk singer, guitarist, and harmonica player. Dylan’s music ranges from folk to folk-rock to country blues, but perhaps his most influential songs were those of social protest, such as “Blowin’ in the Wind” and “The Times They Are A-Changin’.”

The Times They Are A-Changin’

[1963]

Come gather ’round people
Wherever you roam
And admit that the waters
Around you have grown
And accept it that soon
You’ll be drenched to the bone.
If your time to you
Is worth savin'
Then you better start swimmin'
Or you'll sink like a stone
For the times they are a-changin'.

Come writers and critics
Who prophesize with your pen
And keep your eyes wide
The chance won't come again
And don't speak too soon
For the wheel's still in spin
And there's no tellin' who
That it's namin'.
For the loser now
Will be later to win
For the times they are a-changin'.

Come senators, congressmen
Please heed the call
Don't stand in the doorway
Don't block up the hall
For he that gets hurt
Will be he who has stalled
There's a battle outside
And it is ragin'.
It'll soon shake your windows
And rattle your walls
For the times they are a-changin'.

Come mothers and fathers
Throughout the land
And don't criticize
What you can't understand
Your sons and your daughters
Are beyond your command
Your old road is Rapidly agin'.
Please get out of the new one
If you can't lend your hand
For the times they are a-changin'.

The line it is drawn
The curse it is cast
The slow one now
Will later be fast
As the present now
Will later be past
The order is Rapidly fadin'.
And the first one now
Will later be last
For the times they are a-changin'.
Chapter 24 / A Collection of Poems

T. S. ELIOT

Thomas Stearns Eliot (1888–1965) was born into a New England family that had moved to St. Louis. He attended a preparatory school in Massachusetts, then graduated from Harvard and did further study in literature and philosophy in France, Germany, and England. In 1914 he began working for Lloyd’s Bank in London, and three years later he published his first book of poems (it included “Prufrock”). In 1925 he joined a publishing firm, and in 1927 he became a British citizen and a member of the Church of England. Much of his later poetry, unlike “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,” is highly religious. In 1948 Eliot received the Nobel Prize in Literature.

The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock [1917]

S’io credesse che mia risposta fosse
A persona che mai tornasse al mondo,
Questa fiamma staria senza più scosse.
Ma perciocché giammai di questo fondo
Non torno vivo alcun, s’i’ odo il vero,
Senza tema d’infamia ti rispondo.*

Let us go then, you and I,
When the evening is spread out against the sky
Like a patient etherised upon a table;
Let us go, through certain half-deserted streets,
The muttering retreats
Of restless nights in one-night cheap hotels
And sawdust restaurants with oyster-shells;
Streets that follow like a tedious argument
Of insidious intent
To lead you to an overwhelming question . . .
Oh, do not ask, “What is it?”
Let us go and make our visit.

In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.

The yellow fog that rubs its back upon the window-panes,
The yellow smoke that rubs its muzzle on the window-panes

*In Dante’s Inferno XXVII: 61–66, a damned soul who had sought absolution before committing a crime addresses Dante, thinking that his words will never reach the earth: “If I believed that my answer were to a person who could ever return to the world, this flame would no longer quiver. But because no one ever returned from this depth, if what I hear is true, without fear of infamy, I answer you.”

Explanations of allusions in the poem may be helpful. “Works and days” (line 29) is the title of a poem on farm life by Hesiod (eighth century BCE); “dying fall” (line 52) echoes Twelfth Night 1.1.4; lines 81–83 allude to John the Baptist (see Matthew 14.1–11); line 92 echoes lines 41–42 of Marvell’s “To His Coy Mistress” (see page 707); for “Lazarus” (line 94) see Luke 16 and John 11; lines 112–117 allude to Polonius and perhaps to other figures in Hamlet; “full of high sentence” (line 117) comes from Chaucer’s description of the Clerk of Oxford in the Canterbury Tales.
Licked its tongue into the corners of the evening,
Lingered upon the pools that stand in drains,
Let fall upon its back the soot that falls from chimneys,
Slipped by the terrace, made a sudden leap,
And seeing that it was a soft October night,
Curl ed once about the house, and fell asleep.

And indeed there will be time
For the yellow smoke that slides along the street,
Rubbing its back upon the window-panes;
There will be time, there will be time
To prepare a face to meet the faces that you meet;
There will be time to murder and create,
And time for all the works and days of hands
That lift and drop a question on your plate;
Time for you and time for me,
And time yet for a hundred indecisions,
And for a hundred visions and revisions,
Before the taking of a toast and tea.

In the room the women come and go
Talking of Michelangelo.

And indeed there will be time
To wonder, "Do I dare?" and, "Do I dare?"—
Time to turn back and descend the stair,
With a bald spot in the middle of my hair—
[They will say: "How his hair is growing thin!"]
My morning coat, my collar mounting firmly to the chin,
My necktie rich and modest, but asserted by a simple pin—
[They will say: "But how his arms and legs are thin!"]
Do I dare
Disturb the universe?
In a minute there is time
For decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse.

For I have known them all already, known them all:
Have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons,
I have measured out my life with coffee spoons;
I know the voices dying with a dying fall
Beneath the music from a farther room.

So how should I presume?
And I have known the eyes already, known them all—
The eyes that fix you in a formulated phrase,
And when I am formulated, sprawling on a pin,
When I am pinned and wriggling on the wall,
Then how should I begin
To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways?
And how should I presume?

And I have known the arms already, known them all—
Arms that are bracelet ed and white and bare
[But in the lamplight, downed with light brown hair!]

Is it perfume from a dress
That makes me so digress?
Arms that lie along a table, or wrap about a shawl.
And should I then presume?
And how should I begin?

Shall I say, I have gone at dusk through narrow streets
And watched the smoke that rises from the pipes
Of lonely men in shirt-sleeves, leaning out of windows? . . .

I should have been a pair of ragged claws
Scuttling across the floors of silent seas.

And the afternoon, the evening, sleeps so peacefully!
Smoothed by long fingers,
Asleep . . . tired . . . or it malingers,
Stretched on the floor, here beside you and me.
Should I, after tea and cakes and ices,
Have the strength to force the moment to its crisis?
But though I have wept and fasted, wept and prayed,
Though I have seen my head [grown slightly bald] brought in upon a platter,
I am no prophet—and here's no great matter;
I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker,
And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker,
And in short, I was afraid.
And would it have been worth it, after all,
After the cups, the marmalade, the tea,
Among the porcelain, among some talk of you and me,
Would it have been worth while,
To have bitten off the matter with a smile,
To have squeezed the universe into a ball
To roll it toward some overwhelming question,
To say: “I am Lazarus, come from the dead,
Come back to tell you all, I shall tell you all”—
If one, settling a pillow by her head,
Should say: “That is not what I meant at all.
That is not it, at all.”

And would it have been worth it, after all,
Would it have been worth while,
After the sunsets and the dooryards and the sprinkled streets,
After the novels, after the teacups, after the skirts that trail along the floor—
And this, and so much more?—
It is impossible to say just what I mean!
But as if a magic lantern threw the nerves in patterns on a screen:
Would it have been worth while
If one, settling a pillow or throwing off a shawl,
And turning toward the window, should say:
“That is not it at all,
That is not what I meant, at all.”
... No! I am not Prince Hamlet, nor was meant to be;
Am an attendant lord, one that will do
To swell a progress, start a scene or two,
Advise the prince; no doubt, an easy tool,
Differential, glad to be of use,
Politic, cautious, and meticulous;
Full of high sentence, but a bit obtuse;
At times, indeed, almost ridiculous—
Almost, at times, the Fool.

I grow old... I grow old...
I shall wear the bottoms of my trousers rolled.

Shall I part my hair behind? Do I dare to eat a peach?
I shall wear white flannel trousers, and walk upon the beach.
I have heard the mermaids singing, each to each.

I do not think that they will sing to me.

I have seen them riding seaward on the waves
Combing the white hair of the waves blown back
When the wind blows the water white and black.

We have lingered in the chambers of the sea
By sea-girls wreathed with seaweed red and brown
Till human voices wake us, and we drown.

Ralph Waldo Emerson

Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882), born in Boston and educated at Harvard, served briefly as a Unitarian preacher, but in 1832 he resigned his pastorate and devoted himself fully to lecturing and to writing essays and, to a much lesser extent, to writing poetry. In his period, he was probably the most influential man of letters in the United States, and he remains a towering figure.

The historical background of “Concord Hymn” is as follows: On April 19, 1775, near a wooden bridge (the “rude bridge” of line 1) that spanned the Concord River, the Minutemen (farmers who had pledged to resist the British on a minute’s notice) resisted British soldiers. The British had killed eight men at nearby Lexington, but at Concord they were dispersed, and the American Revolution was evident to all (“the shot heard round the world”). The land where the skirmish occurred was owned by Emerson’s step-grandfather, who later gave it to the town.

Emerson’s poem was composed in 1836 for a ceremony dedicating a monument—an obelisk—on the site. At the dedicatory ceremony the poem was sung by a choir to the tune of “Old Hundredth,” an immensely popular hymn tune written in the sixteenth century for Psalm 100 (“All people that on earth do dwell”) in the English Psalter. The tune is also sometimes used for “Praise God, from whom all blessings flow.” In 1875, at the one-hundredth anniversary of the battle, Daniel Chester French’s statue The Minute Man of Concord was dedicated on the site, with the first stanza of Emerson’s poem inscribed on the pedestal.
Concord Hymn

Sung at the completion of the Battle Monument, July 4, 1837

By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
   Their flag to April’s breeze unfurled,
Here once the embattled farmers stood,
   And fired the shot heard round the world.

The foe long since in silence slept;
   Alike the conqueror silent sleeps;
And Time the ruined bridge has swept
   Down the dark stream which seaward creeps.

On the green bank, by this soft stream,
   We set to-day a votive stone;
That memory may their deed redeem,
   When, like our sires, our sons are gone.

Spirit, that made those heroes dare
   To die, and leave their children free,
Bid Time and Nature gently spare
   The shaft we raise to them and thee.

MARTÍN ESPADA

Martín Espada was born in Brooklyn in 1957. He received a bachelor’s degree from the University of Wisconsin and a law degree from Northeastern University. A poet who publishes regularly, Espada is professor of English at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst.

Bully

Boston, Massachusetts, 1987

In the school auditorium, the Theodore Roosevelt statue is nostalgic for the Spanish-American War, each fist lonely for a saber or the reins of anguish-eyed horses, or a podium to clatter with speeches glorying in the malaria of conquest.

But now the Roosevelt school is pronounced Hernández. Puerto Rico has invaded Roosevelt with its army of Spanish-singing children in the hallways, brown children devouring the stockpiles of the cafeteria, children painting Taíno ancestors that leap naked across murals.
Roosevelt is surrounded by all the faces he ever shoved in eugenic spite and cursed as mongrels, skin of one race, hair and cheekbones of another.

Once Marines tramped from the newsreel of his imagination; now children plot to spray graffiti in parrot-brilliant colors across the Victorian mustache and monocle.

ALLEN GINSBERG

Allen Ginsberg (1926–1997) was born in Newark, New Jersey, and graduated from Columbia University in 1948. After eight months in Columbia Psychiatric Institute—Ginsberg had pleaded insanity to avoid prosecution when the police discovered that a friend stored stolen goods in Ginsberg’s apartment—he worked at odd jobs and finally left the nine-to-five world for a freer life in San Francisco. In the 1950s he established a reputation as an uninhibited declamatory poet whose chief theme was a celebration of those who were alienated from a repressive America.

A Supermarket in California [1956]

What thoughts I have of you tonight, Walt Whitman, for I walked down the sidestreets under the trees with a headache self-conscious looking at the full moon.

In my hungry fatigue, and shopping for images, I went into the neon fruit supermarket, dreaming of your enumerations!

What peaches and what penumbras! Whole families shopping at night! Aisles full of husbands! Wives in the avocados, babies in the tomatoes!—and you, García Lorca, what were you doing down by the watermelons?

I saw you, Walt Whitman, childless, lonely old grubber, poking among the meats in the refrigerator and eyeing the grocery boys.

I heard you asking questions of each: Who killed the pork chops? What price bananas? Are you my Angel? I wandered in and out of the brilliant stacks of cans following you, and followed in my imagination by the store detective.

We strode down the open corridors together in our solitary fancy tasting artichokes, possessing every frozen delicacy, and never passing the cashier.

3 García Lorca Federico García Lorca (1899–1936), Spanish poet (and, like Whitman and Ginsberg, a homosexual).
Where are we going, Walt Whitman? The doors close in an hour. Which way does your beard point tonight?
(I touch your book and dream of our odyssey in the supermarket and feel absurd.)
Will we walk all night through solitary streets? The trees add shade to shade, lights out in the houses, we’ll both be lonely.
Will we stroll dreaming of the lost America of love past blue automobiles in driveways, home to our silent cottage?
Ah, dear father, graybeard, lonely old courage-teacher, what America did you have when Charon quit poling his ferry and you got out on a smoking bank and stood watching the boat disappear on the black waters of Lethe?

12 Lethe In classical mythology, Charon ferried the souls of the dead across the river Styx, to Hades, where, after drinking from the river Lethe, they forgot the life they had lived.

NIKKI GIOVANNI

Nikki Giovanni was born in Knoxville, Tennessee, in 1943 and educated at Fisk University, the University of Pennsylvania School of Social Work, and Columbia University. She has taught at Queens College, Rutgers University, and Ohio State University, and she is Distinguished University Professor at Virginia Tech. Giovanni has published many books of poems, an autobiography (Gemini: An Extended Autobiographical Statement on My First Twenty-Five Years of Being a Black Poet), a book of essays, and a book consisting of a conversation with James Baldwin.

Master Charge Blues

[1970]

its wednesday night baby and i’m all alone
wednesday night baby
and i’m all alone
sitting with myself waiting for the telephone wanted you baby
but you said you had to go wanted you yeah
but you said you had to go called your best friend but he can’t come ’cross no more did you ever go to bed at the end of a busy day look over and see the smooth where your hump usta lay feminine odor and no reason why i said feminine odor and no reason why asked the lord to help me he shook his head “not i”
but i'm a modern woman baby ain't gonna let this get me down
i'm a modern woman
ain't gonna let this get me down gonna take my master charge and get everything in town

LOUISE GLÜCK

Louise Glück (b. 1943) was born in New York City and attended Sarah Lawrence College and Columbia University. She has taught at Goddard College in Vermont and at Warren Wilson College in North Carolina. Her volume of poems The Triumph of Achilles (1985) won the National Book Critics Circle Award for poetry.

The School Children

[1975]

The children go forward with their little satchels.
And all morning the mothers have labored to gather the late apples, red and gold, like words of another language.

And on the other shore are those who wait behind great desks to receive these offerings.

How orderly they are—the nails on which the children hang their overcoats of blue or yellow wool.

And the teachers shall instruct them in silence and the mothers shall scour the orchards for a way out, drawing to themselves the gray limbs of the fruit trees bearing so little ammunition.

H. D.

H. D. was the pen name of Hilda Doolittle (1886–1961). Doolittle, born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, of a socially prominent family, met Ezra Pound when she was 15 and he was 16. Their relationship was complicated—Doolittle was sexually attracted to women as well as to men—and met with opposition from her family. She further distressed her family when she dropped out of Bryn Mawr College. In 1911 H. D. and a female friend who had once loved Doolittle and now loved Pound followed Pound to England, where Doolittle was active in various literary movements.

We print a poem about a Greek mythological figure, Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of the Greek city-state of Sparta. Paris, a Trojan prince, abducted her and thereby initiated the Trojan War. Poets—ever since the days of ancient Greece—have been interested in this story, but H. D. had an especially strong interest in classical Greece and in psychoanalytic and feminist interpretations of mythology.

Helen

[1924]

All Greece hates
the still eyes in the white face, the lustre as of olives
where she stands,
and the white hands.

All Greece reviles
the wan face when she smiles, hating it deeper still when it grows wan and white, remembering past enchantments
and past ills.

Greece sees, unmoved,
God’s daughter, born of love,
the beauty of cool feet
and slenderest knees,
could love indeed the maid,
only if she were laid,
white ash amid funereal cypresses.

THOMAS HARDY

Thomas Hardy (1840–1928) was born in Dorset, England, the son of a stonemason. Despite great obstacles he studied the classics and architecture, and in 1862 he moved to London to study and practice as an architect. Ill health forced him to return to Dorset, where he continued to work as an architect and to write. Best known for his novels, Hardy ceased writing fiction after the hostile reception of Jude the Obscure in 1896 and turned to writing lyric poetry.

Ab, Are You Digging on My Grave

[1916]

“Ah, are you digging on my grave,
My loved one?—planting rue?”
—“No: yesterday he went to wed
One of the brightest wealth has bred.
‘It cannot hurt her now,’ he said,
‘That I should not be true.’”
“Then who is digging on my grave?
My nearest dearest kin?”
—“Ah, no: they sit and think, ‘What use!
What good will planting flowers produce?
No tendance of her mound can loose
Her spirit from Death’s gin.”

“But some one digs upon my grave?
My enemy?—prodding sly?”
—“Nay: when she heard you had passed the Gate
That shuts on all flesh soon or late,
She thought you no more worth her hate,
And cares not where you lie.”

“Then, who is digging on my grave?
Say—since I have not guessed!”
—“O it is I, my mistress dear,
Your little dog, who still lives near,
And much I hope my movements here
Have not disturbed your rest?”

“Ah, yes! You dig upon my grave . . .
Why flashed it not on me
That one true heart was left behind!
What feeling do we ever find
To equal among human kind
A dog’s fidelity!”

“Mistress, I dug upon your grave
To bury a bone, in case
I should be hungry near this spot
When passing on my daily trot.
I am sorry, but I quite forgot
It was your resting-place.”

12 gin snare.

JOY HARJO

Joy Harjo, a Creek Indian, was born in Tulsa, Oklahoma, in 1951. She was educated at the Institute of American Indian Arts in Santa Fe, New Mexico, and at the University of Iowa Writers’ Workshop. She lives in Albuquerque, New Mexico. Her chief books are The Last Song, What Moon Drove Me to This, She Had Some Horses, and Secrets from the Center of the World.

Vision [1983]

The rainbow touched down
"somewhere in the Rio Grande,"
we said. And saw the light of it from your mother's house in Isleta. How it curved down between earth and the deepest sky to give us horses of color horses that were within us all of this time but we didn't see them because we wait for the easiest vision to save us.

In Isleta the rainbow was a crack in the universe. We saw the barest of all life that is possible. Bright horses rolled over and over the dusking sky. I heard the thunder of their beating hearts. Their lungs hit air and sang. All the colors of horses formed the rainbow, and formed us watching them.

4 Isleta a pueblo in New Mexico.

ROBERT HAYDEN

Robert Hayden (1913–1980) was born in Detroit, Michigan. His parents divorced when he was a child, and he was brought up by a neighboring family, whose name he adopted. In 1942, at the age of 29, he graduated from Detroit City College (now Wayne State University), and he received a master's degree from the University of Michigan. He taught at Fisk University from 1946 to 1969 and after that, for the remainder of his life, at the University of Michigan. In 1979 he was appointed Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress, the first African-American to hold the post.

Those Winter Sundays

Sundays too my father got up early and put his clothes on in the blueblack cold, then with cracked hands that ached from labor in the weekday weather made banked fires blaze. No one ever thanked him. 5

I'd wake and hear the cold splintering, breaking. When the rooms were warm, he'd call, and slowly I would rise and dress, fearing the chronic angers of that house, Speaking indifferently to him, who had driven out the cold and polished my good shoes as well.
What did I know, what did I know of love’s austere and lonely offices?

ANTHONY HECHT

Anthony Hecht (1923–2004), born in New York City, was educated at Bard College and Columbia University. He taught at several institutions (notably at Georgetown University), and he served as poetry consultant to the Library of Congress.

Like “The Dover Bitch,” which assumes a reader’s familiarity with Matthew Arnold’s “Dover Beach” (page 879), much of Hecht’s work glances at earlier literature. The poem is dedicated to a critic and editor.

The Dover Bitch

A Criticism of Life

For Andrews Wanning

So there stood Matthew Arnold and this girl
With the cliffs of England crumbling away behind them,
And he said to her, “Try to be true to me,
And I’ll do the same for you, for things are bad
All over, etc., etc.”

Well now, I knew this girl. It’s true she had read
Sophocles in a fairly good translation
And caught that bitter allusion to the sea,
But all the time he was talking she had in mind
The notion of what his whiskers would feel like
On the back of her neck. She told me later on
That after a while she got to looking out
At the lights across the channel, and really felt sad,
Thinking of all the wine and enormous beds
And blandishments in French and the perfumes.

And then she got really angry. To have been brought
All the way down from London, and then be addressed
As sort of a mournful cosmic last resort
Is really tough on a girl, and she was pretty.

Anyway, she watched him pace the room
And finger his watch-chain and seem to sweat a bit,
And then she said one or two unprintable things.
But you mustn’t judge her by that. What I mean to say is,
She’s really all right. I still see her once in a while
And she always treats me right. We have a drink
And I give her a good time, and perhaps it’s a year
Before I see her again, but there she is,
Running to fat, but dependable as they come.
And sometimes I bring her a bottle of Nuit d’Amour.
ROBERT HERRICK

Robert Herrick (1591–1674) was born in London, the son of a goldsmith. After taking an M.A. at Cambridge, he was ordained in the Church of England. Later, he was sent to the country parish of Dean Prior in Devonshire, where he wrote most of his poetry. A loyal supporter of the king, in 1647 he was expelled from his parish by the Puritans, though in 1662 he was restored to Dean Prior.

Delight in Disorder

A sweet disorder in the dress
Kindles in clothes a wantonness:
A lawn about the shoulders thrown
Into a fine distraction:
An erring lace, which here and there
Enthralls the crimson stomacher:
A cuff neglectful, and thereby
Ribbons to flow confusedly:
A winning wave, deserving note,
In the tempestuous petticoat:
A careless shoestring, in whose tie
I see a wild civility:
Do more bewitch me than when art
Is too precise in every part.

3 lawn scarf. 6 stomacher ornamental cloth.

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS

Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844–1889) was born near London and was educated at Oxford, where he studied the classics. A convert from Anglicanism to Roman Catholicism, he was ordained a Jesuit priest in 1877. After serving as a parish priest and teacher, he was appointed Professor of Greek at the Catholic University in Dublin.

Hopkins published only a few poems during his lifetime, partly because he believed that the pursuit of literary fame was incompatible with his vocation as a priest, and partly because he was aware that his highly individual style might puzzle readers.

God's Grandeur

The world is charged with the grandeur of God.
It will flame out, like shining from shook foil;
It gathers to a greatness, like the ooze of oil
Crushed. Why do men then now not reck his rod?
Generations have trod, have trod, have trod;
And all is scared with trade; bleared, smeared with toil;
And wears man’s smudge and shares man’s smell: the soil
Is bare now, nor can foot feel, being shod.
And for all this, nature is never spent;
There lives the dearest freshness deep down things;
And though the last lights off the black West went
Oh, morning, at the brown brink eastward, springs—
Because the Holy Ghost over the bent
World broods with warm breast and with ah! bright wings.

_Pied* Beauty_[1877]

Glory be to God for dappled things—
For skies of couple-color as a brinded° cow;
For rose-moles all in stipple upon trout that swim;
Fresh-firecoal chestnut-falls; finches' wings;
Landscape plotted and pieced—fold, fallow, and plough;°
And all trades, their gear and tackle and trim.°

All things counter, original, spare, strange;
Whatever is fickle, freckled (who knows how?)
With swift, slow; sweet, sour; adazzle, dim;
He fathers-forth whose beauty is past change:
Praise him.

°Pied Variegated, particolored. 2 brinded streaked. 5 fold, fallow, and plough fields used for pasture (sheep-fold), left fallow, or ploughed. 6 trim equipment.

A. E. HOUSMAN

_A. E. Housman (1859–1936) was one of the most distinguished classical scholars of his time. Though he left Oxford without a degree (having failed his examinations), through hard work, discipline, and rigorous study he earned an appointment in 1892 as professor of Latin at University College, London, and in 1911 as professor of Latin at Cambridge and fellow of Trinity College. Only two volumes of Housman's poems appeared during his lifetime: A Shropshire Lad (1896) and Last Poems (1922)._

_TO an Athlete Dying Young_[1896]

The time you won your town the race
We chaired you through the market-place;
Man and boy stood cheering by,
And home we brought you shoulder-high.

To-day, the road all runners come,
Shoulder-high we bring you home,
And set you at your threshold down,
Townsmen of a stiller town.
Smart lad, to slip betimes away
From fields where glory does not stay
And early though the laurel grows
It withers quicker than the rose.

Eyes the shady night has shut
Cannot see the record cut,
And silence sounds no worse than cheers
After earth has stopped the ears:

Now you will not swell the rout
Of lads that wore their honors out,
Runners whom renown outran
And the name died before the man.

So set, before its echoes fade,
The fleet foot on the sill of shade,
And hold to the low lintel up
The still-defended challenge-cup.

And round that early-laurelled head
Will flock to gaze the strengthless dead,
And find unwithered on its curls
The garland briefer than a girl’s.

When I Was One-and-Twenty

When I was one-and-twenty
I heard a wise man say,
"Give crowns and pounds and guineas
But not your heart away;"
Give pearls away and rubies
But keep your fancy free."

But I was one-and-twenty,
No use to talk to me.

When I was one-and-twenty
I heard him say again,
"The heart out of the bosom
Was never given in vain;
'Tis paid with sighs a plenty
And sold for endless rue."

And I am two-and-twenty,
And oh, 'tis true, 'tis true.

Loveliest of trees, the cherry now

Loveliest of trees, the cherry now
Is hung with bloom along the bough,
And stands about the woodland ride
Wearing white for Eastertide.
Now, of my threescore years and ten,
Twenty will not come again,
And take from seventy springs a score,
It only leaves me fifty more.

And since to look at things in bloom
Fifty springs are little room,
About the woodlands I will go
To see the cherry hung with snow.

JAMES WELDON JOHNSON

Born in Jacksonville, Florida, James Weldon Johnson (1871–1938) received a bachelor’s and a master’s degree from Atlanta University. Johnson taught school, served as a high school principal, and founded the Daily American (1895, the first black daily in America). Later he became active in the NAACP, served as consul to Venezuela and to Nicaragua, and taught creative writing at Fisk University. On the day of his death, in an automobile accident, he was appointed to teach African-American literature at New York University.

Johnson wrote dialect poems as well as poems in standard English.

To America

[1917]

How would you have us, as we are?
Or sinking 'neath the load we bear?
Our eyes fixed forward on a star?
Or gazing empty at despair?

Rising or falling? Men or things?
With dragging pace or footsteps fleet?
Strong, willing sinews in your wings?
Or tightening chains about your feet?

BEN JONSON

Ben Jonson (1572–1637), born in London, was Shakespeare’s contemporary. Like Shakespeare, he wrote for the theater, and in fact Shakespeare acted in Jonson’s first important play, Every Man in His Humour (1598). But unlike Shakespeare, Jonson produced a fairly large body of nondramatic poetry.

Jonson’s son, born in 1596, died on his birthday in 1603. Like the father, the boy was named Benjamin, which in Hebrew means “son of the right hand,” a phrase Jonson draws on the first line of the poem.

On My First Son

[1616]

Farewell, thou child of my right hand and joy;
My sin was too much hope of thee, loved boy.
Seven years thou wert lent to me, and I thee pay,
Exacted by thy fate, on the just day.
O, could I lose all father now! For why
Will man lament the state he should envy?
To have so soon 'scaped world's and flesh's rage,
And, if no other misery, yet age?
Rest in soft peace, and asked, say here doth lie
Ben Jonson, his best piece of poetry:
For whose sake, henceforth, all his vows be such,
As what he loves may never like too much.

The following song is from a play: Epicoene, or the Silent Woman.

Still to Be Neat

Still\(^1\) to be neat, still to be dressed
As\(^2\) you were going to a feast;
Still to be powdered, still perfumed—
Lady, it is to be presumed,
Though art's hid causes are not found,
All is not sweet, all is not sound.

Give me a look, give me a face,
That makes simplicity a grace;
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free:
Such sweet neglect more taketh me
Than all the adulteries\(^3\) of art;
They strike mine eyes, but not my heart.

---

1. Still always.
2. As As if.
3. adulteries adulterations.

JOHN KEATS

John Keats (1795–1821), son of a London stable keeper, was taken out of school when he was 15 and apprenticed to a surgeon and apothecary. In 1816 he was licensed to practice as an apothecary-surgeon, but he almost immediately abandoned medicine and decided to make a career as a poet. His progress was amazing; he quickly moved from routine verse to major accomplishments, publishing books of poems—to mixed reviews—in 1817, 1818, and 1820, before dying of tuberculosis at the age of 25. Today he is esteemed as one of England's greatest poets.

To Autumn

I

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness,
Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun;
Conspiring with him how to load and bless
With fruit the vines that round the thatch-eaves run;
To bend with apples the mossed cottage-trees,
And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core;
To swell the gourd, and plump the hazel shells
With a sweet kernel; to set budding more,
And still more, later flowers for the bees,
Until they think warm days will never cease,
For summer has o’er-brimmed their clammy cells.

II

Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store?
Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
Thee sitting careless on a granary floor,
Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind;
Or on a half-reaped furrow sound asleep,
Drowsed with the fume of poppies, while thy hook
Sparest the next swath and all its twinèd flowers:
And sometime like a gleaner thou dost keep Steady thy laden head across a brook;
Or by a cider-press, with patient look,
Thou watchest the last oozings hours by hours.

III

Where are the songs of Spring? Ay, where are they?
Think not of them, thou hast thy music too,—
While barréd clouds bloom the soft-dying day,
And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue;
Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn
Among the river sallows, borne aloft
Or sinking as the light wind lives or dies;
And full-grown lambs loud bleat from hilly bourn;
Hedge-crickets sing; and now with treble soft
The red-breast whistles from a garden-croft;
And gathering swallows twitter in the skies.

X. J. KENNEDY

X. J. Kennedy was born in New Jersey in 1929. He has taught at Tufts University and is the author of several books of poems, books for children, and college textbooks.

The following poem builds on “The Tyger” (page 887) by William Blake, a favorite poet of Allen Ginsberg. Ginsberg, a New Yorker who established his fame in San Francisco, was noted for his declamatory poetry and his celebration of outsiders, especially protestors against the wars in Korea and Vietnam. He often chanted Blake’s poems at his own poetry readings. In the following poem X. J. Kennedy pays homage to Ginsberg by adopting the form of one of Ginsberg’s favorite poems. Kennedy alludes, in his poem, to Ginsberg’s left-wing activities (“Taunter of the ultra right”), his view that his hearers should drop out of a corrupt and repressive society, his interest in Buddhist mantras. syllables laden with mystic power), his antiwar activity ("Mantra-minded flower child"), his homosexuality ("Queer," "Queen"), and his use of finger cymbals in some of his readings. Om (line 10) is a syllable that begins several mantras. Ginsberg often had his audience utter the sound. For other poems by Kennedy, see pages 738 and 809.

For Allen Ginsberg

Ginsberg, Ginsberg, burning bright,
Taunter of the ultra right,
What blink of the Buddha's eye
Chose the day for you to die?

Queer pied piper, howling wild,
Mantra-minded flower child,
Queen of Maytime, misrule's lord Bawling, Drop out! All aboard!

Foe of fascist, bane of bomb,
Finger-cymbaled, chanting Om,
Proper poets' thorn in side,
Turner of a whole time's tide,

Who can fill your sloppy shoes?
What a catch for Death. We lose
Glee and sweetness, freaky light,
Ginsberg, Ginsberg, burning bright.

YUSEF KOMUNYAKAA

Yusef Komunyakaa was born in 1947 in Bogalusa, Louisiana. After graduating from high school he entered the army and served in Vietnam, where he was awarded the Bronze Star. On his return to the United States he earned a bachelor's degree at the University of Colorado, and then earned an M.A. at Colorado State University and an M.F.A. in creative writing at the University of California, Irvine. The author of several books of poetry, he currently teaches at New York University. "Facing It" is the last poem in a book of poems about Vietnam, Dien Cai Dau (1988). The title of the book is a slang term for "crazy."

Facing It

My black face fades,
 hiding inside the black granite.
I said I wouldn’tdammit: No tears.
I’m stone. I’m flesh.
My clouded reflection eyes me like a bird of prey; the profile of night slanted against morning. I turn this way—the stone lets me go.
I turn that way—I’m inside
the Vietnam Veterans Memorial again, depending on the light to make a difference.
I go down the 58,022 names, half-expecting to find my own in letters like smoke.
I touch the name Andrew Johnson;
I see the booby trap’s white flash.
Names shimmer on a woman’s blouse but when she walks away
the names stay on the wall.
Brushstrokes flash, a red bird’s wings cutting across my stare.
The sky. A plane in the sky.
A white vet’s image floats closer to me, then his pale eyes look through mine. I’m a window.
He’s lost his right arm inside the stone. In the black mirror a woman’s trying to erase names:
No, she’s brushing a boy’s hair.
ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

Archibald MacLeish (1892–1982) was educated at Harvard and at Yale Law School. His early poetry (say, to about 1930), including "Ars Poetica," often is condensed and allusive, though his later poems and his plays are readily accessible. Under Franklin Delano Roosevelt, MacLeish served as Librarian of Congress (1939–1944) and as assistant secretary of state (1944–1945). He then taught at Harvard and at Amherst until he retired in 1967.

Ars Poetica

[Ars Poetica] [1926]

A poem should be palpable and mute
As a globed fruit,
Dumb
As old medallions to the thumb,
Silent as the sleeve-worn stone
Of casement ledges where the moss has grown— 5
A poem should be wordless
As the flight of birds.

... 10
A poem should be motionless in time
As the moon climbs,
Leaving, as the moon releases
Twig by twig the night-entangled trees,
Leaving, as the moon behind the winter leaves,
Memory by memory the mind—
A poem should be motionless in time 15
As the moon climbs.

...
A poem should be equal to:
Not true.
For all the history of grief
An empty doorway and a maple leaf. 20
For love
The leaning grasses and two lights above the sea—
A poem should not mean
But be.

CLAUDE McKAY

Claude McKay (1889–1948), born in Jamaica, came to the United States when he was 23. McKay is known chiefly for his militant left-wing writings—novels and essays as well as poems—but he wrote a wide range of lyric poetry, and despite his radicalism he favored (like his friend Countee Cullen) traditional poetic forms such as the sonnet.
America

Although she feeds me bread of bitterness,
And sinks into my throat her tiger's tooth,
Stealing my breath of life, I will confess
I love this cultured hell that tests my youth!
Her vigor flows like tides into my blood,
Giving me strength erect against her hate.
Her bigness sweeps my being like a flood.
Yet as a rebel fronts a king in state,
I stand within her walls with not a shred
Of terror, malice, not a word of jeer.
Darkly I gaze into the days ahead,
And see her might and granite wonders there,
Beneath the touch of Time's unerring hand,
Like priceless treasures sinking in the sand.

Misgivings

When ocean-clouds over inland hills
Sweep storming in late autumn brown,
And horror the sodden valley fills,
And the spire falls crashing in the town,
I muse upon my country's ills—
The tempest bursting from the waste of Time
On the world's fairest hope linked with man's foulest crime.
Nature's dark side is heeded now—
(Ah! optimist-cheer disheartened flown)—
A child may read the moody brow
Of yon black mountain lone.
With shouts the torrents down the gorges go,
And storms are formed behind the storm we feel:
The hemlock shakes in the rafter, the oak in the driving keel.

The Tuft of Kelp

All dripping in tangles green,
Cast up by a lonely sea
If purer for that, O Weed,
Bitterer, too, are ye?
Pat Mora, after graduating from Texas Western College, earned a master's degree at the University of Texas at El Paso. She is best known for her poems, but she has also published essays on Chicano culture.

Illegal Alien

Socorro, you free me
to sit in my yellow kitchen waiting for a poem
while you scrub and iron.

Today you stand before me holding cleanser and sponge and say you can’t sleep at night.
“My husband’s fury is a fire.
His fist can burn.
We don’t fight with words
on that side of the Rio Grande.”

Your eyes fill. I want to comfort you, but my arms feel heavy, unaccustomed to healing grown-up bodies.

I offer foolish questions
when I should hug you hard,
when I should dry your eyes, my sister, sister because we are both women,
both married, both warmed
by Mexican blood.

It is not cool words you need but soothing hands.
My plastic band-aid doesn’t fit your hurt.

I am the alien here.

Legal Alien

Bi-lingual. Bi-cultural, able to slip from “How’s life?”
to “Me’stan volviendo loca,” able to sit in a paneled office drafting memos in smooth English, able to order in fluent Spanish
at a Mexican restaurant,
American but hyphenated,
viewed by Anglos as perhaps exotic,

Me’stan volviendo loca They are driving me crazy.
perhaps inferior, definitely different,
viewed by Mexicans as alien,
(their eyes say, “You may speak Spanish but you’re not like me”) an American to Mexicans a Mexican to Americans
a handy token sliding back and forth between the fringes of both worlds by smiling
by masking the discomfort of being pre-judged
Bi-laterally.

CAROL MUSKE

Carol Muske was born in 1945 in St. Paul, Minnesota, and educated at Creighton University and San Francisco State University. She has taught creative writing at several universities and was the founder and director of Free Space (a creative writing program) at the Women’s House of Detention, Riker’s Island, New York. She has written several books of poetry and novels, and has been awarded distinguished fellowships, including a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts.

Chivalry

[1997]

In Benares°
the holiest city on earth
I saw an old man
toiling up the stone steps to the ghat°
his dead wife in his arms shrunken to the size of a child—
lashed to a stretcher.
The sky filled with crows.
He held her up for a moment then placed her
in the flames.
In my time on earth
I have seen few acts of true chivalry,

1 Benares one of India’s most ancient cities, located on the Ganges River, it is the holy city of the Hindus and the site of pilgrimages.
5 ghat a broad flight of steps on an Indian riverbank that provides access to the water.
man’s reverence for woman.

But the memory of him
with her in the cradle of his arms placing her just so in the fire
so she would burn faster
so the kindling of the stretcher would catch—
is enough for me now, will suffice
for what remains on this earth
a gesture of bereavement
in the familiar carnage of love.

SHARON OLDS

Sharon Olds was born in San Francisco in 1942. She was educated at Stanford University and Columbia University, has published several volumes of poetry, and has received major awards.

Rite of Passage

[1983]

As the guests arrive at my son’s party they gather in the living room—short men, men in first grade with smooth jaws and chins.
Hands in pockets, they stand around jostling, jockeying for place, small fights breaking out and calming. One says to another
How old are you? Six. I’m seven. So?
They eye each other, seeing themselves tiny in the other’s pupils. They clear their throats a lot, a room of small bankers, they fold their arms and frown.
I could beat you
up,
a seven says to a six,
the dark cake, round and heavy as a turret, behind them on the table. My son, freckles like specks of nutmeg on his cheeks, chest narrow as the balsa keel of a model boat, long hands cool and thin as the day they guided him out of me, speaks up as a host for the sake of the group.
We could easily kill a two-year-old,
he says in his clear voice. The other men agree, they clear their throats like Generals, they relax and get down to playing war, celebrating my son’s life.
LINDA PASTAN

Linda Pastan, born in New York City in 1932, is the author of numerous books of poetry and the winner of significant literary prizes. Other poems by Pastan appear on pages 634, 642, and 680.

Love Poem

I want to write you a love poem as headlong as our creek after thaw when we stand on its dangerous banks and watch it carry with it every twig every dry leaf and branch in its path every scruple when we see it so swollen with runoff that even as we watch we must grab each other and step back we must grab each other or get our shoes soaked we must grab each other

MARGE PIERCY

Marge Piercy, born in Detroit in 1936, was the first member of her family to attend college. After earning a bachelor's degree from the University of Michigan in 1957 and a master's degree from Northwestern University in 1958, she moved to Chicago. There she worked at odd jobs while writing novels (unpublished) and engaging in action on behalf of women and blacks and against the war in Vietnam. In 1970—the year she moved to Wellfleet, Massachusetts, where she still lives—she published her first book, a novel. Since then she has published other novels, as well as short stories, poems, and essays.

To be of use

The people I love the best jump into work head first without dallying in the shallows and swim off with sure strokes almost out of sight.
They seem to become natives of that element,
the black sleek heads of seals
bouncing like half-submerged balls.

I love people who harness themselves, an ox to a heavy cart, who pull like water buffalo, with massive patience, who strain in the mud and the muck to move things forward,
who do what has to be done, again and again.

I want to be with people who submerge in the task, who go into the fields to harvest and work in a row and pass the bags along, who are not parlor generals and field deserters
but move in a common rhythm
when the food must come in or the fire be put out.

The work of the world is common as mud.
Botched, it smears the hands, crumbles to dust.
But the thing worth doing well done has a shape that satisfies, clean and evident.
Greek amphoras for wine or oil,
Hopi vases that held corn, are put in museums but you know they were made to be used.
The pitcher cries for water to carry and a person for work that is real.

SYLVIA PLATH

Sylvia Plath (1932–1963) was born in Boston, the daughter of German immigrants. While still an undergraduate at Smith College, she published in Seventeen and Mademoiselle, but her years at college, like her later years, were marked by manic-depressive periods. After graduating from college she went to England to study at Cambridge University, where she met the English poet Ted Hughes, whom she married in 1956. The marriage was unsuccessful, and they separated. One day she committed suicide by turning on the kitchen gas.

Daddy

You do not do, you do not do
Any more, black shoe
In which I have lived like a foot
For thirty years, poor and white,
 Barely daring to breathe or Achoo.

Daddy, I have had to kill you.
You died before I had time—
Marble-heavy, a bag full of God,
Ghastly statue with one gray toe
Big as a Frisco seal
And a head in the freakish Atlantic
Where it pours bean green over blue
In the waters off beautiful Nauset.
I used to pray to recover you.

Ach, du.°

In the German tongue, in the Polish town
Scraped flat by the roller
Of wars, wars, wars.
But the name of the town is common.
My Polack friend

Says there are a dozen or two.
So I never could tell where you
Put your foot, your root,
I never could talk to you.
The tongue stuck in my jaw.

It stuck in a barb wire snare.
I could hardly speak.
I thought every German was you.
And the language obscene

An engine, an engine
Chuffing me off like a Jew.
A Jew to Dachau, Auschwitz, Belsen.°
I began to talk like a Jew.
I think I may well be a Jew.

The snows of the Tyrol, the clear beer of Vienna
Are not very pure or true.
With my gypsy ancestress and my weird luck
And my Taroc pack and my Taroc pack
I may be a bit of a Jew.

I have always been scared of you,
With your Luftwaffe,° your gobbledygoo.
And your neat moustache
And your Aryan eye, bright blue,
Panzer-man,° panzer-man, O You—

Not God but a swastika
So black no sky could squeak through.
Every woman adores a Fascist,
The boot in the face, the brute
Brute heart of a brute like you.

You stand at the blackboard, daddy,
In the picture I have of you,

° Ach, du O, you (German).
° Ich, ich, ich 1, 1, 1.
° Dachau . . . Belsen concentration camps.
° Luftwaffe German air force.
° Panzer-man member of a tank crew.
A cleft in your chin instead of your foot
But no less a devil for that, no not Any less the black man who

Bit my pretty red heart in two.
I was ten when they buried you.
At twenty I tried to die
And get back, back, back to you.
I thought even the bones would do.

But they pulled me out of the sack,
And they stuck me together with glue,
And then I knew what to do.
I made a model of you,
A man in black with a Meinkampf° look

And a love of the rack and the screw.
And I said I do, I do.
So daddy, I’m finally through.
The black telephone’s off at the root,
The voices just can’t worm through.

If I’ve killed one man, I’ve killed two—
The vampire who said he was you
And drank my blood for a year,
Seven years, if you want to know.
Daddy, you can lie back now.

There’s a stake in your fat black heart
And the villagers never liked you.
They are dancing and stamping on you.
They always knew it was you.
Daddy, daddy, you bastard, I’m through.

EZRA POUND

Ezra Pound (1885–1972), born in Hailey, Idaho, and raised in Philadelphia, was one of the most influential American poets of the twentieth century. He prepared to be a teacher of medieval and Renaissance Spanish, Italian, and French literature, but his career as an academician ended abruptly when he was fired from Wabash College for having a woman in his room overnight. Pound went to Venice, where he did odd jobs, and then to London, where he met T. S. Eliot and played a large role in editing Eliot’s long poem, The Waste Land. Among the other poets whom he assisted was Robert Frost, who was then living in England. In 1924 Pound settled in Italy. He espoused Mussolini’s cause, was arrested by the American forces in 1945, and (having been declared insane and therefore not fit to be tried for treason) was confined in a mental institution in Washington, D.C. Released in 1958, he spent the remainder of his life in Italy.

Learning the Bicycle for Heather

The older children pedal past
Stable as little gyros, spinning hard
To supper, bath, and bed, until at last
We also quit, silent and tired
Beside the darkening yard where trees
Now shadow up instead of down.
Their predictable lengths can only tease
Her as, head lowered, she walks her bike alone
Somewhere between her wanting to ride
And her certainty she will always fall.

Tomorrow, though I will run behind,
Arms out to catch her, she’ll tilt then balance wide
Of my reach, till distance makes her small,
Smaller, beyond the place I stop and know
That to teach her I had to follow
And when she learned I had to let her go.

Dudley Randall

Born in Washington, D.C., Dudley Randall (1914–2000) graduated from Wayne State University and the University of Michigan, and worked as a reference librarian and as poet in residence at the University of Detroit. In 1965 he founded the Broadside Press, widely recognized as influential far beyond its size. Broadside Press issues excellent small books and single sheets with poems by African-Americans.
The Melting Pot

There is a magic melting pot where any girl or man can step in Czech or Greek or Scot, step out American.

Johann and Jan and jean and Juan,
Giovanni and Ivan
step in and then step out again
all freshly christened John.

Sam, watching, said, “Why, I was here even before they came,”
and stepped in too, but was tossed out before he passed the brim.

And every time Sam tried that pot,
they threw him out again.
“Keep out. This is our private pot
We don’t want your black stain.”

At last, thrown out a thousand times,
Sam said, “I don’t give a damn.
Shove your old pot. You can like it or not, but I’ll be just what I am.”

ADRIENNE RICH

In line 9 of the first poem, James and Whitehead are William James (1842–1910) and Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947), both of whom taught philosophy at Harvard.

For the Felling of an Elm in the Harvard Yard

They say the ground precisely swept
No longer feeds with rich decay
The roots enormous in their age
That long and deep beneath have slept.
So the great spire is overthrown,
And sharp saws have gone hurtling through
The rings that three slow centuries wore;
The second oldest elm is down.

The shade where James and Whitehead strolled
Becomes a litter on the green.
The young men pause along the paths
To see the axes glinting bold.

Watching the hewn trunk dragged away,
Some turn the symbol to their own,
And some admire the clean dispatch
With which the aged elm came down.

Living in Sin

[1955]

She had thought the studio would keep itself;
no dust upon the furniture of love.
Half heresy, to wish the taps less vocal,
the panes relieved of grime. A plate of pears, a piano with a Persian shawl, a cat stalking the picturesque amusing mouse had risen at his urging.
Not that at five each separate stair would writhe under the milkman’s tramp; that morning light:
so coldly would delineate the scraps of last night’s cheese and three sepulchral bottles;
that on the kitchen shelf among the saucers
a pair of beetle-eyes would fix her own—envoy from some black village in the moldings . . .

Meanwhile, he, with a yawn,
sounded a dozen notes upon the keyboard,
declared it out of tune, shrugged at the mirror, rubbed at his beard, went out for cigarettes;
while she, jeered by the minor demons, pulled back the sheets and made the bed and found a towel to dust the table-top,
and let the coffee-pot boil over on the stove.
By evening she was back in love again,
though not so wholly but throughout the night
she woke sometimes to feel the daylight coming like a relentless milkman up the stairs.

ANNE SEXTON

Anne Sexton (1928–1974) was born in Newton, Massachusetts. She was a member of a well-educated New England family but did not attend college. After the birth of her second child she suffered a mental breakdown, and for much of the rest of her life she was under psychiatric care. Indeed, a psychiatrist encouraged her to write poetry, and she was soon able to publish in national journals such as The New Yorker. Despite her success, she continued to suffer mentally, and in 1974 she took her life.

Her Kind

I have gone out, a possessed witch, haunting the black air, braver at night;
dreaming evil, I have done my hitch over the plain houses, light by light;
lonely thing, twelve-fingered, out of mind.
A woman like that is not a woman, quite.
I have been her kind.

I have found the warm caves in the woods, filled them with skillets, carvings, shelves,
closets, silks, innumerable goods;
fixed the suppers for the worms and the elves:
whining, rearranging the disaligned.
A woman like that is misunderstood.
I have been her kind.

I have ridden in your cart, driver, waved my nude arms at villages going by,
learning the last bright routes, survivor where your flames still bite my thigh and my ribs crack where your wheels wind.
A woman like that is not ashamed to die.
I have been her kind.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

William Shakespeare (1564–1616), born in Stratford-upon-Avon in England, is chiefly known as a dramatic poet, but he also wrote nondramatic poetry. In 1609 a volume of 154 of his sonnets was published, apparently without his permission. Probably he chose to keep his sonnets unpublished not because he thought that they were of little value, but because it was more prestigious to be an amateur (unpublished) poet than a professional (published) poet. Although the sonnets were published in 1609, they were probably written in the mid-1590s, when there was a vogue for sonneteering. A writer in 1598 said that Shakespeare’s “sugred Sonnets [circulate] among his private friends.” We print two other sonnets by Shakespeare on pages 733–735.

Sonnet 29

When, in disgrace with Fortune and men’s eyes,
I all alone beweep my outcast state,
And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless° cries,
And look upon myself and curse my fate,
Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
Featured like him, like him° with friends possessed,
Desiring this man's art, and that man’s scope,
With what I most enjoy contented least;
Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
Haply° I think on thee, and then my state,
Like to the lark at break of day arising
From sullen earth, sings hymns at heaven’s gate;
For thy sweet love rememb'red such wealth brings,
That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

6 like him, like him like a second man, like a third man. 10 Haply Perchance.

Sonnet 116

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments; love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove.
O, no, it is an ever-fixèd mark°
That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
It is the star° to every wand’ring bark,
Whose worth’s unknown, although his height be taken.
Love’s not Time’s fool°, though rosy lips and cheeks
Within his bending sickle’s compass° come;
Love alters not with his° brief hours and weeks
But bears° it out even to the edge of doom.°
If this be error and upon me proved,
I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON

Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–1892), the son of an English clergyman, was born in Lincolnshire, where he began writing verse at age 5. Educated at Cambridge, he bad to leave without a degree when his father died and Alfred bad to accept responsibility for bringing up his brothers and sisters. In fact, the family had inherited ample funds, but for some years the money was tied up by litigation. Following Wordsworth's death in 1850, Tennyson was made poet laureate With his government pension he moved with his family to the Isle of Wight, where he lived in comfort until his death.
Ulysses

[1833]

It little profits that an idle king,
By this still hearth, among these barren crags,
Matched with an aged wife, I mete and dole
Unequal laws unto a savage race,
That hoard, and sleep, and feed, and know not me.
I cannot rest from travel; I will drink
Life to the lees. All times I have enjoyed Greatly, have suffered greatly, both with those
That loved me, and alone; on shore, and when Thro’ scudding drifts the rainy Hyades
Vext the dim sea. I am become a name;
For always roaming with a hungry heart
Much have I seen and known,—cities of men
And manners, climates, councils, governments,
Myself not least, but honored of them all,—
And drunk delight of battle with my peers,
Far on the ringing plains of windy Troy.
I am a part of all that I have met;
Yet all experience is an arch wherethro’
Gleams that untravelled world whose margin fades
For ever and for ever when I move.
How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
To rust unburnished, not to shine in use!
As tho’ to breathe were life! Life piled on life
Were all too little, and of one to me
Little remains; but every hour is saved
From that eternal silence, something more,
A bringer of new things; and vile it were
For some three suns to store and hoard myself,
And this gray spirit yearning in desire
To follow knowledge like a sinking star,
Beyond the utmost bound of human thought.

This is my son, mine own Telemachus,
To whom I leave the scepter and the isle,—
Well-loved of me, discerning to fulfill
This labor, by slow prudence to make mild
A rugged people, and thro’ soft degrees
Subdue them to the useful and the good.
Most blameless is he, centered in the sphere
Of common duties, decent not to fail
In offices of tenderness, and pay
Meet adoration to my household gods,
When I am gone. He works his work, I mine.

There lies the port; the vessel puffs her sail;
There gloom the dark, broad seas. My mariners,

*Ulysses Odysseus, King of Ithaca, a leader of the Greeks in the Trojan War, famous for his ten years of journeying to remote places.
Souls that have toiled, and wrought, and thought with me,—
That ever with a frolic welcome took
The thunder and the sunshine, and opposed
Free hearts, free foreheads,—you and I are old;
Old age hath yet his honor and his toil.

Death closes all; but something ere the end,
Some work of noble note, may yet be done,
Not unbecoming men that strove with Gods.
The lights begin to twinkle from the rocks;
The long day wanes; the slow moon climbs; the deep Moans round with many voices. Come, my friends.
’Tis not too late to seek a newer world.
Push off, and sitting well in order smite
The sounding furrows; for my purpose holds
To sail beyond the sunset, and the baths
Of all the western stars, until I die.
It may be that the gulls will wash us down;
It may be we shall touch the Happy Isles,
And see the great Achilles, whom we knew.
Tho’ much is taken, much abides; and tho’
We are not now that strength which in old days
Moved earth and heaven, that which we are, we are.
One equal temper of heroic hearts,
Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield.

Kitty Tsui

Born in Hong Kong in 1953, Kitty Tsui lived there and in England until 1969, when she came to the United States. She is an actor, an artist, and a professional bodybuilder as well as a writer. Her publications include Breathless: Erotica (1996).

A Chinese Banquet

for the one who was not invited it was not a very formal affair but all the women over twelve wore long gowns and a corsage, except for me.

it was not a very formal affair, just
the family getting together, poa poa, kuw fu without kuw mow
(her excuse this year is a headache).

7 poa poa maternal grandmother. kuw fu uncle. kuw mow aunt.
aunts and uncles and cousins,
the grandson who is a dentist,
the one who drives a mercedes benz,
sitting down for shark’s fin soup.

they talk about buying a house and taking a two week vacation in beijing.
i suck on shrimp and squab,
dreaming of the cloudscape in your eyes.

my mother, her voice beaded with sarcasm:
you’re twenty six and not getting younger.
it’s about time you got a decent job.
she no longer asks when i’m getting married.

you’re twenty six and not getting younger.
what are you doing with your life?
you’ve got to make a living.
why don’t you study computer programming?

she no longer asks when i’m getting married.
one day, wanting desperately to bridge the boundaries that separate us, wanting desperately to touch her,
tell her: mother, i’m gay,
mother i’m gay and so happy with her.
but she will not listen,
she shakes her head.

she sits across from me,
emotions invading her face.
her eyes are wet but she will not let tears fall.

mother, i say,
you love a man.
i love a woman.
it is not what she wants to hear.

aunts and uncles and cousins,
very much a family affair.
but you are not invited,
being neither my husband nor my wife.

aunts and uncles and cousins

fragrant with ham inquire:
sold that old car of yours yet?

i want to tell them: my back is healing,
i dream of dragons and water.
my home is in her arms,
our bedroom ceiling the wide open sky.
JOHN UPDIKE

John Updike (b. 1932) is best known as a writer of fiction—short stories and novels—but throughout his professional career he has also written essays and poems. (For a more complete biography, see page 812.)

Ex-Basketball Player

Pearl Avenue runs past the high-school lot,
Bends with the trolley tracks, and stops, cut off
Before it has a chance to go two blocks,
At Colonel McComsky Plaza. Berth’s Garage
Is on the corner facing west, and there,
Most days, you’ll find Flick Webb, who helps Berth out.

Flick stands tall among the idiot pumps—
Five on a side, the old bubble-head style,
Their rubber elbows hanging loose and low.
One’s nostrils are two S’s, and his eyes
An E and O. And one is squat, without
A head at all—more of a football type.

Once Flick played for the high-school team, the Wizards.
He was good: in fact, the best. In ’46
He bucketed three hundred ninety points,
A county record still. The ball loved Flick.
I saw him rack up thirty-eight or forty
In one home game. His hands were like wild birds.

He never learned a trade, he just sells gas,
Checks oil, and changes flats. Once in a while,
As a gag, he dribbles an inner tube,
But most of us remember anyway.
His hands are fine and nervous on the lug wrench.
It makes no difference to the lug wrench, though.

Off work, he hangs around Mae’s Luncheonette,
Grease-gray and kind of coiled, he plays pinball,
Smokes those thin cigars, nurses lemon phosphates.
Flick seldom says a word to Mae, just nods
Beyond her face toward bright applauding tiers
Of Necco Wafers, Nibs, and Juju Beads.

DEREK WALCOTT

Derek Walcott, born in 1930 on the Caribbean island of St. Lucia, in 1992 was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature. Although in the United States he is known chiefly as a poet, Walcott is also an important playwright and director of plays. Much of his work is concerned with his mixed heritage—a black writer from the Caribbean, whose language is English and who lives part of the year in New England, where he teaches at Boston University.
A Far Cry from Africa

A wind is ruffling the tawny pelt
Of Africa. Kikuyu, quick as flies,
Batten upon the bloodstreams of the veldt.
Corpses are scattered through a paradise.
Only the worm, colonel of carrion, cries:
‘Waste no compassion on these separate dead!’
Statistics justify and scholars seize
The salients of colonial policy.
What is that to the white child hacked in bed?
To savages, expendable as Jews?

Threshed out by beaters, the long rushes break
In a white dust of ibises whose cries
Have wheeled since civilization’s dawn
From the parched river or beast-teeming plain.
The violence of beast on beast is read
As natural law, but upright man
Seeks his divinity by inflicting pain.
Delirious as these worried beasts, his wars
Dance to the tightened carcass of a drum,
While he calls courage still that native dread
Of the white peace contracted by the dead.

Again brutish necessity wipes its hands
Upon the napkin of a dirty cause, again
A waste of our compassion, as with Spain.
The gorilla wrestles with the superman.
I who am poisoned with the blood of both,
Where shall I turn, divided to the vein?
I who have cursed
The drunken officer of British rule, how choose Between this Africa and the English tongue I love?
Betray them both, or give back what they give?
How can I face such slaughter and be cool?
How can I turn from Africa and live?

PHILLIS WHEATLEY

Kidnapped in Africa when she was a child of about age 7, and brought to Boston on the schooner Phillis, Phillis Wheatley (1753–1784) owed her first name to the ship and her second to the family name of the merchant who bought her to attend on his wife. She was educated in English, Latin, history, and geography, and especially in the Bible, and within a few years she was writing poetry in the approved manner—that is, the manner of eighteenth-century England. In 1773, the year she was granted freedom, she published a book of her poems in England.

2 Kikuyu an African tribe who fought against British colonialists. 3 veldt grassland in southern Africa. 24 Spain a reference to the triumph of fascism in Spain after the Civil War of 1936–1939.

Despite her education and the style of writing that she adopted, Wheatley of course did not move freely in the white world. But neither did she move freely in the black world, since her educators kept her away from other persons of African origin. Perhaps the best single sentence ever written about Phillis Wheatley is Richard Wright’s: “Before the webs of slavery had so tightened as to snare nearly all Negroes in our land, one was freed by accident to give in clear, bell-like limpid cadence the hope of freedom in the New World.”

One other sentence about Wheatley, by another African-American writer, should also be quoted here. Alice Walker, commenting on Wheatley’s much criticized assumption of white values, says, in an address to Wheatley, “It is not so much what you sang, as that you kept alive, in so many of our ancestors, the notion of song.”

“On Being Brought from Africa to America” alludes to the story of Cain and Abel, in Genesis 4, which reports that Cain killed Abel, and that “the Lord set a mark upon Cain” (4.15). The biblical text explicitly says that the mark was to protect Cain from someone who might take vengeance on him, but it does not say what the mark was. Nevertheless, some Christians developed the idea that the color of Africans was the mark of Cain.

Wheatley probably was brought to America on a slave ship such as this one. Thomas Clarkson distributed this drawing with his Essay on the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species (1804).
'Twas mercy brought me from my pagan land,
Taught my benighted soul to understand
That there's a God, that there's a Savior too:
Once I redemption neither sought nor knew.
Some view our sable race with scornful eye,
"Their color is a diabolic dye."
Remember, Christians; Negroes, black as Cain,
May be refined, and join the angelic train.

WALT WHITMAN

Walt Whitman (1819–1892) was born on Long Island, the son of a farmer. The young Whitman taught school, worked as a carpenter, a printer, a newspaper editor; and, during the Civil War, as a volunteer nurse on the Union side. After the war he supported himself by doing secretarial jobs. In Whitman's own day his poetry was highly controversial because of its unusual form (formlessness, many people said) and its abundant erotic implications.

Reconciliation

Word over all, beautiful as the sky,
Beautiful that war and all its deeds of carnage must in time be utterly lost,
That the hands of the sisters Death and Night incessantly softly wash again, and ever again, this soiled world;
For my enemy is dead, a man divine as myself is dead,
I look where he lies white-faced and still in the coffin—I draw near,
Bend down and touch lightly with my lips the white face in the coffin.

A Sight in Camp in the Daybreak Gray and Dim

A sight in camp in the daybreak gray and dim,
As from my tent I emerge so early sleepless,
As slow I walk in the cool fresh air the path near by the hospital tent,
Three forms I see on stretchers lying, brought out there untended lying,
Over each the blanket spread, ample brownish woolen blanket,
Gray and heavy blanket, folding, covering all.
Curious I halt and silent stand,
Then with light fingers I from the face of the nearest the first just lift the blanket;
Who are you elderly man so gaunt and grim, with well-gray'd hair,
and flesh all sunken about the eyes?
Who are you my dear comrade?
Then to the second I step—and who are you my child and darling?
Who are you sweet boy with cheeks yet blooming?
Then to the third—a face nor child nor old, very calm, as of beautiful yellow-white ivory; Young man I think I know you—I think this face is the face of the Christ himself, Dead and divine and brother of all, and here again he lies.

The Dalliance of the Eagles

[1880]

Skirting the river road, (my forenoon walk, my rest,) Skyward in air a sudden muffled sound, the dalliance of the eagles, The rushing amorous contact high in space together, The clinching interlocking claws, a living, fierce, gyrating wheel, Four beating wings, two beaks, a swirling mass tight grappling, In tumbling turning clustering loops, straight downward falling, Till o’er the river pois’d, the twain yet one, a moment’s lull, A motionless still balance in the air, then parting, talons loosing, Upward again on slow-firm pinions slanting, their separate diverse flight, She hers, he his, pursuing.

WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

William Carlos Williams (1883–1963) was the son of an English traveling salesman and a Basque-Jewish woman. The couple met in Puerto Rico and settled in Rutherford, New Jersey, where William was born. He spent his life there, practicing as a pediatrician and writing poems in the moments between seeing patients who visited his office.

For other poems by Williams, see pages 677, 721, and 728.

Spring and All

[1923]

By the road to the contagious hospital under the surge of the blue mottled clouds driven from the northeast—a cold wind. Beyond, the waste of broad, muddy fields brown with dried weeds, standing and fallen patches of standing water the scattering of tall trees All along the road the reddish purplish, forked, upstanding, twiggy stuff of bushes and small trees with dead, brown leaves under them leafless vines— Lifeless in appearance, sluggish dazed spring approaches—
They enter the new world naked, cold, uncertain of all save that they enter. All about them the cold, familiar wind—
Now the grass, tomorrow
the stiff curl of wildcarrot leaf
One by one objects are defined—
It quickens: clarity, outline of leaf
But now the stark dignity of entrance—Still, the profound change has come upon them: rooted, they grip down and begin to awaken

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

William Wordsworth (1770–1850), the son of an attorney, grew up in the Lake District of England. After graduating from Cambridge University in 1791, he spent a year in France, falling in love with a French girl, with whom he had a daughter. His enthusiasm for the French Revolution waned, and he returned alone to England, where, with the help of a legacy, he devoted his life to poetry. With his friend Samuel Taylor Coleridge, in 1798 he published anonymously a volume of poetry, Lyrical Ballads, which changed the course of English poetry. In 1799 he and his sister Dorothy settled in Grasmere in the Lake District, where he married and was given the office of distributor of stamps. In 1843 he was appointed poet laureate.

The World Is Too Much with Us

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;
Little we see in Nature that is ours;
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!°
This Sea that bares her bosom to the moon,
The winds that will be howling at all hours,
And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers,
For this, for everything, we are out of tune;
It moves us not.—Great God! I'd rather be
A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn; 10
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
Have sight of Proteus° rising from the sea;
Or hear old Triton° blow his wreathéd horn.

° boon gift. 13, 14 Proteus, Triton sea gods.
William Wordsworth

I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud

I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o’er vales and hills,
When all at once I saw a crowd,
A host, of golden daffodils,
Beside the lake, beneath the trees,
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle on the milky way,
They stretched in never-ending line
Along the margin of a bay;
Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

The waves beside them danced, but they Outdid the sparkling waves in glee;
A poet could not but be gay,
In such a jocund company;
I gazed—and gazed—but little thought
What wealth the show to me had brought:

For oft, when on my couch I lie
In vacant or in pensive mood,
They flash upon that inward eye
Which is the bliss of solitude;
And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils.

The Solitary Reaper

Behold her, single in the field,
Yon solitary Highland lass!
Reaping and singing by herself;
Stop here, or gently pass!
Alone she cuts and binds the grain,
And sings a melancholy strain;
O listen! for the Vale profound
Is overflowing with the sound.

No Nightingale did ever chant
More welcome notes to weary bands
Of travelers in some shady haunt,
Among Arabian sands:
A voice so thrilling ne’er was heard
In spring-time from the Cuckoo-bird,
Breaking the silence of the seas
Among the farthest Hebrides.°

---

16 Hebrides distant northern islands.
Will no one tell me what she sings?—
Perhaps the plaintive numbers° flow
For old, unhappy, far-off things,
And battles long ago:
Or is it some more humble lay,°
Familiar matter of to-day?
Some natural sorrow, loss, or pain,
That has been, and may be again?

Whate’er the theme, the Maiden sang
As if her song could have no ending;
I saw her singing at her work,
And o’er the sickle bending;—
I listened, motionless and still;
And, as I mounted up the hill,
The music in my heart I bore,
Long after it was heard no more.

18 plaintive numbers mournful verses.  21 lay song.

JAMES WRIGHT

James Wright (1927–1980) was born in Martins Ferry, Ohio, which provided him with the locale for many of his poems. He is often thought of as a poet of the Midwest, but (as in the example that we give) his poems move beyond the scenery. Wright was educated at Kenyon College in Ohio and at the University of Washington. He wrote several books of poetry and published many translations of European and Latin-American poetry.

Lying in a Hammock at William Duffy’s Farm in Pine Island, Minnesota  [1963]

Over my head, I see the bronze butterfly,
Asleep on the black trunk,
Blowing like a leaf in green shadow.
Down the ravine behind the empty house,
The cowbells follow one another
Into the distances of the afternoon.
To my right,
In a field of sunlight between two pines,
The droppings of last year’s horses
Blaze up into golden stones.
I lean back, as the evening darkens and comes on.
A chicken hawk floats over, looking for home.
I have wasted my life.
WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS

William Butler Yeats (1865–1939) was born in Dublin, Ireland. The young Yeats was much interested in highly lyrical, romantic poetry, often drawing on Irish mythology. The later poems, say from about 1910, are often more colloquial, more down-to-earth, more hardheaded. He was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1923.

In the seventh century BCE the ancient Greeks founded the city of Byzantium in Thrace, where Istanbul, Turkey, now stands. (Constantine, the first Christian ruler of the Roman empire, built a new city there in CE 330. Named Constantinople, the city served as the capital of the Roman empire until 1453, when the Turks captured it. In 1930 the name was officially changed to Istanbul.) The capital of the Roman Empire and the “holy city” of the Greek Orthodox Church, Byzantium had two golden ages. The first, in its early centuries, continued the traditions of the antique Greco-Roman world. The second, which is what Yeats had in mind, extended from the mid-ninth to the mid-thirteenth century and was a distinctive blend of classical, Christian, Slavic, and even Islamic culture. This period is noted for mysticism, for the preservation of ancient learning, and for exquisitely refined symbolic art. In short, Byzantium (as Yeats saw it) was wise and passionless. In A Vision, his prose treatment of his complex mystical system, Yeats says:

I think that in early Byzantium, maybe never before or since in recorded history, religious, aesthetic and practical life were one, that architect and artificers—though not, it may be, poets, for language has been the instrument of controversy and must have grown abstract—spoke to the multitude and the few alike. The painter, the mosaic worker, the worker in gold and silver, the illuminator of sacred books, were almost impersonal, almost perhaps without the consciousness of individual design, absorbed in their subject matter and that the vision of the whole people. They could copy out of old Gospel books those pictures that seemed as sacred as the text, and yet weave all into a vast design, the work of many that seemed the work of one, that made building, picture, pattern, metal-work of rail and lamp, seem but a single image.

Sailing to Byzantium

[1926]

I

That is no country for old men. The young
In one another’s arms, birds in the trees
—Those dying generations—at their song,
The salmon-falls, the mackerel-crowded seas,
Fish, flesh, or fowl, commend all summer long
Whatever is begotten, born, and dies.
Caught in that sensual music all neglect
Monuments of unaging intellect.
II

An aged man is but a paltry thing,
A tattered coat upon a stick, unless Soul clap its hands and sing, and louder sing
For every tatter in its mortal dress,
Nor is there singing school but studying
Monuments of its own magnificence;
And therefore I have sailed the seas and come
To the holy city of Byzantium.

III

O sages standing in God's holy fire
As in the gold mosaic of a wall,
Come from the holy fire, perne° in a gyre,
And be the singing-masters of my soul.
Consume my heart away; sick with desire
And fastened to a dying animal
It knows not what it is; and gather me
Into the artifice of eternity.

IV

Once out of nature I shall never take
My bodily form from any natural thing,
But such a form as Grecian goldsmiths make
Of hammered gold and gold enameling
To keep a drowsy Emperor awake;
Or set upon a golden bough to sing
To lords and ladies of Byzantium
Of what is past, or passing, or to come.

19 perne whirl down.
Drama usually tells an intense story by means of a fairly small number of characters. It can thus be contrasted with both the novel and with poetry. The novel tends to use a large number of characters and to cover a substantial period of time, thereby in some measure showing a picture of a society as well as of individuals; poetry, at the other extreme, tends to reveal the thoughts and emotions of individuals. Drama usually gives us a heightened sense of life as we experience it daily—that is, of one character impinging on another, of actions having consequences, and of lives as comically or tragically interconnected. To quote Alfred Hitchcock, “Drama is life with the dull bits cut out.”

Admittedly, some playwrights have used the stage as a platform for exploring ideas rather than as a way of showing intense representations of lives interacting, and Arthur Miller is among the playwrights who are sometimes said to be intellectuals. He indeed commented abundantly on the nature of society, both in essays and within the plays themselves (e.g., in All My Sons Chris Keller tells his mother, “There’s a universe of people outside, and you’re responsible to it”), but the fact remains that Miller is especially valued not for Big Ideas but because he gives us, through passionate characters, a sense that we are witnessing lives and human relationships in their most essential forms. Miller wished to make us think, but chiefly he makes us feel, and that is perhaps enough for a playwright to do. He cared deeply about social issues but one of the wisest things he said is not about any social issue but about the nature of drama itself: “The theater is above all else an instrument of passion.”
Arthur Miller (1915–2005) was born in New York, the son of Jewish immigrants from Austria. Miller went to the University of Michigan, where he first majored in journalism but then switched to English. As an undergraduate he won an award for playwrighting—one of the judges was Susan Glaspell, author of Trifles (see page 953)—and after graduation (1938) he returned to New York, where he wrote some radio plays and some unsuccessful stage plays. A novel, Focus (1945), was well received, and with All My Sons (1947), Death of a Salesman (1949) and The Crucible (1953), his reputation as a playwright was firmly established. His leftist views, however, caused difficulty: Subjected to questioning by the House Committee on Un-American Activities, in the 1950s he was convicted of contempt of Congress, but the conviction was overturned in 1958. Miller is widely regarded, in England and the rest of Europe as well as in the United States, as American’s most important dramatist.
Chapter 25
How to Read a Play

Thinking about the Language of Drama

The earlier parts of this book have dealt with fiction and poetry. A third chief literary type is drama, texts written to be performed.

A play is written to be seen and to be heard. We go to see a play in a theater (theater is derived from a Greek word meaning “to watch”), but in the theater we also hear it because we become an audience (audience is derived from a Latin word meaning “to hear”). Hamlet was speaking the ordinary language of his day when he said, “We’ll hear a play tomorrow.” When we read a play rather than see and hear it in a theater, we lose a good deal. We must see it in the mind’s eye and hear it in the mind’s ear.

In reading a play it’s not enough mentally to hear the lines. We must try to see the characters, costumed and moving within a specified setting, and we must try to hear not only their words but their tone, their joy or hypocrisy or tentativeness or aggression. Our job is much easier when we are in the theater and we have only to pay attention to the performers; as readers on our own, however, we must do what we can to perform the play in the theater of our minds.

If as a reader you develop the following principles into habits, you will get far more out of a play than if you read it as though it were a novel consisting only of dialogue.

1. Pay attention to the list of characters and carefully read whatever descriptions the playwright has provided. Early dramatists, such as Shakespeare, did not provide much in the way of description (“Othello, the Moor” or “Ariel, an airy spirit” is about as much as we find in Elizabethan texts), but later playwrights often are very forthcoming. Here, for instance, is Tennessee Williams introducing us to Amanda Wingfield in The Glass Menagerie. (We give only the beginning of his longish description.)

   Amanda Wingfield, the mother. A little woman of great but confused vitality clinging frantically to another time and place.

And here is Susan Glaspell introducing us to all the characters in her one-act play, Trifles:

   ...the Sheriff comes in, followed by the County Attorney and Hale. The Sheriff and Hale are men in middle life, the County Attorney is a young man; all are much bundled up and go at once to the stove. They are followed by the two women—the Sheriff’s Wife, [Mrs. Peters] first; she is a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face. Mrs. Hale is larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking, but she is disturbed now and looks fearfully about as she enters. The women have come in slowly and stand close together near the door.

Glaspell’s description of her characters is not nearly so explicit as Tennessee Williams’s, but Glaspell does reveal much to a reader. What do we know about the men? They differ in age, they are bundled up, and they “go at once to the stove.” What do we know about the women? Mrs. Peters is slight, and she has a “nervous face”; Mrs. Hale is “larger” but she too is “disturbed.” The women enter “slowly,” and they “stand close together near the door.” In short, the men, who take over the warmest part of the room, are more confident than the women, who nervously huddle together near the door. It’s a man’s world.

2. Pay attention to gestures and costumes that are specified in stage directions or are implied by the dialogue. We have just seen how Glaspell distinguishes between the men and the women by what they do—the men take over the warm part of the room, the women stand insecurely near the door. Most dramatists from the late nineteenth century to the present have been fairly generous with their stage directions, but when we read the works of earlier dramatists we often have to deduce the gestures from the speeches. For instance, although the texts of Shakespeare’s day have an occasional direction, such as “Enter Hamlet reading on a book,” “Leaps in the grave,” and “in scuffling, they change rapiers,” such directions are rare. In reading Shakespeare, we must, again, see the action in the mind’s eye (a phrase from Hamlet, by the way). Here, for instance, are Horatio’s words (1.1.130–131) when he sees the Ghost:

But soft, behold! Lo, where it comes again!
I’ll cross it, though it blast me. [It spreads bis arms.] Stay, illusion!

As a footnote indicates, the “his” in the stage direction is the Ghost’s; today we would say “its.” There is no doubt about what the Ghost does, but what does Horatio do when he says “I’ll cross it”? Conceivably “I’ll cross it” means “I’ll confront it; I’ll stand in its path,” and Horatio then walks up to the Ghost. Or perhaps the words mean “I’ll make the sign of the cross, to protect myself from this creature from another world.” If so, does Horatio make the sign of the cross with his hand, or does he perhaps hold up his sword, an object that by virtue of the sword guard at right angles to the blade is itself a cross? The words “Stay, illusion” similarly must be accompanied by a gesture; perhaps Horatio reaches out, to try to take hold of the Ghost.

Or consider the first reunion of Hamlet and Horatio, in the second scene (1.2.160–161) of the play:

HORATIO. Hail to your lordship!
HAMLET. I am glad to see you well.
Horatio!—or I do forget myself.

One cannot be positive, but it seems that the melancholy Hamlet, hearing a greeting (“Hail to your lordship”), at first replies with routine politeness
("I am glad to see you well") and, when an instant later he recognizes that this greeting comes from an old friend whom he has not seen for a while, he responds with an enthusiastic "Horatio!" and perhaps with an embrace.

In addition to thinking about gestures, don't forget the costumes that the characters wear. Costumes identify the characters as soldiers or kings or farmers or whatever, and changes of costume can be especially symbolic.

Costumes are always important, because they tell us something about the people who wear them. As even the fatuous Polonius knows, "the apparel oft proclaims the man." In Hamlet, the use of symbolic costume is evident; Hamlet is dressed in black (we hear of his "nighted color" and his "inky cloak"), a color that sets him apart from the courtiers, who presumably are dressed in colorful robes. Later in the play, when, having escaped from a sea journey that was supposed to end in his death, Hamlet is seen in the graveyard, perhaps he wears the "sea gown" that he mentions, and we feel that he is now a more energetic character, freed from his constricting suit of mourning.

3. Keep in mind the kind of theater for which the play was written. The plays in this book were written for various kinds of theaters. Sophocles, author of Antigone and King Oedipus, wrote for the ancient Greek theater, essentially a space where performers acted in front of an audience seated on a hillside. (See the photo on page 1018.) This theater was open to the heavens, with a structure representing a palace or temple behind the actors, in itself a kind of image of a society governed by the laws of the state and the laws of the gods. Moreover, the chorus entered the playing space by marching down the side aisles, close to the audience, thus helping to unite the world of the audience and of the players. On the other hand, the audience in most modern theaters sits in a darkened area and looks through a proscenium arch at performers who move in a boxlike setting. The box set of the late nineteenth century and the twentieth century is, it often seems, an appropriate image of the confined lives of the unheroic characters of the play.

4. If the playwright describes a set, try to envision the set clearly. Glaspell, for instance, tells us a good deal about the set. We quote only the first part.

The kitchen in the now abandoned farmhouse of John Wright, a gloomy kitchen, and left without having been put in order. . . .

These details about a gloomy and disordered kitchen may seem to be mere realism—after all, the play has to take place somewhere—but it turns out that the disorder and, for that matter, the gloominess are extremely important. You'll have to read the play to find out why.

Another example of a setting that provides important information is Arthur Miller's in Death of a Salesman. Again we quote only the beginning of the description.

Before us is the Salesman's house. We are aware of towering, angular shapes behind it, surrounding it on all sides. Only the blue light of the sky falls upon the house and forestage; the surrounding area shows an angry glow of orange.

If we read older drama, we find that playwrights do not give us much help, but by paying attention to the words we can to some degree visualize the locale. For instance, the first stage direction in Hamlet (“Enter Bernardo and Francisco, two sentinels”), along with the opening dialogue (“Who’s there?”; “Nay, answer me. Stand and unfold yourself”), indicates that we are in some sort of public place where anyone may suddenly appear. Elizabethan plays were staged in daylight, and there was no way of darkening the stage, so if the scene is a night scene the playwright has to convey this information. In this instance, the audience understands that the meeting takes place at night because the characters can hear but cannot see each other; to make certain, however, a few lines later Shakespeare has Bernardo say, “‘Tis now struck twelve. Get thee to bed, Francisco.”

5. Pay attention to whatever sound effects are specified in the play. In Hamlet (1.2.125), when the king (called “Denmark” in the speech we quote) drinks, he does so to the rather vulgar accompaniment of a cannonade:

   No jocund health that Denmark drinks today
   But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell,
   And the King’s rouse the heaven shall bruith again,
   Respeaking earthly thunder.

The point is made again several times, but these salutes to King Claudius are finally displaced by a military salute to Hamlet; “a peal of ordnance is shot off,” we are told, when his body is carried off the stage at the end of the play. Thus, the last sound that we hear in Hamlet is a validation of Hamlet as a hero.

In Death of a Salesman, before the curtain goes up, “A melody is heard, played upon a flute. It is small and fine, telling of grass and trees and the horizon.” Then the curtain rises, revealing the Salesman’s house, with “towering, angular shapes behind it, surrounding it on all sides.” Obviously the sound of the flute is meant to tell us of the world that the Salesman is shut off from.

A sound effect, however, need not be so evidently symbolic to be important in a play. In Glaspell’s Trifles, almost at the very end of the play we hear the “sound of a knob turning in the other room.” The sound has an electrifying effect on the audience, as it does on the two women on the stage, and it precedes a decisive action.

6. Pay attention to what the characters say, and keep in mind that (like real people) dramatic characters are not always to be trusted. An obvious case is Shakespeare’s Iago, an utterly unscrupulous villain who knows that he is a liar. But a character may be self-deceived, or, to put it a bit differently, characters may say what they honestly think but may not know what they are talking about.

PLOT AND CHARACTER

Although plot is sometimes equated with the gist of the narrative—the story—it is sometimes reserved to denote the writer’s arrangement of the happenings in the story. Thus, all plays about the assassination of Julius Caesar have pretty much the same story, but by beginning with a scene of workmen enjoying a holiday (and thereby introducing the motif of the fickleness of the mob), Shakespeare’s play has a plot different from a play that omits such a scene.
Handbooks on drama often suggest that a plot (arrangement of happenings) should have a rising action, a climax, and a falling action. This sort of plot can be diagrammed as a pyramid, the tension rising through complications, or crises, to a climax, at which point the fate of the protagonist (chief character) is firmly established; the climax is the apex, and the tension allegedly slackens as we witness the dénouement (unknotting). Shakespeare sometimes used a pyramidal structure, placing his climax neatly in the middle of what seems to us to be the third of five acts. Roughly the first half of Julius Caesar shows Brutus rising, reaching his height in 3.1 with the death of Caesar; but later in this scene he gives Marc Antony permission to speak at Caesar’s funeral and thus he sets in motion his own fall, which occupies the second half of the play. In Macbeth (3.4.137–139), the protagonist attains his height in 3.1 (“Thou hast it now: King”), but he soon perceives that he is going downhill:

I am in blood
Stepped in so far, that, should I wade no more,
 Returning were as tedious as go o’er.

Of course, no law demands such a structure, and a hunt for the pyramid usually causes the hunter to overlook all the crises but the middle one. William Butler Yeats once suggestively diagrammed a good plot not as a pyramid but as a line moving diagonally upward, punctuated by several crises. Perhaps it is sufficient to say that a good plot has its moments of tension, but the location of these will vary with the play. They are the product of conflict, but not all conflict produces tension; there is conflict but little tension in a ball game when the score is 10–0 in the ninth inning with two out and no one on base.

Regardless of how a plot is diagrammed, the exposition is that part that tells the audience what it has to know about the past, the antecedent action. When two gossiping servants tell each other that after a year away in Paris the young master is coming home tomorrow with a new wife, they are giving the audience the exposition by introducing characters and establishing relationships. The Elizabethans and the Greeks sometimes tossed out all pretense at dialogue and began with a prologue, like the one spoken by the Chorus at the outset of Romeo and Juliet:

Two households, both alike in dignity
In fair Verona, where we lay our scene,
From ancient grudge break to new mutiny,
Where civil blood makes civil hands unclean.

*An act is a main division in a drama or opera. Act divisions probably stem from Roman theory and derive ultimately from the Greek practice of separating episodes in a play by choral interludes; but Greek (and probably Roman) plays were performed without interruption, for the choral interludes were part of the plays themselves. Elizabethan plays, too, may have been performed without breaks; the division of Elizabethan plays into five acts is usually the work of editors rather than of authors. Frequently an act division today (commonly indicated by lowering the curtain and turning up the houselights) denotes change in locale and lapse of time. A scene is a smaller unit, either (1) a division with no change of locale or abrupt shift of time, or (2) a division consisting of an actor or group of actors on the stage; according to the second definition, the departure or entrance of an actor changes the composition of the group and thus introduces a new scene. (In an entirely different sense, the scene is the locale where a work is set.)
From forth the fatal loins of these two foes
A pair of star-crossed lovers take their life. . . .

And in Tennessee Williams's The Glass Menagerie, Tom's first speech is a sort of prologue. However, the exposition also may extend far into the play so that the audience keeps getting bits of information that both clarify the present and build suspense about the future. Occasionally the soliloquy (speech of a character alone on the stage, revealing his or her thoughts) or the aside (speech in the presence of others but unheard by them) is used to do the job of putting the audience in possession of the essential facts. The soliloquy and the aside are not limited to exposition; they are used to reveal the private thoughts of characters who, like people in real life, do not always tell others what their inner thoughts are. The soliloquy is especially used for meditation, where we might say the character is interacting not with another character but with himself or herself.

Because a play is not simply words but words spoken with accompanying gestures by performers who are usually costumed and in a particular setting, it may be argued that to read a play (rather than to see and hear it) is to falsify it. Drama is not literature, some people hold, but theater. However, there are replies: a play can be literature as well as theater, and readers of a play can perhaps enact in the theater of their mind a more effective play than the one put on by imperfect actors. After all, as Shakespeare's Duke Theseus, in A Midsummer Night's Dream, says of actors, "The best in this kind are but shadows." In any case, we need not wait for actors to present a play; we can do much on our own.

Susan Glaspell (1882–1948) was born in Davenport, Iowa, and educated at Drake University in Des Moines. In 1903 she married George Cram Cook and, with Cook and other writers, actors, and artists, in 1915 founded the Provincetown Players, a group that remained vital until 1929. Glaspell wrote Trifles (1916) for the Provincetown Players, but she also wrote stories, novels, and a biography of her husband. In 1931 she won a Pulitzer Prize for Alison’s House, a play about the family of a deceased poet who in some ways resembles Emily Dickinson.

Trifles

SCENE: The kitchen in the now abandoned farmhouse of John Wright, a gloomy kitchen, and left without having been put in order—unwashed pans under the sink, a loaf of bread outside the breadbox, a dish towel on the table—other signs of incomplete work. At the rear the outer door opens, and the Sheriff comes in, followed by the County Attorney and Hale. The Sheriff and Hale are men in middle life, the County Attorney is a young man; all are much bundled up and go at once to the stove. They are followed by the two women—the Sheriff’s Wife first; she is a slight wiry woman, a thin nervous face. Mrs. Hale is larger and would ordinarily be called more comfortable looking, but she is disturbed now and looks fearfully about as she enters. The women have come in slowly and stand close together near the door.

COUNTY ATTORNEY (rubbing his hands). This feels good. Come up to the fire, ladies.

MRS. PETERS (after taking a step forward). I’m not—cold.

SHERIFF (unbuttoning his overcoat and stepping away from the stove as if to the beginning of official business). Now, Mr. Hale, before we move things about, you explain to Mr. Henderson just what you saw when you came here yesterday morning.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. By the way, has anything been moved? Are things just as you left them yesterday?

SHERIFF (looking about). It’s just the same. When it dropped below zero last night, I thought I’d better send Frank out this morning to make a fire for us—no use getting pneumonia with a big case on; but I told him not to touch anything except the stove—and you know Frank.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Somebody should have been left here yesterday.

SHERIFF. Oh—yesterday. When I had to send Frank to Morris Center for that man who went crazy—I want you to know I had my hands full yesterday. I knew you could get back from Omaha by today, and as long as I went over everything here myself—

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Well, Mr. Hale, tell just what happened when you came here yesterday morning.

HALE. Harry and I had started to town with a load of potatoes. We came along the road from my place; and as I got here, I said, “I’m going to see if I can’t get John Wright to go in with me on a party telephone.” I spoke to Wright about it once before, and he put me off, saying folks talked too much anyway, and all he asked was peace and quiet—I guess you know about how much he talked himself; but I thought maybe if I went to the house and talked about it before his wife, though I said to Harry that I didn’t know as what his wife wanted made much difference to John—

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Let’s talk about that later, Mr. Hale. I do want to talk about that, but tell now just what happened when you got to the house.

HALE. I didn’t hear or see anything; I knocked at the door, and still it was all quiet inside. I knew they must be up, it was past eight o’clock. So I knocked again, and I thought I heard somebody say, “Come in.” I wasn’t sure, I’m not sure yet, but I opened the door—this door (indicating the door by which the two women are still standing), and there in that rocker—(pointing to it) sat Mrs. Wright. (They all look at the rocker.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY. What—was she doing?

HALE. She was rockin’ back and forth. She had her apron in her hand and was kind of—pleating it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. And how did she—look?

HALE. Well, she looked queer.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. How do you mean—queer?

HALE. Well, as if she didn’t know what she was going to do next. And kind of done up.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. How did she seem to feel about your coming?

HALE. Why, I don’t think she minded—one way or other. She didn’t pay much attention. I said, “How do, Mrs. Wright, it’s cold, ain’t it?” And she said, “Is it?”—and went on kind of pleating at her apron. Well, I was surprised; she didn’t ask me to come up to the stove, or to set down, but just sat there, not even looking at me, so I said, “I want to see John.” And then she—laughed. I guess you would call it a laugh. I thought of Harry and the team outside, so I said a little sharp: “Can’t I see John?” “No,” she says, kind o’ dull like. “Ain’t he home?” says I. “Yes,” says she, “he’s home.” “Then why can’t I see him?” I asked her, out of patience. “Cause he’s dead,” says she. “Dead?” says I. She just nodded her head, not getting a bit excited, but rockin’ back and forth. “Why—where is he?” says I, not knowing what to say. She just pointed upstairs—like that (himself pointing to the room above). I got up, with the idea of going up there. I walked from there to here—then I says, “Why, what did he die of?” “He died of a rope around his neck,” says she, and just went on pleatin’ at her apron. Well, I went out and called Harry. I thought I might—need help. We went upstairs, and there he was lyin’—

COUNTY ATTORNEY. I think I’d rather have you go into that upstairs, where you can point it all out. Just go on now with the rest of the story.

HALE. Well, my first thought was to get that rope off. I looked . . . (Stops, his face twitches.) . . . but Harry, he went up to him, and he said, “No, he’s dead all right, and we’d better not touch anything.” So we went back downstairs. She was still sitting that same way. “Has anybody been notified?” I asked. “No,” says she, unconcerned. “Who did this, Mrs. Wright?” said Harry. He said it business-like—and she stopped pleatin’ of her apron. “I don’t know,” she says. “You don’t know?” says Harry. “No,” says she. “Weren’t you sleepin’ in the bed with him?” says Harry. “Yes,” says she, “but I was on the inside.” “Somebody slipped a rope round his neck and strangled him, and you didn’t wake up?” says Harry.
“I didn’t wake up,” she said after him. We must ’a looked as if we didn’t see how that could be, for after a minute she said, “I sleep sound.”
Harry was going to ask her more questions, but I said maybe we ought to let her tell her story first to the coroner, or the sheriff, so Harry went fast as he could to Rivers’ place, where there’s a telephone.
COUNTY ATTORNEY. And what did Mrs. Wright do when she knew that you had gone for the coroner?
HALE. She moved from that chair to this over here. . . (Pointing to a small chair in the corner). . . and just sat there with her hands held together and looking down. I got a feeling that I ought to make some conversation, so I said I had come in to see if John wanted to put in a telephone, and at that she started to laugh, and then she stopped and looked at me—scared. (The County Attorney, who has had his notebook out, makes a note.) I dunno, maybe it wasn’t scared. I wouldn’t like to say it was. Soon Harry got back, and then Dr. Lloyd came, and you, Mr. Peters, and so I guess that’s all I know that you don’t.
COUNTY ATTORNEY (looking around). I guess we’ll go upstairs first—and then out to the barn and around there. (To the Sheriff.) You’re convinced that there was nothing important here—nothing that would point to any motive?
SHERIFF. Nothing here but kitchen things.
(County Attorney, after again looking around the kitchen, opens the door of a cupboard closet. He gets up on a chair and looks on a shelf. Pulls his hand away, sticky.)
COUNTY ATTORNEY. Here’s a nice mess.
(The women draw nearer.
MRS. PETERS (to the other woman). Oh, her fruit; it did freeze. (To the Lawyer.) She worried about that when it turned so cold. She said the fire’d go out and her jars would break.
SHERIFF. Well, can you beat the women! Held for murder and worryin’ about her preserves.
COUNTY ATTORNEY. I guess before we’re through she may have something more serious than preserves to worry about.
HALE. Well, women are used to worrying over trifles.
(The two women move a little closer together.)
COUNTY ATTORNEY (with the gallantry of a young politician). And yet, for all their worries, what would we do without the ladies? (The women do not unbend. He goes to the sink, takes a dipperful of water from the pail and, pouring it into a basin, washes his hands. Starts to wipe them on the roller towel, turns it for a cleaner place.) Dirty towels! (Kicks his foot against the pans under the sink.) Not much of a housekeeper, would you say, ladies?
MRS. HALE (stiffly). There’s a great deal of work to be done on a farm.
COUNTY ATTORNEY. To be sure. And yet . . . (With a little bow to her). . . I know there are some Dickson county farmhouses which do not have such roller towels. (He gives it a pull to expose its full length again.)
MRS. HALE. Those towels get dirty awful quick. Men’s hands aren’t always as clean as they might be.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Ah, loyal to your sex, I see. But you and Mrs. Wright were neighbors. I suppose you were friends, too.

MRS. HALE (shaking her head). I’ve not seen much of her of late years. I’ve not been in this house—it’s more than a year.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. And why was that? You didn’t like her?

MRS. HALE. I liked her all well enough. Farmers’ wives have their hands full, Mr. Henderson. And then—

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Yes—?

MRS. HALE (looking about). It never seemed a very cheerful place.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. No—it’s not cheerful. I shouldn’t say she had the homemaking instinct.

MRS. HALE. Well, I don’t know as Wright had, either.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. You mean that they didn’t get on very well?

MRS. HALE. No, I don’t mean anything. But I don’t think a place’d be any cheerfuler for John Wright’s being in it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. I’d like to talk more of that a little later. I want to get the lay of things upstairs now. (He goes to the left, where three steps lead to a stair door.)

SHERIFF. I suppose anything Mrs. Peters does’ll be all right. She was to take in some clothes for her, you know, and a few little things. We left in such a hurry yesterday.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Yes, but I would like to see what you take, Mrs. Peters, and keep an eye out for anything that might be of use to us.

MRS. PETERS. Yes, Mr. Henderson.

(The women listen to the men’s steps on the stairs, then look about the kitchen.)

MRS. HALE. I’d hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing. (She arranges the pans under sink which the Lawyer had shoved out of place.)

MRS. PETERS. Of course it’s no more than their duty.

MRS. HALE. Duty’s all right, but I guess that deputy sheriff that came out to make the fire might have got a little of this on. (Gives the roller towel a pull.) Wish I’d thought of that sooner. Seems mean to talk about her for not having things slicked up when she had to come away in such a hurry.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Yes, but I would like to see what you take, Mrs. Peters, and keep an eye out for anything that might be of use to us.

MRS. PETERS. Yes, Mr. Henderson.

(The women listen to the men’s steps on the stairs, then look about the kitchen.)

MRS. HALE. I’d hate to have men coming into my kitchen, snooping around and criticizing. (She arranges the pans under sink which the Lawyer had shoved out of place.)

MRS. PETERS. Of course it’s no more than their duty.

MRS. HALE. Duty’s all right, but I guess that deputy sheriff that came out to make the fire might have got a little of this on. (Gives the roller towel a pull.) Wish I’d thought of that sooner. Seems mean to talk about her for not having things slicked up when she had to come away in such a hurry.

MRS. PETERS. She had bread set. (Stands still.)

MRS. HALE (eyes fixed on a loaf of bread beside the breadbox, which is on a low shelf at the other side of the room. Moves slowly toward it). She was going to put this in there. (Picks up loaf, then abruptly drops it. In a manner of returning to familiar things.) It’s a shame about her fruit. I wonder if it’s all gone. (Gets up on the chair and looks.) I think there’s some here that’s all right, Mrs. Peters. Yes—here; (Holding it toward the window:) this is cherries, too. (Looking again.) I declare I believe that’s the only one. (Gets down, bottle in her hand. Goes to the sink and wips it off on the outside.) She’ll feel awful bad after all her hard work in the hot weather. I remember the afternoon I put up my cherries last summer. (She puts the bottle on the big kitchen table, center of the room, front table. With a sigh, is about to sit down in the rocking chair. Before she is seated realizes what chair it is; with a slow look at it, steps back. The chair, which she has touched, rocks back and forth.)

MRS. PETERS. Well, I must get those things from the front room closet. (She goes to the door at the right, but after looking into the other room steps back.) You coming with me, Mrs. Hale? You could help me carry them. (They go into the other room; reappear, Mrs. Peters carrying a dress and skirt, Mrs. Hale following with a pair of shoes.)

MRS. PETERS. My, it’s cold in there. (She puts the cloth on the big table, and hurries to the stove.)

MRS. HALE (examining the skirt). Wright was close. I think maybe that’s why she kept so much to herself. She didn’t even belong to the Ladies’ Aid. I suppose she felt she couldn’t do her part, and then you don’t enjoy things when you feel shabby. She used to wear pretty clothes and be lively, when she was Minnie Foster, one of the town girls singing in the choir. But that—oh, that was thirty years ago. This all you was to take in?

MRS. PETERS. She said she wanted an apron. Funny thing to want, for there isn’t much to get you dirty in jail, goodness knows. But I suppose just to make her feel more natural. She said they was in the top drawer in this cupboard. Yes, here. And then her little shawl that always hung behind the door. (Opens stair door and looks.) Yes, here it is. (Quickly shuts door leading upstairs.)

MRS. HALE (abruptly moving toward her). Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS. Yes, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE. Do you think she did it?

MRS. PETERS (in a frightened voice). Oh, I don’t know.

MRS. HALE. Well, I don’t think she did. Asking for an apron and her little shawl. Worrying about her fruit.

MRS. PETERS (starts to speak, glances up, where footsteps are heard in the room above. In a low voice). Mr. Peters says it looks bad for her. Mr. Henderson is awful sarcastic in speech, and he’ll make fun of her sayin’ she didn’t wake up.

MRS. HALE. Well, I guess John Wright didn’t wake when they was slipping that rope under his neck.

MRS. PETERS. No, it’s strange. It must have been done awful crafty and still. They say it was such a—funny way to kill a man, rigging it all up like that.

MRS. HALE. That’s just what Mr. Hale said. There was a gun in the house. He says that’s what he can’t understand.

MRS. PETERS. Mr. Henderson said coming out that what was needed for the case was a motive; something to show anger, or—sudden feeling.

MRS. HALE (who is standing by the table). Well, I don’t see any signs of anger around here. (She puts her hand on the dish towel which lies on the table, stands looking down at the table, one half of which is clean, the other half messy.) It’s wiped here. (Makes a move as if to finish work, then turns and looks at loaf of bread outside the bread-box. Drops towel. In that voice of coming back to familiar things.)
Wonder how they are finding things upstairs? I hope she had it a little more red-up there. You know, it seems kind of sneaking. Locking her up in town and then coming out here and trying to get her own house to turn against her!

MRS. PETERS. But, Mrs. Hale, the law is the law.

MRS. HALE. I s'pose 'tis. (Unbuttoning her coat.) Better loosen up your things, Mrs. Peters. You won't feel them when you go out.

(Mrs. Peters takes off her fur tippet, goes to hang it on hook at the back of room, stands looking at the under part of the small corner table.)

MRS. PETERS. She was piecing a quilt. (She brings the large sewing basket, and they look at the bright pieces.)

MRS. HALE. It's log cabin pattern. Pretty, isn't it? I wonder if she was goin' to quilt or just knot it?

(Footsteps have been heard coming down the stairs. The Sheriff enters, followed by Hale and the County Attorney.)

SHERIFF. They wonder if she was going to quilt it or just knot it. (The men laugh, the women look abashed.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY (rubbing his hands over the stove). Frank's fire didn't do much up there, did it? Well, let's go out to the barn and get that cleared up.

(The men go outside.)

MRS. HALE (resentfully). I don't know as there's anything so strange, our takin' up our time with little things while we're waiting for them to get the evidence. (She sits down at the big table, smoothing out a block with decision.) I don't see as it's anything to laugh about.

MRS. PETERS (apologetically). Of course they've got awful important things on their minds. (Pulls up a chair and joins Mrs. Hale at the table.)

MRS. HALE (examining another block). Mrs. Peters, look at this one. Here, this is the one she was working on, and look at the sewing! All the rest of it has been so nice and even. And look at this! It's all over the place! Why, it looks as if she didn't know what she was about! (After she has said this, they look at each other, then start to glance back at the door. After an instant Mrs. Hale has pulled at a knot and ripped the sewing.)

MRS. PETERS. Oh, what are you doing, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE (mildly). Just pulling out a stitch or two that's not sewed very good. (Threading a needle.) Bad sewing always made me fidgety.

MRS. PETERS (nervously). I don't think we ought to touch things.

MRS. HALE. I'll just finish up this end. (Suddenly stopping and leaning forward.) Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS. Yes, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE. What do you suppose she was so nervous about?

MRS. PETERS. Oh—I don't know. I don't know as she was nervous. I sometimes sew awful queer when I'm just tired. (Mrs. Hale starts to say something, looks at Mrs. Peters, then goes on sewing.) Well, I must get these things wrapped up. They may be through sooner than we think.

(Putting apron and other things together.) I wonder where I can find a piece of paper, and string.
MRS. HALE. In that cupboard, maybe.

MRS. PETERS (looking in cupboard). Why, here’s a birdcage. (Holds it up). Did she have a bird, Mrs. Hale?

MRS. HALE. Why, I don’t know whether she did or not—I’ve not been here for so long. There was a man around last year selling canaries cheap, but I don’t know as she took one; maybe she did. She used to sing real pretty herself.

MRS. PETERS (glancing around). Seems funny to think of a bird here. But she must have had one, or why should she have a cage? I wonder what happened to it?

MRS. HALE. I s’pose maybe the cat got it.

MRS. PETERS. No, she didn’t have a cat. She’s got that feeling some people have about cats—being afraid of them. My cat got in her room, and she was real upset and asked me to take it out.

MRS. HALE. My sister Bessie was like that. Queer, ain’t it?

MRS. PETERS (examining the cage). Why, look at this door. It’s broke. One hinge is pulled apart.

MRS. HALE (looking, too). Looks as if someone must have been rough with it.

MRS. PETERS. Why, yes. (She brings the cage forward and puts it on the table.)

MRS. HALE. I wish if they’re going to find any evidence they’d be about it. I don’t like this place.

MRS. PETERS. But I’m awful glad you came with me, Mrs. Hale. It would be lonesome for me sitting here alone.

MRS. HALE. It would, wouldn’t it? (Dropping her sewing.) But I tell you what I do wish, Mrs. Peters. I wish I had come over sometimes when she was here. I—(Looking around the room.)—wish I had.

MRS. PETERS. But of course you were awful busy, Mrs. Hale—your house and your children.

MRS. HALE. I could’ve come. I stayed away because it weren’t cheerful—and that’s why I ought to have come. I—I’ve never liked this place. Maybe because it’s down in a hollow, and you don’t see the road. I dunno what it is, but it’s a lonesome place and always was. I wish I had come over to see Minnie Foster sometimes. I can see now—(Shakes her head.)

MRS. PETERS. Well, you mustn’t reproach yourself, Mrs. Hale. Somehow we just don’t see how it is with other folks until—something comes up.

MRS. HALE. Not having children makes less work—but it makes a quiet house, and Wright out to work all day, and no company when he did come in. Did you know John Wright, Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS. Not to know him; I’ve seen him in town. They say he was a good man.

MRS. HALE. Yes—good; he didn’t drink, and kept his word as well as most, I guess, and paid his debts. But he was a hard man, Mrs. Peters. Just to pass the time of day with him. (Shivers.) Like a raw wind that gets to the bone. (Pauses, her eye falling on the cage.) I should think she would ’a wanted a bird. But what do you suppose went with it?

MRS. PETERS. I don’t know, unless it got sick and died. (She reaches over and swings the broken door, swings it again; both women watch it.)

MRS. HALE. You weren’t raised round here, were you? (Mrs. Peters shakes ber bead.) You didn’t know—her?
MRS. PETERS. Not till they brought her yesterday.

MRS. HALE. She—come to think of it, she was kind of like a bird herself—real sweet and pretty, but kind of timid and—fluttery. How—she—did—change. (Silence; then as if struck by a happy thought and relieved to get back to everyday things.) Tell you what, Mrs. Peters, why don’t you take the quilt in with you? It might take up her mind.

MRS. PETERS. Why, I think that’s a real nice idea, Mrs. Hale. There couldn’t possibly be any objection to it, could there? Now, just what would I take? I wonder if her patches are in here—and her things. (They look in the sewing basket.)

MRS. HALE. Here’s some red. I expect this has got sewing things in it. (Brings out a fancy box.) What a pretty box. Looks like something somebody would give you. Maybe her scissors are in here. (Opens box. Suddenly puts her hand to her nose.) Why—(Mrs. Peters bends nearer, then turns her face away.) There’s something wrapped up in this piece of silk.

MRS. PETERS. Why, this isn’t her scissors.

MRS. HALE (lifting the silk). Oh, Mrs. Peters—it’s—(Mrs. Peters bends closer.)

MRS. PETERS. It’s the bird.

MRS. HALE (jumping up). But, Mrs. Peters—look at it. Its neck! Look at its neck! It’s all—other side to.

MRS. PETERS. Somebody—wrung—its neck.

(Their eyes meet. A look of growing comprehension of horror. Steps are heard outside. Mrs. Hale slips box under quilt pieces, and sinks into her chair. Enter Sheriff and County Attorney. Mrs. Peters rises.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY (as one turning from serious things to little pleasantries). Well, ladies, have you decided whether she was going to quilt it or knot it?

MRS. PETERS. We think she was going to—knot it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Well, that’s interesting, I’m sure. (Seeing the birdcage.) Has the bird flown?

MRS. HALE (putting more quilt pieces over the box). We think the—cat got it.

COUNTY ATTORNEY (preoccupied). Is there a cat?

(Mrs. Hale glances in a quick covert way at Mrs. Peters.)

MRS. PETERS. Well, not now. They’re superstitious, you know. They leave.

COUNTY ATTORNEY (to Sheriff Peters, continuing an interrupted conversation). No sign at all of anyone having come from the outside. Their own rope. Now let’s go up again and go over it piece by piece. (They start upstairs.) It would have to have been someone who knew just the—

(Mrs. Peters sits down. The two women sit there not looking at one another, but as if peering into something and at the same time holding back. When they talk now, it is the manner of feeling their way over strange ground, as if afraid of what they are saying, but as if they cannot help saying it.)

MRS. HALE. She liked the bird. She was going to bury it in that pretty box.

MRS. PETERS (in a whisper). When I was a girl—my kitten—there was a boy took a hatchet, and before my eyes—and before I could get there—(Covers her face an instant.) If they hadn’t held me back, I would have—(Catches herself, looks upstairs where steps are beard, falters weakly.)—hurt him.
MRS. Hale (with a slow look around her). I wonder how it would seem never to have had any children around. (Pause.) No, Wright wouldn’t like the bird—a thing that sang. She used to sing. He killed that, too.

MRS. Peters (moving uneasily). We don’t know who killed the bird.

MRS. Hale. I knew John Wright.

MRS. Peters. It was an awful thing was done in this house that night, Mrs. Hale. Killing a man while he slept, slipping a rope around his neck that choked the life out of him.

MRS. Hale. His neck. Choked the life out of him.

(Her band goes out and rests on the birdcage.)

MRS. Peters (with a rising voice). We don’t know who killed him. We don’t know.

MRS. Hale (her own feeling not interrupted). If there’d been years and years of nothing, then a bird to sing to you, it would be awful—still, after the bird was still.

MRS. Peters (something within her speaking). I know what stillness is. When we homesteaded in Dakota, and my first baby died—after he was two years old, and me with no other then—

MRS. Hale (moving). How soon do you suppose they’ll be through, looking for evidence?

MRS. Peters. I know what stillness is. (Pulling herself back.) The law has got to punish crime, Mrs. Hale.

MRS. Hale (not as if answering that). I wish you’d seen Minnie Foster when she wore a white dress with blue ribbons and stood up there in the choir and sang. (A look around the room.) Oh, I wish I’d come over here once in a while! That was a crime! That was a crime! Who’s going to punish that?

MRS. Peters (looking upstairs). We mustn’t—take on.

MRS. Hale. I might have known she needed help! I know how things can be—for women. I tell you, it’s queer, Mrs. Peters. We live close together and we live far apart. We all go through the same things—it’s all just a different kind of the same thing. (Brushes her eyes, noticing the bottle of fruit, reaches out for it.) If I was you, I wouldn’t tell her her fruit was gone. Tell her it ain’t. Tell her it’s all right. Take this in to prove it to her. She—she may never know whether it was broke or not.

MRS. Peters (looking upstairs). We mustn’t—take on.

MRS. Hale. (under her breath). Maybe they would—maybe they wouldn’t.

COUNTY ATTORNEY. No, Peters, it’s all perfectly clear except a reason for doing it. But you know juries when it comes to women. If there was some definite thing. Something to show—something to make a story about—a thing that would connect up with this strange way of doing it.

(The men are heard coming downstairs.)

MRS. Hale (under her breath). Maybe they would—maybe they wouldn’t.
HALE. Well, I've got the team around. Pretty cold out there.
COUNTY ATTORNEY. I'm going to stay here awhile by myself. (To the Sheriff.)
You can send Frank out for me, can't you? I want to go over everything.
I'm not satisfied that we can't do better.
SHERIFF. Do you want to see what Mrs. Peters is going to take in?

(The Lawyer goes to the table, picks up the apron, laughs.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY. Oh I guess they're not very dangerous things the ladies have picked up. (Moves a few things about, disturbing the quilt pieces which cover the box. Steps back.) No, Mrs. Peters doesn't need supervising. For that matter, a sheriff's wife is married to the law. Ever think of it that way, Mrs. Peters?

MRS. PETERS. Not—just that way.
SHERIFF (chuckling). Married to the law. (Moves toward the other room.)
I just want you to come in here a minute, George. We ought to take a look at these windows.

COUNTY ATTORNEY (scoffingly). Oh, windows!
SHERIFF. We'll be right out, Mr. Hale.

(Hale goes outside. The Sheriff follows the County Attorney into the other room. Then Mrs. Hale rises, bands tight together, looking intensely at Mrs. Peters, whose eyes take a slow turn, finally meeting Mrs. Hale's. A moment Mrs. Hale holds her, then her own eyes point the way to where the box is concealed. Suddenly Mrs. Peters throws back quilt pieces and tries to put the box in the bag she is wearing. It is too big. She opens box, starts to take the bird out, cannot touch it, goes to pieces, stands there helpless. Sound of a knob turning in the other room. Mrs. Hale snatches the box and puts it in the pocket of her big coat. Enter County Attorney and Sheriff.)

COUNTY ATTORNEY (facetiously). Well, Henry, at least we found out that she was not going to quilt it. She was going to—what is it you call it, ladies?
MRS. HALE (her band against her pocket). We call it—knot it, Mr. Henderson.

CURTAIN

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. How would you characterize Mr. Henderson, the county attorney?
2. In what way or ways are Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Hale different from each other?
3. On page 960, when Mrs. Peters tells of the boy who killed her cat, she says, "If they hadn't held me back, I would have—(catches herself, looks upstairs where steps are heard, falters weakly.)—hurt him." What do you think she was about to say before she faltered? Why do you suppose Glaspell included this speech about Mrs. Peters's girlhood?
4. We never see Mrs. Wright on stage. Nevertheless, by the end of Trifles we know a great deal about her. Explain both what we know about her—physical characteristics, habits, interests, personality, life before her marriage and after—and how we know these things.
5. The title of the play is ironic—the "trifles" are important. What other ironies do you find in the play. (On irony, see the Glossary, page 1589.)
6. Do you think the play is immoral? Explain.
7. Assume that the canary has been found, thereby revealing a possible motive, and that Minnie is indicted for murder. You are the defense attor-ey. In 500 words set forth your defense. (Take any position you wish.
For instance, you may want to argue that she committed justifiable homicide or that—on the basis of her behavior as reported by Mr. Hale—she is innocent by reason of insanity.)
8. Assume that the canary had been found and Minnie Wright convicted.
Compose the speech you think she might have delivered before the sentence was given.

The Play on the Stage

9. Briefly describe the setting, indicating what it "says" and what atmosphere it evokes.
10. Several times the men "laugh" or "chuckle." In their contexts, what do these expressions of amusement convey?
11. At the bottom of page 961, "the women's eyes meet for an instant."
What do you think this bit of action "says"? What do you understand by the exchange of glances?

TENNESSEE WILLIAMS

Tennessee Williams (1914–1983) was born Thomas Lanier Williams in Columbus, Mississippi. During his childhood his family moved to St. Louis, where his father had accepted a job as manager of a shoe company. Williams has written that neither he nor his sister Rose could adjust to the change from the South to the Midwest, but the children had already been deeply troubled. Nevertheless, at the age of 16 he achieved some distinction as a writer when his prize-winning essay in a nationwide contest was published.
After high school he attended the University of Missouri but flunked ROTC and was therefore withdrawn from school by his father. He worked in a shoe factory for a while, then attended Washington University, where he wrote several plays. He finally graduated from the University of Iowa with a major in playwrighting. After graduation he continued to write, supporting himself with odd jobs such as waiting on tables and running elevators. His first commercial success was The Glass Menagerie (produced in Chicago in 1944, and in New York in 1945); among his other plays are A Streetcar Named Desire (1947), Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1955), and Suddenly Last Summer (1958).

LIST OF CHARACTERS

AMANDA WINGFIELD, the mother. A little woman of great but confused vitality clinging frantically to another time and place. Her characterization must be carefully created, not copied from type. She is not paranoiac, but her life is paranoia. There is much to admire in Amanda, and as much to love and pity as there is to laugh at. Certainly she has endurance and a kind of heroism, and though her foolishness makes her unwittingly cruel at times, there is tenderness in her slight person.

LAURA WINGFIELD, her daughter. Amanda, having failed to establish contact with reality, continues to live vitally in her illusions, but Laura’s situation is even graver. A childhood illness has left her crippled, one leg slightly shorter than the other, and held in a brace. This defect need not be more than suggested on the stage. Stemming from this, Laura’s separation increases till she is like a piece of her own glass collection, too exquisitely fragile to move from the shelf.

TOM WINGFIELD, her son. And the narrator of the play. A poet with a job in a warehouse. His nature is not remorseless, but to escape from a trap he has to act without pity.

JIM O’CONNOR, the gentleman caller. A nice, ordinary, young man.

SCENE. An alley in St. Louis.
PART I. Preparation for a Gentleman Caller.

PART II. The Gentleman Calls.

TIME. Now and the Past.

Scene I

The Wingfield apartment is in the rear of the building, one of those vast hive-like conglomerations of cellular living-units that flower as warty growths in overcrowded urban centers of lower middle-class population and are symptomatic of the impulse of this largest and fundamentally enslaved section of American society to avoid fluidity and differentiation and to exist and function as one interfused mass of automatism.

The apartment faces an alley and is entered by a fire-escape, a structure whose name is a touch of accidental poetic truth, for all of these huge buildings are always burning with the slow and implacable fires of human desperation. The fire-escape is included in the set—that is, the landing of it and steps descending from it.

The scene is memory and is therefore nonrealistic. Memory takes a lot of poetic license. It omits some details; others are exaggerated, according to the emotional value of the articles it touches, for memory is seated predominantly in the heart. The interior is therefore rather dim and poetic.

At the rise of the curtain, the audience is faced with the dark, grim rear wall of the Wingfield tenement. This building, which runs parallel to the footlights, is flanked on both sides by dark, narrow alleys which run into murky canyons of tangled clotheslines, garbage cans and the sinister latticework of neighboring fire-escapes. It is up and down these side alleys that exterior entrances and exits are made, during the play. At the end of Tom’s opening commentary, the dark tenement wall slowly reveals (by means of a transparency) the interior of the ground floor Wingfield apartment.

Downstage is the living room, which also serves as a sleeping room for Laura, the sofa unfolding to make her bed. Upstage, center, and divided by a wide arch or second proscenium with transparent faded portieres (or second curtain), is the dining room. In an old-fashioned what-not in the living room are seen scores of transparent glass animals. A blown-up photograph of the father hangs on the wall of the living room, facing the audience, to the left of the archway. It is the face of a very handsome young man in a doughboy’s First World War cap. He is gallantly smiling, ineluctably smiling, as if to say, “I will be smiling forever.”

The audience hears and sees the opening scene in the dining room through both the transparent fourth wall of the building and the transparent gauze portieres of the dining-room arch. It is during this revealing scene that the fourth wall slowly ascends, out of sight.

This transparent exterior wall is not brought down again until the very end of the play, during Tom’s final speech.

The narrator is an undisguised convention of the play. He takes whatever license with dramatic convention as is convenient to his purposes.
TOM enters dressed as a merchant sailor from alley, stage left, and strolls across the front of the stage to the fire-escape. There be stops and lights a cigarette. He addresses the audience.

TOM. Yes, I have tricks in my pocket, I have things up my sleeve. But I am the opposite of a stage magician. He gives you illusion that has the appearance of truth. I give you truth in the pleasant disguise of illusion. To begin with, I turn back time. I reverse it to that quaint period, the thirties, when the huge middle class of America was matriculating in a school for the blind. Their eyes had failed them, or they had failed their eyes, and so they were having their fingers pressed forcibly down on the fiery Braille alphabet of a dissolving economy. In Spain there was revolution. Here there was only shouting and confusion. In Spain there was Guernica. Here there were disturbances of labor, sometimes pretty violent, in otherwise peaceful cities such as Chicago, Cleveland, Saint Louis. . . . This is the social background of the play.

(Music.)
The play is memory. Being a memory play, it is dimly lighted, it is sentimental, it is not realistic. In memory everything seems to happen to music. That explains the fiddle in the wings. I am the narrator of the play, and also a character in it. The other characters are my mother, Amanda, my sister, Laura, and a gentleman caller who appears in the final scenes. He is the most realistic character in the play, being an emissary from a world of reality that we were somehow set apart from. But since I have a poet’s weakness for symbols, I am using this character also as a symbol; he is the long delayed but always expected something that we live for. There is a fifth character in the play who doesn’t appear except in this larger-than-life photograph over the mantel. This is our father who left us a long time ago. He was a telephone man who fell in love with long distances; he gave up his job with the telephone company and skipped the light fantastic out of town. . . . The last we heard of him was a picture post-card from Mazatlan, on the Pacific coast of Mexico, containing a message of two words—‘Hello—Goodbye!’ and no address. I think the rest of the play will explain itself. . . .

AMANDA’S voice becomes audible through the portieres.
(Legend on Screen: “Où Sont les Neiges?”)
He divides the portieres and enters the upstage area.
AMANDA and LAURA are seated at a drop-leaf table. Eating is indicated by gestures without food or utensils. AMANDA faces the audience.
TOM and LAURA are seated in profile.
The interior has lit up softly and through the scrim we see AMANDA and LAURA seated at the table in the upstage area.

AMANDA (calling). Tom?
TOM. Yes, Mother.
AMANDA. We can’t say grace until you come to the table!
TOM. Coming, Mother. (He bows slightly and withdraws, reappearing a few moments later in his place at the table.)
AMANDA (to her son). Honey, don’t push with your fingers. If you have to push with something, the thing to push with is a crust of bread. And chew—chew! Animals have sections in their stomachs which enable them to digest food without mastication, but human beings are supposed to chew their food before they swallow it down. Eat food leisurely, son, and really enjoy it. A well-cooked meal has lots of delicate flavors that have to be held in the mouth for appreciation. So chew your food and give your salivary glands a chance to function!

TOM deliberately lays his imaginary fork down and pushes his chair back from the table.

TOM. I haven’t enjoyed one bite of this dinner because of your constant directions on how to eat it. It’s you that makes me rush through meals with your hawk-like attention to every bite I take. Sickening—spoils my appetite—all this discussion of animals’ secretion—salivary glands—mastication!

AMANDA (lightly). Temperament like a Metropolitan star! (He rises and crosses downstage.) You’re not excused from the table.

TOM. I am getting a cigarette.

AMANDA. You smoke too much.

LAURA rises.

LAURA. I’ll bring in the blanc mange.

He remains standing with his cigarette by the portieres during the following.

AMANDA (rising.) No, sister, no, sister—you be the lady this time and I’ll be the darky.

LAURA. I’m already up.

AMANDA. Resume your seat, little sister—I want you to stay fresh and pretty—for gentlemen callers!

LAURA. I’m not expecting any gentlemen callers.

AMANDA (crossing out to kitchenette. Airily). Sometimes they come when they are least expected! Why, I remember one Sunday afternoon in Blue Mountain—(Enters kitchenette.)

TOM. I know what’s coming!

LAURA. Yes. But let her tell it.

TOM. Again?

LAURA. She loves to tell it.

AMANDA returns with bowl of dessert.

AMANDA. One Sunday afternoon in Blue Mountain—your mother received—seventeen!—gentlemen callers! Why, sometimes there weren’t chairs enough to accommodate them all. We had to send the nigger over to bring in folding chairs from the parish house.

TOM (remaining at portieres). How did you entertain those gentlemen callers?

AMANDA. I understood the art of conversation!
TOM. I bet you could talk.

AMANDA. Girls in those days knew how to talk, I can tell you.

TOM. Yes?

(IMAGE: AMANDA as a Girl on a Porch Greeting Callers.)

AMANDA. They knew how to entertain their gentlemen callers. It wasn’t enough for a girl to be possessed of a pretty face and a graceful figure—although I wasn’t slighted in either respect. She also needed to have a nimble wit and a tongue to meet all occasions.

TOM. What did you talk about?

AMANDA. Things of importance going on in the world! Never anything coarse or common or vulgar. (She addresses TOM as though be were seated in the vacant chair at the table though he remains by portieres. He plays this scene as though he held the book.) My callers were gentlemen—all! Among my callers were some of the most prominent young planters of the Mississippi Delta—planters and sons of planters!

TOM motions for music and a spot of light on AMANDA.

Her eyes lift, her face glows, her voice becomes rich and elegiac. (Screen Legend: “Où Sont les Neiges?”)

There was young Champ Laughlin who later became vice-president of the Delta Planters Bank. Hadley Stevenson who was drowned in Moon Lake and left his widow one hundred and fifty thousand in Government bonds. There were the Cutrere brothers, Wesley and Bates. Bates was one of my bright particular beaux! He got in a quarrel with that wild Wainright boy. They shot it out on the floor of Moon Lake Casino. Bates was shot through the stomach. Died in the ambulance on his way to Memphis. His widow was also well-provided for, came into eight or ten thousand acres, that’s all. She married him on the rebound—never loved her—carried my picture on him the night he died! And there was that boy that every girl in Delta had set her cap for! That beautiful, brilliant young Fitzhugh boy from Green County!

TOM. What did he leave his widow?

AMANDA. He never married! Gracious, you talk as though all of my old admirers had turned up their toes to the daisies!

TOM. Isn’t this the first you mentioned that still survives?

AMANDA. That Fitzhugh boy went North and made a fortune—came to be known as the Wolf of Wall Street! He had the Midas touch, whatever he touched turned to gold! And I could have been Mrs. Duncan J. Fitzhugh, mind you! But—I picked your father!

LAURA (rising). Mother, let me clear the table.

AMANDA. No dear, you go in front and study your typewriter chart. Or practice your shorthand a little. Stay fresh and pretty!—It’s almost time for our gentlemen callers to start arriving. (She flounces girlishly toward the kitchenette.) How many do you suppose we’re going to entertain this afternoon?

TOM throws down the paper and jumps up with a groan.

LAURA (alone in the dining room). I don’t believe we’re going to receive any, Mother.
AMANDA (reappearing, airily). What? No one—not one? You must be joking! (LAURA nervously echoes her laugh. She slips in a fugitive manner through the half-open portieres and draws them gently behind her. A shaft of very clear light is thrown on her face against the faded tapestry of the curtains.) (Music: “The Glass Menagerie” Under Faintly.) (Lightly.) Not one gentleman caller! It can’t be true! There must be a flood, there must have been a tornado!

LAURA. It isn’t a flood, it’s not a tornado, Mother. I’m just not popular like you were in Blue Mountain. . . . (TOM utters another groan. LAURA glances at him with a faint, apologetic smile. Her voice catching a little.) Mother’s afraid I’m going to be an old maid.

(The Scene Dims Out with “Glass Menagerie” Music.)

Scene II

“Laura, Haven’t You Ever Liked Some Boy?”

On the dark stage the screen is lighted with the image of blue roses. Gradually LAURA’S figure becomes apparent and the screen goes out. The music subsides.

LAURA is seated in the delicate ivory chair at the small clawfoot table. She wears a dress of soft violet material for a kimono—her hair tied back from her forehead with a ribbon.

She is washing and polishing her collection of glass.

AMANDA appears on the fire-escape steps. At the sound of her ascent, LAURA catches her breath, thrusts the bowl of ornaments away and seats herself stiffly before the diagram of the typewriter keyboard as though it held her spellbound. Something has happened to AMANDA. It is written in her face as she climbs to the landing: a look that is grim and hopeless and a little absurd.

She has on one of those cheap or imitation velvety-looking cloth coats with imitation fur collar. Her hat is five or six years old, one of those dreadful cloche hats that were worn in the late twenties, and she is clasping an enormous black patent-leather pocketbook with nickel clasp and initials. This is her full-dress outfit, the one she usually wears to the D.A.R.

Before entering she looks through the door.

She purses her lips, opens her eyes wide, rolls them upward and shakes her head.

Then she slowly lets herself in the door. Seeing her mother’s expression LAURA touches her lips with a nervous gesture.

LAURA. Hello, Mother, I was—(She makes a nervous gesture toward the chart on the wall. AMANDA leans against the shut door and stares at LAURA with a martyred look.)

AMANDA. Deception? Deception? (She slowly removes her hat and gloves, continuing the swift suffering stare. She lets the hat and gloves fall on the floor—a bit of acting.)

LAURA (shakily.) How was the D.A.R. meeting? (AMANDA slowly opens her purse and removes a dainty white handkerchief which she shakes out delicately and delicately touches to her lips and nostrils.) Didn’t you go to the D.A.R. meeting, Mother?
AMANDA (faintly, almost inaudibly). —No.—No. (Then more forcibly. I did not have the strength—to go to the D.A.R. In fact, I did not have the courage! I wanted to find a hole in the ground and hide myself in it forever! (*She crosses slowly to the wall and removes the diagram of the typewriter keyboard. She holds it in front of her for a second, staring at it sweetly and sorrowfully—then bites her lips and tears it in two pieces.)

LAURA (faintly). Why did you do that, Mother? (AMANDA repeats the same procedure with the chart of the Gregg Alphabet.) Why are you—

AMANDA. Why? Why? How old are you, Laura?

LAURA. Mother, you know my age.

AMANDA. I thought that you were an adult; it seems that I was mistaken. (She crosses slowly to the sofa and sinks down and stares at LAURA.)

LAURA. Please don’t stare at me, Mother.

AMANDA closes her eyes and lowers her head. Count ten.

AMANDA. What are we going to do, what is going to become of us, what is the future?

Count ten.

LAURA. Has something happened, Mother? (AMANDA draws a long breath and takes out the handkerchief again. Dabbing process.) Mother, has—something happened?

AMANDA. I’ll be all right in a minute. I’m just bewildered—(count five)—by life. . . .

LAURA. Mother, I wish that you would tell me what’s happened.

AMANDA. As you know, I was supposed to be inducted into my office at the D.A.R. this afternoon. (Image: A Swarm of Typewriters.) But I stopped off at Rubicam’s Business College to speak to your teachers about your having a cold and ask them what progress they thought you were making down there.

LAURA. Oh. . . .

AMANDA. I went to the typing instructor and introduced myself as your mother. She didn’t know who you were. Wingfield, she said. She didn’t have any such student enrolled at the school! I assured her she did, that you had been going to classes since early in January. “I wonder,” she said, “if you could be talking about that terribly shy little girl who dropped out of school after only a few days’ attendance?” “No,” I said, “Laura, my daughter, has been going to school every day for the past six weeks!” “Excuse me,” she said. She took the attendance book out and there was your name, unmistakably printed, and all the dates you were absent until they decided that you had dropped out of school. I still said, “No, there must have been some mistake! There must have been some mix-up in the records!” And she said, “No—I remember her perfectly now. Her hand shook so that she couldn’t hit the right keys! The first time we gave a speed-test, she broke down completely—was sick at the stomach and almost had to be carried into the wash-room! After that morning she never showed up any more. We phoned the house but never got any answer”—while I was working at Famous and Barr, I suppose, demonstrating those—Oh! I felt so weak I could barely keep on my feet. I had to sit down while they got me a glass of water! Fifty dollars' tuition, all of our plans—my hopes and ambitions for you—just gone up the spout, just gone up the spout like that.

(LAURA draws a long breath and gets awkwardly to her feet. She crosses to the Victrola and winds it up.) What are you doing?

LAURA. Oh! (She releases the handle and returns to her seat.)

AMANDA. Laura, where have you been going when you've gone out pretending that you were going to business college?

LAURA. I've just been going out walking.

AMANDA. That's not true.

LAURA. It is. I just went walking.

AMANDA. Walking? Walking? In winter? Deliberately courting pneumonia in that light coat? Where did you walk to, Laura?

LAURA. It was the lesser of two evils, Mother. (Image: Winter Scene in Park.) I couldn't go back up. I—threw up—on the floor!

AMANDA. From half past seven till after five every day you mean to tell me you walked around in the park, because you wanted to make me think that you were still going to Rubicam's Business College?

LAURA. It wasn't as bad as it sounds. I went inside places to get warmed up.

AMANDA. Inside where?

LAURA. I went in the art museum and the bird-houses at the Zoo. I visited the penguins every day! Sometimes I did without lunch and went to the movies. Lately I've been spending most of my afternoons in the Jewel-box, that big glass house where they raise the tropical flowers.

AMANDA. You did all this to deceive me, just for the deception? (LAURA looks down.) Why?

LAURA. Mother, when you're disappointed, you get that awful suffering look on your face, like the picture of Jesus' mother in the museum!

AMANDA. Hush!

PAUSE. A whisper of strings.

(Legend: "The Crust of Humility.")

AMANDA (hopelessly fingering the huge pocketbook). So what are we going to do the rest of our lives? Stay home and watch the parades go by? Amuse ourselves with the glass menagerie, darling? Eternally play those worn-out phonograph records your father left as a painful reminder of him? We won't have a business career—we've given that up because it gave us nervous indigestion! (Laughs wearily.) What is there left but dependency all our lives? I know so well what becomes of unmarried women who aren't prepared to occupy a position. I've seen such pitiful cases in the South—barely tolerated spinsters living upon the grudging patronage of sister's husband or brother's wife!—stuck away in some little mousetrap of a room—encouraged by one in-law to visit another—little birdlike women without any nest—eating the crust of humility all their life! Is that the future that we've mapped out for ourselves? I swear it's the only alternative I can think of! It isn't a very pleasant alternative, is it? Of course—some girls do marry. (LAURA twists her hands nervously.)

Haven't you ever liked some boy?

LAURA. Yes. I liked one once. (Rises.) I came across his picture a while ago.

AMANDA (with some interest). He gave you his picture?

LAURA. No, it's in the year-book.
AMANDA (disappointed). Oh—a high-school boy.

(Screen Image: Jim as a High-School Hero Bearing a Silver Cup.)

LAURA. Yes. His name was Jim. (LAURA lifts the heavy annual from the claw-foot table.) Here he is in The Pirates of Penzance.

AMANDA (absently). The what?

LAURA. The operetta the senior class put on. He had a wonderful voice and we sat across the aisle from each other Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays in the Aud. Here he is with the silver cup for debating! See his grin?

AMANDA (absently). He must have had a jolly disposition.

LAURA. He used to call me—Blue Roses.

(Image: Blue Roses.)

AMANDA. Why did he call you such a name as that?

LAURA. When I had that attack of pleurosis—he asked me what was the matter when I came back. I said pleurosis—he thought that I said Blue Roses! So that’s what he always called me after that. Whenever he saw me, he’d holler, “Hello, Blue Roses!” I didn’t care for the girl that he went out with. Emily Meisenbach. Emily was the best-dressed girl at Soldan. She never struck me, though, as being sincere. . . . It says in the Personal Section—they’re engaged. That’s—six years ago! They must be married by now.

AMANDA. Girls that aren’t cut out for business careers usually wind up married to some nice man. (Gets up with a spark of revival.) Sister, that’s what you’ll do!

LAURA utters a startled, doubtful laugh. She reaches quickly for a piece of glass.

LAURA. But, Mother—

AMANDA. Yes? (Crossing to photograph.)

LAURA (in a tone of frightened apology). I’m—crippled!

(Image: Screen.)

AMANDA. Nonsense! Laura, I’ve told you never, never to use that word. Why, you’re not crippled, you just have a little defect—hardly noticeable, even! When people have some slight disadvantage like that, they cultivate other things to make up for it—develop charm—and vivacity—and—charm! That’s all you have to do! (She turns again to the photograph.) One thing your father had plenty of—was charm!

TOM motions to the fiddle in the wings.

(The Scene Fades Out with Music.)

Scene III

(Legend on the Screen: “After the Fiasco—”)

TOM speaks from the fire-escape landing.

TOM. After the fiasco at Rubicam’s Business College, the idea of getting a gentleman caller for Laura began to play a more important part in Mother’s calculations. It became an obsession. Like some archetype of the universal unconscious, the image of the gentleman caller haunted our small apartment. . . . (Image: Young Man at Door with Flowers.)

An evening at home rarely passed without some allusion to this image, this specter, this hope. . . . Even when he wasn’t mentioned, his presence hung in Mother’s preoccupied look and in my sister’s frightened, apologetic manner—hung like a sentence passed upon the Wingfields!

Mother was a woman of action as well as words. She began to take logical steps in the planned direction. Late that winter and in the early spring—realizing that extra money would be needed to properly feather the nest and plume the bird—she conducted a vigorous campaign on the telephone, roping in subscribers to one of those magazines for matrons called The Home-maker’s Companion, the type of journal that features the serialized sublimations of ladies of letters who think in terms of delicate cuplike breasts, slim, tapering waists, rich, creamy thighs, eyes like wood-smoke in autumn, fingers that soothe and caress like strains of music, bodies as powerful as Etruscan sculpture.

AMANDA enters with phone on long extension cord. She is spotted in the dim stage.

AMANDA. Ida Scott? This is Amanda Wingfield! We missed you at the D.A.R. last Monday! I said to myself: She’s probably suffering with that sinus condition! How is that sinus condition? Horrors! Heaven have mercy!—You’re a Christian martyr, yes, that’s what you are, a Christian martyr! Well, I just now happened to notice that your subscription to the Companion’s about to expire! Yes, it expires with the next issue, honey!—just when that wonderful new serial by Bessie Mae Hopper is getting off to such an exciting start. Oh, honey, it’s something that you can’t miss! You remember how Gone With the Wind took everybody by storm? You simply couldn’t go out if you hadn’t read it. All everybody talked was Scarlett O’Hara. Well, this is a book that critics already compare to Gone With the Wind. It’s the Gone With the Wind of the post-World War generation!—What?—Burning?—Oh, honey, don’t let them burn, go take a look in the oven and I’ll hold the wire! Heavens—I think she’s hung up!

(Dim Out.)

(Legend on Screen: “You Think I’m in Love with Continental Shoemakers?”)

Before the stage is lighted, the violent voices of TOM and AMANDA are heard. They are quarreling behind the portieres. In front of them stands LAURA with clenched bands and panicky expression.

A clear pool of light on her figure throughout this scene.

TOM. What in Christ’s name am I—

AMANDA (shrilly). Don’t you use that—

TOM. Supposed to do!

AMANDA. Expression! Not in my—

TOM. Ohhh!

AMANDA. Presence! Have you gone out of your senses?
TOM. I have, that’s true, driven out!
AMANDA. What is the matter with you, you—big—big—idiot!
TOM. Look—I’ve got no thing, no single thing—
AMANDA. Lower your voice!
TOM. In my life here that I can call my own! Everything is—
AMANDA. Stop that shouting!
TOM. Yesterday you confiscated my books! You had the nerve to—AMANDA. I took that horrible novel back to the library—yes! That hideous book by that insane Mr. Lawrence. (TOM laughs wildly. (TOM laughs still more wildly.) But I won’t allow such filth brought into my house! No, no, no, no, no!
TOM. House, house! Who pays rent on it, who makes a slave of himself to—AMANDA (fairly screeching). Don’t you dare to—TOM. No, no, I mustn’t say things! I’ve got to just—
AMANDA. Let me tell you—
TOM. I don’t want to hear any more! (He tears the portieres open. The upstage area is lit with a turgid smoky red glow.)

AMANDA’S hair is in metal curlers and she wears a very old bathrobe, much too large for her slight figure, a relic of the faithless MR. WINGFIELD. An upright typewriter and a wild disarray of manuscripts are on the dropleaf table. The quarrel was probably precipitated by AMANDA’S interruption of his creative labor. A chair lying overthrown on the floor. Their gesticulating shadows are cast on the ceiling by the fiery glow.

AMANDA. You will hear more, you—
TOM. No, I won’t hear more, I’m going out!
AMANDA. You come right back in—
TOM. Out, out, out! Because I’m—
AMANDA. Come back here, Tom Wingfield! I’m not through talking to you!
TOM. Oh, go—
LAURA (desperately). Tom!
AMANDA. You’re going to listen, and no more insolence from you! I’m at the end of my patience! (He comes back toward her.)
TOM. What do you think I’m at? Aren’t I supposed to have any patience to reach the end of, Mother? I know, I know. It seems unimportant to you, what I’m doing—what I want to do—having a little difference between them! You don’t think that—
AMANDA. I think you’ve been doing things that you’re ashamed of. That’s why you act like this. I don’t believe that you go every night to the movies. Nobody goes to the movies night after night. Nobody in their right minds goes to the movies as often as you pretend to. People don’t go to the movies at nearly midnight, and movies don’t let out at two A.M. Come in stumbling. Muttering to yourself like a maniac! You get three hours’ sleep and then go to work. Oh, I can picture the way you’re doing down there. Moping, doping, because you’re in no condition.
TOM (wildly). No, I’m in no condition!
AMANDA. What right have you got to jeopardize your job? Jeopardize the security of us all? How do you think we'd manage if you were—

TOM. Listen! You think I'm crazy about the warehouse? (He bends fiercely toward her slight figure.) You think I'm in love with the Continental Shoemakers? You think I want to spend fifty-five years down there in that—celotex interior! with—fluorescent—tubes! Look! I'd rather somebody picked up a crowbar and battered out my brains—than go back mornings! I go! Every time you come in yelling that God damn “Rise and Shine!” “Rise and Shine!” I say to myself “How lucky dead people are!” But I get up. I go! For sixty-five dollars a month I give up all that I dream of doing and being ever! And you say self—self's all I ever think of. Why, listen, if self is what I thought of, Mother, I'd be where he is—GONE! (Pointing to father's picture.) As far as the system of transportation reaches! (He starts past her. She grabs his arm.) Don't grab at me, Mother!

AMANDA. Where are you going?

TOM. I'm going to the movies!

AMANDA. I don't believe that lie!

TOM (crouching toward her, overtopping her tiny figure. She backs away, gasping). I'm going to opium dens! Yes, opium dens, dens of vice and criminals' hang-outs, Mother. I've joined the Hogan gang, I'm a hired assassin, I carry a tommy-gun in a violin case! I run a string of cat-houses in the Valley! They call me Killer, Killer Wingfield, I'm leading a double-life, a simple, honest warehouse worker by day, by night a dynamic czar of the underworld, Mother. I go to gambling casinos, I spin away fortunes on the roulette table! I wear a patch over one eye and a false mustache, sometimes I put on green whiskers. On those occasions they call me—El Diablo! Oh, I could tell you things to make you sleepless! My enemies plan to dynamite this place. They're going to blow us all sky-high some night! I'll be glad, very happy, and so will you! You'll go up, up on a broomstick, over Blue Mountain with seventeen gentlemen callers! You ugly—babbling old—witch. . . . (He goes through a series of violent, clumsy movements, seizing his overcoat, lunging to the door, pulling it fiercely open. The women watch him, aghast. His arm catches in the sleeve of the coat as he struggles to pull it on. For a moment he is pinioned by the bulky garment. With an outraged groan he tears the coat off again, splitting the shoulders of it, and hurls it across the room. It strikes against the shelf of Laura's glass collection, there is a tinkle of shattering glass. LAURA cries out as if wounded.)

(Music Legend: “The Glass Menagerie.”)

LAURA (sbrilly). My glass!—menagerie. . . . (She covers her face and turns away.)

But AMANDA is still stunned and stupefied by the “ugly witch” so that she barely notices this occurrence. Now she recovers her speech.

AMANDA (in an awful voice). I won't speak to you—until you apologize! (She crosses through portieres and draws them together behind her.)
TOM is left with LAURA. LAURA clings weakly to the mantel with her face averted. TOM stares at her stupidly for a moment. Then he crosses to shelf. Drops awkwardly to bis knees to collect the fallen glass, glancing at LAURA as if he would speak but couldn’t.

“The Glass Menagerie” steals in as
(The Scene Dims Out.)

Scene IV

The interior is dark. Faint light in the alley.

A deep-voiced bell in a church is tolling the hour of five as the scene commences.

TOM appears at the top of the alley. After each solemn boom of the bell in the tower, he shakes a little noise-maker or rattle as if to express the tiny spasm of man in contrast to the sustained power and dignity of the Almighty. This and the unsteadiness of bis advance make it evident that he has been drinking.

As he climbs the few steps to the fire-escape landing light steals up inside. LAURA appears in night-dress, observing TOM’S empty bed in the front room.

TOM fishes in bis pockets for the door-key, removing a motley assortment of articles in the search, including a perfect shower of movie-ticket stubs and an empty bottle. At last he finds the key, but just as he is about to insert it, it slips from his fingers. He strikes a match and crouches below the door.

TOM (bitterly). One crack—and it falls through!

LAURA opens the door.

LAURA. Tom! Tom, what are you doing?
TOM. Looking for a door-key.
LAURA. Where have you been all this time?
TOM. I have been to the movies.
LAURA. All this time at the movies?
TOM. There was a very long program. There was a Garbo picture and a Mickey Mouse and a travelogue and a newsreel and a preview of coming attractions. And there was an organ solo and a collection for the milk-fund—simultaneously—which ended up in a terrible fight between a fat lady and an usher!

LAURA (innocently). Did you have to stay through everything?
TOM. Of course! And, oh, I forgot! There was a big stage show! The headliner on this stage show was Malvolio the Magician. He performed wonderful tricks, many of them, such as pouring water back and forth between pitchers. First it turned to wine and then it turned to beer and then it turned to whiskey. I know it was whiskey it finally turned into because he needed somebody to come up out of the audience to help him, and I came up—both shows! It was Kentucky Straight Bourbon. A very generous fellow, he gave souvenirs. (He pulls from bis back pocket a shimmering rainbow-colored scarf.) He gave me this. This is his magic scarf. You can have it, Laura. You wave it over a canary cage and you get a bowl of gold-fish. You wave it over the gold-fish bowl and they fly away canaries. . . . But the wonderfulllest trick of all was the coffin trick. We nailed him into a coffin and he got out of the coffin without removing one nail. (He has come inside.) There is a trick that would come in handy for me—get me out of this 2 by 4 situation! (Flops onto bed and starts removing shoes.)

LAURA. Tom—Shhh!
TOM. What you shushing me for?
LAURA. You’ll wake up Mother.
TOM. Goody, goody! Pay ’er back for all those “Rise an’ Shines.” (Lies down, groaning.) You know it don’t take much intelligence to get yourself into a nailed-up coffin, Laura. But who in hell ever got himself out of one without removing one nail?

As if in answer, the father’s grinning photograph lights up.

(Scene Dims Out.)

Immediately following: The church bell is heard striking six. At the sixth stroke the alarm clock goes off in AMANDA’S room, and after a few moments we hear her calling: “Rise and Shine! Rise and Shine! LAURA, go tell your brother to rise and shine!”

TOM (sitting up slowly). I’ll rise—but I won’t shine.

The light increases.

AMANDA. Laura, tell your brother his coffee is ready.

LAURA slips into front room.

AMANDA. Laura, are you going to do what I asked you to do, or do I have to get dressed and go out myself?

LAURA. Mother, they make such faces when I do that.

AMANDA. Sticks and stones may break my bones, but the expression on Mr. Garfinkel’s face won’t harm us! Tell your brother his coffee is getting cold.

LAURA. Going, going—soon as I get on my coat! (She pulls on a shapeless felt hat with nervous, jerky movement, pleadingly glancing at TOM. Rushes awkwardly for coat. The coat is one of AMANDA’S, inaccurately made-over, the sleeves too short for LAURA.) Butter and what else?

AMANDA (entering upstage). Just butter. Tell them to charge it.

LAURA. Do what I asked you, will you, will you, Tom?

He looks sullenly away.

AMANDA. Laura, go now or just don’t go at all!

LAURA (rushing out). Going—going! (A second later she cries out. TOM springs up and crosses to the door. AMANDA rushes anxiously in. TOM opens the door.)
TOM. Laura?

LAURA. I’m all right. I slipped, but I’m all right.

AMANDA (peering anxiously after her). If anyone breaks a leg on those fire-escape steps, the landlord ought to be sued for every cent he possesses! (She shuts door. Remembers she isn’t speaking and returns to other room.)

As TOM enters listlessly for his coffee, she turns her back to him and stands rigidly facing the window on the gloomy gray vault of the areaway. Its light on her face with its aged but childish features is cruelly sharp, satirical as a Daumier print.

(Music Under: “Ave Maria.”)

TOM glances sheepishly but sullenly at her averted figure and slumps at the table. The coffee is scalding hot; he sips it and gasps and spits it back in the cup. At his gasp, AMANDA catches her breath and half turns. Then catches herself and turns back to window.

TOM blows on his coffee, glancing sidewise at his mother. She clears her throat. TOM clears his. He starts to rise. Sinks back down again, scratches his head, clears his throat again. AMANDA coughs. TOM raises his cup in both bands to blow on it, his eyes staring over the rim of it at his mother for several moments. Then he slowly sets the cup down and awkwardly and hesitantly rises from the chair.

TOM (boarsely). Mother. I—I apologize, Mother. (AMANDA draws a quick, shuddering breath. Her face works grotesquely. She breaks into childlike tears.) I’m sorry for what I said, for everything that I said, I didn’t mean it.

AMANDA (sobbingly). My devotion has made me a witch and so I make myself hateful to my children!

TOM. No you don’t.

AMANDA. I worry so much, don’t sleep, it makes me nervous!

TOM (gently). I understand that.

AMANDA. I’ve had to put up a solitary battle all these years. But you’re my right-hand bower! Don’t fall down, don’t fail!

TOM (gently). I try, Mother.

AMANDA (with great enthusiasm). Try and you will succeed! (The notion makes her breathless.) Why, you—you’re just full of natural endowments! Both of my children—they’re unusual children! Don’t you think I know it? I’m so—proud! Happy and—if I’ve—so much to be thankful for but—Promise me one thing, son!

TOM. What, Mother?

AMANDA. Promise, son, you’ll—never be a drunkard!

TOM (turns to her grinning). I will never be a drunkard, Mother.

AMANDA. That’s what frightened me so, that you’d be drinking! Eat a bowl of Purina!

TOM. Just coffee, Mother.

AMANDA. Shredded wheat biscuit?

TOM. No. No, Mother, just coffee.

AMANDA. You can’t put in a day’s work on an empty stomach. You’ve got ten minutes—don’t gulp! Drinking too-hot liquids makes cancer of the stomach. . . . Put cream in.

TOM. No, thank you.

AMANDA. To cool it.
TOM. No! No, thank you, I want it black.

AMANDA. I know, but it’s not good for you. We have to do all that we can to build ourselves up. In these trying times we live in, all that we have to cling to is—each other. . . . That’s why it’s so important to—Tom, I—I sent out your sister so I could discuss something with you. If you hadn’t spoken I would have spoken to you. (Sits down.)

TOM (gently). What is it, Mother, that you want to discuss?

AMANDA. Laura!

TOM puts his cup down slowly.

(Music: “The Glass Menagerie.”)

TOM. —Oh.—Laura . . .

AMANDA (touching his sleeve). You know how Laura is. So quiet but—still water runs deep! She notices things and I think she—broods about them. (TOM looks up.) A few days ago I came in and she was crying.

TOM. What about?

AMANDA. You.

TOM. Me?

AMANDA. She has an idea that you’re not happy here.

TOM. What gave her that idea?

AMANDA. What gives her any idea? However, you do act strangely. I—I’m not criticizing, understand that! I know your ambitions do not lie in the warehouse, that like everybody in the whole wide world—you’ve had to—make sacrifices, but—Tom—Tom—life’s not easy, it calls for—Spartan endurance! There’s so many things in my heart that I cannot describe to you! I’ve never told you but I—loved your father. . . .

TOM (gently). I know that, Mother.

AMANDA. And you—when I see you taking after his ways! Staying out late—and—well, you bad been drinking the night you were in that—terrifying condition! Laura says that you hate the apartment and that you go out nights to get away from it! Is that true, Tom?

TOM. No. You say there’s so much in your heart that you can’t describe to me. That’s true of me, too. There’s so much in my heart that I can’t describe to you! So let’s respect each other’s—

AMANDA. But, why—why, Tom—are you always so restless? Where do you go to, nights?

TOM. I—go to the movies.

AMANDA. Why do you go to the movies so much, Tom?

TOM. I go to the movies because—I like adventure. Adventure is something I don’t have much of at work, so I go to the movies.

AMANDA. But, Tom, you go to the movies entirely too much!

TOM. I like a lot of adventure.

AMANDA looks baffled, then hurt. As the familiar inquisition resumes he becomes hard and impatient again. AMANDA slips back into her querulous attitude toward him.

(Image on Screen: Sailing Vessel with Jolly Roger.)

AMANDA. Most young men find adventure in their careers.

TOM. Then most young men are not employed in a warehouse.

AMANDA. The world is full of young men employed in warehouses and offices and factories.
TOM. Do all of them find adventure in their careers?
AMANDA. They do or they do without it! Not everybody has a craze for adventure.
TOM. Man is by instinct a lover, a hunter, a fighter, and none of those instincts are given much play at the warehouse!
AMANDA. Man is by instinct! Don’t quote instinct to me! Instinct is something that people have got away from! It belongs to animals! Christian adults don’t want it!
TOM. What do Christian adults want, then, Mother?
AMANDA. Superior things! Things of the mind and the spirit! Only animals have to satisfy instincts! Surely your aims are somewhat higher than theirs! Than monkeys—pigs—
TOM. I reckon they’re not.
AMANDA. You’re joking. However, that isn’t what I wanted to discuss.
TOM (rising). I haven’t much time.
AMANDA (pushing his shoulders). Sit down.
TOM. You want me to punch in red at the warehouse, Mother?
AMANDA. You have five minutes. I want to talk about Laura.

(Legend: “Plans and Provisions.”)

TOM. All right! What about Laura?
AMANDA. We have to be making plans and provisions for her. She’s older than you, two years, and nothing has happened. She just drifts along doing nothing. It frightens me terribly how she just drifts along.
TOM. I guess she’s the type that people call home girls.
AMANDA. There’s no such type, and if there is, it’s a pity! That is unless the home is hers, with a husband!
TOM. What?
AMANDA. Oh, I can see the handwriting on the wall as plain as I see the nose in the front of my face! It’s terrifying! More and more you remind me of your father! He was out all hours without explanation—Then left! Goodbye! And me with the bag to hold. I saw that letter you got from the Merchant Marine. I know what you’re dreaming of. I’m not standing here blindfolded. Very well, then. Then do it! But not till there’s somebody to take your place.
TOM. What do you mean?
AMANDA. I mean that as soon as Laura has got somebody to take care of her, married, a home of her own, independent—why, then you’ll be free to go wherever you please, on land, on sea, whichever way the wind blows! But until that time you’ve got to look out for your sister. I don’t say me because I’m old and don’t matter! I say for your sister because she’s young and dependent. I put her in business college—a dismal failure! Frightened her so it made her sick to her stomach. I took her over to the Young People’s League at the church. Another fiasco. She spoke to nobody, nobody spoke to her. Now all she does is fool with those pieces of glass and play those worn-out records. What kind of a life is that for a girl to lead!
TOM. What can I do about it?
AMANDA. Overcome selfishness! Self, self, self is all that you ever think of! (TOM springs up and crosses to get his coat. It is ugly and bulky. He pulls on a cap with earmuffs.) Where is your muffler? Put your wool muffler on! (He snatches it angrily from the closet and tosses it around his neck and pulls both ends tight.) Tom! I haven’t said what I had in mind to ask you.
Scene V

TOM. I’m too late to—

AMANDA (catching his arms—very impatiently. Then shyly). Down at the warehouse, aren’t there some—nice young men?

TOM. No!

AMANDA. There must be—some.

TOM. Mother—

Gesture.

AMANDA. Find out one that’s clean-living—doesn’t drink and—ask him out for sister!

TOM. What?

AMANDA. For sister! To meet! Get acquainted!

TOM (stamping to door). Oh, my go-osh!

AMANDA. Will you? (He opens door. Imploringly.) Will you? (He starts down.) Will you? Will you dear?

TOM (calling back). YES!

AMANDA closes the door hesitantly and with a troubled but faintly hopeful expression.

(Screen Image: Glamor Magazine Cover.)

Spot AMANDA at phone.

AMANDA. Ella Cartwright? This is Amanda Wingfield! How are you honey? How is that kidney condition? (Count five.) Horrors! (Count five.) You’re a Christian martyr, yes, honey, that’s what you are, a Christian martyr! Well, I just happened to notice in my little red book that your subscription to the Companion has just run out! I knew that you wouldn’t want to miss out on the wonderful serial starting in this new issue. It’s by Bessie Mae Hopper, the first thing she’s written since Honeymoon for Three. Wasn’t that a strange and interesting story? Well, this one is even lovelier, I believe. It has a sophisticated society background. It’s all about the horsey set on Long Island!

(Fade Out.)

Scene V

(Legend on Screen: “Annunciation.”) Fade with music.

It is early dusk of a spring evening. Supper has just been finished at the Wingfield apartment. AMANDA and LAURA in light-colored dresses are removing dishes from the table, in the upstage area, which is shadowy, their movements formalized almost as a dance or ritual, their moving forms as pale and silent as moths.

TOM, in white shirt and trousers, rises from the table and crosses toward the fire-escape.

AMANDA (as he passes her). Son, will you do me a favor?

TOM. What?
AMANDA. Comb your hair! You look so pretty when your hair is combed!
(TOM slouches on sofa with evening paper. Enormous caption “Franco Triumphs.”) There is only one respect in which I would like you to emulate your father.

TOM. What respect is that?

AMANDA. The care he always took of his appearance. He never allowed himself to look untidy. (He throws down the paper and crosses to fire-escape.) Where are you going?

TOM. I'm going out to smoke.

AMANDA. You smoke too much. A pack a day at fifteen cents a pack. How much would that amount to in a month? Thirty times fifteen is how much, Tom? Figure it out and you will be astounded at what you could save. Enough to give you a night-school course in accounting at Washington U! Just think what a wonderful thing that would be for you, son!

TOM is unmovèd by the thought.

TOM. I'd rather smoke. (He steps out on landing, letting the screen door slam.)

AMANDA (sharply). I know! That's the tragedy of it. . . . (Alone, she turns to look at her husband's picture.)

(Dance Music: “All the World Is Waiting for the Sunrise!”)

TOM (to the audience). Across the alley from us was the Paradise Dance Hall. On evenings in spring the windows and doors were open and the music came outdoors. Sometimes the lights were turned out except for a large glass sphere that hung from the ceiling. It would turn slowly about and filter the dusk with delicate rainbow colors. Then the orchestra played a waltz or a tango, something that had a slow and sensuous rhythm. Couples would come outside, to the relative privacy of the alley. You could see them kissing behind ashpits and telephone poles. This was the compensation for lives that passed like mine, without any change or adventure. Adventure and change were imminent in this year. They were waiting around the corner for all these kids. Suspended in the mist over Berchtesgaden, caught in the folds of Chamberlain’s umbrella—In Spain there was Guernica! But here there was only hot swing music and liquor, dance halls, bars, and movies, and sex that hung in the gloom like a chandelier and flooded the world with brief, deceptive rainbows. . . . All the world was waiting for bombardments!

AMANDA turns from the picture and comes outside.

AMANDA (sighing). A fire-escape landing’s a poor excuse for a porch. (She spreads a newspaper on a step and sits down, gracefully and demurely as if she were settling into a swing on a Mississippi veranda.) What are you looking at?

TOM. The moon.

AMANDA. Is there a moon this evening?

TOM. It’s rising over Garfinkel’s Delicatessen.

AMANDA. So it is! A little silver slipper of a moon. Have you made a wish on it yet?

TOM. Um-hum.
AMANDA. What did you wish for?
TOM. That’s a secret.
AMANDA. A secret, huh? Well, I won’t tell mine either. I will be just as mys-\[\text{\textcopyright\textregistered}1944, 1946 by Tennessee Williams.]
erious as you.
TOM. I bet I can guess what yours is.
AMANDA. Is my head so transparent?
TOM. You’re not a sphinx.
AMANDA. No, I don’t have secrets. I’ll tell you what I wished for on the moon.
Success and happiness for my precious children! I wish for that whenever there’s a moon, and when there isn’t a moon, I wish for it, too.
TOM. I thought perhaps you wished for a gentleman caller.
AMANDA. Why do you say that?
TOM. Don’t you remember asking me to fetch one?
AMANDA. I remember suggesting that it would be nice for your sister if you brought some nice young man from the warehouse. I think I’ve made that suggestion more than once.
TOM. Yes, you have made it repeatedly.
AMANDA. Well?
TOM. We are going to have one.
AMANDA. What?
TOM. A gentleman caller!

(The Annunciation Is Celebrated with Music.)

AMANDA rises.

(Image on Screen: Caller with Bouquet.)

AMANDA. You mean you have asked some nice young man to come over?
TOM. Yep. I’ve asked him to dinner.
AMANDA. You really did?
TOM. I did!
AMANDA. You did, and did he—accept?
TOM. He did!
AMANDA. Well, well—well, well! That’s—lovely!
TOM. I thought that you would be pleased.
AMANDA. It’s definite, then?
TOM. Very definite.
AMANDA. Soon?
TOM. Very soon.
AMANDA. For heaven’s sake, stop putting on and tell me some things, will you?
TOM. What things do you want me to tell you?
AMANDA. Naturally I would like to know when he’s coming!
TOM. He’s coming tomorrow.
AMANDA. Tomorrow?
TOM. Yep. Tomorrow.
AMANDA. But, Tom!
TOM. Yes, Mother?
AMANDA. Tomorrow gives me no time!
TOM. Time for what?
AMANDA. Preparations! Why didn’t you phone me at once, as soon as you asked him, the minute that he accepted? Then, don’t you see, I could have been getting ready!
TOM. You don’t have to make any fuss.
AMANDA. Oh, Tom, Tom, Tom, of course I have to make a fuss! I want things nice, not sloppy! Not thrown together. I’ll certainly have to do some fast thinking, won’t I?

TOM. I don’t see why you have to think at all.

AMANDA. You just don’t know. We can’t have a gentleman caller in a pigsty! All my wedding silver has to be polished, the monogrammed table linen ought to be laundered! The windows have to be washed and fresh curtains put up. And how about clothes? We have to wear something, don’t we?

TOM. Mother, this boy is no one to make a fuss over!

AMANDA. Do you realize he’s the first young man we’ve introduced to your sister? It’s terrible, dreadful, disgraceful that poor little sister has never received a single gentleman caller! Tom, come inside! (She opens the screen door.)

TOM. What for?

AMANDA. I want to ask you some things.

TOM. If you’re going to make such a fuss, I’ll call it off, I’ll tell him not to come.

AMANDA. You certainly won’t do anything of the kind. Nothing offends people worse than broken engagements. It simply means I’ll have to work like a Turk! We won’t be brilliant, but we’ll pass inspection. Come on inside. (TOM follows, groaning.) Sit down.

TOM. Any particular place you would like me to sit?

AMANDA. Thank heavens I’ve got that new sofa! I’m also making payments on a floor lamp I’ll have sent out! And put the chintz covers on, they’ll brighten things up! Of course I’d hoped to have these walls repapered. . . . What is the young man’s name?

TOM. His name is O’Connor.

AMANDA. That, of course, means fish—tomorrow is Friday! I’ll have that salmon loaf—with Durkee’s dressing! What does he do? He works at the warehouse?

TOM. Of course! How else would I—

AMANDA. Tom, he—doesn’t drink?

TOM. Why do you ask me that?

AMANDA. Your father did!

TOM. Don’t get started on that!

AMANDA. He does drink, then?

TOM. Not that I know of!

AMANDA. Make sure, be certain! The last thing I want for my daughter’s a boy who drinks!

TOM. Aren’t you being a little premature? Mr. O’Connor has not yet appeared on the scene!

AMANDA. But will tomorrow. To meet your sister, and what do I know about his character? Nothing! Old maids are better off than wives of drunkards!

TOM. Oh, my God!

AMANDA. Be still!

TOM (leaning forward to whisper). Lots of fellows meet girls whom they don’t marry!

AMANDA. Oh, talk sensibly, Tom—and don’t be sarcastic! (She has gotten a hairbrush.)

TOM. What are you doing?
AMANDA. I’m brushing that cow-lick down! What is this young man’s position at the warehouse?
TOM (submitting grimly to the brush and the interrogation). This young man’s position is that of a shipping clerk, Mother.
AMANDA. Sounds to me like a fairly responsible job, the sort of a job you would be in if you just had more get-up. What is his salary? Have you got any idea?
TOM. I would judge it to be approximately eighty-five dollars a month.
AMANDA. Well—not princely, but—
TOM. Twenty more than I make.
AMANDA. Yes, how well I know! But for a family man, eighty-five dollars a month is not much more than you can just get by on. . . .
TOM. Yes, but Mr. O’Connor is not a family man.
AMANDA. He might be, mightn’t he? Some time in the future?
TOM. I see. Plans and provisions.
AMANDA. You are the only man that I know of who ignores the fact that the future becomes the present, the present the past, and the past turns into everlasting regret if you don’t plan for it!
TOM. I will think that over and see what I can make of it.
AMANDA. Don’t be supercilious with your mother! Tell me some more about this—what do you call him?
TOM. James D. O’Connor. The D. is for Delaney.
AMANDA. Irish on both sides! Gracious! And doesn’t drink?
TOM. Shall I call him up and ask him right this minute?
AMANDA. The only way to find out about those things is to make discreet inquiries at the proper moment. When I was a girl in Blue Mountain and it was suspected that a young man drank, the girl whose attentions he had been receiving, if any girl was, would sometimes speak to the minister of his church, or rather her father would if her father was living, and sort of feel him out on the young man’s character. That is the way such things are discreetly handled to keep a young woman from making a tragic mistake!
TOM. Then how did you happen to make a tragic mistake?
AMANDA. That innocent look of your father’s had everyone fooled! He smiled—the world was enchanted! No girl can do worse than put herself at the mercy of a handsome appearance! I hope that Mr. O’Connor is not too good-looking.
TOM. No, he’s not too good-looking. He’s covered with freckles and hasn’t too much of a nose.
AMANDA. He’s not right-down homely, though?
TOM. Not right-down homely. Just medium homely, I’d say.
AMANDA. Character’s what to look for in a man.
TOM. That’s what I’ve always said, Mother.
AMANDA. You’ve never said anything of the kind and I suspect you would never give it a thought.
TOM. Don’t be suspicious of me.
AMANDA. At least I hope he’s the type that’s up and coming.
TOM. I think he really goes in for self-improvement.
AMANDA. What reason have you to think so?
TOM. He goes to night school.
AMANDA (beaming). Splendid! What does he do, I mean study?
TOM. Radio engineering and public speaking!
AMANDA. Then he has visions of being advanced in the world! Any young man who studies public speaking is aiming to have an executive job some day! And radio engineering? A thing for the future! Both of these facts are very illuminating. Those are the sort of things that a mother should know concerning any young man who comes to call on her daughter. Seriously or—not.

TOM. One little warning. He doesn’t know about Laura. I didn’t let on that we had dark ulterior motives. I just said, why don’t you come have dinner with us? He said okay and that was the whole conversation.
AMANDA. I bet it was! You’re eloquent as an oyster. However, he’ll know about Laura when he gets here. When he sees how lovely and sweet and pretty she is, he’ll thank his lucky stars he was asked to dinner.

TOM. Mother, you mustn’t expect too much of Laura.
AMANDA. What do you mean?
TOM. Laura seems all those things to you and me because she’s ours and we love her. We don’t even notice she’s crippled any more.
AMANDA. Don’t say crippled! You know that I never allow that word to be used!
TOM. But face facts, Mother. She is and—that’s not all—
AMANDA. What do you mean “not all”?
TOM. Laura is very different from other girls.
AMANDA. I think the difference is all to her advantage.
TOM. Not quite all—in the eyes of others—strangers—she’s terribly shy and lives in a world of her own and those things make her seem a little peculiar to people outside the house.
AMANDA. Don’t say peculiar.
TOM. Face the facts. She is.

(The Dance-Hall Music Changes to a Tango that Has a Minor and Somewhat Ominous Tone.)

AMANDA. In what way is she peculiar—may I ask?
TOM (gently). She lives in a world of her own—a world of—little glass ornaments, Mother. . . . (Gets up, AMANDA remains holding brush, looking at him, troubled.) She plays old phonograph records and—that’s about all—(He glances at himself in the mirror and crosses to door.)
AMANDA (sharply). Where are you going?
TOM. I’m going to the movies. (Out screen door.)
AMANDA looks worriedly after him for a moment. Then vitality and optimism return and she turns from the door. Crossing to portieres.

LAURA. Yes, Mother.
AMANDA. Let those dishes go and come in front! (LAURA appears with dish towel. Gaily.) Laura, come here and make a wish on the moon!
LAURA (entering). Moon—moon?
AMANDA. A little silver slipper of a moon. Look over your left shoulder, Laura, and make a wish! (LAURA looks faintly puzzled as if called out of sleep. AMANDA seizes her shoulders and turns her at an angle by the door.) Now! Now, darling, wish!
LAURA. What shall I wish for, Mother?

AMANDA (her voice trembling and her eyes suddenly filling with tears).

Happiness! Good Fortune!

The violin rises and the stage dims out.

Scene VI

(Image: High School Hero.)

TOM. And so the following evening I brought Jim home to dinner. I had known Jim slightly in high school. In high school Jim was a hero. He had tremendous Irish good nature and vitality with the scrubbed and polished look of white chinaware. He seemed to move in a continual spotlight. He was a star in basketball, captain of the debating club, president of the senior class and the glee club and he sang the male lead in the annual light operas. He was always running or bounding, never just walking. He seemed always at the point of defeating the law of gravity. He was shooting with such velocity through his adolescence that you would logically expect him to arrive at nothing short of the White House by the time he was thirty. But Jim apparently ran into more interference after his graduation from Soldan. His speed had definitely slowed. Six years after he left high school he was holding a job that wasn’t much better than mine.

(Image: Clerk.)

He was the only one at the warehouse with whom I was on friendly terms. I was valuable to him as someone who could remember his former glory, who had seen him win basketball games and the silver cup in debating. He knew of my secret practice of retiring to a cabinet of the washroom to work on poems when business was slack in the warehouse. He called me Shakespeare. And while the other boys in the warehouse regarded me with suspicious hostility, Jim took a humorous attitude toward me. Gradually his attitude affected the others, their hostility wore off and they also began to smile at me as people smile at an oddly fashioned dog who trots across their path at some distance.

I knew that Jim and Laura had known each other at Soldan, and I had heard Laura speak admiringly of his voice. I didn’t know if Jim remembered her or not. In high school Laura had been as unobtrusive as Jim had been astonishing. If he did remember Laura, it was not as my sister, for when I asked him to dinner, he grinned and said, “You know, Shakespeare, I never thought of you as having folks!”

He was about to discover that I did.

(Light up Stage.)

(Legend on Screen: “The Accent of a Coming Foot.”)

Friday evening. It is about five o’clock of a late spring evening which comes “scattering poems in the sky.”

A delicate lemony light is in the Wingfield apartment.

AMANDA has worked like a Turk in preparation for the gentleman caller. The results are astonishing. The new floor lamp with its rose-silk shade is in place, a colored paper lantern conceals the broken light fixture in the ceiling, new billowing white curtains are at the windows, chintz covers are on chairs and sofa, a pair of new sofa pillows make their initial appearance.

Open boxes and tissue paper are scattered on the floor.

Laura stands in the middle with lifted arms while Amanda crouches before her, adjusting the hem of the new dress, devout and ritualistic. The dress is colored and designed by memory. The arrangement of Laura’s hair is changed; it is softer and more becoming. A fragile, unearthly prettiness has come out in Laura: she is like a piece of translucent glass touched by light, given a momentary radiance, not actual, not lasting.

Amanda (impatiently). Why are you trembling?
Laura. Mother, you’ve made me so nervous!
Amanda. How have I made you nervous?
Laura. By all this fuss! You make it seem so important!
Amanda. I don’t understand you, Laura. You couldn’t be satisfied with just sitting home, and yet whenever I try to arrange something for you, you seem to resist it. (She gets up.) Now take a look at yourself. No, wait! Wait just a moment—I have an idea!
Laura. What is it now?

Amanda produces two powder puffs which she wraps in handkerchiefs and stuffs in Laura’s bosom.

Laura. Mother, what are you doing?
Amanda. They call them “Gay Deceivers”!
Laura. I won’t wear them!
Amanda. You will!
Laura. Why should I?
Amanda. Because, to be painfully honest, your chest is flat.
Laura. You make it seem like we were setting a trap.
Amanda. All pretty girls are a trap, a pretty trap, and men expect them to be. (Legend: “A Pretty Trap.”) Now look at yourself, young lady. This is the prettiest you will ever be! I’ve got to fix myself now! You’re going to be surprised by your mother’s appearance! (She crosses through portieres, humming gaily.)

Laura moves slowly to the long mirror and stares solemnly at herself.

A wind blows the white curtains inward in a slow, graceful motion and with a faint, sorrowful sighing.

Amanda (off stage). It isn’t dark enough yet. (She turns slowly before the mirror with a troubled look.)

(Legend on Screen: “This Is My Sister: Celebrate Her with Strings!” Music.)

Amanda (laughing, off). I’m going to show you something. I’m going to make a spectacular appearance!
Laura. What is it, Mother?
Amanda. Possess your soul in patience—you will see! Something I’ve resurrected from that old trunk! Styles haven’t changed so terribly much after all. . . . (She parts the portieres.) Now just look at your mother!
She wears a girlish frock of yellowed voile with a blue silk sash. She carries a bunch of jonquils—the legend of her youth is nearly revived. Feverishly.

This is the dress in which I led the cotillion. Won the cakewalk twice at Sunset Hill, wore one spring to the Governor's ball in Jackson! See how I sashayed around the ballroom, Laura? (She raises her skirt and does a mincing step around the room.) I wore it on Sundays for my gentlemen callers! I had it on the day I met your father—I had malaria fever all that spring. The change of climate from East Tennessee to the Delta—weakened resistance—I had a little temperature all the time—not enough to be serious—just enough to make me restless and giddy! Invitations poured in—parties all over the Delta!—“stay in bed,” said Mother, “you have fever!”—but I just wouldn’t.—I took quinine but kept on going, going!—Evenings, dances!—Afternoons, long, long rides! Picnics—lovely!—So lovely, that country in May.—All lacy with dogwood, literally flooded with jonquils!—That was the spring I had the craze for jonquils. Jonquils became an absolute obsession. Mother said, “Honey, there’s no more room for jonquils.” And still I kept bringing in more jonquils. Whenever, wherever I saw them, I’d say, “Stop! Stop! I see jonquils!” I made the young men help me gather the jonquils! It was a joke, Amanda and her jonquils! Finally there were no more vases to hold them, every available space was filled with jonquils. No vases to hold them? All right, I’ll hold them myself! And then I—(She stops in front of the picture. Music.) I hope they get here before it starts to rain. (She crosses upstage and places the jonquils in bowl on table.) I gave your brother a little extra change so he and Mr. O’Connor could take the service car home.

LAURA (with altered look). What did you say his name was?

AMANDA. O’Connor.

LAURA. What is his first name?

AMANDA. I don’t remember. Oh, yes, I do. It was—Jim!

LAURA sways slightly and catches hold of a chair. (Legend on Screen: “Not Jim!”)

LAURA (faintly). Not—Jim!

AMANDA. Yes, that was it, it was Jim! I’ve never known a Jim that wasn’t nice!

(Music: Ominous.)

LAURA. Are you sure his name is Jim O’Connor?

AMANDA. Yes. Why?

LAURA. Is he the one that Tom used to know in high school?

AMANDA. He didn’t say so. I think he just got to know him at the warehouse.

LAURA. There was a Jim O’Connor we both knew in high school—(Then, with effort.) If that is the one that Tom is bringing to dinner—you’ll have to excuse me, I won’t come to the table.

AMANDA. What sort of nonsense is this?

LAURA. You asked me once if I’d ever liked a boy. Don’t you remember I showed you this boy’s picture?

AMANDA. You mean the boy you showed me in the year-book?
LAURA. Yes, that boy.
AMANDA. Laura, Laura, were you in love with that boy?
LAURA. I don’t know, Mother. All I know is I couldn’t sit at the table if it was him!
AMANDA. It won’t be him! It isn’t the least bit likely. But whether it is or not, you will come to the table. You will not be excused.
LAURA. I’ll have to be, Mother.
AMANDA. I don’t intend to humor your silliness, Laura. I’ve had too much from you and your brother, both! So just sit down and compose yourself till they come. Tom has forgotten his key so you’ll have to let them in, when they arrive.

LAURA (panicky). Oh, Mother—you answer the door!
AMANDA (lightly). I’ll be in the kitchen—busy!
LAURA. Oh, Mother, please answer the door, don’t make me do it!
AMANDA (crossing into kitchenette). I’ve got to fix the dressing for the salmon. Fuss, fuss—silliness!—over a gentleman caller!

Door swings shut. LAURA is left alone.

(Legend: “Terror!”)
She utters a low moan and turns off the lamp—sits stiffly on the edge of the sofa, knotting her fingers together.

(Legend on Screen: “The Opening of a Door!”)
TOM and JIM appear on the fire-escape steps and climb to landing. Hearing their approach, LAURA rises with a panicky gesture. She retreats to the portieres.
The doorbell. LAURA catches her breath and touches her throat. Low drums.

AMANDA (calling). Laura, sweetheart! The door!
LAURA stares at it without moving.

JIM. I think we just beat the rain.
TOM. Uh-huh. (He rings again, nervously. JIM whistles and fishes for a cigarette.)

AMANDA (very, very gaily). Laura, that is your brother and Mr. O’Connor! Will you let them in, darling?

LAURA crosses toward kitchenette door.
LAURA (breathlessly). Mother—you go to the door!

AMANDA steps out of kitchenette and stares furiously at LAURA. She points imperiously at the door.

LAURA. Please, please!
AMANDA (in a fierce whisper). What is the matter with you, you silly thing?
LAURA (desperately). Please, you answer it, please!
AMANDA. I told you I wasn’t going to humor you, Laura. Why have you chosen this moment to lose your mind?

LAURA. Please, please, please, you go!
AMANDA. You’ll have to go to the door because I can’t!
LAURA (despairingly). I can’t either!
AMANDA. Why?
LAURA. I’m sick!
AMANDA. I’m sick, too—of your nonsense! Why can’t you and your brother be normal people? Fantastic whims and behavior! (TOM gives a long ring.) Preposterous goings on! Can you give me one reason—(Calls out lyrically.) COMING! JUST ONE SECOND!—why should you be afraid to open a door? Now you answer it, Laura!

LAURA. Oh, oh, oh . . . (She returns through the portieres. Darts to the victrola and winds it frantically and turns it on.)

AMANDA. Laura Wingfield, you march right to that door!

LAURA. Yes—yes, Mother!

_A faraway, scratchy rendition of _dardanella_ softens the air and gives her strength to move through it. She slips to the door and draws it cautiously open._

TOM enters with caller, JIM O’CONNOR.

TOM. Laura, this is Jim. Jim, this is my sister, Laura.

JIM (stepping inside). I didn’t know that Shakespeare had a sister!

LAURA (retreating stiff and trembling from the door). How—how do you do?

JIM (heartily extending his hand). Okay!

LAURA touches it hesitantly with hers.

JIM. Your hand’s cold, Laura!

LAURA. Yes, well—I’ve been playing the victrola. . . .

JIM. Must have been playing classical music on it! You ought to play a little hot swing music to warm you up!

LAURA. Excuse me—I haven’t finished playing the victrola. . . .

_She turns awkwardly and burries into the front room. She pauses a second by the victrola. Then catches her breath and darts through the portieres like a frightened deer._

JIM (grinning). What was the matter?

TOM. Oh—with Laura? Laura is—terribly shy.

JIM. Shy, huh? It’s unusual to meet a shy girl nowadays. I don’t believe you ever mentioned you had a sister.

TOM. Well, now you know. I have one. Here is the _Post Dispatch_. You want a piece of it?

JIM. Uh-huh.

TOM. What piece? The comics?

JIM. Sports! (_Glances at it_) Ole Dizzy Dean is on his bad behavior.

TOM (disinterest). Yeah? (_Lights cigarette and crosses back to fire-escape door._)

JIM. Where are you going?

TOM. I’m going out on the terrace.

JIM (goes after him). You know, Shakespeare—I’m going to sell you a bill of goods!

TOM. What goods?

JIM. A course I’m taking.

TOM. Huh?

JIM. In public speaking! You and me, we’re not the warehouse type.

TOM. Thanks—that’s good news. But what has public speaking got to do with it?
JIM. It fits you for—executive positions!
TOM. Awww.
JIM. I tell you it’s done a helluva lot for me.

(Image: Executive at Desk.)

TOM. In what respect?
JIM. In every! Ask yourself what is the difference between you an’ me and men in the office down front? Brains?—No!—Ability?—No! Then what? Just one little thing—
TOM. What is that one little thing?
JIM. Primarily it amounts to—social poise! Being able to square up to people and hold your own on any social level!

AMANDA (off stage). Tom?
TOM. Yes, Mother?
AMANDA. Is that you and Mr. O’Connor?
TOM. Yes, Mother.
AMANDA. Well, you just make yourselves comfortable in there.
TOM. Yes, Mother.
AMANDA. Ask Mr. O’Connor if he would like to wash his hands.
JIM. Aw—no—no—thank you—I took care of that at the warehouse. Tom—
TOM. Yes?
JIM. Mr. Mendoza was speaking to me about you.
TOM. Favorably?
JIM. What do you think?
TOM. Well—
JIM. You’re going to be out of a job if you don’t wake up.
TOM. I am waking up—
JIM. You show no signs.
TOM. The signs are interior.

(Image on Screen: The Sailing Vessel with Jolly Roger Again.)

TOM. I’m planning to change. (He leans over the rail speaking with quiet exhilaration. The incandescent marquees and signs of the first-run movie houses light his face from across the alley. He looks like a voyager.) I’m right at the point of committing myself to a future that doesn’t include the warehouse and Mr. Mendoza or even a night-school course in public speaking.

JIM. What are you gassing about?
TOM. I’m tired of the movies.
JIM. Movies!
TOM. Yes, movies! Look at them—(a wave toward the marvells of Grand Avenue.) All of those glamorous people—having adventures—hogging it all, gobbling the whole thing up! You know what happens? People go to the movies instead of moving! Hollywood characters are supposed to have all the adventures for everybody in America, while everybody in America sits in a dark room and watches them have them! Yes, until there’s a war. That’s when adventure becomes available to the masses! Everyone’s dish, not only Gable’s! Then the people in the dark room come out of the dark room to have some adventures themselves—Goody, goody—It’s our turn now, to go to the South Sea Island—to make a safari—to be exotic, far-off—But I'm not patient. I don't want to wait till then. I'm tired of the movies and I am about to move!

Jim (incredulously). Move?

Tom. Yes.

Jim. When?

Tom. Soon!

Jim. Where? Where?

(Theme Three: Music Seems to Answer the Question, while Tom Thinks it Over. He Searches among his Pockets.)

Tom. I'm starting to boil inside. I know I seem dreamy, but inside—well, I'm boiling! Whenever I pick up a shoe, I shudder a little thinking how short life is and what I am doing!—Whatever that means. I know it doesn't mean shoes—except as something to wear on a traveler's feet!

(Finds paper.) Look—

Jim. What?

Tom. I'm a member.

Jim (reading). The Union of Merchant Seamen.

Tom. I paid my dues this month, instead of the light bill.

Jim. You will regret it when they turn the lights off.

Tom. I won't be here.

Jim. How about your mother?

Tom. I'm like my father. The bastard son of a bastard! See how he grins? And he's been absent going on sixteen years!

Jim. You're just talking, you drip. How does your mother feel about it?

Tom. Shhh—Here comes Mother! Mother is not acquainted with my plans!

Amanda (enters portieres). Where are you all?

Tom. On the terrace, Mother.

They start inside. She advances to them. Tom is distinctly shocked at her appearance. Even Jim blinks a little. He is making his first contact with girlish Southern vivacity and in spite of the night-school course in public speaking is somewhat thrown off the beam by the unexpected outlay of social charm.

Certain responses are attempted by Jim but are swept aside by Amanda's gay laughter and chatter. Tom is embarrassed but after the first shock Jim reacts very warmly. Grins and chuckles, is altogether won over.

(AMANDA'S gay laughter and chatter.)

Amanda (coyly smiling, shaking her girlish ringlets). Well, well, well, so this is Mr. O'Connor. Introductions entirely unnecessary. I've heard so much about you from my boy. I finally said to him, Tom—good gracious!—why don't you bring this paragon to supper? I'd like to meet this nice young man at the warehouse!—Instead of just hearing him sing your praises so much! I don't know why my son is so standoffish—that's not Southern behavior! Let's sit down and—I think we could stand a little more air in here! Tom, leave the door open. I felt a nice fresh breeze a moment ago. Where has it gone? Mmm, so warm already!
And not quite summer, even. We're going to burn up when summer really gets started. However, we’re having—we’re having a very light supper. I think light things are better fo’ this time of year. The same as light clothes are. Light clothes an’ light food are what warm weather calls fo’. You know our blood gets so thick during th’ winter—it takes a while fo’ us to adjust ou’ selves!—when the season changes. . . . It’s come so quick this year. I wasn’t prepared. All of a sudden—heavens!
Already summer!—I ran to the trunk an’ pulled out this light dress—Terribly old! Historical almost! But feels so good—so good an’ co-ol, y’know. . . .

TOM. Mother—
AMANDA. Yes, honey?
TOM. How about—supper?
AMANDA. Honey, you go ask Sister if supper is ready! You know that Sister is in full charge of supper! Tell her you hungry boys are waiting for it. (To JIM.) Have you met Laura?

JIM. She—

AMANDA. Let you in? Oh, good, you’ve met already! It’s rare for a girl as sweet an’ pretty as Laura to be domestic! But Laura is, thank heavens, not only present but also very domestic. I’m not at all. I never was a bit. I never could make a thing but angel-food cake. Well, in the South we had so many servants. Gone, gone, gone. All vestiges of gracious living! Gone completely! I wasn’t prepared for what the future brought me. All of my gentlemen callers were sons of planters and so of course I assumed that I would be married to one and raise my family on a large piece of land with plenty of servants. But man proposes—and woman accepts the proposal!—To vary that old, old saying a little bit—I married no planter!
I married a man who worked for the telephone company!—that gallant smiling gentleman over there! [Points to the picture.] A telephone man who—fell in love with long distance!—Now he travels and I don’t even know where!—But what am I going on for about my—tribulations!
Tell me yours—I hope you don’t have any! Tom?

TOM (returning). Yes, Mother?
AMANDA. Is supper nearly ready?
TOM. It looks to me like supper is on the table.
AMANDA. Let me look—(She rises prettily and looks through portieres.) Oh, lovely—But where is Sister?
TOM. Laura is not feeling well and she says that she thinks she’d better not come to the table.
AMANDA. What?—Nonsense!—Laura? Oh, Laura!
LAURA (off stage, faintly). Yes, Mother.
AMANDA. You really must come to the table. We won’t be seated until you come to the table! Come in, Mr. O’Connor. You sit over there and I’ll—Laura! Laura Wingfield! You’re keeping us waiting, honey! We can’t say grace until you come to the table!

_The back door is pushed weakly open and LAURA comes in. She is obviously quite faint, her lips trembling, her eyes wide and staring. She moves unsteadily toward the table._

_(Legend: “Terror!”)_
Outside a summer storm is coming abruptly. The white curtains billow inward at the windows and there is a sorrowful murmur and deep blue dusk.

LAURA suddenly stumbles—She catches a chair with a faint moan.

TOM. Laura!

AMANDA. Laura! (There is a clap of thunder.) (Legend: “Ah!”) (Despairingly.) Why, Laura, you are sick, darling! Tom, help your sister into the living room, dear! Sit in the living room, Laura—rest on the sofa. Well! (To the gentleman caller.) Standing over the hot stove made her ill!—I told her that it was just too warm this evening, but—(TOM comes back in. LAURA is on the sofa.) Is Laura all right now?

TOM. Yes.

AMANDA. What is that? Rain? A nice cool rain has come up! (She gives the gentleman caller a frightened look.) I think we may—have grace—now . . . (TOM looks at her stupidly.) Tom, honey—you say grace!

TOM. Oh . . . “For these and all thy mercies—” (They bow their heads, AMANDA stealing a nervous glance at JIM. In the living room LAURA, stretched on the sofa, clenches her hand to her lips, to hold back a shuddering sob.) God’s Holy Name be praised—

(The Scene Dims Out.)

Scene VII

A Souvenir

Half an hour later. Dinner is just being finished in the upstage area which is concealed by the drawn portieres.

As the curtain rises LAURA is still huddled upon the sofa, her feet drawn under her, her head resting on a pale blue pillow, her eyes wide and mysteriously watchful. The new floor lamp with its shade of rose-colored silk gives a soft, becoming light to her face, bringing out the fragile, unearthly prettiness which usually escapes attention. There is a steady murmur of rain, but it is slackening and stops soon after the scene begins; the air outside becomes pale and luminous as the moon breaks out.

A moment after the curtain rises, the lights in both rooms flicker and go out.

JIM. Hey, there, Mr. Light Bulb!

AMANDA laughs nervously.

(Legend: “Suspension of a Public Service.”)

AMANDA. Where was Moses when the lights went out? Ha-ha. Do you know the answer to that one, Mr. O’Connor?

JIM. No, Ma’am, what’s the answer?

AMANDA. In the dark! (JIM laughs appreciatively.) Everybody sit still. I’ll light the candles. Isn’t it lucky we have them on the table? Where’s a match? Which of you gentlemen can provide a match?
JIM. Here.
AMANDA. Thank you, sir.
JIM. Not at all, Ma’am!
AMANDA. I guess the fuse has burnt out. Mr. O’Connor, can you tell a burnt-out fuse? I know I can’t and Tom is a total loss when it comes to mechanics. (Sound: Getting Up: Voices Recede a Little to Kitchenette.) Oh, be careful you don’t bump into something. We don’t want our gentleman caller to break his neck. Now wouldn’t that be a fine howdy-do?
JIM. Ha-ha! Where is the fuse-box?
AMANDA. Right here next to the stove. Can you see anything?
JIM. Just a minute.
AMANDA. Isn’t electricity a mysterious thing? Wasn’t it Benjamin Franklin who tied a key to a kite? We live in such a mysterious universe, don’t we? Some people say that science clears up all the mysteries for us. In my opinion it only creates more! Have you found it yet?
JIM. No, Ma’am. All these fuses look okay to me.
AMANDA. Tom!
TOM. Yes, Mother?
AMANDA. That light bill I gave you several days ago. The one I told you we got the notices about?
TOM. Oh.—Yeah.

(Legend: “Ha!”)
AMANDA. You didn’t neglect to pay it by any chance?
TOM. Why, I—
AMANDA. Didn’t! I might have known it!
JIM. Shakespeare probably wrote a poem on that light bill, Mrs. Wingfield.
AMANDA. I might have known better than to trust him with it! There’s such a high price for negligence in this world!
JIM. Maybe the poem will win a ten-dollar prize.
AMANDA. We’ll just have to spend the remainder of the evening in the nineteenth century, before Mr. Edison made the Mazda lamp!
JIM. Candlelight is my favorite kind of light.
AMANDA. That shows you’re romantic! But that’s no excuse for Tom. Well, we got through dinner. Very considerate of them to let us get through dinner before they plunged us into everlasting darkness, wasn’t it, Mr. O’Connor?
JIM. Ha-ha!
AMANDA. Tom, as a penalty for your carelessness you can help me with the dishes.
JIM. Let me give you a hand.
AMANDA. Indeed you will not!
JIM. I ought to be good for something.
AMANDA. Good for something? (Her tone is rhapsodic.) You? Why, Mr. O’Connor, nobody, nobody’s given me this much entertainment in years—as you have!
JIM. Aw, now, Mrs. Wingfield!
AMANDA. I’m not exaggerating, not one bit! But Sister is all by her lonesome. You go keep her company in the parlor! I’ll give you this lovely old candelabrum that used to be on the altar at the church of the Heavenly Rest. It was melted a little out of shape when the church burnt down. Lightning struck it one spring. Gypsy Jones was holding a revival at the time and he intimated that the church was destroyed because the Episcopalians gave card parties.

JIM. Ha-ha.

AMANDA. And how about coaxing Sister to drink a little wine? I think it would be good for her! Can you carry both at once?

JIM. Sure. I’m Superman!

AMANDA. Now, Thomas, get into this apron!

The door of kitchenette swings closed on AMANDA’s gay laughter; the flickering light approaches the portieres. LAURA sits up nervously as he enters. Her speech at first is low and breathless from the almost intolerable strain of being alone with a stranger.

(Legend: “I Don’t Suppose You Remember Me at All!”)

In her first speeches in this scene, before JIM’s warmth overcomes her paralyzing shyness, LAURA’s voice is thin and breathless as though she has run up a steep flight of stairs.

JIM’s attitude is gently humorous. In playing this scene it should be stressed that while the incident is apparently unimportant, it is to LAURA the climax of her secret life.

JIM. Hello, there, Laura.

LAURA (faintly). Hello. (She clears her throat.)

JIM. How are you feeling now? Better?

LAURA. Yes. Yes, thank you.

JIM. This is for you. A little dandelion wine. (He extends it toward her with extravagant gallantry.)

LAURA. Thank you.

JIM. Drink it—but don’t get drunk! (He laughs heartily. LAURA takes the glass uncertainly; laughs shyly.) Where shall I set the candles?

LAURA. Oh—oh, anywhere . . .

JIM. How about here on the floor? Any objections?

LAURA. No.

JIM. I’ll spread a newspaper under to catch the drippings. I like to sit on the floor. Mind if I do?

LAURA. Oh, no.

JIM. Give me a pillow?

LAURA. What?

JIM. A pillow!

LAURA. Oh . . . (Hands him one quickly.)

JIM. How about you? Don’t you like to sit on the floor?

LAURA. Oh—yes.

JIM. Why don’t you, then?

LAURA. I—will.

JIM. Take a pillow! (LAURA does. Sits on the other side of the candelabrum. JIM crosses his legs and smiles engagingly at her.) I can’t hardly see you sitting way over there.

LAURA. I can—see you.
JIM. I know, but that’s not fair, I’m in the limelight. (LAURA moves her pillow closer.) Good! Now I can see you! Comfortable?

LAURA. Yes.

JIM. So am I. Comfortable as a cow. Will you have some gum?

LAURA. No, thank you.

JIM. I think that I will indulge, with your permission. (Musingly unwraps it and holds it up.) Think of the fortune made by the guy that invented the first piece of chewing gum. Amazing, huh? The Wrigley Building is one of the sights of Chicago.—I saw it summer before last when I went up to the Century of Progress. Did you take in the Century of Progress?

LAURA. No, I didn’t.

JIM. Well, it was quite a wonderful exposition. What impressed me most was the Hall of Science. Gives you an idea of what the future will be in America, even more wonderful than the present time is! (Pause. Smiling at her.) Your brother tells me you’re shy. Is that right, Laura?

LAURA. I—don’t know.

JIM. I judge you to be an old-fashioned type of girl. Well, I think that’s a pretty good type to be. Hope you don’t think I’m being too personal—do you?

LAURA (bastily, out of embarrassment). I believe I will take a piece of gum, if you—don’t mind. (Clearing her throat.) Mr. O’Connor, have you—kept up with your singing?

JIM. Singing? Me?

LAURA. Yes. I remember what a beautiful voice you had.

JIM. When did you hear me sing?

(Voice Offstage in the Pause.)

VOICE (offstage).

O blow, ye winds, heigh-ho.
A-roving I will go!
I’m off to my love
With a boxing glove—
Ten thousand miles away!

JIM. You say you’ve heard me sing?

LAURA. Oh, yes! Yes, very often . . . I—don’t suppose you remember me—at all?

JIM (smiling doubtfully). You know I have an idea I’ve seen you before. I had that idea soon as you opened the door. It seemed almost like I was about to remember your name. But the name that I started to call you wasn’t a name! And so I stopped myself before I said it.

LAURA. Wasn’t it—Blue Roses?

JIM (springs up, grinning). Blue Roses! My gosh, yes—Blue Roses! That’s what I had on my tongue when you opened the door! Isn’t it funny what tricks your memory plays? I didn’t connect you with the high school somehow or other. But that’s where it was; it was high school. I didn’t even know you were Shakespeare’s sister! Gosh, I’m sorry.

LAURA. I didn’t expect you to. You—barely knew me!

JIM. But we did have a speaking acquaintance, huh?
LAURA. Yes, we—spoke to each other.

JIM. When did you recognize me?

LAURA. Oh, right away!

JIM. Soon as I came in the door?

LAURA. When I heard your name I thought it was probably you. I knew that Tom used to know you a little in high school. So when you came in the door—Well, then I was—sure.

JIM. Why didn’t you say something, then?

LAURA (breathlessly). I didn’t know what to say, I was—too surprised!

JIM. For goodness’ sakes! You know, this sure is funny!

LAURA. Yes! Yes, isn’t it, though. . . .

JIM. Didn’t we have a class in something together?

LAURA. Yes, we did.

JIM. What class was that?

LAURA. It was—singing—Chorus!

JIM. Aw!

LAURA. I sat across the aisle from you in the Aud.

JIM. Aw.

LAURA. Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays.

JIM. Now I remember—you always came in late.

LAURA. Yes, it was so hard for me, getting upstairs. I had a brace on my leg—it clumped so loud!

JIM. I never heard any clumping.

LAURA (wincing at the recollection). To me it sounded like—thunder!

JIM. Well, well, well. I never even noticed.

LAURA. And everybody was seated before I came in. I had to walk in front of all those people. My seat was in the back row. I had to go clumping all the way up the aisle with everyone watching!

JIM. You shouldn’t have been self-conscious.

LAURA. I know, but I was. It was always such a relief when the singing started.

JIM. Aw, yes, I’ve placed you now! I used to call you Blue Roses. How was it that I got started calling you that?

LAURA. I was out of school a little while with pleurosis. When I came back you asked me what was the matter. I said I had pleurosis—you thought I said Blue Roses. That’s what you always called me after that!

JIM. I hope you didn’t mind.

LAURA. Oh, no—I liked it. You see, I wasn’t acquainted with many—people. . . .

JIM. As I remember you sort of stuck by yourself.

LAURA. I—I—never had much luck at—making friends.

JIM. I don’t see why you wouldn’t.

LAURA. Well, I—I—started out badly.

JIM. You mean being—

LAURA. Yes, it sort of—stood between me—

JIM. You shouldn’t have let it!

LAURA. I know, but it did, and—

JIM. You were shy with people!

LAURA. I tried not to be but never could—

JIM. Overcome it?

LAURA. No, I—I never could!

JIM. I guess being shy is something you have to work out of kind of gradually.
LAURA (sorrowfully). Yes—I guess it—
JIM. Takes time!
LAURA. Yes—
JIM. People are not so dreadful when you know them. That’s what you have to remember! And everybody has problems, not just you, but practically everybody has got some problems. You think of yourself as having the only problems, as being the only one who is disappointed. But just look around you and you will see lots of people as disappointed as you are. For instance, I hoped when I was going to high school that I would be further along at this time, six years after, than I am now—You remember that wonderful write-up I had in The Torch?
LAURA. Yes! (She rises and crosses to table.)
JIM. It said I was bound to succeed in anything I went into! (Laura returns with the annual.) Holy Jeez! The Torch! (He accepts it reverently. They smile across it with mutual wonder. Laura crouches beside him and they begin to turn through it. Laura’s shyness is dissolving in his warmth.)
LAURA. Here you are in Pirates of Penzance!
JIM (wistfully). I sang the baritone lead in that operetta.
LAURA (rapidly). So—beautifully!
JIM (protesting). Aw—
LAURA. Yes, yes—beautifully—beautifully!
JIM. You heard me?
LAURA. All three times!
JIM. No!
LAURA. Yes!
JIM. All three performances?
LAURA (looking down). Yes.
JIM. Why?
LAURA. I—wanted to ask you to—autograph my program.
JIM. Why didn’t you ask me to?
LAURA. You were always surrounded by your own friends so much that I never had a chance to.
JIM. You should have just—
LAURA. Well, I—thought you might think I was—
JIM. Thought I might think you was—what?
LAURA. Oh—
JIM (with reflective relish). I was beleaguered by females in those days.
LAURA. You were terribly popular!
JIM. Yeah—
LAURA. You had such a—friendly way—
JIM. I was spoiled in high school.
LAURA. Everybody—liked you!
JIM. Including you?
LAURA. I—yes, I—I did, too—(She gently closes the book in her lap.)
JIM. Well, well, well!—Give me that program, Laura. (She hands it to him. He signs it with a flourish.) There you are—better late than never!
LAURA. Oh, I—what a—surprise!
JIM. My signature isn’t worth very much right now. But some day—maybe—it will increase in value! Being disappointed is one thing and being discouraged is something else. I am disappointed but I’m not discouraged. I’m twenty-three years old. How old are you?

LAURA. I’ll be twenty-four in June.

JIM. That’s not old age!

LAURA. No, but—

JIM. You finished high school?

LAURA (with difficulty). I didn’t go back.

JIM. You mean you dropped out?

LAURA. I made bad grades in my final examinations. (She rises and replaces the book and the program. Her voice strained.) How is—Emily Meisenbach getting along?

JIM. Oh, that kraut-head!

LAURA. Why do you call her that?

JIM. That’s what she was.

LAURA. You’re not still—going with her?

JIM. I never see her.

LAURA. It said in the Personal Section that you were—engaged!

JIM. I know, but I wasn’t impressed by that—propaganda!

LAURA. It wasn’t—the truth?

JIM. Only in Emily’s optimistic opinion!

LAURA. Oh—

(Legend: “What Have You Done since High School?”)

JIM lights a cigarette and leans indolently back on his elbows smiling at LAURA with a warmth and charm which light her inwardly with altar candles. She remains by the table and turns in her hands a piece of glass to cover her tumult.

JIM (after several reflective puffs on a cigarette). What have you done since high school? (She seems not to hear him. Huh? (LAURA looks up.) I said what have you done since high school, Laura?

LAURA. Nothing much.

JIM. You must have been doing something these six long years.

LAURA. Yes.

JIM. Well, then, such as what?

LAURA. I took a business course at business college—

JIM. How did that work out?

LAURA. Well, not very—well—I had to drop out, it gave me—indigestion—

JIM laughs gently.

JIM. What are you doing now?

LAURA. I don’t do anything—much. Oh, please don’t think I sit around doing nothing! My glass collection takes up a good deal of my time. Glass is something you have to take good care of.

JIM. What did you say—about glass?

LAURA. Collection I said—I have one—(She clears her throat and turns away again, acutely shy.)

JIM (Abruptly). You know what I judge to be the trouble with you? Inferiority complex! Know what that is? That’s what they call it when someone low-rates himself! I understand it because I had it, too. Although my case was not so aggravated as yours seems to be. I had it until I took up public speaking, developed my voice, and learned that I had an aptitude for science. Before that time I never thought of myself as being outstanding in any way whatsoever! Now I’ve never made a regular study of it, but I have a friend who says I can analyze people better than doctors that make a profession of it. I don’t claim that to be necessarily true, but I can sure guess a person’s psychology, Laura! (Takes out his gum.) Excuse me, Laura. I always take it out when the flavor is gone. I’ll use this scrap of paper to wrap it in. I know how it is to get it stuck on a shoe. Yep—that’s what I judge to be your principal trouble. A lack of confidence in yourself as a person. You don’t have the proper amount of faith in yourself. I’m basing that fact on a number of your remarks and also on certain observations I’ve made. For instance that clumping you thought was so awful in high school. You see what you did? You dropped out of school, you gave up an education because of a clump, which as far as I know was practically nonexistent! A little physical defect is what you have. Hardly noticeable even! Magnified thousands of times by imagination! You know what my strong advice to you is? Think of yourself as superior in some way!

LAURA. In what way would I think?

JIM. Why, man alive, Laura! Just look about you a little. What do you see? A world full of common people! All of ’em born and all of ’em going to die! Which of them has one-tenth of your good points! Or mine! Or anyone else’s, as far as that goes—Gosh! Everybody excels in some one thing. Some in many! (Unconsciously glances at himself in the mirror.) All you’ve got to do is discover in what! (He adjusts his tie at the mirror.) My interest happens to lie in electro-dynamics. I’m taking a course in radio engineering at night school, Laura, on top of a fairly responsible job at the warehouse. I’m taking that course and studying public speaking.

LAURA. Ohhhh.

JIM. Because I believe in the future of television! (Turning back to her.) I wish to be ready to go up right along with it. Therefore I’m planning to get in on the ground floor. In fact, I’ve already made the right connections and all that remains is for the industry itself to get under way! Full steam—(His eyes are starry.) Knowledge—Zzzzz! Money—Zzzzzz!—Power! That’s the cycle democracy is built on! (His attitude is convincingly dynamic. Laura stares at him, even her shyness eclipsed in her absolute wonder. He suddenly grins.) I guess you think I think a lot of myself!

LAURA. No—o-o-o, I—

JIM. Now how about you? Isn’t there something you take more interest in than anything else?

LAURA. Well, I do—as I said—have my—glass collection—

Peal of girlish laughter from the kitchen.

JIM. I’m not right sure I know what you’re talking about. What kind of glass is it?

LAURA. Little articles of it, they’re ornaments mostly! Most of them are little animals made out of glass, the tiniest little animals in the world. Mother calls them a glass menagerie! Here’s an example of one, if you’d like to see it! This one is one of the oldest. It’s nearly thirteen. (He stretches out bis hand.) (Music: “The Glass Menagerie.”) Oh, be careful—if you breathe, it breaks!

JIM. I’d better not take it. I’m pretty clumsy with things.

LAURA. Go on, I trust you with him! (Places it in bis palm.) There now—you’re holding him gently! Hold him over the light, he loves the light! You see how the light shines through him?

JIM. It sure does shine!

LAURA. I shouldn’t be partial, but he is my favorite one.

JIM. What kind of a thing is this one supposed to be?

LAURA. Haven’t you noticed the single horn on his forehead?

JIM. A unicorn, huh?

LAURA. Mmm-hmmm!

JIM. Unicorns, aren’t they extinct in the modern world?

LAURA. I know!

JIM. Poor little fellow, he must feel sort of lonesome.

LAURA (smiling). Well, if he does he doesn’t complain about it. He stays on a shelf with some horses that don’t have horns and all of them seem to get along nicely together.

JIM. How do you know?

LAURA (lightly). I haven’t heard any arguments among them!

JIM (grinning). No arguments, huh? Well, that’s a pretty good sign! Where shall I set him?

LAURA. Put him on the table. They all like a change of scenery once in a while!

JIM (stretching). Well, well, well, well—Look how big my shadow is when I stretch!

LAURA. Oh, oh, yes—it stretches across the ceiling!

JIM (crossing to door). I think it’s stopped raining. (Opens fire-escape door.) Where does the music come from?

LAURA. From the Paradise Dance Hall across the alley.

JIM. How about cutting the rug a little, Miss Wingfield?

LAURA. Oh, I—

JIM. Or is your program filled up? Let me have a look at it. (Grasps imaginary card.) Why, every dance is taken! I’ll just have to scratch some out.

(Waltz Music: “La Golondrina.”) Ahhh, a waltz! (He executes some sweeping turns by himself then holds bis arms toward LAURA.)

LAURA (breathlessly). I—can’t dance!

JIM. There you go, that inferiority stuff!

LAURA. I’ve never danced in my life!

JIM. Come on, try!

LAURA. Oh, but I’d step on you!

JIM. I’m not made out of glass.

LAURA. How—how—how do we start?

JIM. Just leave it to me. You hold your arms out a little.

LAURA. Like this?

JIM. A little bit higher. Right. Now don’t tighten up, that’s the main thing about it—relax.

LAURA (laughing breathlessly). It’s hard not to.

JIM. Okay.

LAURA. I’m afraid you can’t budge me.
JIM. What do you bet I can’t? (He swings her into motion.)
LAURA. Goodness, yes, you can!
JIM. Let yourself go, now, Laura, just let yourself go.
LAURA. I’m—
JIM. Come on!
LAURA. Trying!
JIM. Not so stiff—Easy does it!
LAURA. I know but I’m—
JIM. Loosen th’ backbone! There now, that’s a lot better.
LAURA. Am I?
JIM. Lots, lots better! (He moves her about the room in a clumsy waltz.)
LAURA. Oh, my!
JIM. Ha-ha!
LAURA. Oh, my goodness!
JIM. Ha-ha-ha! (They suddenly bump into the table. Jim stops.) What did we hit on?
LAURA. Table.
JIM. Did something fall off it? I think—
LAURA. Yes.
JIM. I hope that it wasn’t the little glass horse with the horn!
LAURA. Yes.
JIM. Aw, aw, aw. Is it broken?
LAURA. Now it is just like all the other horses.
JIM. It’s lost its—
LAURA. Horn! It doesn’t matter. Maybe it’s a blessing in disguise.
JIM. You’ll never forgive me. I bet that that was your favorite piece of glass.
LAURA. I don’t have favorites much. It’s no tragedy, Freckles. Glass breaks so easily. No matter how careful you are. The traffic jars the shelves and things fall off them.
JIM. Still I’m awfully sorry that I was the cause.
LAURA (smiling). I’ll just imagine he had an operation. The horn was removed to make him feel less—freakish! (They both laugh.) Now he will feel more at home with the other horses, the ones that don’t have horns . . .
JIM. Ha-ha, that’s very funny! (Suddenly serious.) I’m glad to see that you have a sense of humor. You know—you’re—well—very different! Surprisingly different from anyone else I know! (His voice becomes soft and besitating with a genuine feeling.) Do you mind me telling you that? (Laure is abashed beyond speech.) You make me feel sort of—I don’t know how to put it! I’m usually pretty good at expressing things, but—This is something that I don’t know how to say! (Laure touches her throat and clears it—turns the broken unicorn in her hands.) (Even softer.) Has anyone ever told you that you were pretty? (Pause: Music.) (Laure looks up slowly, with wonder, and shakes her head.) Well, you are! In a very different way from anyone else. And all the nicer because of the difference, too. (His voice becomes low and husky. Laure turns away, nearly faint with the novelty of her emotions.) I wish that you were my sister. I’d teach you to have some confidence in yourself. The different people are not like other people, but being different is nothing to be ashamed of. Because other people are not such wonderful people. They’re one hundred times one thousand. You’re one times one!
walk all over the earth. You just stay here. They’re common as—weeds, but—you—well, you’re Blue Roses!

(Image on Screen: Blue Roses.)

(Music Changes.)

LAURA. But blue is wrong for—roses. . . .

JIM. It’s right for you—You’re—pretty!

LAURA. In what respect am I pretty?

JIM. In all respects—believe me! Your eyes—your hair—are pretty! Your hands are pretty! (He catches bold of her band.) You think I’m making this up because I’m invited to dinner and have to be nice. Oh, I could do that! I could put on an act for you, Laura, and say lots of things without being very sincere. But this time I am. I’m talking to you sincerely. I happened to notice you had this inferiority complex that keeps you from feeling comfortable with people. Somebody needs to build your confidence up and make you proud instead of shy and turning away and—blushing—Somebody ought to—ought to—kiss you. Laura! (His hand slips slowly up her arm to her shoulder.) (Music Swells Tumultuously.) (*He suddenly turns her about and kisses her on the lips. When he releases her Laura sinks on the sofa with a bright, dazed look.)

JIM backs away and fishes in his pocket for a cigarette. (Legend on Screen: “Souvenir.”) Stumble-john! (*He lights the cigarette, avoiding her look. There is a peal of girlish laughter from Amanda in the kitchen.*

LAURA slowly raises and opens her band. It still contains the little broken glass animal. She looks at it with a tender, bewildered expression. Stumble-john! I shouldn’t have done that—that was way off the beam. You don’t smoke, do you? (*She looks up, smiling, not bearing the question. He sits beside her a little gingerly. She looks at him speechlessly—waiting. He coughs decorously and moves a little farther aside as he considers the situation and senses her feelings, dimly, with perturbation. Gently.) Would you—care for a—mint? (She doesn’t seem to bear him but her look grows brighter even.) Peppermint—Life Saver? My pocket’s a regular drug store—wherever I go . . . (He pops a mint in his mouth. Then gulps and decides to make a clean breast of it. He speaks slowly and gingerly.) Laura, you know, if I had a sister like you, I’d do the same thing as Tom. I’d bring out fellows—introduce her to them. The right type of boys—of a type to—appreciate her. Only—well—he made a mistake about me. Maybe I’ve got no call to be saying this. That may not have been the idea in having me over. But what if it was? There’s nothing wrong about that. The only trouble is that in my case—I’m not in a situation to—do the right thing. I can’t take down your number and say I’ll phone. I can’t call up next week and—ask for a date. I thought I had better explain the situation in case you misunderstood it and—hurt your feelings. . . . (*Pause. Slowly, very slowly. Laura’s look changes, her eyes returning slowly from his to the ornament in her palm.)

AMANDA utters another gay laugh in the kitchen.

LAURA (faintly). You—won’t—call again?

JIM. No, Laura, I can’t. (He rises from the sofa.) As I was just explaining, I’ve—got strings on me, Laura, I’ve—been going steady! I go out all the time with a girl named Betty. She's a home-girl like you, and Catholic, and Irish, and in a great many ways we—get along fine. I met her last summer on a moonlight boat trip up the river to Alton, on the Majestic.
Well—right away from the start it was—love! (Legend: Love!) (Laura sways slightly forward and grips the arm of the sofa. He fails to notice, now enrapt in his own comfortable being.) Being in love has made a new man of me! (Leaning stiffly forward, clutching the arm of the sofa, Laura struggles visibly with her storm. But Jim is oblivious, she is a long way off.) The power of love is really pretty tremendous!
Love is something that—changes the whole world, Laura! (The storm abates a little and Laura leans back. He notices her again.) It happened that Betty’s aunt took sick, she got a wire and had to go to Centralia. So Tom—when he asked me to dinner—I naturally just accepted the invitation, not knowing that you—that he—that I—(He stops awkwardly.) Huh—I’m a stumble-john! (He flops back on the sofa. The holy candles in the altar of Laura’s face have been snuffed out! There is a look of almost infinite desolation. Jim glances at her uneasily.) I wish that you would—say something. (She bites her lip which was trembling and then bravely smiles. She opens her hand again on the broken glass ornament. Then she gently takes his hand and raises it level with her own. She carefully places the unicorn in the palm of his band, then pushes his fingers closed upon it.) What are you—doing that for? You want me to have him?—Laura? (She nods.) What for?

Laura. A—souvenir . . .

She rises unsteadily and crouches beside the victrola to wind it up.
(Legend on Screen: “Things Have a Way of Turning Out So Badly.”)
(Or Image: “Gentleman Caller Waving Good-Bye!—Gaily.”)
At this moment Amanda rushes brightly back in the front room.
She bears a pitcher of fruit punch in an old-fashioned cut-glass pitcher and a plate of macaroons. The plate has a gold border and poppies painted on it.

Amanda. Well, well, well! Isn’t the air delightful after the shower? I’ve made you children a little liquid refreshment. (Turns gaily to the gentleman caller.) Jim, do you know that song about lemonade?

“Lemonade, lemonade
Made in the shade and stirred with a spade—
Good enough for any old maid!”

Jim (uneasily). Ha-ha! No—I never heard it.

Amanda. Why, Laura! You look so serious!

Jim. We were having a serious conversation.

Amanda. Good! Now you’re better acquainted!

Jim (uncertainly). Ha-ha! Yes.

Amanda. You modern young people are much more serious-minded than my generation. I was so gay as a girl!

Jim. You haven’t changed, Mrs. Wingfield.

Amanda. Tonight I’m rejuvenated! The gaiety of the occasion, Mr. O’Connor!
(She tosses her bead with a peal of laughter. Spills lemonade.) Oooo!
I’m baptizing myself!

Jim. Here—let me—
AMANDA (setting the pitcher down). There now. I discovered we had some maraschino cherries. I dumped them in, juice and all!

JIM. You shouldn’t have gone to that trouble, Mrs. Wingfield.

AMANDA. Trouble, trouble? Why it was loads of fun! Didn’t you hear me cutting up in the kitchen? I bet your ears were burning! I told Tom how outdone with him I was for keeping you to himself so long a time! He should have brought you over much, much sooner! Well, now that you’ve found your way, I want you to be a very frequent caller! Not just occasional but all the time. Oh, we’re going to have a lot of gay times together! I see them coming! Mmm, just breathe that air! So fresh, and the moon’s so pretty! I’ll skip back out—I know where my place is when young folks are having a—serious conversation!

JIM. Oh, don’t go out, Mrs. Wingfield. The fact of the matter is I’ve got to be going.

AMANDA. Going, now? You’re joking! Why, it’s only the shank of the evening, Mr. O’Connor!

JIM. Well, you know how it is.

AMANDA. You mean you’re a young workingman and have to keep working-men’s hours. We’ll let you off early tonight. But only on the condition that next time you stay later. What’s the best night for you? Isn’t Saturday night the best night for you workingmen?

JIM. I have a couple of time-clocks to punch, Mrs. Wingfield. One at morning, another one at night!

AMANDA. My, but you are ambitious! You work at night, too?

JIM. No, Ma’am, not work but—Betty! (He crosses deliberately to pick up his hat. The band at the Paradise Dance Hall goes into a tender waltz.)

AMANDA. Betty? Betty? Who’s—Betty! (There is an ominous cracking sound in the sky.)

JIM. Oh, just a girl. The girl I go steady with! (He smiles charmingly. The sky falls.)

(Legend: “The Sky Falls.”)

AMANDA (a long-drawn exhalation). Ohhhh . . . Is it a serious romance, Mr. O’Connor?

JIM. We’re going to be married the second Sunday in June.

AMANDA. Ohhhh—how nice! Tom didn’t mention that you were engaged to be married.

JIM. The cat’s not out of the bag at the warehouse yet. You know how they are. They call you Romeo and stuff like that. (He stops at the oval mirror to put on his hat. He carefully shapes the brim and the crown to give a discreetly dashing effect.) It’s been a wonderful evening, Mrs. Wingfield. I guess this is what they mean by Southern hospitality.

AMANDA. It really wasn’t anything at all.

JIM. I hope it don’t seem like I’m rushing off. But I promised Betty I’d pick her up at the Wabash depot, an’ by the time I get my jalopy down there her train’ll be in. Some women are pretty upset if you keep ’em waiting.

AMANDA. Yes, I know—The tyranny of women! (Extends her band.) Goodbye, Mr. O’Connor. I wish you luck—and happiness—and success! All three of them, and so does Laura!—Don’t you, Laura?
LAURA. Yes!

JIM (taking her hand). Goodbye, Laura. I’m certainly going to treasure that souvenir. And don’t you forget the good advice I gave you. (Raises his voice to a cheery shout.) So long, Shakespeare! Thanks again, ladies—good night!

_He grins and ducks jauntily out._

Still bravely grimacing, AMANDA closes the door on the gentleman caller. Then she turns back to the room with a puzzled expression. She and LAURA don’t dare to face each other. LAURA crouches beside the victrola to wind it.

AMANDA (faintly). Things have a way of turning out so badly. I don’t believe that I would play the victrola. Well, well—well—Our gentleman caller was engaged to be married! Tom!

TOM (from back). Yes, Mother?

AMANDA. Come in here a minute. I want to tell you something awfully funny.

TOM (enters with macaroon and a glass of the lemonade). Has the gentleman caller gotten away already?

AMANDA. The gentleman caller has made an early departure. What a wonderful joke you played on us!

TOM. How do you mean?

AMANDA. You didn’t mention that he was engaged to be married.

TOM. Jim? Engaged?

AMANDA. That’s what he just informed us.

TOM. I’ll be jiggered! I didn’t know about that.

AMANDA. That seems very peculiar.

TOM. What’s peculiar about it?

AMANDA. Didn’t you call him your best friend down at the warehouse?

TOM. He is, but how did I know?

AMANDA. It seems extremely peculiar that you wouldn’t know your best friend was going to be married!

TOM. The warehouse is where I work, not where I know things about people!

AMANDA. You don’t know things anywhere! You live in a dream; you manufacture illusions! (He crosses to door.) Where are you going?

TOM. I’m going to the movies.

AMANDA. You don’t know things anywhere! You live in a dream; you manufacture illusions! (He crosses to door.) Where are you going?

TOM. I’m going to the movies.

AMANDA. That’s right, now that you’ve had us make such fools of ourselves. The effort, the preparations, all the expense! The new floor lamp, the rug, the clothes for Laura! All for what? To entertain some other girl’s fiancé! Go to the movies, go! Don’t think about us, a mother deserted, an unmarried sister who’s crippled and has no job! Don’t let anything interfere with your selfish pleasure! Just go, go, go—to the movies!

TOM. All right, I will! The more you shout about my selfishness to me the quicker I’ll go, and I won’t go to the movies!

AMANDA. Go, then! Then go to the moon—you selfish dreamer!

TOM smashes his glass on the floor. He plunges out on the fire-escape, slamming the door. LAURA screams—cut by door.

_Dance-ball music up._ TOM goes to the rail and grips it desperately, lifting his face in the chill white moonlight penetrating the narrow abyss of the alley.
(Legend on Screen: “And So Good-Bye . . . ”)

TOM’s closing speech is timed with the interior pantomime. The interior scene is played as though viewed through sound-proof glass. AMANDA appears to be making a comforting speech to LAURA who is huddled upon the sofa. Now that we cannot hear the mother’s speech, her silliness is gone and she has dignity and tragic beauty. LAURA’s dark hair hides her face until at the end of the speech she lifts it to smile at her mother. AMANDA’s gestures are slow and graceful, almost dance-like, as she comforts the daughter. At the end of her speech she glances a moment at the father’s picture—then withdraws through the portieres. At close of TOM’s speech, LAURA blows out the candles, ending the play.

TOM. I didn’t go to the moon, I went much further—for time is the longest distance between two places—Not long after that I was fired for writing a poem on the lid of a shoe-box. I left Saint Louis. I descended the steps of this fire-escape for a last time and followed, from then on, in my father’s footsteps, attempting to find in motion what was lost in space—I traveled around a great deal. The cities swept about me like dead leaves, leaves that were brightly colored but torn away from the branches. I would have stopped, but I was pursued by something. It always came upon me unawares, taking me altogether by surprise. Perhaps it was a familiar bit of music. Perhaps it was only a piece of transparent glass—Perhaps I am walking along a street at night, in some strange city, before I have found companions. I pass the lighted window of a shop where perfume is sold. The window is filled with pieces of colored glass, tiny transparent bottles in delicate colors, like bits of a shattered rainbow. Then all at once my sister touches my shoulder. I turn around and look into her eyes . . . Oh, Laura, Laura, I tried to leave you behind me, but I am more faithful than I intended to be! I reach for a cigarette, I cross the street, I run into the movies or a bar, I buy a drink, I speak to the nearest stranger—anything that can blow your candles out! (LAURA bends over the candles.)—for nowadays the world is lit by lightning! Blow out your candles, Laura—and so goodbye . . .

She blows the candles out.

(The Scene Dissolves.)

A CONTEXT FOR THE GLASS MENAGERIE

TENNESSEE WILLIAMS

Production Notes

[1944]

Being a “memory play,” The Glass Menagerie can be presented with unusual freedom of convention. Because of its considerably delicate or tenuous material, atmospheric touches and subtleties of direction play a particularly important part. Expressionism and all other unconventional techniques in drama have only one valid aim, and that is a closer approach to truth. When a play employs unconventional techniques, it is not, or certainly shouldn’t be, trying to escape its responsibility of dealing with reality, or interpreting experience, but is actually or should be attempting to find a closer approach, a more penetrating and vivid expression of things as they are. The straight realistic play with its genuine frigidaire and authentic ice cubes, its characters that speak exactly as its audience speaks, corresponds to the academic landscape and has the same virtue of a photographic likeness. Everyone should know nowadays the unimportance of the photographic in art: that truth, life, or reality is an organic thing which the poetic imagination can represent or suggest, in essence, only through transformation, through changing into other forms than those which were merely present in appearance.

These remarks are not meant as comments only on this particular play. They have to do with a conception of a new, plastic theater which must take the place of the exhausted theater of realistic conventions if the theater is to resume vitality as a part of our culture.

The Screen Device

There is only one important difference between the original and acting version of the play and that is the omission in the latter of the device which I tentatively included in my original script. This device was the use of a screen on which were projected magic-lantern slides bearing images or titles. I do not regret the omission of this device from the . . . Broadway production. The extraordinary power of Miss Taylor’s performance made it suitable to have the utmost simplicity in the physical production. But I think it may be interesting to some readers to see how this device was conceived. So I am putting it into the published manuscript. These images and legends, projected from behind, were cast on a section of wall between the front-room and dining-room areas, which should be indistinguishable from the rest when not in use.

The purpose of this will probably be apparent. It is to give accent to certain values in each scene. Each scene contains a particular point (or several) which is structurally the most important. In an episodic play, such as this, the basic structure or narrative line may be obscured from the audience; the effect may seem fragmentary rather than architectural. This may not be the fault of the play so much as a lack of attention in the audience. The legend or image upon the screen will strengthen the effect of what is merely allusion in the writing and allow the primary point to be made more simply and lightly than if the entire responsibility were on the spoken lines. Aside from this structural value, I think the screen will have a definite emotional appeal, less definable but just as important. An imaginative producer or director may invent many other uses for this device than those indicated in the present script. In fact the possibilities of the device seem much larger to me than the instance of this play can possibly utilize.

The Music

Another extra-literary accent in this play is provided by the use of music. A single recurring tune, “The Glass Menagerie,” is used to give emotional emphasis to suitable passages. This tune is like circus music, not when you are on the grounds or in the immediate vicinity of the parade, but when you are at some distance and very likely thinking of something else. It seems under those circumstances to continue almost interminably and it weaves in and out of your preoccupied consciousness; then it is the lightest, most delicate music in the world and perhaps the saddest. It expresses the surface vivacity of life with the underlying strain of immutable and inexpressible sorrow. When you look at a piece of delicately spun glass you think of two things: how beautiful it is and how easily it can be broken. Both of those ideas should be woven into the recurring tune, which dips in and out of the play as if it were carried on a wind that changes. It serves as a thread of connection and allusion between the narrator with his separate point in time and space and the subject of his story. Between each episode it returns as reference to the emotion, nostalgia, which is the first condition of the play. It is primarily Laura’s music and therefore comes out most clearly when the play focuses upon her and the lovely fragility of glass which is her image.

The Lighting

The lighting in the play is not realistic. In keeping with the atmosphere of memory, the stage is dim. Shafts of light are focused on selected areas or actors, sometimes in contradistinction to what is the apparent center. For instance, in the quarrel scene between Tom and Amanda, in which Laura has no active part, the clearest pool of light is on her figure. This is also true of the supper scene. The light upon Laura should be distinct from the others, having a peculiar pristine clarity such as light used in early religious portraits of female saints or madonnas. A certain correspondence to light in religious paintings, such as El Greco’s, where the figures are radiant in atmosphere that is relatively dusky, could be effectively used throughout the play. (It will also permit a more effective use of the screen.) A free, imaginative use of light can be of enormous value in giving a mobile, plastic quality to plays of a more or less static nature.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. What does the victrola offer to Laura? Why is the typewriter a better symbol (for the purposes of the play) than, for example, a piano? After all, Laura could have been taking piano lessons.
2. What do you understand of Laura’s glass menagerie? Why is it especially significant that the unicorn is Laura’s favorite? How do you interpret the loss of the unicorn’s horn? What is Laura saying to Jim in the gesture of giving him the unicorn?
3. Laura escapes to her glass menagerie. To what do Tom and Amanda escape? How complete do you think Tom’s escape is at the end of the play?
4. Jim is described as “a nice, ordinary young man.” To what extent can it be said that he, like the Wingfields, lives in a dream world? Tom says (speaking of the time of the play, 1939) that “The huge middle class was matriculating in a school for the blind." Does the play suggest that Jim, apparently a spokesperson for the American dream, is one of the pupils in this school?

5. There is an implication that had Jim not been going steady he might have rescued Laura, but Jim also seems to represent (for example, in his lines about money and power) the corrupt outside world that no longer values humanity. Is this a slip on Williams's part, or is it an interesting complexity?

6. How do you interpret the episode at the end when Laura blows out the candles? Is she blowing out illusions? her own life? both? Explain.

7. Some readers have seen great importance in the religious references in the play. To cite only a few examples: Scene 5 is called (on the screen) "Annunciation"; Amanda is associated with the music "Ave Maria"; Laura’s candelabrum, from the altar of the Church of Heavenly Rest, was melted out of shape when the church burned down. Do you think these references add up to anything? If so, to what?

8. On page 1009, Williams says, in a stage direction, "Now that we cannot hear the mother’s speech, her silliness is gone and she has dignity and tragic beauty." Is Williams simply dragging in the word "tragic" because of its prestige, or is it legitimate? Tragedy is often distinguished from pathos: in tragedy, suffering is experienced by persons who act and are in some measure responsible for their suffering; in pathos, suffering is experienced by the passive and the innocent. For example, in discussion The Suppliants, a play by the ancient Greek dramatist Aeschylus, H. D. F. Kitto (in Greek Tragedy) says, “The Suppliants are not only pathetic, as the victims of outrage, but also tragic, as the victims of their own misconceptions.” Given this distinction, to what extent are Amanda and Laura tragic? pathetic? You might take into account the following quote from an interview with Williams, reprinted in Conversations with Tennessee Williams (ed. Albert J. Devlin): “The mother’s valor is the core of The Glass Menagerie. . . . She’s confused, pathetic, even stupid, but everything has got to be all right. She fights to make it that way in the only way she knows how.”

9. Before writing The Glass Menagerie, Williams wrote a short story with the same plot, "Portrait of a Girl in Glass" (later published in his Collected Stories). You may want to compare the two works, noticing especially the ways in which Williams has turned a story into a play.

The Play on the Stage

10. In what ways is the setting relevant to the issues raised in the play?

11. In his Production Notes (page 1010) Williams called for the use of a “screen device.” Over the years, some productions have incorporated it and some have not. If you were involved in producing The Glass Menagerie, would you use this device? Explain your reasons.

12. As director, would you want the actress playing Laura to limp? Give reasons for your decision, and provide additional comments on the ways in which you would ask an actress to portray the role.

13. List the various emotions that you find for Amanda in Scenes 2 and 3. If you were advising an actress playing this role, how would you suggest she convey these different feelings? Following are some questions to consider: In what ways does she reveal her own sadnesses? Should her speeches to Tom be delivered differently from her speeches to Laura? When she looks at Laura’s yearbook, should there be any physical contact between the two women? What effect would you wish to achieve at the close of Scene 3?

14. At the end of Scene 5, after an exasperated exchange between Tom and Amanda, Laura and her mother make a wish on the new moon. Three students can memorize this brief section and present it to the group. Then examine each speech, and discuss its emotion. Offer suggestions to the three actors—for instance, changes in emphasis, a slight difference in tone, a certain stance for the mother and daughter—and repeat the scene.
The Greek philosopher Aristotle defined "tragedy" as a dramatization of a serious happening—not necessarily one ending with the death of the protagonist—and his definition remains among the best. But many plays have been written since Aristotle defined tragedy. When we think of Shakespeare’s tragedies, we cannot resist narrowing Aristotle’s definition by adding something like “showing a struggle that rends the protagonist’s whole being”; and when we think of the “problem plays” of the last hundred years—the serious treatments of such sociological problems as alcoholism and race prejudice—we might be inclined to exclude some of them by adding to the definition something about the need for universal appeal.

The question remains: Is there a single quality present in all works that we call tragedy and absent from works not called tragedy? If there is, no one has yet pointed it out to general satisfaction. But this failure does not mean that there is no such classification as “tragedy.” We sense that tragedies resemble each other as members of the same family resemble each other: two children have the mother’s coloring and eyes, a third child has the mother’s coloring but the father’s eyes, a fourth child has the mother’s eyes but the father’s coloring.

In the next few pages we will examine three comments on tragedy, none of which is entirely acceptable, but each of which seems to have some degree of truth, and each of which can help us detect resemblances and differences among tragedies. The first comment is by Cyril Tourneur, a tragic dramatist of the early seventeenth century:

When the bad bleed, then is the tragedy good.

We think of Macbeth (“usurper,” “butcher”). Macbeth is much more than a usurper and butcher, but it is undeniable that he is an offender against the moral order. Whatever the merits of Tourneur’s statement, however, if we think of Romeo and Juliet (to consider only one play), we realize its inadequacy. Tourneur so stresses the guilt of the protagonist that his or her suffering becomes mere retributive justice. But we cannot plausibly say, for example, that Romeo and Juliet deserved to die because they married without their parents’ consent; it is much too simple to call them “bad.” Romeo and Juliet are young, in love, nobler in spirit than their parents.

Tourneur’s view is probably derived ultimately from an influential passage in Aristotle’s Poetics in which Aristotle speaks of hamartia, sometimes literally translated as “missing the target,” sometimes as “vice” or “flaw” or “weakness,” but perhaps best translated as “mistake.” Aristotle seems to imply that the hero is undone because of some mistake he or she commits, but this mistake need not be the result of a moral fault; it may be simply a miscalculation—for example, failure to foresee the consequences of a deed. Brutus makes a strategic mistake when he lets Marc Antony speak at Caesar’s funeral, but we can hardly call it a vice.

Because Aristotle’s _hamartia_ includes mistakes of this sort, the common translation “tragic flaw” is erroneous. In many Greek tragedies the hero’s _hamartia_ is _hubris_ (or _hybris_), usually translated as “overweening pride.” The hero forgets that he or she is fallible, acts as though he or she has the power and wisdom of the gods, and is later humbled for this arrogance. But one can argue that this self-assertiveness is not a vice but a virtue, not a weakness but a strength; if the hero is destroyed for self-assertion, he or she is nevertheless greater than the surrounding people, just as the person who tries to stem a lynch mob is greater than the mob, although that person also may be lynched for his or her virtue. Or a hero may be undone by a high-mindedness that makes him or her vulnerable. Hamlet is vulnerable because he is, as his enemy says, “most generous and free from all contriving”; because Hamlet is high-minded, he will not suspect that the proposed fencing match is a murderous plot. Othello can be tricked into murdering Desdemona not simply because he is jealous but because he is (in the words of the villainous Iago) “of a free and open nature / That thinks men honest but seem so.” Iago knows, too, that out of Desdemona’s “goodness” he can “make the net / That shall enmesh them all.”

Next, here is a statement more or less the reverse of Tourneur’s, by a Russian critic, L. I. Temofeev:

Tragedy in Soviet literature arouses a feeling of pride for the man who has accomplished a great deed for the people’s happiness; it calls for continued struggle against the things which brought about the hero’s death.

The distortions in Soviet criticism are often amusing: Hamlet is seen as an incipient Communist, undone by the decadent aristocracy; or Romeo and Juliet as young people of the future, undone by bourgeois parents. Soviet drama in the third quarter of the twentieth century so consistently showed the triumph of the worker that Western visitors to Russia commented on the absence of contemporary tragic plays. Still, there is much in the idea that the tragic hero accomplishes “a great deed,” and perhaps we do resent “the things which brought about the hero’s death.” The stubbornness of the Montagues and Capulets, the fury of the mob that turns against Brutus, the crimes of Claudius in _Hamlet_—all these would seem to call for our indignation.

The third comment is by Arthur Miller:

If it is true to say that in essence the tragic hero is intent upon claiming his whole due as a personality, and if this struggle must be total and without reservation, then it automatically demonstrates the indestructible will of man to achieve his humanity. . . . It is curious, although edifying, that the plays we revere, century after century, are the tragedies. In them, and in them alone, lies the belief—optimistic, if you will—in the perfectibility of man.
There is much in Miller's suggestions that the tragic hero makes a large and total claim and that the audience often senses triumph rather than despair in tragedies. We often feel that we have witnessed human greatness—that the hero, despite profound suffering, has lived according to his or her ideals. We may feel that we have achieved new insight into human greatness. But the perfectibility of man? Do we feel that Julius Caesar or Macbeth or Hamlet have to do with human perfectibility? Don't these plays suggest rather that people, whatever their nobility, have within them the seeds of their own destruction? Without overemphasizing the guilt of the protagonists, don't we feel that in part the plays dramatize the *im*perfectibility of human beings? In much tragedy, after all, the destruction comes from within, not from without:

> In tragic life, God wot,  No villain need be! Passions spin the plot: We are betrayed by what is false within.  —George Meredith

What we are talking about is tragic irony, the contrast between what is believed to be so and what is so, or between expectations and accomplishments.* Several examples from Macbeth illustrate something of the range of tragic irony within a single play. In the first act, King Duncan bestows on Macbeth the title of Thane of Cawdor. By his kindness Duncan seals his own doom, for Macbeth, having achieved this rank, will next want to achieve a higher one. In the third act, Macbeth, knowing that Banquo will soon be murdered, hypocritically urges Banquo to “fail not our feast.” But Macbeth's hollow request is ironically fulfilled: the ghost of Banquo terrorizes Macbeth during the feast. The most pervasive irony of all, of course, is that Macbeth aims at happiness when he kills Duncan and takes the throne, but he wins only sorrow.

Aristotle's discussion of peripeteia (reversal) and anagnorisis (recognition) may be a way of getting at this sort of irony. He may simply have meant a reversal of fortune (for example, good luck ceases) and a recognition of who is who (for example, the pauper is really the prince), but more likely he meant profounder things. One can say that the reversal in Macbeth lies in the sorrow that Macbeth's increased power brings. The recognition comes when he realizes the consequences of his deeds:

> I have lived long enough: my way of life Is fall’n into the sere, the yellow leaf; And what which should accompany old age, As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends, I must not look to have; but, in their stead, Curses, not loud but deep, mouth-honor, breath Which the poor heart would fain deny, and dare not.

That our deeds often undo us, that we can aim at our good and produce our ruin, was not, of course, a discovery of the tragic dramatists. The archetype is the story of Adam and Eve: these two aimed at becoming like God, and as a consequence,

*Tragic irony is sometimes dramatic irony or Sophoclean irony. The terms are often applied to speeches or actions that the audience understands in a sense fuller than or different from the sense in which the dramatic characters understand them.
they brought upon themselves corruption, death, the loss of their earthly paradise. The Bible is filled with stories of tragic irony. A brief quotation from Ecclesiastes (10.8–9) can stand as an epitome of these stories:

He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it; and whoso breaketh an hedge, a serpent shall bite him.

Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith; and he that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby.

"He that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby." Activity involves danger. To be inactive is, often, to be ignoble, but to be active is necessarily to imperil oneself. Perhaps we can attempt a summary of tragic figures: they act, and they suffer, usually as a consequence of their action. The question is not of the action's being particularly bad (Tourneur's view) or particularly good (Timofeev's view); the action is often both good and bad, a sign of courage and also of arrogance, a sign of greatness and also of limitations.

Finally, a brief consideration of the pleasure of tragedy: Why do we enjoy plays about suffering? Aristotle has some obscure comments on catharsis (pur-gation) that are often interpreted as saying that tragedy arouses in us both pity and fear and then purges us of these emotions. The idea, perhaps, is that just as we can (it is said) harmlessly discharge our aggressive impulses by witnessing a prizefight or by shouting at an umpire, so we can harmlessly discharge our impulses to pity and to fear by witnessing the dramatization of a person's destruction. The theater in this view is an outlet for emotions that elsewhere would be harmful. But, it must be repeated, Aristotle's comments on catharsis are obscure; perhaps, too, they are wrong.

Most later theories on the pleasure of tragedy are footnotes to Aristotle's words on catharsis. Some say that our pleasure is sadistic (we enjoy the sight of suffering); some, that our pleasure is masochistic (we enjoy lacerating ourselves); some, that it lies in sympathy (we enjoy extending pity and benevolence to the wretched); some, that it lies in self-congratulation (we are reminded, when we see suffering, of our own good fortune); some, that we take pleasure in tragedy because the tragic hero acts out our secret desires, and we rejoice in his or her aggression, expiating our guilt in his or her suffering; and so on.

But this is uncertain psychology, and it mostly neglects the distinction between real suffering and dramatized suffering. In the latter, surely, part of the pleasure is in the contemplation of an aesthetic object, an object that is unified and complete. The chaos of real life seems, for a few moments in drama, to be ordered: the protagonist's action, his or her subsequent suffering, and the total cosmos seem somehow related. Tragedy has no use for the passerby who is killed by a falling brick. The events (the person's walk, the brick's fall) have no meaningful relation. But suppose a person chooses to climb a mountain, and in making the ascent sets in motion an avalanche that destroys that person. Here we find (however simple the illustration) something closer to tragedy. We do not say that people should avoid mountains, or that mountain climbers deserve to die by avalanches. But we feel that the event is unified, as the accidental conjunction of brick and passerby is not.

Tragedy thus presents some sort of ordered action; tragic drama itself is orderly. As we see or read it, we feel it cannot be otherwise; word begets word, deed begets deed, and every moment is exquisitely appropriate. Whatever the relevance on sadism, masochism, sympathy, and the rest, the pleasure of tragedy surely comes in part from the artistic shaping of the material.
A NOTE ON GREEK TRAGEDY

Little or nothing is known for certain of the origin of Greek tragedy. The most common hypothesis holds that it developed from improvised speeches during choral dances honoring Dionysus, a Greek nature god associated with spring, fertility, and wine. Thespis (who perhaps never existed) is said to have introduced an actor into these choral performances in the sixth century BCE. Aeschylus (525–456 BCE), Greece’s first great writer of tragedies, added the second actor, and Sophocles (4957–406 BCE) added the third actor and fixed the size of the chorus at fifteen. (Because the chorus leader often functioned as an additional actor, and because the actors sometimes doubled in their parts, a Greek tragedy could have more characters than might at first be thought.)

All the extant great Greek tragedy is of the fifth century BCE. It was performed at religious festivals in the winter and early spring, in large outdoor amphitheaters.
built on hillsides. Some of these theaters were enormous; the one at Epidaurus held about fifteen thousand people. The audience sat in tiers, looking down on the orchestra (a dancing place), with the acting area behind it and the skene (the scene building) yet farther back. The scene building served as dressing room, background (suggesting a palace or temple), and place for occasional entrances and exits. Furthermore, this building helped to provide good acoustics, for speech travels well if there is a solid barrier behind the speakers and a hard, smooth surface in front of them, and if the audience sits in tiers. The wall of the scene building provided the barrier; the orchestra provided the surface in front of the actors; and the seats on the hillside fulfilled the third requirement. Moreover, the acoustics were somewhat improved by slightly elevating the actors above the orchestra, but it is not known exactly when this platform was first constructed in front of the scene building.

A tragedy commonly begins with a prologos (prologue), during which the exposition is given. Next comes the párodos, the chorus’s ode of entrance, sung while the chorus marches into the theater through the side aisles and onto the orchestra. The epeisodion (episode) is the ensuing scene; it is followed by a stasimon (choral song, ode). Usually there are four or five epeisodia, alternating with stasima. Each of these choral odes has a strophe (lines presumably sung while the chorus dances in one direction) and an antistrophe (lines presumably sung while the chorus retraces its steps). Sometimes a third part, an epode, concludes an ode. (In addition to odes that are stasima, there can be odes within episodes; the fourth episode of Antigonê contains an ode complete with epode.) After the last part of the last ode comes the exodos, the epilogue or final scene.

The actors (all male) wore masks, and they seem to have chanted much of the play. Perhaps the total result of combining speech with music and dancing was a sort of music-drama roughly akin to opera with some spoken dialogue, such as Mozart’s The Magic Flute (1791).

TWO PLAYS BY SOPHOCLES

SOPHOCLES

One of the three great writers of tragedies in ancient Greece, Sophocles (496?–406 BCE) was born in Colonus, near Athens, into a well-to-do family. Well educated, he first won public acclaim as a tragic poet at the age of 27, in 468 BCE when he defeated Aeschylus in a competition for writing a tragic play. He is said to have written some 120 plays, but only seven tragedies are extant: among them are Oedipus Rex, Antigonê, and Oedipus at Colonus. He died, much honored, in his ninetieth year, in Athens, where he had lived his entire life.

CHARACTERS

OEDIPUS, king of Thebes
A PRIEST OF ZEUS
CREON, brother of Jocasta
A CHORUS of Theban citizens and their leader
TIRESIAS, a blind prophet
JOCASTA, the queen, wife of Oedipus
A MESSENGER from Corinth
A SHEPHERD MESSENGER from inside the palace
ANTIGONE, ISMENE, daughters of Oedipus and Jocasta GUARDS and attendants
PRIESTS of Thebes

[TIME AND SCENE: The royal house of Thebes. Double doors dominate the façade; a stone altar stands at the center of the stage.

Many years have passed since OEDIPUS solved the riddle of the Sphinx and ascended the throne of Thebes, and now a plague has struck the city. A procession of priests enters; suppliants, broken and despondent, they carry branches wound in wool and lay them on the altar.

The doors open. GUARDS assemble. OEDIPUS comes forward, majestic but for a telltale limp, and slowly views the condition of his people.]

OEDIPUS. Oh my children, the new blood of ancient Thebes, why are you here? Huddling at my altar, praying before me, your branches wound in wool.°
Our city reeks with the smoke of burning incense, rings with cries for the Healer° and wailing for the dead. I thought it wrong, my children, to hear the truth from others, messengers. Here I am myself—

3 branches wound in wool Suppliants laid such offerings on the altar of Apollo, god of healing, until their request was granted. Notice that in line 161 Oedipus tells the suppliants to remove the branches, thus suggesting that he will heal them. 5 the Healer Apollo.
you all know me, the world knows my fame:
I am Oedipus.

[Helping a PRIEST to his feet.]

Speak up, old man. Your years, your dignity—you should speak for the others.
Why here and kneeling, what preys upon you so?
Some sudden fear? Some strong desire?
You can trust me. I am ready to help,
I'll do anything. I would be blind to misery not to pity my people kneeling at my feet.

PRIEST. Oh Oedipus, king of the land, our greatest power!
You see us before you now, men of all ages clinging to your altars. Here are boys, still too weak to fly from the nest,
and here the old, bowed down with the years,
the holy ones—a priest of Zeus° myself—and here
the picked, unmarried men, the young hope of Thebes.
And all the rest, your great family gathers now, branches wreathed, massing in the squares, kneeling before the two temples of queen Athena° or the river-shrine where the embers glow and die and Apollo sees the future in the ashes.°

Our city—
look around you, see with your own eyes—our ship pitches wildly, cannot lift her head from the depths, the red waves of death...
Thebes is dying. A blight on the fresh crops and the rich pastures, cattle sicken and die, and the women die in labor, children stillborn,
and the plague, the fiery god of fever hurls down on the city, his lightning slashing through us—raging plague in all its vengeance, devastating the house of Cadmus!° And black Death luxuriates in the raw, wailing miseries of Thebes.
Now we pray to you. You cannot equal the gods, your children know that, bending at your altar.
But we do rate you first of men,
both in the common crises of our lives and face-to-face encounters with the gods.
You freed us from the Sphinx,° you came to Thebes

21 Zeus chief deity on Mt. Olympus, and father of Apollo. 25 Athena goddess of wisdom and protector of cities. 27 the ashes Diviners foretold the future by examining the ashes of burnt offerings. 37 Cadmus mythical founder of Thebes. 44 the Sphinx a female monster (body of a lion, wings of a bird, face of a woman) who asked the riddle “What goes on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three in the evening?” and who killed those who could not answer. When Oedipus responded correctly that man crawls on all fours in infancy, walks upright in maturity, and uses a staff in old age, the Sphinx destroyed herself.
and cut us loose from the bloody tribute we had paid that harsh, brutal singer. We taught you nothing, no skill, no extra knowledge, still you triumphed.
A god was with you, so they say, and we believe it—you lifted up our lives.

So now again,
Oedipus, king, we bend to you, your power—
we implore you, all of us on our knees:
find us strength, rescue! Perhaps you’ve heard the voice of a god or something from other men,
Oedipus . . . what do you know?
The man of experience—you see it every day—
his plans will work in a crisis, his first of all.

Act now—we beg you, best of men, raise up our city!
Act, defend yourself, your former glory!
Your country calls you savior now for your zeal, your action years ago.
Never let us remember of your reign:
you helped us stand, only to fall once more.
Oh raise up our city, set us on our feet.
The omens were good that day you brought us joy—be the same man today!
Rule our land, you know you have the power,
but rule a land of the living, not a wasteland.
Ship and towered city are nothing, stripped of men alive within it, living all as one.

OEDIPUS.

My children,
I pity you. I see—how could I fail to see what longings bring you here? Well I know you are sick to death, all of you, but sick as you are, not one is sick as I.
Your pain strikes each of you alone, each in the confines of himself, no other. But my spirit grieves for the city, for myself and all of you.
I wasn’t asleep, dreaming. You haven’t wakened me—I’ve wept through the nights, you must know that, groping, laboring over many paths of thought.
After a painful search I found one cure:
I acted at once. I sent Creon, my wife’s own brother, to Delphi—
Apollo the Prophet’s oracle—to learn what I might do or say to save our city.

Today’s the day. When I count the days gone by it torments me . . . what is he doing?
Strange, he’s late, he’s gone too long.
But once he returns, then, then I’ll be a traitor
if I do not do all the god makes clear.

45 bloody tribute i.e., the young Thebans who had tried to solve the riddle and had failed. 82 Delphi site of a shrine of Apollo.
PRIEST. Timely words. The men over there are signaling—Creon’s just arriving.

OEDIPUS. [Sighting Creon, then turning to the altar]

Lord Apollo,

let him come with a lucky word of rescue,
shining like his eyes!

PRIEST. Welcome news, I think—he’s crowned, look, and the laurel wreath is bright with berries.

OEDIPUS. We’ll soon see. He’s close enough to hear—

[Enter Creon from the side; his face is shaded with a wreath.]

Creon, prince, my kinsman, what do you bring us?
What message from the god?

CREON. Good news.
I tell you even the hardest things to bear,
if they should turn out well, all would be well.

OEDIPUS. Of course, but what were the god’s words? There’s no hope and nothing to fear in what you’ve said so far.

CREON. If you want my report in the presence of these . . .

[Pointing to the PRIESTS while drawing OEDIPUS toward the palace.]

I’m ready now, or we might go inside.

OEDIPUS. Speak out,
speak to us all. I grieve for these, my people, far more than I fear for my own life.

CREON. Very well,
I will tell you what I heard from the god.
Apollo commands us—he was quite clear—
"Drive the corruption from the land, don’t harbor it any longer, past all cure,
don’t nurse it in your soil—root it out!"

OEDIPUS. How can we cleanse ourselves—what rites?
What’s the source of the trouble?

CREON. Banish the man, or pay back blood with blood.
Murder sets the plague-storm on the city.

OEDIPUS. Whose murder?

CREON. Our leader,
my lord, was once a man named Laius,
before you came and put us straight on course.

OEDIPUS. I know—
or so I’ve heard. I never saw the man myself.

CREON. Well, he was killed, and Apollo commands us now—
he could not be more clear,
"Pay the killers back—whoever is responsible."

OEDIPUS. Where on earth are they? Where to find it now, the trail of the ancient guilt so hard to trace?

CREON. “Here in Thebes,” he said.
Whatever is sought for can be caught, you know;
whatever is neglected slips away.
OEDIPUS. But where, in the palace, the fields or foreign soil, where did Laius meet his bloody death?

CREON. He went to consult an oracle, Apollo said, and he set out and never came home again.

OEDIPUS. No messenger, no fellow-traveler saw what happened? Someone to cross-examine?

CREON. No, they were all killed but one. He escaped, terrified, he could tell us nothing clearly, nothing of what he saw—just one thing.

OEDIPUS. What’s that? One thing could hold the key to it all, a small beginning give us grounds for hope.

CREON. He said thieves attacked them—a whole band, not single-handed, cut King Laius down.

OEDIPUS. A thief, so daring, so wild, he’d kill a king? Impossible, unless conspirators paid him off in Thebes.

CREON. We suspected as much. But with Laius dead no leader appeared to help us in our troubles.

OEDIPUS. Trouble? Your king was murdered—royal blood! What stopped you from tracking down the killer then and there?

CREON. The singing, riddling Sphinx. She . . . persuaded us to let the mystery go and concentrate on what lay at our feet.

OEDIPUS. No, I’ll start again—I’ll bring it all to light myself! Apollo is right, and so are you, Creon, to turn our attention back to the murdered man. Now you have me to fight for you, you’ll see: I am the land’s avenger by all rights, and Apollo’s champion too. But not to assist some distant kinsman, no, for my own sake I’ll rid us of this corruption. Whoever killed the king may decide to kill me too, with the same violent hand—by avenging Laius I defend myself.

[To the priests.]

Quickly, my children. Up from the steps, take up your branches now.

[To the guards.]

One of you summon the city here before us, tell them I’ll do everything. God help us, we will see our triumph—or our fall.

[Oedipus and Creon enter the palace, followed by the guards.]

PRIEST. Rise, my sons. The kindness we came for Oedipus volunteers himself.
Apollo has sent his word, his oracle—
Come down, Apollo, save us, stop the plague.

[The priests rise, remove their branches and exit to the side. Enter a chorus, the citizens of Thebes, who have not heard the news that Creon brings. They march around the altar, chanting.]

CHORUS. Zeus!
Great welcome voice of Zeus, what do you bring?
What word from the gold vaults of Delphi comes to brilliant Thebes? Racked with terror—terror shakes my heart and I cry your wild cries, Apollo, Healer of Delos
I worship you in dread . . . what now, what is your price?
some new sacrifice? some ancient rite from the past come round again each spring?—
what will you bring to birth?
Tell me, child of golden Hope warm voice that never dies!
You are the first I call, daughter of Zeus deathless Athena—I call your sister Artemis, heart of the market place enthroned in glory,
guardian of our earth—
I call Apollo, Archer astride the thunderheads of heaven—
O triple shield against death, shine before me now!
If ever, once in the past, you stopped some ruin launched against our walls you hurled the flame of pain far, far from Thebes—you gods come now, come down once more!

No, no
the miseries numberless, grief on grief, no end—too much to bear, we are all dying
O my people . . .
Thebes like a great army dying and there is no sword of thought to save us, no and the fruits of our famous earth, they will not ripen no and the women cannot scream their pangs to birth—screams for the Healer, children dead in the womb and life on life goes down
you can watch them go like seabirds winging west, outracing the day’s fire down the horizon, irresistibly streaking on to the shores of Evening

Death
so many deaths, numberless deaths on deaths, no end—Thebes is dying, look, her children stripped of pity . . .
generations strewn on the ground

169 welcome voice of Zeus Apollo, son of Zeus, spoke for Zeus. 173 Delos sacred island where Apollo was born. 181 Artemis a goddess, sister of Apollo.
unburied, unwept, the dead spreading death and the young wives and gray-haired mothers with them cling to the altars, trailing in from all over the city—

Thebes, city of death, one long cortege and the suffering rises wails for mercy rise and the wild hymn for the Healer blazes out clashing with our sobs our cries of mourning—
O golden daughter of god,° send rescue radiant as the kindness in your eyes!

Drive him back!—the fever, the god of death that raging god of war
not armored in bronze, not shielded now, he burns me, battle cries in the onslaught burning on—
O rout him from our borders!
Sail him, blast him out to the Sea-queen’s chamber the black Atlantic guls or the northern harbor, death to all where the Thracian surf comes crashing.
Now what the night spares he comes by day and kills—the god of death.

O lord of the stormcloud,
you who twirl the lightning, Zeus, Father, thunder Death to nothing!

Apollo, lord of the light, I beg you—whip your longbow’s golden cord showering arrows on our enemies—shafts of power champions strong before us rushing on!

Artemis, Huntress,
torches flaring over the eastern ridges—ride Death down in pain!

God of the headdress gleaming gold, I cry to you—your name and ours are one, Dionysus°— come with your face aflame with wine your raving women’s cries your army on the march! Come with the lightning come with torches blazing, eyes ablaze with glory!
Burn that god of death that all gods hate!

[OEDIPUS enters from the palace to address the CHORUS, as if addressing the entire city of Thebes.]

OEDIPUS. You pray to the gods? Let me grant your prayers.
Come, listen to me—do what the plague demands:
you’ll find relief and lift your head from the depths.
I will speak out now as a stranger to the story,
a stranger to the crime. If I’d been present then, 215 golden daughter of god Athena.  239 Dionysus god of wine and fertility. He was attended by the Maenads (the “raving women” of line 241).

there would have been no mystery, no long hunt without a clue in hand. So now, counted a native Theban years after the murder, to all of Thebes I make this proclamation: if any one of you knows who murdered Laius, the son of Labdacus, I order him to reveal the whole truth to me. Nothing to fear, even if he must denounce himself, let him speak up and so escape the brunt of the charge— he will suffer no unbearable punishment, nothing worse than exile, totally unharmed.

[Oedipus pauses, waiting for a reply.]

Next, if anyone knows the murderer is a stranger, a man from alien soil, come, speak up. I will give him a handsome reward, and lay up gratitude in my heart for him besides. [Silence again, no reply.] But if you keep silent, if anyone panicking, trying to shield himself or friend or kin, rejects my offer, then hear what I will do. I order you, every citizen of the state where I hold throne and power: banish this man—whoever he may be—never shelter him, never speak a word to him, never make him partner to your prayers, your victims burned to the gods. Never let the holy water touch his hands Drive him out, each of you, from every home. He is the plague, the heart of our corruption, as Apollo’s oracle has just revealed to me. So I honor my obligations: I fight for the god and for the murdered man. Now my curse on the murderer. Whoever he is, a lone man unknown in his crime or one among many, let that man drag out his life in agony, step by painful step— I curse myself as well . . . if by any chance he proves to be an intimate of our house, here at my hearth, with my full knowledge, may the curse I just called down on him strike me! These are your orders: perform them to the last. I command you, for my sake, for Apollo’s, for this country blasted root and branch by the angry heavens. Even if god had never urged you on to act, how could you leave the crime uncleansed so long? A man so noble—your king, brought down in blood—you should have searched. But I am the king now, I hold the throne that he held then, possess his bed and a wife who shares our seed . . . why, our seed might be the same, children born of the same mother might have created blood-bonds between us if his hope of offspring hadn’t met disaster—but fate swooped at his head and cut him short.

So I will fight for him as if he were my father, stop at nothing, search the world to lay my hands on the man who shed his blood, the son of Labdacus descended of Polydorus, Cadmus of old and Agenor, founder of the line: their power and mine are one.

Oh dear gods, my curse on those who disobey these orders!

Let no crops grow out of the earth for them—shrivels their women, kill their sons, burn them to nothing in this plague that hits us now, or something even worse.

But you, loyal men of Thebes who approve my actions, may our champion, Justice, may all the gods be with us, fight beside us to the end!

LEADER. In the grip of your curse, my king, I swear I’m not the murderer, I cannot point him out.

As for the search, Apollo pressed it on us—he should name the killer.

OEDIPUS. Quite right, but to force the gods to act against their will—no man has the power.

LEADER. Then if I might mention the next best thing . . .

OEDIPUS. The third best too—don’t hold back, say it.

LEADER. I still believe . . .

Lord Tiresias° sees with the eyes of Lord Apollo. Anyone searching for the truth, my king, might learn it from the prophet, clear as day.

OEDIPUS. I’ve not been slow with that. On Creon’s cue I sent the escorts, twice, within the hour. I’m surprised he isn’t here.

LEADER. We need him—without him we have nothing but old, useless rumors.

OEDIPUS. Which rumors? I’ll search out every word.

LEADER. Laius was killed, they say, by certain travelers.

OEDIPUS. I know—but no one can find the murderer.

LEADER. If the man has a trace of fear in him he won’t stay silent long, not with your curses ringing in his ears.

OEDIPUS. He didn’t flinch at murder, he’ll never flinch at words.

323 Tiresias a blind prophet.
[Enter Tiresias, the blind prophet, led by a boy with escorts in attendance. He remains at a distance.]

Leader. Here is the one who will convict him, look, they bring him on at last, the seer, the man of god. The truth lives inside him, him alone.

Oedipus. O Tiresias, master of all the mysteries of our life, all you teach and all you dare not tell, signs in the heavens, signs that walk the earth! Blind as you are, you can feel all the more what sickness haunts our city. You, my lord, are the one shield, the one savior we can find.

We asked Apollo—perhaps the messengers haven’t told you—he sent his answer back: “Relief from the plague can only come one way. Uncover the murderers of Laius, put them to death or drive them into exile.” So I beg you, grudge us nothing now, no voice, no message plucked from the birds, the embers or the other mantic ways within your grasp. Rescue yourself, your city, rescue me—rescue everything infected by the dead. We are in your hands. For a man to help others with all his gifts and native strength: that is the noblest work.

Tiresias. How terrible—to see the truth when the truth is only pain to him who sees! I knew it well, but I put it from my mind, else I never would have come.

Oedipus. What’s this? Why so grim, so dire?

Tiresias. Just send me home. You bear your burdens, I’ll bear mine. It’s better that way, please believe me.

Oedipus. Strange response . . . unlawful, unfriendly too to the state that bred and reared you—you withhold the word of god.

Tiresias. I fail to see that your own words are so well-timed. I’d rather not have the same thing said of me . . .

Oedipus. For the love of god, don’t turn away, not if you know something. We beg you, all of us on our knees.

Tiresias. None of you knows—and I will never reveal my dreadful secrets, not to say your own.

Oedipus. What? You know and you won’t tell? You’re bent on betraying us, destroying Thebes?

Tiresias. I’d rather not cause pain for you or me. So why this . . . useless interrogation? You’ll get nothing from me.
Nothing! You, you scum of the earth, you'd enrage a heart of stone! You won't talk? Nothing moves you? Out with it, once and for all!

You criticize my temper . . . unaware of the one you live with, you revile me.

Who could restrain his anger hearing you? What outrage—you spurn the city!

What will come will come. Even if I shroud it all in silence.

What will come? You're bound to tell me that.

I'll say no more. Do as you like, build your anger to whatever pitch you please, rage your worst—

Oh I'll let loose, I have such fury in me—now I see it all. You helped hatch the plot, you did the work, yes, short of killing him with your own hands—and given eyes I'd say you did the killing single-handed!

Is that so!

I charge you, then, submit to that decree you just laid down: from this day onward speak to no one, not these citizens, not myself. You are the curse, the corruption of the land!

You, shameless—are you appalled to start up such a story? You think you can get away with this?

I have already.

Who primed you for this? Not your prophet's trade.

You did, you forced me, twisted it out of me.

What? Say it again—I'll understand it better.

I say you are the murderer you hunt.

That obscenity, twice—by god, you'll pay.

Shall I say more, so you can really rage?

Much as you want. Your words are nothing—futile.

You cannot imagine . . . I tell you, you and your loved ones live together in infamy, you cannot see how far you've gone in guilt.

You think you can keep this up and never suffer?

Indeed, if the truth has any power.

It does but not for you, old man. You've lost your power, stone-blind, stone-deaf—senses, eyes blind as stone!

I pity you, flinging at me the very insults each man here will fling at you so soon.

Blind, lost in the night, endless night that cursed you!
You can’t hurt me or anyone else who sees the light—you can never touch me.

TIRESIAS. True, it is not your fate to fall at my hands. Apollo is quite enough, and he will take some pains to work this out.

OEDIPUS. Creon! Is this conspiracy his or yours?

TIRESIAS. Creon is not your downfall, no, you are your own.

OEDIPUS. O power—wealth and empire, skill outstripping skill in the heady rivalries of life, what envy lurks inside you! Just for this, the crown the city gave me—I never sought it, they laid it in my hands—for this alone, Creon, the soul of trust, my loyal friend from the start steals against me . . . so hungry to overthrow me he sets this wizard on me, this scheming quack, this fortune-teller peddling lies, eyes peedled for his own profit—seer blind in his craft! Come here, you pious fraud. Tell me, when did you ever prove yourself a prophet? When the Sphinx, that chanting Fury kept her deathwatch here, why silent then, not a word to set our people free? There was a riddle, not for some passer-by to solve—it cried out for a prophet. Where were you? Did you rise to the crisis? Not a word, you and your birds, your gods—nothing. No, but I came by, Oedipus the ignorant, I stopped the Sphinx! With no help from the birds, the flight of my own intelligence hit the mark.

And this is the man you’d try to overthrow? You think you’ll stand by Creon when he’s king? You and the great mastermind—you’ll pay in tears, I promise you, for this, this witch-hunt. If you didn’t look so senile the lash would teach you what your scheming means!

LEADER. I would suggest his words were spoken in anger, Oedipus . . . yours too, and it isn’t what we need. The best solution to the oracle, the riddle posed by god—we should look for that.

TIRESIAS. You are the king no doubt, but in one respect, at least, I am your equal: the right to reply. I claim that privilege too. I am not your slave. I serve Apollo. I don’t need Creon to speak for me in public.

So, you mock my blindness? Let me tell you this. You with your precious eyes, you’re blind to the corruption of your life, to the house you live in, those you live with—who are your parents? Do you know? All unknowing you are the scourge of your own flesh and blood, the dead below the earth and the living here above, and the double lash of your mother and your father’s curse will whip you from this land one day, their footfall treading you down in terror, darkness shrouding your eyes that now can see the light!

Soon, soon you’ll scream aloud—what haven won’t reverberate? What rock of Cithaeron° won’t scream back in echo? That day you learn the truth about your marriage, the wedding-march that sang you into your halls, the lusty voyage home to the fatal harbor! And a crowd of other horrors you’d never dream will level you with yourself and all your children. There. Now smear us with insults—Creon, myself, and every word I’ve said. No man will ever be rooted from the earth as brutally as you.

OEDIPUS. Enough! Such filth from him? Insufferable—what, still alive? Get out—faster, back where you came from—vanish!

TIRESIAS. I would never have come if you hadn’t called me here.

OEDIPUS. If I thought you would blurt out such absurdities, you’d have died waiting before I’d had you summoned.

TIRESIAS. Absurd, am I! To you, not to your parents: the ones who bore you found me sane enough.

OEDIPUS. Parents—who? Wait . . . who is my father?

TIRESIAS. This day will bring your birth and your destruction.

OEDIPUS. Riddles—all you can say are riddles, murk and darkness.

TIRESIAS. Ah, but aren’t you the best man alive at solving riddles?

OEDIPUS. Mock me for that, go on, and you’ll reveal my greatness.

TIRESIAS. Your great good fortune, true, it was your ruin.

OEDIPUS. Not if I saved the city—what do I care?

TIRESIAS. Well then, I’ll be going.

[To his attendant.]

Take me home, boy.

OEDIPUS. Yes, take him away. You’re a nuisance here. Out of the way, the irritation’s gone.

[Turning his back on TIRESIAS, moving toward the palace.]

TIRESIAS. I will go, once I have said what I came here to say. I’ll never shrink from the anger in your eyes—you can’t destroy me. Listen to me closely: the man you’ve sought so long, proclaiming, cursing up and down, the murderer of Laius—he is here. A stranger. you may think, who lives among you, he soon will be revealed a native Theban Cithaeron mountains near Thebes, where Oedipus was abandoned as an infant.

but he will take no joy in the revelation.
Blind who now has eyes, beggar who now is rich,
he will grope his way toward a foreign soil,
a stick tapping before him step by step.

[OEDIPUS enters the palace.]

Revealed at last, brother and father both to the children he embraces; to his mother son and husband both—he sowed the loins his father sowed, he spilled his father’s blood!

Go in and reflect on that, solve that.
And if you find I’ve lied
from this day onward call the prophet blind.

[TIRESIAS and the boy exit to the side.]

CHORUS. Who—
who is the man the voice of god denounces resounding out of the rocky gorge of Delphi?
The horror too dark to tell,
whose ruthless bloody hands have done the work?
His time has come to fly to outrace the stallions of the storm his feet a streak of speed—
 Cased in armor, Apollo son of the Father lunges on him, lightning-bolts afire!
 And the grim unerring Furies° closing for the kill.

Look,
the word of god has just come blazing flashing off Parnassus° snowy heights!
 That man who left no trace—after him, hunt him down with all our strength!
Now under bristling timber up through rocks and caves he stalks like the wild mountain bull—cut off from men, each step an agony, frenzied, racing blind but he cannot outrace the dread voices of Delphi ringing out of the heart of Earth, the dark wings beating around him shrieking doom
 the doom that never dies, the terror—

The skilled prophet scans the birds and shatters me with terror!
I can’t accept him, can’t deny him, don’t know what to say,
I’m lost, and the wings of dark foreboding beating—
I cannot see what’s come, what’s still to come . . .
and what could breed a blood feud between Laius’ house and the son of Polybus°

---

536 Furies avenging deities. 539 Parnassus a mountain associated with Apollo.
555 son of Polybus Oedipus is mistakenly thought to be the son of Polybus, King of Corinth.
I know of nothing, not in the past and not now, no charge to bring against our king, no cause to attack his fame that rings throughout Thebes—not without proof—not for the ghost of Laius, not to avenge a murder gone without a trace.

Zeus and Apollo know, they know, the great masters of all the dark and depth of human life.
But whether a mere man can know the truth, whether a seer can fathom more than I—there is no test, no certain proof though matching skill for skill
a man can outstrip a rival. No, not till I see these charges proved will I side with his accusers.
We saw him then, when the she-hawk swept against him, saw with our own eyes his skill, his brilliant triumph—
there was the test—he was the joy of Thebes!
Never will I convict my king, never in my heart.

[Enter CREON from the side.]
CREON. My fellow-citizens, I hear King Oedipus levels terrible charges at me. I had to come.
I resent it deeply. If, in the present crisis he thinks he suffers any abuse from me, anything I’ve done or said that offers him the slightest injury, why, I’ve no desire to linger out this life, my reputation in ruins.
The damage I’d face from such an accusation is nothing simple. No, there’s nothing worse: branded a traitor in the city, a traitor to all of you and my good friends.
LEADER. True, but a slur might have been forced out of him, by anger perhaps, not any firm conviction.
CREON. The charge was made in public, wasn’t it? I put the prophet up to spreading lies?
LEADER. Such things were said . . .
CREON. Was his glance steady, his mind right when the charge was brought against me?
LEADER. I really couldn’t say. I never look to judge the ones in power.

[The doors open. OEDIPUS enters.]

Wait,
here’s Oedipus now.
OEDIPUS. You—here? You have the gall to show your face before the palace gates?
You, plotting to kill me, kill the king—

569 the she-hawk the Sphinx.
I see it all, the marauding thief himself scheming to steal my crown and power!

Tell me,
in god’s name, what did you take me for,
coward or fool, when you spun out your plot?
Your treachery—you think I’d never detect it creeping against me in the dark? Or sensing it, not defend myself? Aren’t you the fool, you and your high adventure. Lacking numbers, powerful friends, out for the big game of empire—
you need riches, armies to bring that quarry down!

CREON. Are you quite finished? It’s your turn to listen for just as long as you’ve . . . instructed me.
Hear me out, then judge me on the facts.

OEDIPUS. You’ve a wicked way with words, Creon, but I’ll be slow to learn—from you.
I find you a menace, a great burden to me.

CREON. Just one thing, hear me out in this.

OEDIPUS. Just one thing, don’t tell me you’re not the enemy, the traitor.

CREON. Look, if you think crude, mindless stubbornness such a gift, you’ve lost your sense of balance.

OEDIPUS. If you think you can abuse a kinsman, then escape the penalty, you’re insane.

CREON. Fair enough, I grant you. But this injury you say I’ve done you, what is it?

OEDIPUS. Did you induce me, yes or no, to send for that sanctimonious prophet?

CREON. I did. And I’d do the same again.

OEDIPUS. All right then, tell me, how long is it now since Laius . . .

CREON. Laius—what did be do?

OEDIPUS. Vanished,
swept from sight, murdered in his tracks.

CREON. The count of the years would run you far back . . .

OEDIPUS. And that far back, was the prophet at his trade?

CREON. Skilled as he is today, and just as honored.

OEDIPUS. Did he ever refer to me then, at that time?

CREON. No,
never, at least, when I was in his presence.

OEDIPUS. But you did investigate the murder, didn’t you?

CREON. We did our best, of course, discovered nothing.

OEDIPUS. But the great seer never accused me then—why not?

CREON. I don’t know. And when I don’t, I keep quiet.

OEDIPUS. You do know this, you’d tell it too—
if you had a shred of decency.

CREON. What?

If I know, I won’t hold back.

OEDIPUS. Simply this:
if the two of you had never put heads together,
we would never have heard about my killing Laius.
CREON. If that’s what he says . . . well, you know best. But now I have a right to learn from you as you just learned from me.

OEDIPUS. Learn your fill, you never will convict me of the murder.

CREON. Tell me, you’re married to my sister, aren’t you? 645

OEDIPUS. A genuine discovery—there’s no denying that.

CREON. And you rule the land with her, with equal power?

OEDIPUS. She receives from me whatever she desires.

CREON. And I am the third, all of us are equals?

OEDIPUS. Yes, and it’s there you show your stripes— you betray a kinsman.

CREON. Not at all. Not if you see things calmly, rationally, as I do. Look at it this way first: who in his right mind would rather rule and live in anxiety than sleep in peace? Particularly if he enjoys the same authority. Not I, I’m not the man to yearn for kingship, not with a king’s power in my hands. Who would? Now, as it is, you offer me all I need, not a fear in the world. But if I wore the crown . . . there’d be many painful duties to perform, hardly to my taste.

How could kingship please me more than influence, power without a qualm? I’m not that deluded yet, to reach for anything but privilege outright, profit free and clear. Now all men sing my praises, all salute me, now all who request your favors curry mine. I am their best hope: success rests in me. Why give up that, I ask you, and borrow trouble? A man of sense, someone who sees things clearly would never resort to treason. No, I’ve no lust for conspiracy in me, nor could I ever suffer one who does.

Do you want proof? Go to Delphi yourself, examine the oracle and see if I’ve reported the message word-for-word. This too: if you detect that I and the clairvoyant have plotted anything in common, arrest me, execute me. Not on the strength of one vote, two in this case, mine as well as yours. But don’t convict me on sheer unverified surmise. How wrong it is to take the good for bad, purely at random, or take the bad for good. But reject a friend, a kinsman? I would as soon tear out the life within us, priceless life itself. You’ll learn this well, without fail, in time.
Time alone can bring the just man to light—the criminal you can spot in one short day.

LEADER. Good advice, my lord, for anyone who wants to avoid disaster. Those who jump to conclusions may go wrong.

OEDIPUS. When my enemy moves against me quickly, plots in secret, I move quickly too, I must, I plot and pay him back. Relax my guard a moment, waiting his next move—he wins his objective, I lose mine.

CREON. What do you want?

You want me banished?

OEDIPUS. No, I want you dead.

CREON. Just to show how ugly a grudge can . . .

OEDIPUS. So, still stubborn? you don’t think I’m serious?

CREON. I think you’re insane.

OEDIPUS. Quite sane—in my behalf.

CREON. Not just as much in mine?

OEDIPUS. You—my mortal enemy?

CREON. What if you’re wholly wrong?

OEDIPUS. No matter—I must rule.

CREON. Not if you rule unjustly.

OEDIPUS. Hear him, Thebes, my city!

CREON. My city too, not yours alone!

LEADER. Please, my lords.

[Enter JOCASTA from the palace.]

Look, Jocasta’s coming, and just in time too. With her help you must put this fighting of yours to rest.

JOCASTA. Have you no sense? Poor misguided men, such shouting—why this public outburst? Aren’t you ashamed, with the land so sick, to stir up private quarrels?

[To OEDIPUS.]

Into the palace now. And Creon, you go home. Why make such a furor over nothing?

CREON. My sister, it’s dreadful . . . Oedipus, your husband, he’s bent on a choice of punishments for me, banishment from the fatherland or death.

OEDIPUS. Precisely. I caught him in the act, Jocasta, plotting, about to stab me in the back.

CREON. Never—curse me, let me die and be damned if I’ve done you any wrong you charge me with.

JOCASTA. Oh god, believe it, Oedipus, honor the solemn oath he swears to heaven. Do it for me, for the sake of all your people.
[The CHORUS begins to chant.]

CHORUS. Believe it, be sensible give way, my king, I beg you!
OEDIPUS. What do you want from me, concessions?
CHORUS. Respect him—he’s been no fool in the past and now he’s strong with the oath he swears to god.
OEDIPUS. You know what you’re asking?
CHORUS. I do.
OEDIPUS. Then out with it!
CHORUS. The man’s your friend, your kin, he’s under oath—don’t cast him out, disgraced branded with guilt on the strength of hearsay only.
OEDIPUS. Know full well, if that is what you want you want me dead or banished from the land.
CHORUS. Never—
no, by the blazing Sun, first god of the heavens!
Stripped of the gods, stripped of loved ones,
let me die by inches if that ever crossed my mind.
But the heart inside me sickens, dies as the land dies and now on top of the old griefs you pile this, your fury—both of you!
OEDIPUS. Then let him go,
even if it does lead to my ruin, my death or my disgrace, driven from Thebes for life.
It’s you, not him I pity—your words move me.
He, wherever he goes, my hate goes with him.
CREON. Look at you, sullen in yielding, brutal in your rage—you’ll go too far. It’s perfect justice:
natures like yours are hardest on themselves.
OEDIPUS. Then leave me alone—get out!
CREON. I’m going.
You’re wrong, so wrong. These men know I’m right.

[Exit to the side. The CHORUS turns to JOCASTA.]

CHORUS. Why do you hesitate, my lady why not help him in?
JOCASTA. Tell me what’s happened first.
CHORUS. Loose, ignorant talk started dark suspicions and a sense of injustice cut deeply too.
JOCASTA. On both sides?
CHORUS. Oh yes.
JOCASTA. What did they say?
CHORUS. Enough, please, enough! The land’s so racked already or so it seems to me . . .
End the trouble here, just where they left it.
OEDIPUS. You see what comes of your good intentions now?
And all because you tried to blunt my anger.
CHORUS. My king,
I’ve said it once, I’ll say it time and again—
I’d be insane, you know it, senseless, ever to turn my back on you.
You who set our beloved land—storm-tossed, shattered—straight on course. Now again, good helmsman, steer us through the storm!

[The CHORUS draws away, leaving OEDIPUS and JOCASTA side by side.]

JOCASTA. For the love of god,
Oedipus, tell me too, what is it?
Why this rage? You’re so unbending.
OEDIPUS. I will tell you. I respect you, Jocasta, much more than these . . .

[Glancing at the CHORUS.]

Creon’s to blame, Creon schemes against me.
JOCASTA. Tell me clearly, how did the quarrel start?
OEDIPUS. He says I murdered Laius—I am guilty.
JOCASTA. How does he know? Some secret knowledge or simple hearsay?
OEDIPUS. Oh, he sent his prophet in to do his dirty work. You know Creon, Creon keeps his own lips clean.

JOCASTA. A prophet?
Well then, free yourself of every charge!
Listen to me and learn some peace of mind:
no skill in the world,
nothing human can penetrate the future.
Here is proof, quick and to the point.

An oracle came to Laius one fine day
(I won’t say from Apollo himself but his underlings, his priests) and it said that doom would strike him down at the hands of a son, our son, to be born of our own flesh and blood. But Laius, so the report goes at least, was killed by strangers, thieves, at a place where three roads meet . . . my son—
he wasn’t three days old and the boy’s father fastened his ankles, had a henchman fling him away on a barren, trackless mountain.

There, you see?
Apollo brought neither thing to pass. My baby no more murdered his father than Laius suffered—his wildest fear—death at his own son’s hands.
That’s how the seers and all their revelations mapped out the future. Brush them from your mind.
Whatever the god needs and seeks he’ll bring to light himself, with ease.

OEDIPUS. Strange,
hearing you just now . . . my mind wandered,
my thoughts racing back and forth.
JOCASTA. What do you mean? Why so anxious, startled?

OEDIPUS. I thought I heard you say that Laius was cut down at a place where three roads meet.

JOCASTA. That was the story. It hasn’t died out yet.

OEDIPUS. Where did this thing happen? Be precise.

JOCASTA. A place called Phocis, where two branching roads, one from Daulia, one from Delphi, come together—a crossroads.

OEDIPUS. When? How long ago?

JOCASTA. The heralds no sooner reported Laius dead than you appeared and they hailed you king of Thebes.

OEDIPUS. My god, my god—what have you planned to do to me?

JOCASTA. What, Oedipus? What haunts you so?

OEDIPUS. Not yet.

Laius—how did he look? Describe him. Had he reached his prime?

JOCASTA. He was swarthy, and the gray had just begun to streak his temples, and his build... wasn’t far from yours.

OEDIPUS. Oh no no, I think I’ve just called down a dreadful curse upon myself—I simply didn’t know!

JOCASTA. What are you saying? I shudder to look at you.

OEDIPUS. I have a terrible fear the blind seer can see. I’ll know in a moment. One thing more—JOCASTA. Anything, afraid as I am—ask, I’ll answer, all I can.

OEDIPUS. Did he go with a light or heavy escort, several men-at-arms, like a lord, a king?

JOCASTA. There were five in the party, a herald among them, and a single wagon carrying Laius.

OEDIPUS. Ai—now I can see it all, clear as day. Who told you all this at the time, Jocasta?

JOCASTA. A servant who reached home, the lone survivor.

OEDIPUS. So, could he still be in the palace—even now?

JOCASTA. No indeed. Soon as he returned from the scene and saw you on the throne with Laius dead and gone, he knelt and clutched my hand, pleading with me to send him into the hinterlands, to pasture, far as possible, out of sight of Thebes. I sent him away. Slave though he was, he’d earned that favor—and much more.

OEDIPUS. Can we bring him back, quickly?

JOCASTA. Easily. Why do you want him so?

OEDIPUS. I’m afraid, Jocasta, I have said too much already. That man—I’ve got to see him.

JOCASTA. Then he’ll come. But even I have a right, I’d like to think, to know what’s torturing you, my lord.
OEDIPUS. And so you shall—I can hold nothing back from you, now I’ve reached this pitch of dark foreboding. Who means more to me than you? Tell me, whom would I turn toward but you as I go through all this?

My father was Polybus, king of Corinth. My mother, a Dorian, Merope. And I was held the prince of the realm among the people there, till something struck me out of nowhere, something strange . . . worth remarking perhaps, hardly worth the anxiety I gave it. Some man at a banquet who had drunk too much shouted out—he was far gone, mind you—that I am not my father’s son. Fighting words! I barely restrained myself that day but early the next I went to mother and father, questioned them closely, and they were enraged at the accusation and the fool who let it fly. So as for my parents I was satisfied, but still this thing kept gnawing at me, the slander spread—I had to make my move.

And so, unknown to mother and father I set out for Delphi, and the god Apollo spurned me, sent me away denied the facts I came for, but first he flashed before my eyes a future great with pain, terror, disaster—I can hear him cry, “You are fated to couple with your mother, you will bring a breed of children into the light no man can bear to see—you will kill your father, the one who gave you life!” I heard all that and ran. I abandoned Corinth, from that day on I gauged its landfall only by the stars, running, always running toward some place where I would never see the shame of all those oracles come true. And as I fled I reached that very spot where the great king, you say, met his death. Now, Jocasta, I will tell you all. Making my way toward this triple crossroad I began to see a herald, then a brace of colts drawing a wagon, and mounted on the bench . . . a man, just as you’ve described him, coming face-to-face, and the one in the lead and the old man himself were about to thrust me off the road—brute force—and the one shouldering me aside, the driver, I strike him in anger!—and the old man, watching me coming up along his wheels—he brings down his prod, two prongs straight at my head! I paid him back with interest! Short work, by god—with one blow of the staff in this right hand I knock him out of his high seat, roll him out of the wagon, sprawling headlong—
I killed them all—every mother’s son!
Oh, but if there is any blood-tie between Laius and this stranger . . .
what man alive more miserable than I?
More hated by the gods? I am the man no alien, no citizen welcomes to his house, law forbids it—not a word to me in public,
driven out of every hearth and home.
And all these curses I—no one but I brought down these piling curses on myself!
And you, his wife, I’ve touched your body with these,
the hands that killed your husband cover you with blood.
Wasn’t I born for torment? Look me in the eyes!
I am abomination—heart and soul!
I must be exiled, and even in exile never see my parents, never set foot on native ground again. Else I am doomed to couple with my mother and cut my father down . . .
Polybus who reared me, gave me life.

But why, why?
Wouldn’t a man of judgment say—and wouldn’t he be right—
some savage power has brought this down upon my head?
Oh no, not that, you pure and awesome gods, never let me see that day! Let me slip from the world of men, vanish without a trace before I see myself stained with such corruption, stained to the heart.

LEADER. My lord, you fill our hearts with fear.
But at least until you question the witness,
don’t take hope.

OEDIPUS. Exactly. He is my last hope—
I am waiting for the shepherd. He is crucial.

JOCASTA. And once he appears, what then? Why so urgent?

OEDIPUS. I will tell you. If it turns out that his story matches yours, I’ve escaped the worst.

JOCASTA. What did I say? What struck you so?

OEDIPUS. You said thieves—
he told you a whole band of them murdered Laius.
So, if he still holds to the same number,
I cannot be the killer. One can’t equal many.
But if he refers to one man, one alone,
clearly the scales come down on me:
I am guilty.

JOCASTA. Impossible. Trust me,
I told you precisely what he said,
and he can’t retract it now;
the whole city heard it, not just I.
And even if he should vary his first report
by one man more or less, still, my lord, he could never make the murder of Laius truly fit the prophecy. Apollo was explicit:
my son was doomed to kill my husband . . . my son, poor defenseless thing, he never had a chance to kill his father. They destroyed him first.
So much for prophecy. It’s neither here nor there.
From this day on, I wouldn’t look right or left.
OEDIPUS. True, true. Still, that shepherd, someone fetch him—now!
JOCASTA. I’ll send at once. But do let’s go inside.
I’d never displease you, least of all in this.
[OEDIPUS and JOCASTA enter the palace.]
CHORUS. Destiny guide me always Destiny find me filled with reverence pure in word and deed.
Great laws tower above us, reared on high born for the brilliant vault of heaven—
Olympian Sky their only father, nothing mortal, no man gave them birth,
their memory deathless, never lost in sleep:
within them lives a mighty god, the god does not grow old.

Pride breeds the tyrant violent pride, gorging, crammed to bursting with all that is overripe and rich with ruin—clawing up to the heights, headlong pride crashes down the abyss—sheer doom!
No footing helps, all foothold lost and gone.
But the healthy strife that makes the city strong—
I pray that god will never end that wrestling:
god, my champion, I will never let you go.
But if any man comes striding, high and mighty in all he says and does,
no fear of justice, no reverence for the temples of the gods—
let a rough doom tear him down, repay his pride, breakneck, ruinous pride!
If he cannot reap his profits fairly cannot restrain himself from outrage—mad, laying hands on the holy things untouchable!

Can such a man, so desperate, still boast
he can save his life from the flashing bolts of god?
If all such violence goes with honor now
why join the sacred dance?

Never again will I go reverent to Delphi, the inviolate heart of Earth or Apollo’s ancient oracle at Abae or Olympia of the fires—unless these prophecies all come true for all mankind to point toward in wonder.
King of kings, if you deserve your titles
Zeus, remember, never forget!
You and your deathless, everlasting reign.

They are dying, the old oracles sent to Laius,
now our masters strike them off the rolls.
Nowhere Apollo’s golden glory now—
the gods, the gods go down.

[Enter JOCASTA from the palace, carrying a suppliant’s branch wound in wool.]

JOCASTA. Lords of the realm, it occurred to me, just now, to visit the temples of the gods,
so I have my branch in my hand and incense too.
Oedipus is beside himself. Racked with anguish, no longer a man of sense, he won’t admit the latest prophecies are hollow as the old—he’s at the mercy of every passing voice
if the voice tells of terror.
I urge him gently, nothing seems to help,
so I turn to you, Apollo, you are nearest.

[Placing her branch on the altar, while an old herdsman enters from the side, not the one just summoned by the King but an unexpected MESSENGER from Corinth.]

MESSENGER. [Approaching JOCASTA and the CHORUS.]
Strangers, please, I wonder if you could lead us to the palace of the king . . . I think it’s Oedipus.
Better, the man himself—you know where he is?
LEADER. This is his palace, stranger. He’s inside.
But here is his queen, his wife and mother of his children.
MESSENGER. Blessings on you, noble queen, queen of Oedipus crowned with all your family—blessings on you always!
JOCASTA. And the same to you, stranger, you deserve it . . .
such a greeting. But what have you come for?
Have you brought us news?
MESSENGER. Wonderful news—for the house, my lady, for your husband too.
JOCASTA. Really, what? Who sent you?
MESSENGER. Corinth.
I’ll give you the message in a moment.
You’ll be glad of it—how could you help it?—
though it costs a little sorrow in the bargain.
JOCASTA. What can it be, with such a double edge?
MESSENGER. The people there, they want to make your Oedipus king of Corinth, so they’re saying now.
JOCASTA. Why? Isn’t old Polybus still in power?
MESSENGER. No more. Death has got him in the tomb.
JOCASTA. What are you saying? Polybus, dead?—dead?
MESSENGER. If not, if I’m not telling the truth, strike me dead too.
JOCASTA. [To a servant.] Quickly, go to your master, tell him this!
You prophecies of the gods, where are you now?
This is the man that Oedipus feared for years,
he fled him, not to kill him—and now he’s dead,
quite by chance, a normal, natural death,
not murdered by his son.
OEDIPUS. [Emerging from the palace.]
Dearest, what now? Why call me from the palace?
JOCASTA. [Bringing the MESSENGER closer.] Listen to him, see for yourself what all those awful prophecies of god have come to.
OEDIPUS. And who is he? What can he have for me?
JOCASTA. He’s from Corinth, he’s come to tell you your father is no more—Polybus—he’s dead!
OEDIPUS. [Wheeling on the MESSENGER.]
What? Let me have it from your lips.
MESSENGER. Well, if that’s what you want first, then here it is:
make no mistake, Polybus is dead and gone.
OEDIPUS. How—murder? sickness?—what? what killed him?
MESSENGER. A light tip of the scales put old bones to rest.
OEDIPUS. Sickness then—poor man, it wore him down.
MESSENGER. That, and the long count of years he’d measured out.
OEDIPUS. So!
Jocasta, why, why look to the Prophet’s hearth, the fires of the future? Why scan the birds that scream above our heads? They winged me on to the murder of my father, did they? That was my doom?
Well look, he’s dead and buried, hidden under the earth, and here I am in Thebes, I never put hand to sword—unless some longing for me wasted him away, then in a sense you’d say I caused his death.
But now, all those prophecies I feared—Polybus packs them off to sleep with him in hell!
They’re nothing, worthless.
JOCASTA. There.
Didn’t I tell you from the start?
OEDIPUS. So you did. I was lost in fear.
JOCASTA. No more, sweep it from your mind forever.
OEDIPUS. But my mother’s bed, surely I must fear—
JOCASTA. Fear? What should a man fear? It's all chance, chance rules our lives. Not a man on earth can see a day ahead, groping through the dark. Better to live at random, best we can. And as for this marriage with your mother—have no fear. Many a man before you, in his dreams, has shared his mother's bed. Take such things for shadows, nothing at all—Live, Oedipus, as if there's no tomorrow!

OEDIPUS. Brave words, and you'd persuade me if mother weren't alive. But mother lives, so for all your reassurances I live in fear, I must.

JOCASTA. But your father's death, that, at least, is a great blessing, joy to the eyes!

OEDIPUS. Great, I know . . . but I fear her—she's still alive.

MESSENGER. Wait, who is this woman, makes you so afraid?

OEDIPUS. Merope, old man. The wife of Polybus.

MESSENGER. The queen? What's there to fear in her?

OEDIPUS. A dreadful prophecy, stranger, sent by the gods.

MESSENGER. Tell me, could you? Unless it's forbidden other ears to hear.

OEDIPUS. Not at all. Apollo told me once—it is my fate—I must make love with my own mother, shed my father's blood with my own hands. So for years I've given Corinth a wide berth, and it's been my good fortune too. But still, to see one's parents and look into their eyes is the greatest joy I know.

MESSENGER. You're afraid of that?

OEDIPUS. My father, old man—so I wouldn't kill my father.

MESSENGER. That kept you out of Corinth?

OEDIPUS. My father, old man—so I wouldn't kill my father.

MESSENGER. So that's it.

OEDIPUS. What a rich reward you'd have for that!

MESSENGER. What do you think I came for, majesty? So you'd come home and I'd be better off.

OEDIPUS. Never, I will never go near my parents.

MESSENGER. My boy, it's clear, you don't know what you're doing.

OEDIPUS. What do you mean, old man? For god's sake, explain.

MESSENGER. If you ran from them, always dodging home . . .

OEDIPUS. Always, terrified Apollo's oracle might come true—

MESSENGER. And you'd be covered with guilt, from both your parents.

OEDIPUS. That's right, old man, that fear is always with me.

MESSENGER. Don't you know? You've really nothing to fear.

OEDIPUS. But why? If I'm their son—Merope, Polybus?

MESSENGER. Polybus was nothing to you, that's why, not in blood.
OEDIPUS. What are you saying—Polybus was not my father?

MESSENGER. No more than I am. He and I are equals.

OEDIPUS. My father—

how can my father equal nothing? You're nothing to me!

MESSENGER. Neither was he, no more your father than I am.

OEDIPUS. Then why did he call me his son?

MESSENGER. You were a gift, years ago—know for a fact he took you from my hands.

OEDIPUS. No, from another’s hands?

Then how could he love me so? He loved me, deeply . . .

MESSENGER. True, and his early years without a child made him love you all the more.

OEDIPUS. And you, did you . . .
buy me? find me by accident?

MESSENGER. I stumbled on you, down the woody flanks of Mount Cithaeron.

OEDIPUS. So close,
what were you doing here, just passing through?

MESSENGER. Watching over my flocks, grazing them on the slopes.

OEDIPUS. A herdsman, were you? A vagabond, scraping for wages?

MESSENGER. Your savior too, my son, in your worst hour.

OEDIPUS. Oh—
when you picked me up, was I in pain? What exactly?

MESSENGER. Your ankles . . . they tell the story. Look at them.

OEDIPUS. Why remind me of that, that old affliction?

MESSENGER. Your ankles were pinned together. I set you free.

OEDIPUS. That dreadful mark—I’ve had it from the cradle.

MESSENGER. And you got your name° from that misfortune too, the name’s still with you.

OEDIPUS. Dear god, who did it?—mother? father? Tell me.

MESSENGER. I don’t know.
The one who gave you to me, he’d know more.

OEDIPUS. What? You took me from someone else?
You didn’t find me yourself?

MESSENGER. No sir,
another shepherd passed you on to me.

OEDIPUS. Who? Do you know? Describe him.

MESSENGER. He called himself a servant of . . .
if I remember rightly—Laius.

JOCASTA turns sharply:

OEDIPUS. The king of the land who ruled here long ago?

MESSENGER. That’s the one. That herdsman was his man.

OEDIPUS. Is he still alive? Can I see him?

MESSENGER. They’d know best, the people of these parts.

[OEDIPUS and the MESSENGER turn to the CHORUS.]

1135 you got your name “Oedipus” means “swollen foot.”
OEDIPUS. Does anyone know that herdsman, the one he mentioned? Anyone seen him in the fields, in the city? Out with it!
The time has come to reveal this once for all.
LEADER. I think he’s the very shepherd you wanted to see, a moment ago. But the queen, Jocasta, she’s the one to say.
OEDIPUS. Jocasta, you remember the man we just sent for?
is that the one he means?
JOCASTA. That man . . .
why ask? Old shepherd, talk, empty nonsense, don’t give it another thought, don’t even think—OEDIPUS. What—give up now, with a clue like this?
Fail to solve the mystery of my birth?
Not for all the world!
JOCASTA. Stop—in the name of god,
if you love your own life, call off this search!
My suffering is enough.
OEDIPUS. Courage!
Even if my mother turns out to be a slave,
and I a slave, three generations back,
you would not seem common.
JOCASTA. Oh no,
listen to me, I beg you, don’t do this.
OEDIPUS. Listen to you? No more. I must know it all, must see the truth at last.
JOCASTA. No, please—for your sake—I want the best for you!
OEDIPUS. Your best is more than I can bear.
JOCASTA. You’re doomed—may you never fathom who you are!
OEDIPUS. [To a servant.] Hurry, fetch me the herdsman, now!
Leave her to glory in her royal birth.
JOCASTA. Aieeeeee—man of agony—
that is the only name I have for you,
that, no other—ever, ever, ever!
[Flinging through the palace doors. A long, tense silence follows.]
LEADER. Where’s she gone, Oedipus?
Rushing off, such wild grief . . .
I’m afraid that from this silence something monstrous may come bursting forth.
OEDIPUS. Let it burst! Whatever will, whatever must!
I must know my birth, no matter how common it may be—I must see my origins face-to-face.
She perhaps, she with her woman’s pride may well be mortified by my birth, but I, I count myself the son of Chance,
the great goddess, giver of all good things—
I'll never see myself disgraced. She is my mother!
And the moons have marked me out, my blood-brothers,
one moon on the wane, the next moon great with power.
That is my blood, my nature—I will never betray it, ever fail to search and learn my birth!

CHORUS. Yes—if I am a true prophet if I can grasp the truth,
    by the boundless skies of Olympus,
at the full moon of tomorrow, Mount Cithaeron you will know how Oedipus glories in you—you, his birthplace, nurse, his mountain-mother!
And we will sing you, dancing out your praise—
you lift our monarch's heart!
    Apollo, Apollo, god of the wild cry may our dancing please you!

Oedipus—
    son, dear child, who bore you?
Who of the nymphs who seem to live forever
mated with Pan,° the mountain-striding Father?
Who was your mother? who, some bride of Apollo
the god who loves the pastures spreading toward the sun?
    Or was it Hermes, king of the lightning ridges?
Or Dionysus, lord of frenzy, lord of the barren peaks—did he seize you in his hands, dearest of all his lucky finds?— found by the nymphs, their warm eyes dancing, gift to the lord who loves them dancing out his joy!

[OEDIPUS strains to see a figure coming from the distance.Attended by palace guards, an old SHEPHERD enters slowly, reluctant to approach the king.]

OEDIPUS. I never met the man, my friends . . . still,
    if I had to guess, I'd say that's the shepherd,
the very one we've looked for all along.
Brothers in old age, two of a kind,
he and our guest here. At any rate the ones who bring him in are my own men,
I recognize them.

[Turning to the LEADER.]
    But you know more than I,
you should, you've seen the man before.
LEADER. I know him, definitely. One of Laius' men, a trusty shepherd, if there ever was one.
OEDIPUS. You, I ask you first, stranger, you from Corinth—is this the one you mean?
MESSENGER. You're looking at him. He's your man.
OEDIPUS. [To the SHEPHERD.]
    You, old man, come over here—

1207 Pan god of shepherds (associated, like Hermes and Dionysus, with wilderness).
look at me. Answer all my questions.

Did you ever serve King Laius?

SHEPHERD. So I did . . .

a slave, not bought on the block though,

born and reared in the palace.

OEDIPUS. Your duties, your kind of work?

SHEPHERD. Herding the flocks, the better part of my life.

OEDIPUS. Where, mostly? Where did you do your grazing?

SHEPHERD. Cithaeron sometimes, or the foothills round about.

OEDIPUS. This man—you know him? ever see him there?

SHEPHERD. [Confused, glancing from the MESSENGER to the KING.]

Doing what?—what man do you mean?

OEDIPUS. [Pointing to the MESSENGER.]

This one here—ever have dealings with him?

SHEPHERD. Not so I could say, but give me a chance, my memory's bad . . .

MESSENGER. No wonder he doesn't know me, master.

But let me refresh his memory for him.

I'm sure he recalls old times we had on the slopes of Mount Cithaeron;

he and I, grazing our flocks, he with two and I with one—we both struck up together, three whole seasons, six months at a stretch from spring to the rising of Arcturus° in the fall, then with winter coming on I'd drive my herds to my own pens, and back he'd go with his to Laius' folds.

[To the SHEPHERD.]

Now that's how it was, wasn't it—yes or no?

SHEPHERD. Yes, I suppose . . .

it's all so long ago.

MESSENGER. Come, tell me,
you gave me a child back then, a boy, remember?

A little fellow to rear, my very own.

SHEPHERD. What? Why rake up that again?

MESSENGER. Look, here he is, my fine old friend—the same man who was just a baby then.

SHEPHERD. Damn you, shut your mouth—quiet!

OEDIPUS. Don't lash out at him, old man—you need lashing more than he does.

SHEPHERD. Why, master, majesty—what have I done wrong?

OEDIPUS. You won't answer his question about the boy.

SHEPHERD. He's talking nonsense; wasting his breath.

1249 Arcturus a star whose rising signaled the end of summer.
OEDIPUS. So, you won’t talk willingly—then you’ll talk with pain.

[The guards seize the SHEPHERD.]

SHEPHERD. No, dear god, don’t torture an old man!
OEDIPUS. Twist his arms back, quickly!
SHEPHERD. God help us, why?
OEDIPUS. Did you give him that child? He’s asking.
SHEPHERD. I did . . . I wish to god I’d died that day.
OEDIPUS. You’ve got your wish if you don’t tell the truth.
SHEPHERD. The more I tell, the worse the death I’ll die.
OEDIPUS. Our friend here wants to stretch things out, does he?

[Motioning to his men for torture.]

SHEPHERD. No, no, I gave it to him—I just said so.
OEDIPUS. Where did you get it? Your house? Someone else’s?
SHEPHERD. It wasn’t mine, no; I got it from . . . someone.
OEDIPUS. Which one of them?

[Looking at the citizens.]

Whose house?
SHEPHERD. No—
god’s sake, master, no more questions!
OEDIPUS. You’re a dead man if I have to ask again.
SHEPHERD. Then—the child came from the house . . . of Laius.
OEDIPUS. A slave? or born of his own blood?
SHEPHERD. Oh no,
I’m right at the edge, the horrible truth—I’ve got to say it!
OEDIPUS. And I’m at the edge of hearing horrors, yes, but I must hear!
SHEPHERD. All right! His son, they said it was—his son!
But the one inside, your wife,
she’d tell it best.
OEDIPUS. My wife—
_she_ gave it to you?
SHEPHERD. Yes, yes, my king.
OEDIPUS. Why, what for?
SHEPHERD. To kill it.
OEDIPUS. Her own child,
how could she?
SHEPHERD. She was afraid—frightening prophecies.
OEDIPUS. What?
SHEPHERD. They said—
he’d kill his parents.
OEDIPUS. But you gave him to this old man—why?
SHEPHERD. I pitied the little baby, master, hoped he’d take him off to his own country,
far away, but he saved him for this, his fate.
If you are the man he says you are, believe me, you were born for pain.

Oedipus. O god— all come true, all burst to light!
O light—now let me look my last on you!
I stand revealed at last—cursed in my birth, cursed in marriage, cursed in the lives I cut down with these hands!

[ Rushing through the doors with a great cry. The Corinthian Messenger, the Shepherd and attendants exit slowly to the side. ]

Chorus. O the generations of men the dying generations—adding the total of all your lives I find they come to nothing . . .
does there exist, is there a man on earth who seizes more joy than just a dream, a vision?
And the vision no sooner dawns than dies blazing into oblivion.

You are my great example, you, your life your destiny, Oedipus, man of misery—
I count no man blest.

You outranged all men!

Bending your bow to the breaking-point
you captured priceless glory, O dear god, and the Sphinx came crashing down,
the virgin, claws hooked
like a bird of omen singing, shrieking death—like a fortress reared in the face of death you rose and saved our land.

From that day on we called you king
we crowned you with honors, Oedipus, towering over all—mighty king of the seven gates of Thebes.

But now to hear your story—is there a man more agonized?
More wed to pain and frenzy? Not a man on earth, the joy of your life ground down to nothing
O Oedipus, name for the ages—
one and the same wide harbor served you son and father both son and father came to rest in the same bridal chamber.

How, how could the furrows your father plowed bear you, your agony, harrowing on in silence O so long?

But now for all your power
Time, all-seeing Time has dragged you to the light, judged your marriage monstrous from the start—the son and the father tangling, both one—
O child of Laius, would to god
I'd never seen you, never never!

Now I weep like a man who wails the dead and the dirge comes pouring forth with all my heart!
I tell you the truth, you gave me life
my breath leapt up in you and now you bring down the night upon my eyes.

[Enter a Messenger from the palace.]

MESSENGER. Men of Thebes, always first in honor, what horrors you will hear, what you will see,
what a heavy weight of sorrow you will shoulder . . .
if you are true to your birth, if you still have some feeling for the royal house of Thebes.
I tell you neither the waters of the Danube nor the Nile can wash this palace clean.
Such things it hides, it soon will bring to light—terrible things, and none done blindly now, all done with a will. The pains
we inflict upon ourselves hurt most of all.

LEADER. God knows we have pains enough already.
What can you add to them?

MESSENGER. The queen is dead.

LEADER. Poor lady—how?

MESSENGER. By her own hand. But you are spared the worst, you never had to watch . . . I saw it all,
and with all the memory that’s in me
you will learn what that poor woman suffered.

Once she’d broken in through the gates,
dashing past us, frantic, whipped to fury, ripping her hair out with both hands—straight to her rooms she rushed, flinging herself across the bridal-bed, doors slamming behind her—one inside, she wailed for Laius, dead so long, remembering how she bore his child long ago,
the life that rose up to destroy him, leaving its mother to mother living creatures with the very son she’d borne.
Oh how she wept, mourning the marriage-bed where she let loose that double brood—monsters—husband by her husband, children by her child.

And then—but how she died is more than I can say. Suddenly Oedipus burst in, screaming, he stunned us so we couldn’t watch her agony to the end, our eyes were fixed on him. Circling like a maddened beast, stalking, here, there, crying out to us—
Give him a sword! His wife, no wife, his mother, where can he find the mother earth that cropped two crops at once, himself and all his children?
He was raging—one of the dark powers pointing the way,
none of us mortals crowding around him, no, with a great shattering cry—someone, something leading him on—he hurled at the twin doors and bending the bolts back.
out of their sockets, crashed through the chamber.
And there we saw the woman hanging by the neck,
cradled high in a woven noose, spinning, swinging back and forth. And when he saw her, giving a low, wrenching sob that broke our hearts,
slipping the halter from her throat, he eased her down,
in a slow embrace he laid her down, poor thing . . .
then, what came next, what horror we beheld!

He rips off her brooches, the long gold pins holding her robes—and lifting them high, looking straight up into the points,
he digs them down the sockets of his eyes, crying, “You, you’ll see no more the pain I suffered, all the pain I caused!
Too long you looked on the ones you never should have seen, blind to the ones you longed to see, to know! Blind from this hour on! Blind in the darkness—blind!”
His voice like a dirge, rising, over and over raising the pins, raking them down his eyes.
And at each stroke blood spurts from the roots, splashing his beard, a swirl of it, nerves and clots—
black hail of blood pulsing, gushing down.

These are the griefs that burst upon them both, coupling man and woman. The joy they had so lately, the fortune of their old ancestral house was deep joy indeed. Now, in this one day, wailing, madness and doom, death, disgrace,
all the griefs in the world that you can name,
all are theirs forever.

LEADER. Oh poor man, the misery—has he any rest from pain now?

[A voice within, in torment.]

MESSENGER. He’s shouting,
“Loose the bolts, someone, show me to all of Thebes!
My father’s murderer, my mother’s—”
No, I can’t repeat it, it’s unholy.
Now he’ll tear himself from his native earth,
not linger, curse the house with his own curse.
But he needs strength, and a guide to lead him on.
This is sickness more than he can bear.

[The palace doors open.]

Look,
he’ll show you himself. The great doors are opening—you are about to see a sight, a horror even his mortal enemy would pity.

[Enter Oedipus, blinded, led by a boy. He stands at the palace steps, as if surveying his people once again.]
CHORUS. O the terror—
the suffering, for all the world to see,
the worst terror that ever met my eyes.
What madness swept over you? What god, what dark power leapt beyond all bounds, beyond belief, to crush your wretched life?—
godforsaken, cursed by the gods!
I pity you but I can’t bear to look.
I’ve much to ask, so much to learn,
so much fascinates my eyes,
but you . . . I shudder at the sight.

OEDIPUS. Oh, Ohh—
the agony! I am agony—
where am I going? where on earth?
where does all this agony hurl me?
where’s my voice?—
w winging, swept away on a dark tide—
My destiny, my dark power, what a leap you made!

CHORUS. To the depths of terror, too dark to hear, to see.

OEDIPUS. Dark, horror of darkness my darkness, drowning, swirling around me crashing wave on wave—unspeakable, irresistible headwind, fatal harbor! Oh again, the misery, all at once, over and over the stabbing daggers, stab of memory raking me insane.

CHORUS. No wonder you suffer twice over, the pain of your wounds,
the lasting grief of pain.

OEDIPUS. Dear friend, still here?
Standing by me, still with a care for me,
the blind man? Such compassion, loyal to the last. Oh it’s you,
I know you’re here, dark as it is I’d know you anywhere, your voice—
it’s yours, clearly yours.

CHORUS. Dreadful, what you’ve done . . .
how could you bear it, gouging out your eyes?
What superhuman power drove you on?

OEDIPUS. Apollo, friends, Apollo—he ordained my agonies—these, my pains on pains!
But the hand that struck my eyes was mine,
mine alone—no one else—
I did it all myself!
What good were eyes to me?
Nothing I could see could bring me joy.

CHORUS. No, no, exactly as you say.

OEDIPUS. What love, what call of the heart can touch my ears with joy? Nothing, friends.
Take me away, far, far from Thebes, quickly, cast me away, my friends—
this great murderous ruin, this man cursed to heaven, the man the deathless gods hate most of all!

CHORUS. Pitiful, you suffer so, you understand so much . . .
I wish you’d never known.

OEDIPUS. Die, die—
whoever he was that day in the wilds who cut my ankles free of the ruthless pins, he pulled me clear of death, he saved my life
for this, this kindness—
Curse him, kill him!
If I’d died then, I’d never have dragged myself,
my loved ones through such hell.

CHORUS. Oh if only . . . would to god.

OEDIPUS. I’d never have come to this, my father’s murderer—never been branded mother’s husband, all men see me now! Now, loathed by the gods, son of the mother I defiled coupling in my father’s bed, spawning lives in the loins that spawned my wretched life. What grief can crown this grief?

It’s mine alone, my destiny—I am Oedipus!

CHORUS. How can I say you’ve chosen for the best?
Better to die than be alive and blind.

OEDIPUS. What I did was best—don’t lecture me, no more advice. I, with my eyes, how could I look my father in the eyes
when I go down to death? Or mother, so abused . . .
I have done such things to the two of them,
crimes too huge for hanging.

Worse yet,
the sight of my children, born as they were born,
how could I long to look into their eyes?
No, not with these eyes of mine, never.
Not this city either, her high towers,
the sacred glittering images of her gods—
I am misery! I, her best son, reared as no other son of Thebes was ever reared,
I’ve stripped myself, I gave the command myself.
All men must cast away the great blasphemer,
the curse now brought to light by the gods,
the son of Laius—I, my father’s son!

Now I’ve exposed my guilt, horrendous guilt, could I train a level glance on you, my countrymen?
Impossible! No, if I could just block off my ears, the springs of hearing, I would stop at nothing—
I’d wall up my loathsome body like a prison, blind to the sound of life, not just the sight:
Oblivion—what a blessing . . .
for the mind to dwell a world away from pain.

O Cithaeron, why did you give me shelter?
Why didn’t you take me, crush my life out on the spot?
I’d never have revealed my birth to all mankind.

O Polybus, Corinth, the old house of my fathers, so I believed—what a handsome prince you raised—under the skin, what sickness to the core.
Look at me! Born of outrage, outrage to the core.
O triple roads—it all comes back, the secret, dark ravine, and the oaks closing in where the three roads join . . .
You drank my father’s blood, my own blood spilled by my own hands—you still remember me?
What things you saw me do? Then I came here and did them all once more!

Marriages! O marriage, you gave me birth, and once you brought me into the world
you brought my sperm rising back, springing to light fathers, brothers, sons—one murderous breed—brides, wives, mothers. The blackest things a man can do, I have done them all!

No more—
it’s wrong to name what’s wrong to do. Quickly, for the love of god, hide me somewhere, kill me, hurl me into the sea
where you can never look on me again.

[Beckoning to the CHORUS as they shrink away.]

Closer,
it’s all right. Touch the man of grief.
Do. Don’t be afraid. My troubles are mine and I am the only man alive who can sustain them.

[Enter CREON from the palace, attended by palace guards.]

LEADER. Put your requests to Creon. Here he is, just when we need him. He’ll have a plan, he’ll act.
Now that he’s the sole defense of the country in your place.

OEDIPUS. Oh no, what can I say to him?
How can I ever hope to win his trust?
I wronged him so, just now, in every way.
You must see that—I was so wrong, so wrong.

CREON. I haven’t come to mock you, Oedipus, or to criticize your former failings.

[Turning to the guards.]

You there,
have you lost all respect for human feelings?
At least revere the Sun, the holy fire that keeps us all alive. Never expose a thing of guilt and holy dread so great it appalls
the earth, the rain from heaven, the light of day!
Get him into the halls—quickly as you can.
Piety demands no less. Kindred alone should see a kinsman’s shame. This is obscene.

OEDIPUS. Please, in god’s name...you wipe my fears away, coming so generously to me, the worst of men.
Do one thing more, for your sake, not mine.

CREON. What do you want? Why so insistent?

OEDIPUS. Drive me out of the land at once, far from sight, where I can never hear a human voice.

CREON. I’d have done that already, I promise you.
First I wanted the god to clarify my duties.

OEDIPUS. The god? His command was clear, every word:
death for the father-killer, the curse—
he said destroy me!

CREON. So he did. Still, in such a crisis
it’s better to ask precisely what to do.

OEDIPUS. So miserable—you’d consult the god about a man like me?

CREON. By all means. And this time, I assume, even you will obey the god’s decrees.

OEDIPUS. I will,
I will. And you, I command you—I beg you...the woman inside, bury her as you see fit.
It’s the only decent thing, to give your own the last rites. As for me, ever condemn the city of my fathers to house my body, not while I’m alive, no, let me live on the mountains, on Cithaeron,
my favorite haunt, I have made it famous.

Mother and father marked out that rock to be my everlasting tomb—buried alive.
Let me die there, where they tried to kill me.
Oh but this I know: no sickness can destroy me, nothing can. I would never have been saved from death—I have been saved for something great and terrible, something strange.
Well let my destiny come and take me on its way!
About my children, Creon, the boys at least,
don’t burden yourself. They’re men, wherever they go, they’ll find the means to live.
But my two daughters, my poor helpless girls, clustering at our table, never without me hovering near them...whatever I touched, they always had their share. Take care of them,

I beg you. Wait, better—permit me, would you?
Just to touch them with my hands and take our fill of tears. Please...my king.
Grant it, with all your noble heart.
If I could hold them, just once, I’d think
I had them with me, like the early days when I could see their eyes.
[ANTIGONE and ISMENE, two small children, are led in from the palace by a nurse.]

What’s that
O god! Do I really hear you sobbing?—
my two children. Creon, you’ve pitied me?
Sent me my darling girls, my own flesh and blood!
Am I right?

CREON. Yes, it’s my doing.
I know the joy they gave you all these years,
the joy you must feel now.

OEDIPUS. Bless you, Creon!
May god watch over you for this kindness, better than he ever guarded me.

Here, come quickly—

[Grooping for ANTIGONE and ISMENE, who approach their father cautiously, then embrace him.]

Come to these hands of mine, your brother’s hands, your own father’s hands that served his once bright eyes so well—that made them blind. Seeing nothing, children, knowing nothing, I became your father,
I fathered you in the soil that gave me life.

How I weep for you—I cannot see you now . . .
just thinking of all your days to come, the bitterness,
the life that rough mankind will thrust upon you.

Where are the public gatherings you can join,
the banquets of the clans? Home you’ll come,
in tears, cut off from the sight of it all,
the brilliant rites unfinished.

And when you reach perfection, ripe for marriage, who will he be, my dear ones? Risking all to shoulder the curse that weighs down my parents, yes and you too—that wounds us all together.

What more misery could you want?
Your father killed his father, sowed his mother,
one, one and the selfsame womb sprang you—
he cropped the very roots of his existence.

Such disgrace, and you must bear it all!
Who will marry you then? Not a man on earth.
Your doom is clear: you’ll wither away to nothing,
single, without a child.

[Turning to CREON.]

Oh Creon,
you are the only father they have now . . .
we who brought them into the world are gone, both gone at a stroke—
Don’t let them go begging, abandoned, women without men. Your own flesh and blood!
Never bring them down to the level of my pains.
Pity them. Look at them, so young, so vulnerable, shorn of everything—you’re their only hope.
Promise me, noble Creon, touch my hand!

[Reaching toward Creon, who draws back.]

You, little ones, if you were old enough to understand, there is much I’d tell you.
Now, as it is, I’d have you say a prayer.
Pray for life, my children,
live where you are free to grow and season.
Pray god you find a better life than mine,
the father who begot you.

Creon. Enough.
You’ve wept enough. Into the palace now.
Oedipus. I must, but I find it very hard.
Creon. Time is the great healer, you will see.
Oedipus. I am going—you know on what condition?
Creon. Tell me. I’m listening.
Oedipus. Drive me out of Thebes, in exile.
Creon. Not I. Only the gods can give you that.
Oedipus. Surely the gods hate me so much—
Creon. You’ll get your wish at once.
Oedipus. You consent?
Creon. I try to say what I mean; it’s my habit.
Oedipus. Then take me away. It’s time.
Creon. Come along, let go of the children.
Oedipus. No—
don’t take them away from me, not now! No no no!
[Clutching his daughters as the guards wrench them loose and take them through the palace doors.]

Creon. Still the king, the master of all things?
No more; here your power ends.
None of your power follows you through life.

[Exit Oedipus and Creon to the palace. The chorus comes forward to address the audience directly.]

Chorus. People of Thebes, my countrymen, look on Oedipus.
He solved the famous riddle with his brilliance,
he rose to power, a man beyond all power.
Who could behold his greatness without envy?
Now what a black sea of terror has overwhelmed him.
Now as we keep our watch and wait the final day, count no man happy till he dies, free of pain at last.

[Exit in procession.]
TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. On the basis of lines 1–149, characterize Oedipus. Does he seem an effective leader? What additional traits are revealed in lines 205–491?
2. In your opinion, how fair is it to say that Oedipus is morally guilty? Does he argue that he is morally innocent because he did not intend to do immoral deeds? Can it be said that he is guilty of hybris but that hybris (see page 1015) has nothing to do with his fall?
3. Oedipus says that he blinds himself in order not to look upon people he should not. What further reasons can be given? Why does he not (like Jocasta) commit suicide?
4. Does the play show the futility of human efforts to act intelligently?
5. In Oedipus, do you find the gods evil?
6. Are the choral odes lyrical interludes that serve to separate the scenes, or do they advance the dramatic action?
7. Matthew Arnold said that Sophocles saw life steadily and saw it whole. But in this play is Sophocles facing the facts of life? Or, on the contrary, is he avoiding what we think of as normal life, and presenting a series of unnatural and outrageous coincidences? In either case, do you think the play is relevant today?
8. Can you describe your emotions at the end of the play? Do they include pity for Oedipus? Pity for all human beings, including yourself? Fear that you might be punished for some unintended transgression? Awe, engendered by a perception of the interrelatedness of things? Relief that the story is only a story? Exhilaration? Explain your reaction.

The Play on the Stage

9. During your first consideration of the play, start with a reading of lines 1–149. Choose someone from the group to stand on a chair (Oedipus), two other readers to stand nearby (the Priest and Creon), and several others to kneel or lie on the floor (Theban citizens). After this rough enactment, ask the readers how they felt about their roles. Then discuss the ways a modern staging could create a powerful opening for the play. Some questions to consider: Do the Thebans ever touch Oedipus? Should the actor playing Oedipus make eye contact with anyone on the stage?
10. Originally the Greek chorus chanted and danced. What are your recommendations for a director today? Choose a particular passage from the play to illustrate your ideas.
11. Imagine that you are directing a production of Oedipus. Propose a cast for the principal roles, using well-known actors or people from your own circle. Explain the reasons for your choices.
12. What might be gained or lost by performing the play in modern dress? Or is there some period other than ancient Greece—let’s say the Victorian period—in which you think the play might be effectively set?
13. Alan MacVey, who directed a production at the University of Iowa, used classical costumes but afterward said that he wished he had used a conference table as the set and had costumed the royalty in “power suits.” What is your response to this idea?

TIME AND SCENE: The royal house of Thebes. It is still night, and the invading armies of Argos have just been driven from the city. Fighting on opposite sides, the sons of OEDIPUS, ETEOCLES and POLYNICES, have killed each other in combat. Their uncle, CREON, is now king of Thebes.

Enter ANTI GONE, slipping through the central doors of the palace. She motions to her sister, ISMENE, who follows cautiously toward an altar at the center of the stage.

ANTI GONE. My own flesh and blood—dear sister, dear Ismene, how many griefs our father Oedipus° handed down!
Do you know one, I ask you, one grief that Zeus° will not perfect for the two of us while we still live and breathe! There’s nothing, no pain—our lives are pain—no private shame,
no public disgrace, nothing I haven’t seen in your griefs and mine. And now this:
an emergency decree, they say, the Commander has just declared for all of Thebes.
What, haven’t you heard? Don’t you see?
The doom reserved for enemies marches on the ones we love the most.

ISMENE. Not I, I haven’t heard a word, Antigone.
Nothing of loved ones,
no joy or pain has come my way, not since the two of us were robbed of our two brothers, both gone in a day, a double blow—
not since the armies of Argos vanished,

2 Oedipus, once King of Thebes, was the father of Antigone and Ismene, and of their brothers Polynices and Eteocles. Oedipus unwittingly killed his father, Laius, and married his own mother, Jocasta. When he learned what he had done, he blinded himself and left Thebes. Eteocles and Polynices quarreled; Polynices was driven out but returned to assault Thebes. In the battle, each brother killed the other, and Creon became king and ordered that Polynices be left to rot unburied on the battlefield as a traitor. 4 Zeus highest of the deities on Mt. Olympus.
just this very night. I know nothing more, 20 whether our luck’s improved or ruin’s still to come.

ANTIGONE. I thought so. That’s why I brought you out here, past the gates, so you could hear in private.

ISMENE. What’s the matter? Trouble, clearly . . .
you sound so dark, so grim. 25

ANTIGONE. Why not? Our own brothers’ burial!
Hasn’t Creon graced one with all the rites, disgraced the other? Eteocles, they say,
has been given full military honors,
rightly so—Creon’s laid him in the earth and he goes with glory down among the dead.
But the body of Polynices, who died miserably—
why, a city-wide proclamation, rumor has it, forbids anyone to bury him, even mourn him.
He’s to be left unwet, unburied, a lovely treasure for birds that scan the field and feast to their heart’s content.

Such, I hear, is the martial law our good Creon lays down for you and me—yes, me, I tell you—and he’s coming here to alert the uninformed in no uncertain terms, 30 and he won’t treat the matter lightly. Whoever disobeys in the least will die, his doom is sealed:
stoning to death inside the city walls!

There you have it. You’ll soon show what you are, worth your breeding, Ismene, or a coward—
for all your royal blood. 35

ISMENE. My poor sister, if things have come to this, who am I to make or mend them, tell me, what good am I to you?

ANTIGONE. Decide.

ISMENE. What work, what’s the risk? What do you mean?

ANTIGONE. [Raising her hands.] Will you lift up his body with these bare hands and lower it with me?

ISMENE. What? You’d bury him—when a law forbids the city?

ANTIGONE. Yes!

ISMENE. He is my brother and—deny it as you will—your brother too.

No one will ever convict me for a traitor.

ISMENE. So desperate, and Creon has expressly—

ANTIGONE. No, he has no right to keep me from my own.

ISMENE. Oh my sister, think—think how our own father died, hated, his reputation in ruins, driven on by the crimes he brought to light himself to gouge out his eyes with his own hands—then mother... his mother and wife, both in one, mutilating her life in the twisted noose—and last, our two brothers dead in a single day, both shedding their own blood, poor suffering boys, battling out their common destiny hand-to-hand.

Now look at the two of us, left so alone... think what a death we’ll die, the worst of all if we violate the laws and override the fixed decree of the throne, its power—we must be sensible. Remember we are women, we’re not born to contend with men. Then too, we’re underlings, ruled by much stronger hands, so we must submit in this, and things still worse. I, for one, I’ll beg the dead to forgive me—I’m forced, I have no choice—I must obey the ones who stand in power. Why rush to extremes? It’s madness, madness.

ANTIGONE. I won’t insist, no, even if you should have a change of heart, I’d never welcome you in the labor, not with me. So, do as you like, whatever suits you best—I’ll bury him myself. And even if I die in the act, that death will be a glory. I’ll lie with the one I love and loved by him—an outrage sacred to the gods! I have longer to please the dead than please the living here: in the kingdom down below I’ll lie forever.
Do as you like, dishonor the laws
the gods hold in honor.

ISMENE. I’d do them no dishonor . . .
but defy the city? I have no strength for that.

ANTIGONE. You have your excuses. I am on my way,
I’ll raise a mound for him, for my dear brother.

ISMENE. Oh Antigone, you’re so rash—I’m so afraid for you!

ANTIGONE. Don’t fear for me. Set your own life in order.

ISMENE. Then don’t, at least, blurt this out to anyone.
Keep it a secret. I’ll join you in that, I promise.

ANTIGONE. Dear god, shout it from the rooftops. I’ll hate you all the more for silence—tell the world!

ISMENE. So fiery—and it ought to chill your heart.

ANTIGONE. I know I please where I must please the most.

ISMENE. Yes, if you can, but you’re in love with impossibility.

ANTIGONE. Very well then, once my strength gives out
I will be done at last.

ISMENE. You’re wrong from the start, you’re off on a hopeless quest.

ANTIGONE. If you say so, you will make me hate you, and the hatred of the dead, by all rights,
will haunt you night and day.
But leave me to my own absurdity, leave me to suffer this—dreadful thing. I’ll suffer nothing as great as death without glory.
[Exit to the side.]

ISMENE. Then go if you must, but rest assured, wild, irrational as you are, my sister,
you are truly dear to the ones who love you.

[Withdrawing to the palace. Enter a CHORUS, the old citizens of Thebes, chanting as the sun begins to rise.]

CHORUS. Glory!—great beam of sun, brightest of all that ever rose on the seven gates of Thebes, you burn through night at last!
Great eye of the golden day, mounting the Dirce’s banks° you throw him back—the enemy out of Argos, the white shield, the man of bronze—he’s flying headlong now
the bridle of fate stampeding him with pain!
And he had driven against our borders, launched by the warring claims of Polynices—like an eagle screaming, winging havoc over the land, wings of armor shielded white as snow,
a huge army massing,
crested helmets bristling for assault.

He hovered above our roofs, his vast maw gaping closing down around our seven gates,

121 the Dirce’s banks banks of the River Dirce, near Thebes. his spears thirsting for the kill but now he's gone, look,
before he could glut his jaws with Theban blood or the god of fire put our crown of towers to the torch.
He grappled the Dragon none can master—Thebes—
the clang of our arms like thunder at his back!

Zeus hates with a vengeance all bravado,
the mighty boasts of men. He watched them coming on in a rising flood, the pride of their golden armor ringing shrill—and brandishing his lightning blasted the fighter just at the goal, rushing to shout his triumph from our walls.

Down from the heights he crashed, pounding down on the earth!
And a moment ago, blazing torch in hand—mad for attack, ecstatic
he breathed his rage; the storm of his fury hurling at our heads!
But now his high hopes have laid him low and down the enemy ranks the iron god of war deals his rewards, his stunning blows—Ares's rapture of battle, our right arm in the crisis.

Seven captains marshaled at seven gates seven against their equals, gave their brazen trophies up to Zeus, god of the breaking rout of battle,
all but two: those blood brothers,
one father, one mother—matched in rage, spears matched for the twin conquest—
clashed and won the common prize of death.

But now for Victory! Glorious in the morning, joy in her eyes to meet our joy
she is winging down to Thebes, our fleets of chariots wheeling in her wake—
Now let us win oblivion from the wars, thronging the temples of the gods
in singing, dancing choirs through the night!
Lord Dionysus, god of the dance that shakes the land of Thebes, now lead the way!

[Enter CREON from the palace, attended by his guard.]

But look, the king of the realm is coming,
Creon, the new man for the new day,
whatever the gods are sending now . . .
what new plan will he launch?
Why this, this special session?

154 Ares god of war. 171 Dionysus god of fertility and wine.
CREON. My countrymen, the ship of state is safe. The gods who rocked her, after a long, merciless pounding in the storm, have righted her once more.

Out of the whole city I have called you here alone. Well I know, first, your undeviating respect for the throne and royal power of King Laius. Next, while Oedipus steered the land of Thebes, and even after he died, your loyalty was unshakable, you still stood by their children. Now then, since the two sons are dead—two blows of fate in the same day, cut down by each other's hands, both killers, both brothers stained with blood—as I am next in kin to the dead, I now possess the throne and all its powers.

Of course you cannot know a man completely, his character, his principles, sense of judgment, not till he's shown his colors, ruling the people, making laws. Experience, there's the test. As I see it, whoever assumes the task, the awesome task of setting the city's course, and refuses to adopt the soundest policies but fearing someone, keeps his lips locked tight, he's utterly worthless. So I rate him now, I always have. And whoever places a friend above the good of his own country, he is nothing: I have no use for him. Zeus my witness, Zeus who sees all things, always—I could never stand by silent, watching destruction march against our city, putting safety to rout, nor could I ever make that man a friend of mine who menaces our country. Remember this: our country is our safety. Only while she voyages true on course can we establish friendships, truer than blood itself. Such are my standards. They make our city great. Closely akin to them I have proclaimed, just now, the following decree to our people concerning the two sons of Oedipus. Eteocles, who died fighting for Thebes, excelling all in arms: he shall be buried, crowned with a hero's honors, the cups we pour to soak the earth and reach the famous dead.

But as for his blood brother, Polynices, who returned from exile, home to his father-city and the gods of his race, consumed with one desire—to burn them roof to roots—who thirsted to drink his kinsmen's blood and sell the rest to slavery:
that man—a proclamation has forbidden the city to dignify him with burial, mourn him at all.
No, he must be left unburied, his corpse carrion for the birds and dogs to tear, an obscenity for the citizens to behold!

These are my principles. Never at my hands will the traitor be honored above the patriot.
But whoever proves his loyalty to the state:
I’ll prize that man in death as well as life.

LEADER. If this is your pleasure, Creon, treating our city’s enemy and our friend this way . . .
The power is yours, I suppose, to enforce it with the laws, both for the dead and all of us, the living.

CREON. Follow my orders closely then,
be on your guard.

LEADER. We’re too old.
Lay that burden on younger shoulders.

CREON. No, no,
I don’t mean the body—I’ve posted guards already.

LEADER. What commands for us then? What other service?

CREON. See that you never side with those who break my orders.

LEADER. Never. Only a fool could be in love with death.

CREON. Death is the price—you’re right. But all too often the mere hope of money has ruined many men.

[A Sentry enters from the side.]

SENTRY. My lord,
I can’t say I’m winded from running, or set out with any spring in my legs either—no sir,
I was lost in thought, and it made me stop, often,
dead in my tracks, wheeling, turning back,
and all the time a voice inside me muttering, “Idiot, why? You’re going straight to your death.”
Then muttering, “Stopped again, poor fool?
If somebody gets the news to Creon first,
what’s to save your neck?”
And so,
mulling it over, on I trudged, dragging my feet,
you can make a short road take forever . . .
but at last, look, common sense won out,
I’m here, and I’m all yours,
and even though I come empty-handed I’ll tell my story just the same, because I’ve come with a good grip on one hope, what will come will come, whatever fate—

CREON. Come to the point!
What’s wrong—why so afraid?

SENTRY. First, myself, I’ve got to tell you,
I didn’t do it, didn’t see who did—
Be fair, don’t take it out on me.
CREON. You're playing it safe, soldier, barricading yourself from any trouble.
It's obvious, you've something strange to tell.

SENTRY. Dangerous too, and danger makes you delay for all you're worth.

CREON. Out with it—then dismiss!

SENTRY. All right, here it comes. The body—someone's just buried it, then run off...
 sprinkled some dry dust on the flesh,
given it proper rites.

CREON. What?

SENTRY. I've no idea, I swear it.
There was no mark of a spade, no pickaxe there,
no earth turned up, the ground packed hard and dry,
unbroken, no tracks, no wheelruts, nothing,
the workman left no trace. Just at sunup the first watch of the day points it out—it was a wonder! We were stunned...
a terrific burden too, for all of us, listen:
you can't see the corpse, not that it's buried,
really, just a light cover of road-dust on it,
as if someone meant to lay the dead to rest and keep from getting cursed.
Not a sign in sight that dogs or wild beasts had worried the body, even torn the skin.

But what came next! Rough talk flew thick and fast, guard grilling guard—we'd have come to blows at last, nothing to stop it; each man for himself and each the culprit, no one caught red-handed,
all of us pleading ignorance, dodging the charges,
ready to take up red-hot iron in our fists, go through fire, swear oaths to the gods—
"I didn't do it, I had no hand in it either, not in the plotting, not in the work itself!"

Finally, after all this wrangling came to nothing, one man spoke out and made us stare at the ground, hanging our heads in fear. No way to counter him, no way to take his advice and come through safe and sound. Here's what he said:
"Look, we've got to report the facts to Creon,
we can't keep this hidden." Well, that won out, and the lot fell on me, condemned me, unlucky as ever, I got the prize. So here I am, against my will and yours too, well I know—
no one wants the man who brings bad news.

LEADER. My king,
ever since he began I've been debating in my mind,
could this possibly be the work of the gods?
CREON. Stop—before you make me choke with anger—the gods!
You, you're senile, must you be insane?
You say—why it’s intolerable—say the gods could have the slightest concern for that corpse?
Tell me, was it for meritorious service they proceeded to bury him, prized him so? The hero who came to burn their temples ringed with pillars, their golden treasures—scorch their hallowed earth and fling their laws to the winds.
Exactly when did you last see the gods celebrating traitors? Inconceivable!
No, from the first there were certain citizens who could hardly stand the spirit of my regime, grumbling against me in the dark, heads together, tossing wildly, never keeping their necks beneath the yoke, loyally submitting to their king.
These are the instigators, I’m convinced—they’ve perverted my own guard, bribed them to do their work.
Money! Nothing worse
in our lives, so current, rampant, so corrupting.
Money—you demolish cities, root men from their homes, you train and twist good minds and set them on to the most atrocious schemes. No limit, you make them adept at every kind of outrage,
every godless crime—money!
Everyone—
the whole crew bribed to commit this crime, they’ve made one thing sure at least:
sooner or later they will pay the price.

[Wheeling on the SENTRY.]

You—
I swear to Zeus as I still believe in Zeus,
if you don’t find the man who buried that corpse,
the very man, and produce him before my eyes, simple death won’t be enough for you,
not till we string you up alive and wring the immortality out of you.
Then you can steal the rest of your days,
better informed about where to make a killing.
You’ll have learned, at last, it doesn’t pay to itch for rewards from every hand that beckons.
Filthy profits wreck most men, you’ll see—they’ll never save your life.

SENTRY. Please,
may I say a word or two, or just turn and go?
CREON. Can’t you tell? Everything you say offends me.
SENTRY. Where does it hurt you, in the cars or in the heart?
CREON. And who are you to pinpoint my displeasure?

SENTRY. The culprit grates on your feelings,

CREON. Still talking?

I just annoy your ears.

SENTRY. You talk too much! A born nuisance—

CREON. Maybe so,

but I never did this thing, so help me!

SENTRY. Yes you did—

what’s more, you squandered your life for silver!

CREON. Oh it’s terrible when the one who does the judging judges things all wrong.

CREON. Well now,

you just be clever about your judgments—

if you fail to produce the criminals for me, you’ll swear your dirty money brought you pain.

[Turning sharply, reentering the palace.]

SENTRY. I hope he’s found. Best thing by far.

But caught or not, that’s in the lap of fortune;

I’ll never come back, you’ve seen the last of me.

I’m saved, even now, and I never thought,

I never hoped—

dear gods, I owe you all my thanks!

[Rushing out.]

CHORUS. Numberless wonders terrible wonders walk the world but none the match for man—that great wonder crossing the heaving gray sea, driven on by the blast of winter on through breakers crashing left and right, holds his steady course and the oldest of the gods he wears away—

the Earth, the immortal, the inexhaustible—

as his plows go back and forth, year in, year out with the breed of stallions turning up the furrows.

And the blithe, lightheaded race of birds he snares,

the tribes of savage beasts, the life that swarms the depths—

with one fling of his nets woven and coiled tight, he takes them all,

man the skilled, the brilliant!

He conquers all, taming with his techniques

the prey that roams the cliffs and wild lairs, training the stallion, clamping the yoke across his shaggy neck, and the tireless mountain bull.

And speech and thought, quick as the wind and the mood and mind for law that rules the city—

all these he has taught himself and shelter from the arrows of the frost

when there’s rough lodging under the cold clear sky and the shafts of lashing rain—ready, resourceful man!

Never without resources never an impasse as he marches on the future—only Death, from Death alone he will find no rescue but from desperate plagues he has plotted his escapes. 405

Man the master, ingenious past all measure past all dreams, the skills within his grasp—he forges on, now to destruction now again to greatness. When he weaves in the laws of the land, and the justice of the gods that binds his oaths together he and his city rise high—but the city casts out that man who weds himself to inhumanity thanks to reckless daring. Never share my hearth never think my thoughts, whoever does such things.

[Enter Antigone from the side, accompanied by the Sentry.]

Here is a dark sign from the gods—what to make of this? I know her, how can I deny it? That young girl's Antigone!
Wretched, child of a wretched father,
Oedipus. Look, is it possible?
They bring you in like a prisoner—why? did you break the king's laws?
Did they take you in some act of mad defiance?

Sentry. She's the one, she did it single-handed—we caught her burying the body. Where's Creon?

[Enter Creon from the palace.]

Leader. Back again, just in time when you need him.
Creon. In time for what? What is it?
Sentry. My king,
there's nothing you can swear you'll never do—second thoughts make liars of us all.
I could have sworn I wouldn't hurry back (what with your threats, the buffeting I just took), but a stroke of luck beyond our wildest hopes,
what a joy, there's nothing like it. So,
back I've come, breaking my oath, who cares?
I'm bringing in our prisoner—this young girl—
we took her giving the dead the last rites.
But no casting lots this time, this is my luck,
my prize, no one else's.

Now, my lord,
here she is. Take her, question her,
cross-examine her to your heart's content.
But set me free, it's only right—
I'm rid of this dreadful business once for all.
Creon. Prisoner! Her? You took her—where, doing what?
Sentry. Burying the man. That's the whole story.
CREON. What?

You mean what you say, you're telling me the truth?

SENTRY. She's the one. With my own eyes I saw her bury the body, just what you've forbidden.
There. Is that plain and clear?

CREON. What did you see? Did you catch her in the act?

SENTRY. Here's what happened. We went back to our post, those threats of yours breathing down our necks—
we brushed the corpse clean of the dust that covered it, stripped it bare . . . it was slimy, going soft,
and we took to high ground, backs to the wind
so the stink of him couldn't hit us;
jestling, baiting each other to keep awake,
shouting back and forth—no napping on the job, not this time. And so the hours dragged by until the sun stood dead above our heads, a huge white ball in the noon sky, beating, blazing down, and then it happened—
suddenly, a whirlwind!
Twisting a great dust-storm up from the earth,
a black plague of the heavens, filling the plain,
ripping the leaves off every tree in sight, choking the air and sky. We squinted hard and took our whipping from the gods.

And after the storm passed—it seemed endless—
there, we saw the girl!
And she cried out a sharp, piercing cry,
like a bird come back to an empty nest,
peering into its bed, and all the babies gone . . .
Just so, when she sees the corpse bare she bursts into a long, shattering wail and calls down withering curses on the heads of all who did the work. And she scoops up dry dust, handfuls, quickly, and lifting a fine bronze urn, lifting it high and pouring, she crowns the dead with three full libations.

Soon as we saw
we rushed her, closed on the kill like hunters, and she, she didn't flinch. We interrogated her, charging her with offenses past and present—
she stood up to it all, denied nothing. I tell you, it made me ache and laugh in the same breath.
It's pure joy to escape the worst yourself,
it hurts a man to bring down his friends.
But all that, I'm afraid, means less to me than my own skin. That's the way I'm made.

CREON. [Wheeling on ANTIGONE.] You, with your eyes fixed on the ground—speak up.
Do you deny you did this, yes or no?

ANTIGONE. I did it. I don't deny a thing.
CREON. [To the sentry.] You, get out, wherever you please—you’re clear of a very heavy charge.

[He leaves; CREON turns back to ANTIGONE.]

You, tell me briefly, no long speeches—were you aware a decree had forbidden this?

ANTIGONE. Well aware. How could I avoid it? It was public.

CREON. And still you had the gall to break this law?

ANTIGONE. Of course I did. It wasn’t Zeus, not in the least, who made this proclamation—not to me. Nor did that Justice, dwelling with the gods beneath the earth, ordain such laws for men. Nor did I think your edict had such force that you, a mere mortal, could override the gods, the great unwritten, unshakable traditions. They are alive, not just today or yesterday: they live forever, from the first of time, and no one knows when they first saw the light.

These laws—I was not about to break them, not out of fear of some man’s wounded pride, and face the retribution of the gods. Die I must, I’ve known it all my life—how could I keep from knowing?—even without your death-sentence ringing in my ears. And if I am to die before my time I consider that a gain. Who on earth, alive in the midst of so much grief as I, could fail to find his death a rich reward? So for me, at least, to meet this doom of yours is precious little pain. But if I had allowed my own mother’s son to rot, an unburied corpse—that would have been an agony! This is nothing. And if my present actions strike you as foolish, let’s just say I’ve been accused of folly by a fool.

LEADER. Like father like daughter, passionate, wild... she hasn’t learned to bend before adversity.

CREON. No? Believe me, the stiffest stubborn wills fall the hardest; the toughest iron, tempered strong in the white-hot fire, you’ll see it crack and shatter first of all. And I’ve known spirited horses you can break with a light bit—proud, rebellious horses. There’s no room for pride, not in a slave not with the lord and master standing by.

This girl was an old hand at insolence when she overrode the edicts we made public. But once she’d done it—the insolence, twice over—to glory in it, laughing, mocking us to our face with what she’d done.
I’m not the man, not now: she is the man
if this victory goes to her and she goes free.

Never! Sister’s child or closer in blood than all my family clustered at my altar worshiping Guardian Zeus—she’ll never escape,

she and her blood sister, the most barbaric death.

Yes, I accuse her sister of an equal part in scheming this, this burial.

[To bis attendants.]

Bring her here!
I just saw her inside, hysterical, gone to pieces.

It never fails: the mind convicts itself in advance, when scoundrels are up to no good, plotting in the dark. Oh but I hate it more when a traitor, caught red-handed, tries to glorify his crimes.

ANTIGONE. Creon, what more do you want than my arrest and execution?

CREON. Nothing. Then I have it all.

ANTIGONE. Then why delay? Your moralizing repels me, every word you say—pray god it always will.

So naturally all I say repels you too.

Enough. Give me glory! What greater glory could I win than to give my own brother decent burial?

These citizens here would all agree,

[To the chorus.]

they’d praise me too
if their lips weren’t locked in fear.

[Pointing to Creon.]

Lucky tyrants—the perquisites of power!
Ruthless power to do and say whatever pleases them.

CREON. You alone, of all the people in Thebes, see things that way.

ANTIGONE. They see it just that way but defer to you and keep their tongues in leash.

CREON. And you, aren’t you ashamed to differ so from them?
So disloyal!

ANTIGONE. Not ashamed for a moment, not to honor my brother, my own flesh and blood.

CREON. Wasn’t Eteocles a brother too—cut down, facing him?

ANTIGONE. Brother, yes, by the same mother, the same father.

CREON. Then how can you render his enemy such honors, such impieties in his eyes?

ANTIGONE. He’ll never testify to that,
Eteocles dead and buried.
CREON. He will—
if you honor the traitor just as much as him.

ANTIGONE. But it was his brother, not some slave that died—

CREON. Ravaging our country!—
but Eteocles died fighting in our behalf.

ANTIGONE. No matter—Death longs for the same rites for all.

CREON. Never the same for the patriot and the traitor.

ANTIGONE. Who, Creon, who on earth can say the ones below don’t find this pure and uncorrupt?

CREON. Never. Once an enemy, never a friend, ot even after death.

ANTIGONE. I was born to join in love, not hate—that is my nature.

CREON. Go down below and love, if love you must—love the dead! While I’m alive,
no woman is going to lord it over me.

[Enter ISMENE from the palace, under guard.]

CHORUS. Look,
Ismene’s coming, weeping a sister’s tears,
loving sister, under a cloud . . .
hers face is flushed, her cheeks streaming.
Sorrow puts her lovely radiance in the dark.

CREON. You—
in my house, you viper, slinking undetected, sucking my life-blood! I never knew I was breeding twin disasters, the two of you rising up against my throne. Come, tell me, will you confess your part in the crime or not?
Answer me. Swear to me.

ISMENE. I did it, yes—
if only she consents—I share the guilt,
the consequences too.

ANTIGONE. No,
Justice will never suffer that—not you,
you were unwilling. I never brought you in.

ISMENE. But now you face such dangers . . . I’m not ashamed to sail through trouble with you, make your troubles mine.

ANTIGONE. Who did the work?
Let the dead and the god of death bear witness!
I’ve no love for a friend who loves in words alone.

ISMENE. Oh no, my sister, don’t reject me, please, let me die beside you, consecrating
the dead together.

ANTIGONE. Never share my dying, don’t lay claim to what you never touched.
My death will be enough.

ISMENE. What do I care for life, cut off from you?
ANTIGONE. Ask Creon. Your concern is all for him.
ISMENE. Why abuse me so? It doesn't help you now.

ANTIGONE. You're right—
if I mock you, I get no pleasure from it, only pain.

ISMENE. Tell me, dear one,
what can I do to help you, even now?

ANTIGONE. Save yourself. I don't grudge you your survival.

ISMENE. Oh no, no, denied my portion in your death?

ANTIGONE. You chose to live, I chose to die.

ISMENE. Not, at least, without every kind of caution I could voice.

ANTIGONE. Your wisdom appealed to one world—mine, another.

ISMENE. But look, we're both guilty, both condemned to death.

ANTIGONE. Courage! Live your life. I gave myself to death, long ago, so I might serve the dead.

CREON. They're both mad, I tell you, the two of them.
One's just shown it, the other's been that way since she was born.

ISMENE. True, my king,
the sense we were born with cannot last forever . . .
commit cruelty on a person long enough and the mind begins to go.

CREON. Yours did,
when you chose to commit your crimes with her.

ISMENE. How can I live alone, without her?

CREON. Her?
Don't even mention her—she no longer exists.

ISMENE. What? You'd kill your own son's bride?

CREON. Absolutely:
there are other fields for him to plow.

ISMENE. Perhaps,
but never as true, as close a bond as theirs.

CREON. A worthless woman for my son? It repels me.

ISMENE. Dearest Haemon, your father wrongs you so!

CREON. Enough, enough—you and your talk of marriage!

ISMENE. Creon—you're really going to rob your son of Antigone?

CREON. Death will do it for me—break their marriage off.

LEADER. So, it's settled then? Antigone must die?

CREON. Settled, yes—we both know that.

[To the guards.]
Stop wasting time. Take them in.
From now on they'll act like women.
Tie them up, no more running loose;
even the bravest will cut and run,
one they see Death coming for their lives.

[The guards escort ANTIGONE and ISMENE into the palace. CREON remains while the old citizens form their chorus.]

CHORUS. Blest, they are truly blest who all their lives have never tasted devastation. For others, once the gods have rocked a house to its foundations the ruin will never cease, cresting on and on from one generation on throughout the race—like a great mounting tide driven on by savage northern gales, surging over the dead black depths roiling up from the bottom dark heaves of sand and the headlands, taking the storm’s onslaught full-force, roar, and the low moaning echoes on and on and now
as in ancient times I see the sorrows of the house, the living heirs of the old ancestral kings, piling on the sorrows of the dead and one generation cannot free the next—some god will bring them crashing down,
the race finds no release.
And now the light, the hope springing up from the late last root in the house of Oedipus, that hope’s cut down in turn by the long, bloody knife swung by the gods of death by a senseless word
 by fury at the heart.
 Zeus,
yours is the power, Zeus, what man on earth can override it, who can hold it back?
Power that neither Sleep, the all-ensnaring no, nor the tireless months of heaven can ever overmaster—young through all time, mighty lord of power, you hold fast
 the dazzling crystal mansions of Olympus.
And throughout the future, late and soon as through the past, your law prevails:
 no towering form of greatness enters into the lives of mortals
 free and clear of ruin.
 True,
our dreams, our high hopes voyaging far and wide bring sheer delight to many, to many others delusion, blithe, mindless lusts and the fraud steals on one slowly . . . unaware till he trips and puts his foot into the fire.
 He was a wise old man who coined
the famous saying: "Sooner or later foul is fair, fair is foul to the man the gods will ruin”—
 He goes his way for a moment only free of blinding ruin.

[Enter HAEMON from the palace.]

Here’s Haemon now, the last of all your sons.
Does he come in tears for his bride,
his doomed bride, Antigone—bitter at being cheated of their marriage?

CREON. We'll soon know, better than seers could tell us.

[Turning to HAEMON.]

Son, you've heard the final verdict on your bride?
Are you coming now, raving against your father?
Or do you love me, no matter what I do?

HAEMON. Father, I'm your son... you in your wisdom set my bearings for me—I obey you.
No marriage could ever mean more to me than you, whatever good direction you may offer.

CREON. Fine, Haemon.

That's how you ought to feel within your heart, subordinate to your father's will in every way.
That's what a man prays for: to produce good sons—households full of them, dutiful and attentive, so they can pay his enemy back with interest and match the respect their father shows his friend.
But the man who rears a brood of useless children,
what has he brought into the world, I ask you?

Nothing but trouble for himself, and mockery from his enemies laughing in his face.

Oh Haemon,

never lose your sense of judgment over a woman.
The warmth, the rush of pleasure, it all goes cold in your arms, I warn you... a worthless woman in your house, a misery in your bed.
What wound cuts deeper than a loved one turned against you? Spit her out, like a mortal enemy—let the girl go.
Let her find a husband down among the dead.

Imagine it: I caught her in naked rebellion,
the traitor, the only one in the whole city.
I'm not about to prove myself a liar,
not to my people, no, I'm going to kill her!
That's right—so let her cry for mercy, sing her hymns to Zeus who defends all bonds of kindred blood.
Why, if I bring up my own kin to be rebels, think what I'd suffer from the world at large.
Show me the man who rules his household well:
I'll show you someone fit to rule the state.

That good man, my son,
I have every confidence he and he alone can give commands and take them too. Staunch in the storm of spears he'll stand his ground,
a loyal, unflinching comrade at your side.

But whoever steps out of line, violates the laws or presumes to hand out orders to his superiors, he'll win no praise from me. But that man the city places in authority, his orders must be obeyed, large and small, right and wrong.

Anarchy—

show me a greater crime in all the earth!

She, she destroys cities, rips up houses, breaks the ranks of spearmen into headlong rout.

But the ones who last it out, the great mass of them owe their lives to discipline. Therefore we must defend the men who live by law, never let some woman triumph over us.

Better to fall from power; if fall we must, at the hands of a man—never be rated inferior to a woman, never.

LEADER. To us,

unless old age has robbed us of our wits, you seem to say what you have to say with sense.

HAEMON. Father, only the gods endow a man with reason, the finest of all their gifts, a treasure.

Far be it from me—I haven’t the skill, and certainly no desire, to tell you when, if ever, you make a slip in speech . . . though someone else might have a good suggestion.

Of course it’s not for you, in the normal run of things, to watch whatever men say or do, or find to criticize.

The man in the street, you know, dreads your glance, he’d never say anything displeasing to your face.

But it’s for me to catch the murmurs in the dark, the way the city mourns for this young girl.

“No woman,” they say, “ever deserved death less, and such a brutal death for such a glorious action.

She, with her own dear brother lying in his blood—she couldn’t bear to leave him dead, unburied, food for the wild dogs or wheeling vultures.

Death? She deserves a glowing crown of gold!”

So they say, and the rumor spreads in secret, darkly . . .

I rejoice in your success, father—nothing more precious to me in the world.

What medal of honor brighter to his children than a father’s growing glory? Or a child’s to his proud father? Now don’t, please, be quite so single-minded, self-involved, or assume the world is wrong and you are right.

Whoever thinks that he alone possesses intelligence, the gift of eloquence, he and no one else, and character too . . . such men, I tell you, spread them open—you will find them empty.

No, it’s no disgrace for a man, even a wise man, to learn many things and not to be too rigid. You've seen trees by a raging winter torrent, how many sway with the flood and salvage every twig, but not the stubborn—they're ripped out, roots and all. Bend or break. The same when a man is sailing: haul your sheets too taut, never give an inch, you'll capsize, go the rest of the voyage keel up and the rowing-benches under.

Oh give way. Relax your anger—change! I'm young, I know, but let me offer this: it would be best by far, I admit, if a man were born infallible, right by nature. If not—and things don't often go that way, it's best to learn from those with good advice.

LEADER. You'd do well, my lord, if he's speaking to the point, to learn from him.

[Turning to HAEMON.]

and you, my boy, from him.

You both are talking sense.

CREON. So, men our age, we're to be lectured, are we? — schooled by a boy his age?

HAEMON. Only in what is right. But if I seem young, look less to my years and more to what I do.

CREON. Do? Is admiring rebels an achievement?

HAEMON. I'd never suggest that you admire treason.

CREON. Oh? — isn't that just the sickness that's attacked her?

HAEMON. The whole city of Thebes denies it, to a man.

CREON. And is Thebes about to tell me how to rule?

HAEMON. Now, you see? Who's talking like a child?

CREON. Am I to rule this land for others—or myself?

HAEMON. It's no city at all, owned by one man alone.

CREON. What? The city is the king's—that's the law!

HAEMON. What a splendid king you'd make of a desert island—you and you alone.

CREON. [To the CHORUS.] This boy, I do believe, is fighting on her side, the woman's side.

HAEMON. If you are a woman, yes; my concern is all for you.

CREON. Why, you degenerate—bandying accusations, threatening me with justice, your own father!

HAEMON. I see my father offending justice—wrong.

CREON. Wrong?

HAEMON. Protect your rights?

When you trample down the honors of the gods?
CREON. You, you soul of corruption, rotten through—woman's accomplice!

HAEMON. That may be,
but you'll never find me accomplice to a criminal.

CREON. That's what she is,
and every word you say is a blatant appeal for her—

HAEMON. And you, and me, and the gods beneath the earth.

CREON. You'll never marry her, not while she's alive.

HAEMON. Then she'll die . . . but her death will kill another.

CREON. What, brazen threats? You go too far!

HAEMON. What threat?
Combating your empty, mindless judgments with a word?

CREON. You'll suffer for your sermons, you and your empty wisdom!

HAEMON. If you weren't my father, I'd say you were insane.

CREON. Don't flatter me with Father—you woman's slave!

HAEMON. You really expect to fling abuse at me and not receive the same?

CREON. Is that so!
Now, by heaven, I promise you, you'll pay—taunting, insulting me! Bring her out, that hateful—she'll die now, here,
in front of his eyes, beside her groom!

HAEMON. No, no, she will never die beside me—don't delude yourself. And you will never see me, never set eyes on my face again.
Rage your heart out, rage with friends who can stand the sight of you. [Rushing out.]

LEADER. Gone, my king, in a burst of anger.
A temper young as his . . . hurt him once,
he may do something violent.

CREON. Let him do—
dream up something desperate, past all human limit!
Good riddance. Rest assured, he'll never save those two young girls from death.

LEADER. Both of them, you really intend to kill them both?

CREON. No, not her, the one whose hands are clean;
you're quite right.

LEADER. But Antigone—
what sort of death do you have in mind for her?

CREON. I'll take her down some wild, desolate path never trod by men, and wall her up alive in a rocky vault, and set out short rations, just a gesture of piety
to keep the entire city free of defilement.
There let her pray to the one god she worships:
Death—who knows?—may just reprieve her from death.
Or she may learn at last, better late than never,
what a waste of breath it is to worship Death.

[Exit to the palace.]
CHORUS. Love, never conquered in battle
    Love the plunderer laying waste the rich!
    Love standing the night-watch guarding a girl’s soft cheek, you range the seas, the shepherds’ steadings off in the wilds—not even the deathless gods can flee your onset, nothing human born for a day—
    whoever feels your grip is driven mad.

    Love
you wrench the minds of the righteous into outrage, swerve them to their ruin—you have ignited this,
    this kindred strife, father and son at war and Love alone the victor—warm glance of the bride triumphant, burning with desire!
    Throned in power, side-by-side with the mighty laws!
    Irresistible Aphrodite,° never conquered—
    Love, you mock us for your sport.

[Antigone is brought from the palace under guard.]

    But now, even I’d rebel against the king,
    I’d break all bounds when I see this—
    I fill with tears, can’t hold them back, not any more . . . I see Antigone make her way to the bridal vault where all are laid to rest.

ANTIGONE. Look at me, men of my fatherland, setting out on the last road looking into the last light of day the last I’ll ever see . . .
    the god of death who puts us all to bed takes me down to the banks of Acheron° alive—denied my part in the wedding-songs, no wedding-song in the dusk has crowned my marriage—
    I go to wed the lord of the dark waters.

CHORUS. Not crowned with glory, crowned with a dirge, you leave for the deep pit of the dead.
    No withering illness laid you low,
    no strokes of the sword—a law to yourself, alone; no mortal like you, ever, you go down to the halls of Death alive and breathing.

ANTIGONE. But think of Niobe—well I know her story—think what a living death she died,
    Tantalus’ daughter, stranger queen from the east:
    there on the mountain heights, growing stone binding as ivy, slowly walled her round and the rains will never cease, the legends say

893 Aphrodite goddess of love.  905 Acheron river in the underworld.  915 Niobe a Theban queen whose pride in her children was punished by the gods, who turned her into stone.
the snows will never leave her . . .
   wasting away, under her brows the tears showering down her breasting ridge and slopes—a rocky death like hers puts me to sleep.

CHORUS. But she was a god, born of gods, 925 and we are only mortals born to die.
And yet, of course, it’s a great thing for a dying girl to hear, just hear she shares a destiny equal to the gods, during life and later, once she’s dead.

ANTIGONE. O you mock me! 930
   Why, in the name of all my fathers’ gods why can’t you wait till I am gone—must you abuse me to my face?
O my city, all your fine rich sons!
And you, you springs of the Dirce, holy grove of Thebes where the chariots gather,
you at least, you’ll bear me witness, look,
unmourned by friends and forced by such crude laws
I go to my rockbound prison, strange new tomb—always a stranger, O dear god,
   I have no home on earth and none below,
   not with the living, not with the breathless dead.

CHORUS. You went too far, the last limits of daring—smashing against the high throne of Justice!
   Your life’s in ruins, child—I wonder . . .
do you pay for your father’s terrible ordeal?

ANTIGONE. There—at last you’ve touched it, the worst pain the worst anguish! Raking up the grief for father three times over, for all the doom that’s struck us down, the brilliant house of Laius.
O mother, your marriage-bed
the coiling horrors, the coupling there—you with your own son, my father—doomstruck mother!
Such, such were my parents, and I their wretched child.
I go to them now, cursed, unwed, to share their home—
   I am a stranger! O dear brother, doomed in your marriage—your marriage murders mine, your dying drags me down to death alive!

[Enter CREON.]

CHORUS. Reverence asks some reverence in return—but attacks on power never go unchecked, not by the man who holds the reins of power.
   Your own blind will, your passion has destroyed you.

ANTIGONE. No one to weep for me, my friends, no wedding-song—they take me away
in all my pain . . . the road lies open, waiting.
   Never again, the law forbids me to see the sacred eye of day. I am agony!
No tears for the destiny that’s mine,
no loved one mourns my death.
CREON. Can’t you see?
If a man could wail his own dirge before he dies,
he’d never finish.

[To the GUARDS.]

Take her away, quickly!
Wall her up in the tomb, you have your orders.
Abandon her there, alone, and let her choose—death or a buried life with a good roof for shelter.
As for myself, my hands are clean. This young girl—dead or alive, she will be stripped of her rights, her stranger’s rights, here in the world above.

ANTIGONE. O tomb, my bridal-bed—my house, my prison cut in the hollow rock, my everlasting watch!
I’ll soon be there, soon embrace my own,
the great growing family of our dead
Persephone* has received among her ghosts.

I, the last of them all, the most reviled by far, go down before my destined time’s run out.
But still I go, cherishing one good hope:
my arrival may be dear to father,
dear to you, my mother,
dear to you, my loving brother, Eteocles—
When you died I washed you with my hands,
I dressed you all, I poured the cups across your tombs. But now, Polynices, because I laid your body out as well,
this, this is my reward. Nevertheless
I honored you—the decent will admit it—well and wisely too.

Never, I tell you,
if I had been the mother of children or if my husband died, exposed and rotting—
I’d never have taken this ordeal upon myself, ever defied our people’s will. What law,
you ask, do I satisfy with what I say?
A husband dead, there might have been another.
A child by another too, if I had lost the first.
But mother and father both lost in the halls of Death,
no brother could ever spring to light again.

For this law alone I held you first in honor.
For this, Creon, the king, judges me a criminal guilty of dreadful outrage, my dear brother!
And now he leads me off, a captive in his hands,
with no part in the bridal-song, the bridal-bed, denied all joy of marriage, raising children—
deserted so by loved ones, struck by fate,
I descend alive to the caverns of the dead.

982 Persephone queen of the underworld.
What law of the mighty gods have I transgressed?
Why look to the heavens any more, tormented as I am?
Whom to call, what comrades now? Just think,
my reverence only brands me for irreverence!
Very well: if this is the pleasure of the gods,
one I suffer I will know that I was wrong.
But if these men are wrong, let them suffer nothing worse than they mete out to me—these masters of injustice!

LEADER. Still the same rough winds, the wild passion raging through the girl.

CREON. [To the GUARDS.] Take her away.
You’re wasting time—you’ll pay for it too.

ANTIGONE. Oh god, the voice of death. It’s come, it’s here.

CREON. True. Not a word of hope—your doom is sealed.

ANTIGONE. Land of Thebes, city of all my fathers—
O you gods, the first gods of the race!
They drag me away, now, no more delay.
Look on me, you noble sons of Thebes—
the last of a great line of kings,
I alone, see what I suffer now at the hands of what breed of men—
all for reverence, my reverence for the gods!

[She leaves under guard; the CHORUS gathers.]

CHORUS. Danaë,° Danaë—even she endured a fate like yours, in all her lovely strength she traded the light of day for the bolted brazen vault—buried within her tomb, her bridal-chamber, wed to the yoke and broken.
But she was of glorious birth
my child, my child
and treasured the seed of Zeus within her womb,
the cloudburst streaming gold!
The power of fate is a wonder,
dark, terrible wonder—neither wealth nor armies towered walls nor ships black hulls lashed by the salt can save us from that force.
The yoke tamed him too young Lycurgus° flaming in anger
king of Edonia, all for his mad taunts
Dionysus clamped him down, encased

° Danaë Danaë’s father locked her in a cell because it had been predicted that she would bear a son who would kill him; Zeus entered the cell in the form of a shower of gold, and engendered Perseus.
° Lycurgus Lycurgus refused to worship Dionysus, and therefore Dionysus punished him.
in the chain-mail of rock and there his rage
  his terrible flowering rage burst—sobbing, dying away . . . at last that madman came to know his god—
  the power he mocked, the power he taunted in all his frenzy trying to stamp out
the women strong with the god—
  the torch, the raving sacred cries—enraging the Muses° who adore the flute.

And far north where the Black Rocks cut the sea in half and murderous straits split the coast of Thrace
  a forbidding city stands where once, hard by the walls
the savage Ares thrilled to watch a king’s new queen, a Fury rearing in rage against his two royal sons—her bloody hands, her dagger-shuttle stabbing out their eyes—cursed, blinding wounds—their eyes blind sockets screaming for revenge!

They wailed in agony, cries echoing cries
  the princes doomed at birth . . .
and their mother doomed to chains, walled off in a tomb of stone—
  but she traced her own birth back to a proud Athenian line and the high gods and off in caverns half the world away, born of the wild North Wind
  she sprang on her father’s gales, racing stallions up the leaping cliffs—child of the heavens. But even on her the Fates the gray everlasting Fates rode hard
my child, my child.

[Enter Tiresias, the blind prophet, led by a boy.]

Tiresias. Lords of Thebes,
  I and the boy have come together,
  hand in hand.Two see with the eyes of one . . .
  so the blind must go, with a guide to lead the way.

Creon. What is it, old Tiresias? What news now?

Tiresias. I will teach you. And you obey the seer.

Creon. I will,
  I’ve never wavered from your advice before.

Tiresias. And so you kept the city straight on course.

Creon. I owe you a great deal, I swear to that.

1065 Muses nine goddesses of the arts and sciences.
TIRESIAS. Then reflect, my son: you are poised, once more, on the razor-edge of fate.

CREON. What is it? I shudder to hear you.

TIRESIAS. You will learn when you listen to the warnings of my craft. As I sat in the ancient seat of augury, in the sanctuary where every bird I know will hover at my hands—suddenly I heard it, a strange voice in the wingbeats, unintelligible, barbaric, a mad scream! Talons flashing, ripping, they were killing each other—that much I knew—the murderous fury whirring in those wings made that much clear!

I was afraid, I turned quickly, tested the burnt-sacrifice, ignited the altar at all points—but no fire, the god in the fire never blazed. Not from those offerings . . . over the embers slid a heavy ooze from the long thighbones, smoking, sputtering out, and the bladder puffed and burst—spraying gall into the air—and the fat wrapping the bones slithered off and left them glistening white. No fire! The rites failed that might have blazed the future with a sign. So I learned from the boy here; he is my guide, as I am guide to others.

And it’s you—your high resolve that sets this plague on Thebes. The public altars and sacred hearths are fouled, one and all, by the birds and dogs with carrion torn from the corpse, the doomstruck son of Oedipus! And so the gods are deaf to our prayers, they spurn the offerings in our hands, the flame of holy flesh. No birds cry out an omen clear and true—they’re gorged with the murdered victim’s blood and fat. Take these things to heart, my son, I warn you. All men make mistakes, it is only human. But once the wrong is done, a man can turn his back on folly, misfortune too, if he tries to make amends, however low he’s fallen, and stops his bullnecked ways. Stubbornness brands you for stupidity—pride is a crime. No, yield to the dead! Never stab the fighter when he’s down. Where’s the glory, killing the dead twice over?

I mean you well. I give you sound advice. It’s best to learn from a good adviser when he speaks for your own good: it’s pure gain.
CREON. Old man—all of you! So, you shoot your arrows at my head like archers at the target— I even have bim loosed on me, this fortune-teller. Oh his ilk has tried to sell me short and ship me off for years. Well, drive your bargains, traffic—much as you like—in the gold of India, silver-gold of Sardis. You’ll never bury that body in the grave, not even if Zeus’s eagles rip the corpse and wing their rotten pickings off to the throne of god! Never, not even in fear of such defilement will I tolerate his burial, that traitor. Well I know, we can’t defile the gods—no mortal has the power.

No, reverend old Tiresias, all men fall, it’s only human, but the wisest fall obscenely when they glorify obscene advice with rhetoric—all for their own gain.

TIRESIAS. Oh god, is there a man alive who knows, who actually believes . . .

CREON. What now? What earth-shattering truth are you about to utter?

TIRESIAS. . . . just how much a sense of judgment, wisdom is the greatest gift we have?

CREON. Just as much, I’d say, as a twisted mind is the worst affliction going.

TIRESIAS. You are the one who’s sick, Creon, sick to death.

CREON. I am in no mood to trade insults with a seer.

TIRESIAS. You have already, calling my prophecies a lie.

CREON. Why not?

TIRESIAS. And the whole race of tyrants lusts to rake it in.

CREON. This slander of yours—are you aware you’re speaking to the king?

TIRESIAS. Well aware. Who helped you save the city?

CREON. You— you have your skills, old seer, but you lust for injustice!

TIRESIAS. You will drive me to utter the dreadful secret in my heart.

CREON. Spit it out! Just don’t speak it out for profit.

TIRESIAS. Profit? No, not a bit of profit, not for you.

CREON. Know full well, you’ll never buy off my resolve.

TIRESIAS. Then know this too, learn this by heart! The chariot of the sun will not race through so many circuits more, before you have surrendered one born of your own loins, your own flesh and blood, a corpse for corpses given in return, since you have thrust to the world below a child sprung from the world above, ruthlessly lodged a living soul within the grave—then you’ve robbed the gods below the earth, keeping a dead body here in the bright air, 1190
unburied, unsung, unhallowed by the rites.

You, you have no business with the dead,
or do the gods above—this is violence 1195
you have forced upon the heavens.
And so the avengers, the dark destroyers late but true to the mark, now lie in wait for you,
the Furies sent by the gods and the god of death to strike you down with the pains that you perfected!

There. Reflect on that, tell me I’ve been bribed.
The day comes soon, no long test of time, not now, 1200 that wakes the wails for men and women in your halls.
Great hatred rises against you—cities in tumult, all whose mutilated sons
the dogs have graced with burial, or the wild beasts, some wheeling crow that wings the ungodly stench of carrion back to each city, each warrior’s heart and home.

These arrows for your heart! Since you’ve raked me
I loose them like an archer in my anger, arrows deadly true. You’ll never escape their burning, searing force.

[Motioning to his escort.] 1210
Come, boy, take me home.
So he can vent his rage on younger men,
and learn to keep a gentler tongue in his head and better sense than what he carries now.

[Exit to the side.]

LEADER. The old man’s gone, my king—terrible prophecies. Well I know, 1215 since the hair on his old head went gray, he’s never lied to Thebes.
CREON. I know it myself—I’m shaken, torn.
It’s a dreadful thing to yield . . . but resist now?
Lay my pride bare to the blows of ruin?
That’s dreadful too.

LEADER. But good advice,
Creon, take it now, you must.
CREON. What should I do? Tell me . . . I’ll obey.
LEADER. Go! Free the girl from the rocky vault and raise a mound for the body you exposed.
CREON. That’s your advice? You think I should give in?
LEADER. Yes, my king, quickly. Disasters sent by the gods cut short our follies in a flash.
CREON. Oh it’s hard.
giving up the heart’s desire . . . but I will do it—
no more fighting a losing battle with necessity.

LEADER. Do it now, go, don’t leave it to others.
CREON. Now—I’m on my way! Come, each of you, take up axes, make for the high ground, over there, quickly! I and my better judgment have come round to this—I shackled her, I’ll set her free myself. I am afraid... it’s best to keep the established laws to the very day we die.

[Rushing out, followed by his entourage. The CHORUS clusters around the altar]

CHORUS. God of a hundred names!

    Great Dionysus—
    Son and glory of Semele! Pride of Thebes—
    Child of Zeus whose thunder rocks the clouds—
    Lord of the famous lands of evening—
    King of the Mysteries!
    King of Eleusis, Demeter’s plain° her breasting hills that welcome in the world—
    Great Dionysus!
    Bacchus,° living in Thebes
    the mother-city of all your frenzied women—Bacchus living along the Isemenus’° rippling waters standing over the field sown with the Dragons’ teeth!
    You—you have seen you through the flaring smoky fires, your torches blazing over the twin peaks where nymphs of the hallowed cave climb onward fired with you, your sacred rage—we have seen you at Castalia’s running spring° and down from the heights of Nysa° crowned with ivy the greening shore rioting vines and grapes down you come in your storm of wild women ecstatic, mystic cries—
    Dionysus—
    down to watch and ward the roads of Thebes!
    First of all cities, Thebes you honor first you and your mother, bride of the lightning—come, Dionysus! now your people lie in the iron grip of plague, come in your racing, healing stride down Parnassus° slopes or across the moaning straits.
    Lord of the dancing—dance, dance the constellations breathing fire!

1243 Demeter’s plain Demeter, goddess of grain, was worshipped at Eleusis, near Athens. 1245 Bacchus a name for Dionysus. 1247 Isemenus a river near Thebes. The founders of Thebes sprang from a dragon’s teeth sown by Cadmus (see line 1273) near the river. 1253 Castalia’s running spring the sacred spring of Apollo’s oracle at Delphia. 1254 Nysa a mountain where Dionysus was worshipped. 1264 Parnassus a mountain sacred to Dionysus.
Great master of the voices of the night!
Child of Zeus, God's offspring, come, come forth!
Lord, king, dance with your nymphs, swirling, raving arm-in-arm in frenzy through the night they dance you, Iacchus°—
Dance, Dionysus
giver of all good things!

[Enter a messenger from the side.]

MESSENGER. Neighbors, friends of the house of Cadmus and the kings,
there's not a thing in this life of ours
I'd praise or blame as settled once for all.
Fortune lifts and Fortune fells the lucky and unlucky every day. No prophet on earth can tell a man his fate. Take Creon:
there was a man to rouse your envy once,
as I see it. He saved the realm from enemies;
taking power, he alone, the lord of the fatherland,
he set us true on course—flourished like a tree with the noble line of sons he bred and reared . . .
and now it's lost, all gone.
Believe me,
when a man has squandered his true joys,
he's good as dead, I tell you, a living corpse.
Pile up riches in your house, as much as you like—live like a king with a huge show of pomp,
but if real delight is missing from the lot,
I wouldn't give you a wisp of smoke for it,
not compared with joy.

LEADER. What now?
What new grief do you bring the house of kings?

MESSENGER. Dead, dead—and the living are guilty of their death!

LEADER. Who's the murderer? Who is dead? Tell us.

MESSENGER. Haemon's gone, his blood spilled by the very hand—

LEADER. His father's or his own?

MESSENGER. His own . . . raging mad with his father for the death—

LEADER. Oh great seer, you saw it all, you brought your word to birth!

MESSENGER. Those are the facts. Deal with them as you will.

[As he turns to go, EURYDICE enters from the palace.]

LEADER. Look, Eurydice. Poor woman, Creon's wife, so close at hand. By chance perhaps, unless she's heard the news about her son.

EURYDICE. My countrymen,
all of you—I caught the sound of your words
as I was leaving to do my part,
to appeal to queen Athena° with my prayers.

1271 Iacchus a lofty name for Dionysus.  1305 Athena goddess of wisdom.
I was just loosing the bolts, opening the doors, when a voice filled with sorrow, family sorrow, struck my ears, and I fell back, terrified, into the women’s arms—everything went black. Tell me the news, again, whatever it is . . . sorrow and I are hardly strangers; I can bear the worst.

MESSENGER. I—dear lady, I’ll speak as an eye-witness. I was there. And I won’t pass over one word of the truth. Why should I try to soothe you with a story, only to prove a liar in a moment? Truth is always best.

So, I escorted your lord, I guided him to the edge of the plain where the body lay, Polynices, torn by the dogs and still unmourned. And saying a prayer to Hecate of the Crossroads, Pluto° too, to hold their anger and be kind, we washed the dead in a bath of holy water and plucking some fresh branches, gathering . . . what was left of him, we burned them all together and raised a high mound of native earth, and then we turned and made for that rocky vault of hers, the hollow, empty bed of the bride of Death. And far off, one of us heard a voice, a long wail rising, echoing out of that unhallowed wedding-chamber; he ran to alert the master and Creon pressed on, closer—the strange, inscrutable cry came sharper, throbbing around him now, and he let loose a cry of his own, enough to wrench the heart, “Oh god, am I the prophet now? going down the darkest road I’ve ever gone? My son—it’s his dear voice, he greets me! Go, men, closer, quickly! Go through the gap, the rocks are dragged back—right to the tomb’s very mouth—and look, see if it’s Haemon’s voice I think I hear, or the gods have robbed me of my senses.”

The king was shattered. We took his orders, went and searched, and there in the deepest, dark recesses of the tomb we found her . . . hanged by the neck in a fine linen noose, strangled in her veils—and the boy, his arms flung around her waist, clinging to her, wailing for his bride, dead and down below, for his father’s crimes and the bed of his marriage blighted by misfortune.

1321–1322 Hecate . . . Pluto deities of the underworld.
When Creon saw him, he gave a deep sob, he ran in, shouting, crying out to him, “Oh my child—what have you done? what seized you, what insanity? what disaster drove you mad? Come out, my son! I beg you on my knees!” But the boy gave him a wild burning glance, spat in his face, not a word in reply; he drew his sword—his father rushed out, running as Haemon lunged and missed!—and then, doomed, desperate with himself, suddenly leaning his full weight on the blade, he buried it in his body, halfway to the hilt. And still in his senses, pouring his arms around her, he embraced the girl and breathing hard, released a quick rush of blood, bright red on her cheek glistening white. And there he lies, body enfolded by body . . . he has won his bride at last, poor boy, not here but in the houses of the dead.

Creon shows the world that of all the ills afflicting men the worst is lack of judgment.

[Eurydice turns and reenters the palace.]

LEADER. What do you make of that? The lady’s gone, without a word, good or bad.

MESSENGER. I’m alarmed too but here’s my hope—faced with her son’s death, she finds it unbecoming to mourn in public. Inside, under her roof, she’ll set her women to the task and wail the sorrow of the house. She’s too discreet. She won’t do something rash.

LEADER. I’m not so sure. To me, at least, a long heavy silence promises danger, just as much as a lot of empty outcries.

MESSENGER. We’ll see if she’s holding something back, hiding some passion in her heart. I’m going in. You may be right—who knows? Even too much silence has its dangers.

[Exit to the palace. Enter Creon from the side, escorted by attendants carrying Haemon’s body on a bier.]

LEADER. The king himself! Coming toward us, look, holding the boy’s head in his hands. Clear, damning proof, if it’s right to say so—proof of his own madness, no one else’s, no, his own blind wrongs.

CREON. Ohhh, so senseless, so insane . . . my crimes, my stubborn, deadly—Look at us, the killer, the killed, father and son, the same blood—the misery!
My plans, my mad fanatic heart,
my son, cut off so young!
Ai, dead, lost to the world,
not through your stupidity, no, my own.

LEADER. Too late, too late, you see what justice means.

CREON. Oh I’ve learned through blood and tears! Then, it was then, when the god came down and struck me—a great weight shattering, driving me down that wild savage path, ruining, trampling down my joy. Oh the agony,
the heartbreaking agonies of our lives.

[Enter the MESSENGER from the palace.]

MESSENGER. Master,
what a hoard of grief you have, and you’ll have more.
The grief that lies to hand you’ve brought yourself—

[Pointing to HAEMON’s body.]

the rest, in the house, you’ll see it all too soon.

CREON. What now? What’s worse than this?

MESSENGER. The queen is dead.
The mother of this dead boy . . . mother to the end—
poor thing, her wounds are fresh.

CREON. No, no,
harbor of Death, so choked, so hard to cleanse!—
why me? why are you killing me?
Herald of pain, more words, more grief?
I died once, you kill me again and again!
What’s the report, boy . . . some news for me?
My wife dead? O dear god!
Slaughter heaped on slaughter?

[The doors open; the body of EURYDICE is brought out on her bier.]

MESSENGER. See for yourself:
now they bring her body from the palace.

CREON. Oh no,
another, a second loss to break the heart.
What next, what fate still waits for me?
I just held my son in my arms and now,
look, a new corpse rising before my eyes—
wretched, helpless mother—O my son!

MESSENGER. She stabbed herself at the altar, then her eyes went dark, after she’d raised a cry for the noble fate of Megareus,° the hero killed in the first assault, then for Haemon, then with her dying breath she called down torments on your head—you killed her sons.

1428 Megareus son of Creon and Eurydice.
CREON. Oh the dread, I shudder with dread! Why not kill me too?— run me through with a good sharp sword? Oh god, the misery, anguish— I, I’m churning with it, going under.

MESSENGER. Yes, and the dead, the woman lying there, piles the guilt of all their deaths on you.

CREON. How did she end her life, what bloody stroke?

MESSENGER. She drove home to the heart with her own hand, once she learned her son was dead . . . that agony.

CREON. And the guilt is all mine— can never be fixed on another man, no escape for me. I killed you, I, god help me, I admit it all!

[To his attendants.] Take me away, quickly, out of sight.

LEADER. Good advice, if there’s any good in suffering. Quickest is best when troubles block the way.

CREON. [Kneeling in prayer.] Come, let it come!—that best of fates for me that brings the final day, best fate of all. Oh quickly, now— so I never have to see another sunrise.

LEADER. That will come when it comes; we must deal with all that lies before us. The future rests with the ones who tend the future.

CREON. That prayer—I poured my heart into that prayer!

LEADER. No more prayers now. For mortal men there is no escape from the doom we must endure.

CREON. Take me away, I beg you, out of sight. A rash, indiscriminate fool! I murdered you, my son, against my will— you too, my wife . . . Wailing wreck of a man, whom to look to? where to lean for support?

[Desperately turning from HAEMON to EURYDICE on their biers.] Whatever I touch goes wrong—once more a crushing fate’s come down upon my head.

[The MESSENGER and attendants lead CREON into the palace.]

CHORUS. Wisdom is by far the greatest part of joy, and reverence toward the gods must be safeguarded. The mighty words of the proud are paid in full with mighty blows of fate, and at long last those blows will teach us wisdom.

[The old citizens exit to the side.]
TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. If you have read Oedipus, compare and contrast the Creon of Antigone with the Creon of Oedipus.

2. Although Sophocles called his play Antigone, many critics say that Creon is the real tragic hero, pointing out that Antigone is absent from the last third of the play. Evaluate this view.

3. In some Greek tragedies, fate plays a great role in bringing about the downfall of the tragic hero. Though there are references to the curse on the House of Oedipus in Antigone, do we feel that Antigone goes to her death as a result of the workings of fate? Do we feel that fate is responsible for Creon’s fall? Are both Antigone and Creon the creators of their own tragedy?

4. Are the words hamartia and hybris (see pages 1014–1015) relevant to Antigone? To Creon?

5. Why does Creon, contrary to the Chorus’s advice (lines 1224–1225), bury the body of Polynices before he releases Antigone? Does his action show a zeal for piety as short-sighted as his earlier zeal for law? Is his action plausible, in view of the facts that Tiresias has dwelt on the wrong done to Polynices and that Antigone has ritual food to sustain her? Or are we not to worry about Creon’s motive?

6. A foil is a character who, by contrast, sets off or helps define another character. To what extent is Ismene a foil to Antigone? Is she entirely without courage?

7. What function does Eurydice serve? How deeply do we feel about her fate?

The Play on the Stage

8. Would you use masks for some (or all) of the characters? If so, would they be masks that fully cover the face, Greek-style, or some sort of half-masks? (A full mask enlarges the face, and conceivably the mouthpiece can amplify the voice, but only an exceptionally large theater might require such help. Perhaps half-masks are enough if the aim is chiefly to distance the actors from the audience and from daily reality, and to force the actors to develop resources other than facial gestures. One director, arguing in favor of half-masks, has said that actors who wear even a half-mask learn to act not with the eyes but with the neck.)

9. How would you costume the players? Would you dress them as the Greeks might have? Why? One argument sometimes used by those who hold that modern productions of Greek drama should use classical costumes is that Greek drama ought to be remote and ritualistic. Evaluate this view. What sort of modern dress might be effective?

10. If you were directing a college production of Antigone, how large a chorus would you use? (Sophocles is said to have used a chorus of fifteen.) Would you have the chorus recite (or chant) the odes in unison, or would you assign lines to single speakers? In Sophocles’ day, the chorus danced. Would you use dance movements? If not, in what sorts of movements might they engage?
A PLAY BY SHAKESPEARE

Hamlet

This section contains (in addition to illustrations of the original texts of Hamlet, the Elizabethan theater, and modern productions) the following material:

1. A note on the Elizabethan theater
2. A note on the text of Hamlet (with facsimiles of three versions of Hamlet’s “to be or not to be”)
3. A note on various stage productions of Hamlet
4. The text of Hamlet

A NOTE ON THE ELIZABETHAN THEATER

Shakespeare’s theater was wooden, round or polygonal (the Chorus in Henry V calls it a “wooden O”). About eight hundred spectators could stand in the yard in front of—and perhaps along the two sides of—the stage that jutted from the rear wall, and another fifteen hundred or so spectators could sit in the three roofed galleries that ringed the stage.

That portion of the galleries that was above the rear of the stage was sometimes used by actors. For instance, in The Tempest, 3.3, a stage direction following line 17 mentions “Prospero on the top, invisible,” that is, he is imagined to be invisible to the characters in the play.

Left: Johannes de Witt, a Continental visitor to London, made a drawing of the Swan Theater in about the year 1596. The original drawing is lost; this is Arend van Buchel’s copy of it. Right: C. Walter Hodges’s drawing (1965) of an Elizabethan playhouse.
Entry to the stage was normally gained by doors at the rear, but apparently on rare occasions use was made of a curtained alcove—or perhaps a booth—between the doors, which allowed characters to be “discovered” (revealed) as in the modern proscenium theater, which normally employs a curtain. Such “discovery” scenes are rare.

Although the theater as a whole was unroofed, the stage was protected by a roof, supported by two pillars. These could serve (by an act of imagination) as trees behind which actors might pretend to conceal themselves.

A performance was probably uninterrupted by intermissions or by long pauses for the changing of scenery; a group of characters leaves the stage, another enters, and if the locale has changed the new characters somehow tell us. (Modern editors customarily add indications of locales to help a reader, but it should be remembered that the action on the Elizabethan stage was continuous.)

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

William Shakespeare (1564–1616) was born in Stratford, England, of middle-class parents. Nothing of interest is known about his early years, but by 1590 he was acting and writing plays in London. By the end of the following decade he had worked in all three Elizabethan dramatic genres—tragedy, comedy, and history. Romeo and Juliet, for example, was written about 1595, the year of Richard II, and in the following year he wrote A Midsummer Night’s Dream. Julius Caesar (1599) probably preceded As You Like It by one year, and Hamlet probably followed As You Like It by less than a year. Among the plays that followed Othello (1603–1604) were King Lear (1605–1606), Macbeth (1605–1606), and several “romances”—plays that have happy endings but that seem more meditative and closer to tragedy than such comedies as A Midsummer Night’s Dream, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night.

A Note on the Texts of Hamlet

Shakespeare’s Hamlet comes to us in three versions. The first, known as the First Quarto (Q1), was published in 1603. It is an illegitimate garbled version, perhaps derived from the memory of the actor who played Marcellus (this part is conspicuously more accurate than the rest of the play) in a short version of the play.

The second printed version (Q2), which appeared in 1604, is almost twice as long as Q1; all in all, it is the best text we have, doubtless published (as Q1 was not) with the permission of Shakespeare’s theatrical company.

The third printed version, in the First Folio (the collected edition of Shakespeare’s plays, published in 1623), is also legitimate, but it seems to be an acting version, for it lacks some two hundred lines of Q2. On the other hand, the Folio text includes some ninety lines not found in Q2.

Because Q2 is the longest version, giving us more of the play as Shakespeare conceived it than either of the other texts, it serves as the basic version for this text. Unfortunately, the printers of Q2 often worked carelessly: Words and phrases are omitted, there are plain misreadings of what must have been in
And so by continuance, and weake of the braine
Into this frenzie, which now possesteth him:
And if this be not true, take this from this.

King. Thynke you tis so?

Cor. How? so my Lord, I would very faine know
That thing that I have saide tis so, positively,
And it hath fallen out otherwise.
Nay, if circumstances leade me on,
Ile finde it out, if it were hid
As deepe as the centre of the earth.

King. How should wee trie this same?

Cor. Mary my good lord this,
The Princes walkes is here in the gallery,
There let Ophelia walke vntil hee comes:
Your selfe and I will stand close in the study,
There shal you heare the effect of all his hart,
And if it prove any other wise then love,
Then let my cenfure fail another time.

King. See where hee comes poring vpon a booke.

Enter Hamlet.

Cor. Madame, will it please your grace
To leave vs here?

Oue. With all my hart. exit.

Cor. And here Ophelia, reade you on this booke,
And walke aloofe, the King shal be vnscene.

Ham. To be, or not to be, I here's the point,
To Die, to sleepe, is that all? I all:
No, to sleepe, to dreame, I mary there it goes,
For in that dreame of death, when wee awake,
And borne before an everlasing Judge,
From whence no passenger euer returnd,
The undiscovered country, at whose sight
The happy smyle, and the accursed damn'd.
But for this, the joyfull hope of this,
Whod beare the stonnes and flattery of the world,
Scorned by the right rich, the rich cursed of the poore?

Here and on the next page we print "To be or not to be," as given in the First Quarto (QI, 1603). (On pages 1102–03, we give the speech as it appears in the Second Quarto, and on page 1104, the speech in the First Folio.) (continued)
Prince of Denmark

The widow being oppressed, the orphan wrong'd,
The taste of hunger, or a tyrant's reign,
And thousand more calamities besides,
To grunt and sweat under this weary life,
When that he may his full measure make,
With a bare bodkin, who would this endure,
But for a hope of something after death?
Which pulses the brain, and doth confound the sense,
Which makes vs rather bear those ills we have,
Than flie to others that we know not of.
I that, O this conscience makes cowards of us all,
Lady in thy orisons, be all my sinner remembred.

Oset. My Lord, I have fought opportunity which now
I have to redeem to your worthy hands, a small remembrance, such tokens which I have received of you.

Ham. Are you so far?

Oset. My Lord.

Ham. Are you honest?

Oset. What means my Lord?

Ham. That if you be fair and honest,
Your beauty should admit no discourse to your honesty.

Oset. My Lord, can beauty have better privilege than with honesty?

Ham. Yea, many may it for Beauty may transform Honesty, from what she was into a bawd:
Then Honesty can transform Beauty:
This was sometimes a Paradoxe,
But now the time gives it scope.
I never gave you nothing.

Oset. My Lord, you know right well you did;
And with them such earnest voices of love,
As would have moved the stoniest breast alive,
But now too true I finde,
Rich gifts waxe poore, when givers grow vnkinde.

Ham. I never loved you.

Oset. You made me believe you did.
That show of such an exercise may cullour
Your lowlines; we are oft too blame in this,
Tis too much proou'd, that with devotions visage
And pious action, we doe sugar ore
The devill himselfe.

King. O tis too true,
How smart a lash that speech doth give my conscience,
The harlots cheeke beautified with plaflring art,
Is not more ongly to the thing that helps it,
Then is my deede to my most painted word:
O heavy burthen.

Enter Hamlet.

Pol. I heare him comming, with drawe my Lord,

Ham. To be, or not to be, that is the question,
Whether tis nobler in the minde to suffer
The slings and arrowes of outrageous fortune,
Or to take Armes against a sea of troubles,
And by opposing, end them; to die to sleepe
No more, and by a sleepe, to say we end
The hart-ake, and the thousand naturall shockes
That fleth is heire to tis a confusion
Deuously to be wisht to die to sleepe,
To sleepe, perchance to dreame, I there's the rub,
For in that sleepe of death what dreams may come
When we have shufled off this mortall coyle
Must giue vs pause, there's the respect
That makes calamitie of so long life:
For who would bære the whips and scornes of time,
Th'oppressors wrong, the proude mans contumely,
The pangs of despi'd love, the lawes delay,
The insolence of office, and the spurnes
That patient merit of th'vnworthy takes,
When he himselfe might his quietas make
With a bare bodkin; who would fardels beare,
To grunt and sweat vnder a wearie life,
But that the dread of something after death,
The vndiscover'd country, from whose borne.

The Tragedie of Hamlet

No truer returnes, puzzels the will,
And makes vs rather beare those ills we haue,
Then flye to others that we know not of.
Thus conscience dooes make cowards,
And thus the naieue hiew of resolution
Is sickled ore with the pale cast of thought,
And entersifes of great pitch and moment,
With this regard their currents turne away,
And loose the name of action. Soft you now,
The faire Ophelia, Nymph in thy orizons
Be all my finnes remembred.

Oph. Good my Lord,

How dooes your honour for this many a day?

Ham. I humbly thanke you well,

Oph. My Lord, I haue remembrances of yours
That I haue longed long to redeliver,
I pray you now receiue them.

Ham. No, not I, I never gaue you ought.

Oph. My honor'd Lord, you know right well you did,
And with them words of so sweet breath compoind
As made these things more rich, their perfume loft,
Take these againe, for to the noble mind
Rich gifts waxe poore when giuers prooue vnkind,

There my Lord.

Ham. Ha, ha, are you honest.

Oph. My Lord.

Ham. Are you faire?

Oph. What means your Lordship?

Ham. That if you be honest & faire, you should admit no discourse to your beautie.

Oph. Could beauty my Lord have better comers?

Then with honestie:

Ham. I truly, for the power of beautie will sooner transforme honestie from what it is to a bawde, then the force of honestie can tranlate beautie into his likenes, this was sometime a paradox, but now the time giues it prooue, I did lose you once.

Oph. Indeed my Lord you made me believe so.

Ham. You should not have beleu'd me, for vertue cannot so execute our old stock, but we shall relish of it, I loved you not.
With turbulent and dangerous Languor.

"To be or not to be," as given in the First Folio (F1, 1623).
Shakespeare’s manuscript, and speeches are sometimes wrongly assigned. It is therefore necessary to turn to the First Folio for many readings. It has been found useful, also, to divide the play into acts and scenes; these divisions, not found in Q2 (and only a few are found in the Folio), are purely editorial additions, and they are therefore enclosed in square brackets.

We use the text edited by David Bevington.

Portfolio: *Hamlet on the Stage

We know that Hamlet was popular during Shakespeare’s lifetime, but the earliest illustration (1709) showing a scene from the play was engraved more than a century after the play was written, so we know little about what Hamlet looked like on Shakespeare’s stage. Still, we do have at least a little idea. We know, for instance, that at least in the first scene Hamlet wore black (he speaks of his “inky cloak”), and we know that when the Ghost first appears it is dressed in “the very armor he had on / When he the ambitious Norway combatted” (1.1.64–65). We know, too, that when the Ghost appears later, "The Murder of Gonzago" in 3.3. Because this episode is a play-within-the-play, Shakespeare uses a distinctive form of verse (pairs of rhyming lines, eight syllables to a line) that sets it off from the language of the rest of the play (chiefly prose, or unrhymed lines of ten syllables). The language, too, is different, for it is conspicuously old-fashioned (the sun is called “Phoebus’ cart”; the ocean is called “Neptune’s salt wash”). In this modern-dress production done at Stratford, England, in 1975, Claudius wore a blue business suit and Fortinbras wore combat gear, but the characters in the play-within-the-play were masked, to emphasize their theatricality.
in the Queen’s chamber (3.4), he does not wear armor, a sign that his mood is different.

We also have a few tantalizing glimpses of Elizabethan acting. Thus, in the dumb show (pantomime) preceding “The Murder of Gonzago” that the touring players in 3.2 produce for the court, we get this stage direction: “Enter a King and a Queen very lovingly: the Queen embracing him and he her.” A little later, when the Queen in this dumb show finds that the King has been poisoned, she “makes passionate action,” but then, when the poisoner woos her, “she seems harsh a while but in the end accepts love.”

We know something, too, of the sound effects. Possibly the play begins with the bell tolling twelve (in 1.1 Bernardo says, “’Tis now struck twelve”), and certainly in the first scene we hear the crowing of a cock, which causes the Ghost to depart. Later we hear the sound of drums, trumpets, and cannon when Claudius drinks toasts, and the play ends with the sound of cannon, when Fortinbras orders the soldiers to pay tribute to the dead Hamlet.

What about costumes? In their own day, Elizabethan plays were staged chiefly in contemporary dress—doublet (close-fitting jacket) and hose (tights) for the men, gowns of various sorts for the women (whose roles were played by boy actors)—though for classical plays such as Julius Caesar some attempt was made in the direction of ancient costume, at least for the major characters. The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, too, staged the plays in the costume of the day, which of course was not Elizabethan, but in much of the nineteenth century, and in the first third of the twentieth, a strong sense that the plays were “Elizabethan” caused producers to use Elizabethan costumes, although these costumes—contemporary when the plays were first performed—now had become historical costume, marking the plays as of an age remote from our own. In 1925 Barry Jackson staged a modern-dress production in London, in an effort to emphasize the play’s contemporary relevance. Today, productions tend to be in modern dress in the sense that they avoid Elizabethan costume; but usually, in an effort to add some color to the stage as well as to add some (but not a great) sense of remoteness, they use costumes of the nineteenth century, which allow for splendid gowns and for military uniforms with sashes.

The same scene (5.1) as in the previous photo shows Kevin Kline as Hamlet in the 1986 New York Shakespeare Festival production. Costumes are late nineteenth century. Horatio is played by an African-American. Putting aside plays by black authors, and a very few plays by whites about blacks (such as Eugene O’Neill’s The Emperor Jones), there are few roles in drama expressly written for blacks. Shakespeare offers only three: Othello, Aaron (a Moor in Titus Adronicus), and the Prince of Morocco (in The Merchant of Venice). The few black actors who played other Shakespearean roles, such as the great Ira Aldridge who in the nineteenth century was known for his King Lear, performed the roles in whiteface. Since the 1980s, however, directors have engaged in open casting, using blacks (and Asians) in any and all roles, and not requiring white makeup.

Act 1, Scene 1

HAMLET, Prince of Denmark

1.1 Enter BERNARDO and FRANCISCO, two sentinels [meeting].

BERNARDO. Who’s there?

FRANCISCO. Nay, answer me. Stand and unfold yourself.

BERNARDO. Long live the King!

FRANCISCO. Bernardo?

BERNARDO. He. 5

FRANCISCO. You come most carefully upon your hour.

BERNARDO. 'Tis now struck twelve. Get thee to bed, Francisco.

FRANCISCO. For this relief much thanks. 'Tis bitter cold,
And I am sick at heart.

BERNARDO. Have you had quiet guard?

FRANCISCO. Not a mouse stirring.

BERNARDO. Well, good night.

If you do meet Horatio and Marcellus,
The rivals of my watch, bid them make haste.

Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.

FRANCISCO. I think I hear them.—Stand, ho! Who is there?

HORATIO. Friends to this ground.

MARCELLUS. And liegemen to the Dane.

FRANCISCO. Give you good night.
MARCELLUS. O, farewell, honest soldier. Who hath relieved you?

FRANCISCO. Bernardo hath my place. Give you good night.

Exit FRANCISCO.

MARCELLUS. Holla! Bernardo!

BERNARDO. Say, what, is Horatio there?

HORATIO. A piece of him.

BERNARDO. Welcome, Horatio. Welcome, good Marcellus.

HORATIO. What, has this thing appeared again tonight?

BERNARDO. I have seen nothing.

MARCELLUS. Horatio says 'tis but our fantasy,°
And will not let belief take hold of him
Touching this dreaded sight twice seen of us.
Therefore I have entreated him along°
To watch° the minutes of this night,
That if again this apparition come
He may approve° our eyes and speak to it.

HORATIO. Tush, tush, 'twill not appear.

BERNARDO. Sit down awhile,
And let us once again assail your ears,
That are so fortified against our story,
What° we have two nights seen.

HORATIO. Well, sit we down,
And let us hear Bernardo speak of this.

BERNARDO. Last night of all,°
When yond same star that's westward from the pole°
Had made his° course t' illume° that part of heaven
Where now it burns, Marcellus and myself,
The bell then beating one—

Enter GHOST.

MARCELLUS. Peace, break thee off! Look where it comes again!

BERNARDO. In the same figure like the King that's dead.

MARCELLUS. Thou art a scholar.° Speak to it, Horatio.

BERNARDO. Looks 'a° not like the King? Mark it, Horatio.

HORATIO. Most like. It harrows me with fear and wonder.

BERNARDO. It would be spoke to.°

MARCELLUS. It is offended.

BERNARDO. See, it stalks away.

Exit GHOST.

MARCELLUS. 'Tis gone and will not answer.

BERNARDO. How now, Horatio? You tremble and look pale.

Is not this something more than fantasy?

What think you on 't?

HORATIO. Before my God, I might not this believe

Without the sensible° and true avouch°

Of mine own eyes.

MARCELLUS. Is it not like the King?

HORATIO. As thou art to thyself.

Such was the very armor he had on

When he the ambitious Norway° combated.

So frowned he once when, in an angry parle,°

He smote the sledded° Polacks° on the ice.

'Tis strange.

MARCELLUS. Thus twice before, and jump° at this dead hour,

With martial stalk° hath he gone by our watch.

HORATIO. In what particular thought to work° I know not,

But in the gross and scope° of mine opinion

This bodes some strange eruption to our state.

MARCELLUS. Good now,° sit down, and tell me, he that knows,

Why this same strict and most observant watch

So nightly toils° the subject° of the land,

And why such daily cast° of brazen cannon

And foreign mart° for implements of war,

Why such impress° of shipwrights, whose sore task

Does not divide the Sunday from the week.

What might be toward,° that this sweaty haste

Doth make the night joint-laborer with the day?

Who is 't that can inform me?

HORATIO. That can I;

At least, the whisper goes so. Our last king,

Whose image even but now appeared to us,

Was, as you know, by Fortinbras of Norway,

Thereto pricked on° by a most emulate° pride,°

Dared to the combat; in which our valiant Hamlet—

For so this side of our known world° esteemed him—

Did slay this Fortinbras; who by a sealed° compact

Well ratified by law and heraldry

Did forfeit, with his life, all those his lands

Against the which a moiety competent
Was gagèd by our king, which had returned
To the inheritance of Fortinbras
Had he been vanquisher, as, by the same cov’nant
And carriage of the article designed,
His fell to Hamlet. Now, sir, young Fortinbras,
Of unimprovèd mettle hot and full,
Hath in the skirts of Norway here and there
Sharked up a list of lawless resolutes
For food and diet to some enterprise
That hath a stomach in ’t, which is no other—
As it doth well appear unto our state—
But to recover of us, by strong hand
And terms compulsatory, those foresaid lands
So by his father lost. And this, I take it,
Is the main motive of our preparations,
The source of this our watch, and the chief head
Of this posthaste and rummage in the land.

BERNARDO. I think it be no other but e’en so.
Well may it sort that this portentous figure
Comes armèd through our watch so like the King
That was and is the question of these wars.

HORATIO. A mote it is to trouble the mind’s eye.
In the most high and palmy state of Rome,
A little ere the mightiest Julius fell,
The graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted dead
Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets;
As stars with trains of fire and dews of blood,
Disasters in the sun; and the moist star
Upon whose influence Neptune’s empire stands
Was sick almost to doomsday with eclipse.
And even the like precurse of feared events,
As harbingers preceding still the fates
And prologue to the omen° coming on,
Have heaven and earth together demonstrated
Unto our climatures° and countrymen.

Enter GHOST.

But soft,° behold! Lo, where it comes again!
I'll cross° it, though it blast° me. [It spreads his° arms.]

Stay, illusion!
If thou hast any sound or use of voice,
Speak to me!
If there be any good thing to be done
That may to thee do ease and grace to me,
Speak to me!
If thou art privy to° thy country's fate,
Which happily,° foreknowing may avoid,
O, speak!
Or if thou hast uphoarded in thy life
Extorted treasure in the womb of earth,
For which, they say, you spirits oft walk in death,
Speak of it! [The cock crows.] Stay and speak!—Stop it, Marcellus.

MARCELLUS. Shall I strike at it with my partisan?°

BERNARDO. 'Tis here!

HORATIO. 'Tis here! [Exit GHOST.]

MARCELLUS. 'Tis gone.

We do it wrong, being so majestical,
To offer it the show of violence,
For it is as the air invulnerable,
And our vain blows malicious mockery.

BERNARDO. It was about to speak when the cock crew.

HORATIO. And then it started like a guilty thing
Upon a fearful summons. I have heard
The cock, that is the trumpet° to the morn,
Doth with his lofty and shrill-standing throat
Awake the god of day, and at his warning,
Whether in sea or fire, in earth or air,
Th' extravagant and erring° spirit hies°
To his confine; and of the truth herein
This present object made probation.°

MARCELLUS. It faded on the crowing of the cock.

Some say that ever 'gainst° that season comes Wherein our Savior's birth is celebrated,
This bird of dawning singeth all night long,
And then, they say, no spirit dare stir abroad;

HORATIO. So have I heard and do in part believe it.
But, look, the morn in russet mantle clad
Walks o’er the dew of yon high eastward hill.
Break we our watch up, and by my advice
Let us impart what we have seen tonight
Unto young Hamlet; for upon my life,
This spirit, dumb to us, will speak to him.
Do you consent we shall acquaint him with it,
As needful in our loves, fitting our duty?

MARCELLUS. Let’s do ’t, I pray, and I this morning know
Where we shall find him most conveniently.

Exeunt.

1.2 Flourish. Enter CLAUDIUS, King of Denmark, GERTRUDE the Queen, [the] Council, as° POLONIUS and bis son, LAERTES, HAMLET, cum aliis° [including VOLTIMAND and CORNELIUS].

KING. Though yet of Hamlet our° dear brother’s death
The memory be green, and that it us befitted
To bear our hearts in grief and our whole kingdom
To be contracted in one brow of woe,
Yet so far hath discretion fought with nature
That we with wisest sorrow think on him
Together with remembrance of ourselves
Therefore our sometime° sister, now our queen,
Th’ imperial jointress° to this warlike state,
Have we, as ’twere with a defeated joy—
With an auspicious and a dropping eye,°
With mirth in funeral and with dirge in marriage,
In equal scale weighing delight and dole°—
Taken to wife: nor have we herein barred
Your better wisdoms, which have freely gone
With this affair along. For all, our thanks.
Now follows that you know° young Fortinbras,
Holding a weak supposal° of our worth,
Or thinking by our late dear brother’s death
Our state to be disjoint and out of frame,
Co-leaguèd with° this dream of his advantage,°
He hath not failed to pester us with message

Importing the surrender of those lands
Lost by his father, with all bonds of law,
To our most valiant brother. So much for him.
Now for ourself and for this time of meeting.
Thus much the business is: we have here writ
To Norway, uncle of young Fortinbras—
Who, impotent and bed-rid, scarcely hears
Of this his nephew’s purpose—to suppress
His further gait herein, in that the levies,
The lists, and full proportions are all made
Out of his subject, and we here dispatch
You, good Cornelius, and you, Voltimand,
For bearers of this greeting to old Norway,
Giving to you no further personal power
To business with the king more than the scope
Of these dilated articles allow: [He gives a paper]
Farewell, and let your haste commend your duty.

CORNELIUS, VOLTIMAND. In that, and all things, will we show our duty.

KING. We doubt it nothing. Heartily farewell.

[Exeunt VOLTIMAND and CORNELIUS.]

And now, Laertes, what’s the news with you?
You told us of some suit; what is ’t, Laertes?
You cannot speak of reason to the Dane
And lose your voice. What wouldst thou beg, Laertes,
That shall not be my offer, not thy asking?
The head is not more native to the heart,
The hand more instrumental to the mouth,
Than is the throne of Denmark to thy father.
What wouldst thou have, Laertes?

LAERTES. My dread lord,
Your leave and favor to return to France,
From whence though willingly I came to Denmark
To show my duty in your coronation,
Yet now I must confess, that duty done,
My thoughts and wishes bend again toward France
And bow them to your gracious leave and pardon.

KING. Have you your father’s leave? What says Polonius?

POLONIUS. H’ath, my lord, wrung from me my slow leave
By laborsome petition, and at last
Upon his will I sealed my hard consent.
I do beseech you, give him leave to go.

KING. Take thy fair hour, Laertes. Time be thine,
And thy best graces spend it at thy will.

But now, my cousin Hamlet, and my son—

HAMLET. A little more than kin, and less than kind.

KING. How is it that the clouds still hang on you?

HAMLET. Not so, my lord. I am too much in the sun.

QUEEN. Good Hamlet, cast thy nighted color off,
And let thine eye look like a friend on Denmark.

Thou know'st 'tis common, all that lives must die,
Passing through nature to eternity.

HAMLET. Ay, madam, it is common.

QUEEN. If it be,
Why seems it so particular with thee?

HAMLET. Seems, madam? Nay, it is. I know not "seems."
'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good Mother,
Nor customary suits of solemn black,
Nor windy suspiration of forced breath,
No, nor the fruitful river in the eye,
Nor the dejected havior of the visage,
Together with all forms, moods, shapes of grief,
That can denote me truly. These indeed seem,
For they are actions that a man might play.
But I have that within which passes show;
These but the trappings and the suits of woe.

KING. 'Tis sweet and commendable in your nature, Hamlet,
To give these mourning duties to your father.
But you must know your father lost a father,
That father lost, lost his, and the survivor bound
In filial obligation for some term
To do obsequious sorrow. But to persever
In obstinate condolement is a course
Of impious stubbornness. 'Tis unmanly grief.
It shows a will most incorrect to heaven,
A heart unfortified,° a mind impatient,
An understanding simple° and unschooled.
For what we know must be and is as common
As any the most vulgar thing to sense,°
Why should we in our peevish opposition
Take it to heart? Fie, 'tis a fault to heaven,
A fault against the dead, a fault to nature,
To reason most absurd, whose common theme
Is death of fathers, and who still° hath cried,
From the first corpse° till he that died today,
"This must be so." We pray you, throw to earth
This unprevailing° woe and think of us
As of a father; for let the world take note,
You are the most immediate° to our throne,
And with no less nobility of love
Than that which dearest father bears his son
Do I impart toward° you. For° your intent
In going back to school° in Wittenberg,°
It is most retrograde° to our desire,
And we beseech you bend you° to remain
Here in the cheer and comfort of our eye,
Our chiefest courtier, cousin, and our son.

QUEEN. Let not thy mother lose her prayers, Hamlet.
I pray thee, stay with us, go not to Wittenberg.

HAMLET. I shall in all my best° obey you, madam.

KING. Why 'tis a loving and a fair reply.
Be as ourself in Denmark. Madam, come.
This gentle and unforced accord of Hamlet
Sits smiling to° my heart, in grace° whereof
No jocund° health that Denmark drinks today
But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell,
And the King's rouse° the heaven shall bruit again,°
Respeaking earthly thunder.° Come away.

Flourish. Exeunt all but
HAMLET.

HAMLET. O, that this too too sullied° flesh would melt,
Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew!
Or that the Everlasting had not fixed
His canon° 'gainst self-slaughter! O God, God,
How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable
Seem to me all the uses° of this world!

96 unfortified i.e., against adversity. 97 simple ignorant. 99 As . . . sense as the most ordinary experience. 104 still always. 105 the first corpse (Abel's). 107 unprevailing unavailing, useless. 109 most immediate next in succession. 112 impart toward i.e., bestow my affection on. For as for. 113 to school i.e., to your studies. 115 bend you incline yourself. 120 in all my best to the best of my ability. 124 to i.e., at. grace thanksgiving. 125 jocund merry. 127 rouse drinking of a draft of liquor. bruit again loudly echo. 128 thunder i.e., of trumpet and kettledrum, sounded when the King drinks; see 1.4.8–12. 129 sullied defiled. (The early quartos read sallied; the Folio, solid.) 132 canon law. 134 all the uses the whole routine.
Fie on ‘t, ah fie! ‘Tis an unweeded garden
That grows to seed.
Things rank and gross in nature
Possess it merely.° That it should come to this!
But two months dead—nay, not so much, not two.
So excellent a king, that was to° this
Hyperion° to a satyr,° so loving to my mother
That he might not beteem° the winds of heaven
Visit her face too roughly. Heaven and earth,
Must I remember? Why, she would hang on him
As if increase of appetite had grown
By what it fed on, and yet within a month—
Let me not think of ‘t; frailty, thy name is woman!—
A little month, or ere° those shoes were old
With which she followed my poor father’s body,
Like Niobe;° all tears, why she, even she—
O God, a beast, that wants discourse of reason,°
Would have mourned longer—married with my uncle,
My father’s brother; but no more like my father
Than I to Hercules. Within a month,
Ere yet the sale of most unrighteous tears
Had left the flushing in her gallèd° eyes,
She married. O, most wicked speed, to post°
With such dexterity to incestuous° sheets!
It is not, nor it cannot come to good.
But break, my heart, for I must hold my tongue.

Enter

HORATIO, MARCELLO, and BERNARDO.

HORATIO. Hail to your lordship!

HAMLET. I am glad to see you well.

HORATIO. The same, my lord, and your poor servant ever.

HAMLET. Sir, my good friend; I’ll change that name° with you.

And what make you from° Wittenberg, Horatio?

MARCELUS. My good lord.

HAMLET. I am very glad to see you. [To BERNARDO.] Good even, sir.—

But what in faith make you from Wittenberg?

HORATIO. A truant disposition, good my lord.

HAMLET. I would not hear your enemy say so,
Nor shall you do my ear that violence
To make it truster of your own report
Against yourself. I know you are no truant.
But what is your affair in Elsinore?
We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart.

HORATIO. My lord, I came to see your father's funeral.

HAMLET. I prithee, do not mock me, fellow student;
I think it was to see my mother's wedding.

HORATIO. Indeed, my lord, it followed hard upon.

HAMLET. Thrift, thrift, Horatio! The funeral baked meats
Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.
Would I had met my dearest foe in heaven
Or ever I had seen that day, Horatio.
My father—Methinks I see my father.

HORATIO. Where, my lord?

HAMLET. In my mind's eye, Horatio.

HORATIO. I saw him once. 'A was a goodly king.

HAMLET. 'A was a man. Take him for all in all,
I shall not look upon his like again.

HORATIO. My lord, I think I saw him yesternight.

HAMLET. Saw? Who?

HORATIO. My lord, the King your father.

HAMLET. The King my father?

HORATIO. Season your admiration for a while
With an attentive ear till I may deliver,
Upon the witness of these gentlemen,
This marvel to you.

HAMLET. For God's love, let me hear!

HORATIO. Two nights together had these gentlemen,
Marcellus and Bernardo, on their watch,
In the dead waste and middle of the night,
Been thus encountered. A figure like your father,
Arm'd at point exactly, cap-à-pie,
Appears before them, and with solemn march
Goes slow and stately by them. Thrice he walked
By their oppressed and fear-surprisèd eyes
Within his truncheon's length, whilst they, distilled
Almost to jelly with the act of fear,
Stand dumb and speak not to him. This to me
In dreadful secrecy impart they did,
And I with them the third night kept the watch,
Where, as they had delivered, both in time,
Form of the thing, each word made true and good,
The apparition comes. I knew your father;

---

179 hard close. 180 baked meats meat pies. 181 coldly i.e., as cold leftovers. 182 dearest closest (and therefore deadliest). 183 Or ever before. 186 'A he. 193 Season your admiration restrain your astonishment. 194 attent attentive. 199 dead waste desolate stillness. 201 at point correctly in every detail. cap-à-pie from head to foot. 205 truncheon officer's staff. distilled dissolved. 206 act action, operation. 208 dreadful full of dread.
These hands are not more like.

HAMLET. But where was this?

MARCELLUS. My lord, upon the platform where we watch.

HAMLET. Did you not speak to it?

HORATIO. My lord, I did,

But answer made it none. Yet once methought
It lifted up its head and did address
Itself to motion, like as it would speak;
But even then the morning cock crew loud,
And at the sound it shrunk in haste away
And vanished from our sight.

HAMLET. 'Tis very strange.

HORATIO. As I do live, my honoured lord, 'tis true,
And we did think it writ down in our duty
To let you know of it.

HAMLET. Indeed, indeed, sirs. But this troubles me.

Hold you the watch tonight?

All. We do, my lord.

HAMLET. Armed, say you?

All. Armed, my lord.

HAMLET. From top to toe?

All. My lord, from head to foot.

HAMLET. Then saw you not his face?

HORATIO. O, yes, my lord, he wore his beaver up.

HAMLET. What looked he, frowningly?

HORATIO. A countenance more in sorrow than in anger.

HAMLET. Pale or red?

HORATIO. Nay, very pale.

HAMLET. And fixed his eyes upon you?

HORATIO. Most constantly.

HAMLET. I would I had been there.

HORATIO. It would have much amazed you.

HAMLET. Very like, very like. Stayed it long?

HORATIO. While one with moderate haste might tell a hundred.

MARCELLUS, BERNARDO. Longer, longer.

HORATIO. Not when I saw 't.

HAMLET. His beard was grizzled—no?

HORATIO. It was, as I have seen it in his life,
A sable silvered.

HAMLET. I will watch tonight.

Perchance 'twill walk again.

HORATIO. I warrant it will.

HAMLET. If it assume my noble father's person,
I'll speak to it though hell itself should gape
And bid me hold my peace. I pray you all,
If you have hitherto concealed this sight,
Let it be tenable in your silence still,
And whatsoever else shall hap tonight,
Give it an understanding but no tongue.
I will requite your loves. So, fare you well.
Upon the platform twixt eleven and twelve
I'll visit you.

ALL. Our duty to your honor.

HAMLET. Your loves, as mine to you. Farewell.

Exeunt [all but HAMLET].

My father's spirit in arms! All is not well.
I doubt some foul play. Would the night were come!
Till then sit still, my soul. Foul deeds will rise,
Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes.

Exit.

1.3 Enter LAERTES and OPHelia, his sister.

LAERTES. My necessaries are embarked. Farewell.
And, sister, as the winds give benefit
And convoy is assistant, do not sleep
But let me hear from you.

OPHELIA. Do you doubt that?

LAERTES. For Hamlet, and the trifling of his favor,
Hold it a fashion and a toy in blood,
A violet in the youth of primy nature,
Forward, not permanent, sweet, not lasting,
The perfume and suppliance of a minute—
No more.

OPHELIA. No more but so?

LAERTES. Think it no more.
For nature crescent does not grow alone
In thews and bulk, but as this temple waxes
The inward service of the mind and soul
Grows wide withal. Perhaps he loves you now,
And now no soil nor cautel doth besmirch
The virtue of his will, but you must fear,
His greatness weighed, his will is not his own.
For he himself is subject to his birth.
He may not, as unvalued persons do,
Carve for himself, for on his choice depends
The safety and health of this whole state,
And therefore must his choice be circumscribed.

253 tenable held. 261 doubt suspect. 1.3. Location: Polonius' chambers. 3 convoy is assistant means of conveyance are available. 6 toy in blood passing amorous fancy. 7 primy in its prime, springtime. 8 Forward precocious. 9 suppliance supply, filler. 11 crescent growing, waxing. 12 thews bodily strength. temple i.e., body. 14 Grows wide withal grows along with it. 15 soil blemish. cautel deceit. 16 will desire. 17 His greatness weighed if you take into account his high position. 20 Carve i.e., choose.
Unto the voice and yielding\(^{23}\) of that body
Whereof he is the head. Then if he says he loves you,
It fits your wisdom so far to believe it
As he in his particular act and place\(^{26}\)
May give his saying deed, which is no further
Than the main voice\(^{28}\) of Denmark goes withal.\(^{9}\)
Then weigh what loss your honor may sustain
If with too credent\(^{30}\) ear you list\(^{\circ}\) his songs,
Or lose your heart, or your chaste treasure open
To his unmastered importunity.
Fear it, Ophelia, fear it, my dear sister,
And keep you in the rear of your affection,\(^{34}\)
Out of the shot and danger of desire.
The chariest\(^{36}\) maid is prodigal enough
If she unmask\(^{\circ}\) her beauty to the moon.\(^{\circ}\)
Virtue itself scapes not calumnious strokes.
The canker galls\(^{39}\) the infants of the spring
Too oft before their buttons\(^{40}\) be disclosed,\(^{\circ}\)
And in the morn and liquid dew\(^{41}\) of youth
Contagious blastments\(^{42}\) are most imminent.
Be wary then; best safety lies in fear.
Youth to itself rebels,\(^{44}\) though none else near.

OPHELIA. I shall the effect of this good lesson keep
As watchman to my heart. But, good my brother,
Do not, as some ungracious\(^{46}\) pastors do,
Show me the steep and thorny way to heaven,
Whiles like a puffed\(^{47}\) and reckless libertine
Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads,
And recks\(^{\circ}\) not his own rede.\(^{51}\)

Enter POLONIUS.

LAERTES. O, fear me not.\(^{\circ}\)
I stay too long. But here my father comes.
A double\(^{53}\) blessing is a double grace;
Occasion smiles upon a second leave.\(^{54}\)

POLONIUS. Yet here, Laertes? Aboard, aboard, for shame!
The wind sits in the shoulder of your sail,
And you are stayed for. There—my blessing with thee!
And these few precepts in thy memory
Look° thou character.° Give thy thoughts no tongue,
Nor any unproportioned° thought his° act.
Be thou familiar,° but by no means vulgar.°
Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,° Grapple them unto thy soul with hoops of steel,
But do not dull thy palm° with entertainment
Of each new-hatched, unfledged courage.° Beware
Of entrance to a quarrel, but being in,
Bear ’t that° th’ opposèd may beware of thee.
Give every man thy ear, but few thy voice;
Take each man’s censure,° but reserve thy judgment.
Costly thy habit° as thy purse can buy,
But not expressed in fancy,° rich, not gaudy,
For the apparel oft proclaims the man,
And they in France of the best rank and station
Are of a most select and generous chief in that.°
Neither a borrower nor a lender be,
For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
And borrowing dulleth edge of husbandry.°
This above all: to thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.
Farewell. My blessing season° this in thee!

LAERTES. Most humbly do I take my leave, my lord.

POLONIUS. The time invests° you. Go, your servants tend.°

LAERTES. Farewell, Ophelia, and remember well
What I have said to you.

OPHELIA. ’Tis in my memory locked,
And you yourself shall keep the key of it.

LAERTES. Farewell.

Exit

LAERTES.

POLONIUS. What is ’t, Ophelia, he hath said to you?

OPHELIA. So please you, something touching the Lord Hamlet.

POLONIUS. Marry,° well bethought.
’Tis told me he hath very oft of late
Given private time to you, and you yourself
Have of your audience been most free and bounteous.
If it be so—as so ’tis put on° me,
And that in way of caution—I must tell you

59 Look° be sure that.  character inscribe.  60 unproportioned° badly calculated, intemperate.  his° its.  61 familiar° sociable.  vulgar° common.  62 and their adoption tried° and also their suitability for adoption as friends having been tested.  64 dull° thy° palm° i.e., shake hands so often as to make the gesture meaningless.  65 courage° young man of spirit.  67 Bear ’t° that° manage it so that.  69 censure° opinion, judgment.  70 habit° clothing.  71 fancy° excessive ornament, decadent fashion.  74 Are . . . that° are of a most refined and well-bred preeminence in choosing what to wear.  77 husbandry° thrift.  81 season° mature.  83 invests° besieges, presses upon.  tend° attend, wait.  91 Marry° i.e., by the Virgin Mary. (A mild oath.)  95 put° on° impressed on, told to.
You do not understand yourself so clearly
As it behooves° my daughter and your honor.
What is between you? Give me up the truth.

OPHELIA. He hath, my lord, of late made many tenders°
Of his affection to me.

POLONIUS. Affection? Pooh! You speak like a green girl,
Unsifted° in such perilous circumstance.
Do you believe his tenders, as you call them?

OPHELIA. I do not know, my lord, what I should think.

POLONIUS. Marry, I will teach you. Think yourself a baby
That you have ta’en these tenders for true pay
Which are not sterling.° Tender° yourself more dearly,
Or—not to crack the wind° of the poor phrase,
Running it thus—you’ll tender me a fool.°

OPHELIA. My lord, he hath importuned me with love
In honorable fashion.

POLONIUS. Ay, fashion° you may call it. Go to,° go to.

OPHELIA. And hath given countenance° to his speech, my lord,
With almost all the holy vows of heaven.

POLONIUS. Ay, springes° to catch woodcocks.° I do know,
When the blood burns, how prodigal° the soul
Lends the tongue vows. These blazes, daughter,
Giving more light than heat, extinct in both
Even in their promise as it° is a-making,
You must not take for fire. From this time
Be something° scantier of your maiden presence.
Set your entreatments° at a higher rate
Than a command to parle.° For Lord Hamlet,
Believe so much in him° that he is young,
And with a larger tether may he walk
Than may be given you. In few,° Ophelia,
Do not believe his vows, for they are brokers.°
Not of that dye° which their investments° show,
But mere implorators° of unholy suits,
Breathing° like sanctified and pious bawds.

98 behooves befits. 100 tenders offers. 103 Unsifted i.e., untried. 108 sterling legal currency. Tender hold, look after, offer. 109 crack the wind i.e., run it until it is broken-winded. 110 tender me a fool (1) show yourself to me as a fool (2) show me up as a fool (3) present me with a grandchild. (Fool was a term of endearment for a child.) 113 fashion mere form, pretense. Go to (An expression of impatience.) 114 countenance credit, confirmation. 116 springes snares. woodcocks birds easily caught; here used to connote gullibility. 117 prodigal prodigally. 120 it i.e., the promise. 122 something somewhat. 123 entreatments negotiations for surrender. (A military term.) 124 parle discuss terms with the enemy. (Polonius urges his daughter, in the metaphor of military language, not to meet with Hamlet and consider giving in to him merely because he requests an interview.) 125 so . . . him this much concerning him. 127 In few briefly. 128 brokers go-betweens, procurers. 129 dye color or sort. investments clothes. (The vows are not what they seem.) 130 mere implorators out-and-out solicitors. 131 Breathing speaking.
The better to beguile. This is for all:
I would not, in plain terms, from this time forth
Have you so slander\textsuperscript{un} any moment\textsuperscript{of} leisure
As to give words or talk with the Lord Hamlet.
Look to 't, I charge you. Come your ways.\textsuperscript{on} OPHELIA. I shall obey, my lord.

Exeunt.

1.4 Enter HAMLET, HORATIO, and MARCELLUS.

HAMLET. The air bites shrewdly,\textsuperscript{keen} it is very cold.
HORATIO. It is a nipping and eager\textsuperscript{bit} air.
HAMLET. What hour now?
HORATIO. I think it lacks of\textsuperscript{short} twelve.
MARCELLUS. No, it is struck.
HORATIO. Indeed? I heard it not.
It then draws near the season\textsuperscript{time} to walk.

\textit{A flourish of trumpets, and two pieces\textsuperscript{ordnance} go off [within].}

What does this mean, my lord?

HAMLET. The King doth wake\textsuperscript{stay} tonight and takes his rouse,\textsuperscript{carouses}
Keeps wassail,\textsuperscript{bar} and the swaggering upspring\textsuperscript{wild} reels,\textsuperscript{dances}
And as he drains his drafts of Rhenish\textsuperscript{German} down,
The kettledrum and trumpet thus bray out
The triumph of his pledge.\textsuperscript{feat}

HORATIO. It is a custom?

HAMLET. Ay, marry, is't,
But to my mind, though I am native here
And to my manner\textsuperscript{custom} born, it is a custom
More honored in the breach than the observance.\textsuperscript{better neglected than followed}
This heavy-headed revel east and west\textsuperscript{everywhere}
Makes us traduced and taxed of\textsuperscript{censured by} other nations.
They clepe\textsuperscript{call} us drunkards, and with swinish phrase\textsuperscript{by calling us swine}
Soil our addition;\textsuperscript{reputation} and indeed it takes
From our achievements, though performed at height,\textsuperscript{outstandingly}
The pith and marrow of our attribute.\textsuperscript{the essence of the reputation that others attribute to us}
So, oft it chances in particular men,
That for\textsuperscript{on account of} some vicious mole of nature\textsuperscript{natural blemish in one's constitution} in them,
As in their birth—wherein they are not guilty,
Since nature cannot choose his origin—
By their o’ergrowth of some complexion,
Oft breaking down the pales and forts of reason,
Or by some habit that too much o’erleavens
The form of plausible manners, that these men,
Carrying, I say, the stamp of one defect,
Being nature’s livery or fortune’s star,
His virtues else, be they as pure as grace,
As infinite as man may undergo,
Shall in the general censure take corruption
From that particular fault. The dram of evil
Doth all the noble substance often dout
To his own scandal.

Enter GHOST.

HORATIO. Look, my lord, it comes!

HAMLET. Angels and ministers of grace defend us!

Be thou a spirit of health or goblin damned,
Bring with thee airs from heaven or blasts from hell,
Be thy intents wicked or charitable,
Thou com’st in such a questionable shape
That I will speak to thee. I’ll call thee Hamlet,
King, father, royal Dane. O, answer me!

Let me not burst in ignorance, but tell
Why thy canonized bones, hearsèd in death,
Have burst their cerements; why the sepulcher
Hath oped his ponderous and marble jaws
To cast thee up again. What may this mean,
That thou, dead corpse, again in complete steel,
Revisits thus the glimpses of the moon,
Making night hideous, and we fools of nature
So horridly to shake our disposition
With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls?

Say, why is this? Wherefore? What should we do?
[The ghost] beckons [Hamlet].

Horatio. It beckons you to go away with it,
As if it some impartiment69 did desire
To you alone.

Marcellus. Look with what courteous action
It wafts you to a more removèd ground.
But do not go with it.

Horatio. No, by no means.

Hamlet. It will not speak. Then I will follow it.

Horatio. Do not, my lord!

Hamlet. Why, what should be the fear?
I do not set my life at a pin's fee,°
And for my soul, what can it do to that,
Being a thing immortal as itself?
It waves me forth again. I'll follow it.

Horatio. What if it tempt you toward the flood,° my lord,
Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff
That beetles o'er° his° base into the sea,
And there assume some other horrible form
Which might deprive your sovereignty of reason°
And draw you into madness? Think of it.
The very place puts toys of desperation,°
Without more motive, into every brain
That looks so many fathoms to the sea
And hears it roar beneath.

Hamlet. It wafts me still.—Go on, I'll follow thee.

Marcellus. You shall not go, my lord. [They try to stop him.]

Hamlet. Hold off your hands!°

Horatio. Be ruled. You shall not go.

Hamlet. My fate cries out,°
And makes each petty° artery° in this body
As hardy as the Nemean lion's° nerve.°
Still am I called. Unhand me, gentlemen.
By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that lets° me!
I say, away!—Go on, I'll follow thee.

Exeunt ghost and Hamlet.

Horatio. He waxes desperate with imagination.

Marcellus. Let's follow. 'Tis not fit thus to obey him.

Horatio. Have after.° To what issue° will this come?

Marcellus. Something is rotten in the state of Denmark.

Horatio. Heaven will direct it.°

Marcellus. Nay, let's follow him.

Exeunt.

1.5 Enter GHOST and HAMLET.

HAMLET. Whither wilt thou lead me? Speak. I’ll go no further.

GHOST. Mark me.

HAMLET. I will.

GHOST. My hour is almost come,
When I to sulfurous and tormenting flames
Must render up myself.

HAMLET. Alas, poor ghost!

GHOST. Pity me not, but lend thy serious hearing
To what I shall unfold.

HAMLET. Speak. I am bound° to hear.

GHOST. So art thou to revenge, when thou shalt hear.

HAMLET. What?

GHOST. I am thy father’s spirit,
Doomed for a certain term to walk the night,
And for the day confined to fast° in fires,
Till the foul crimes° done in my days of nature°
Are burnt and purged away. But that° I am forbid
To tell the secrets of my prison house,

I could a tale unfold whose lightest word
Would harrow up° thy soul, freeze thy young blood,
Make thy two eyes like stars start from their spheres,°
Thy knotted and combined locks° to part,
And each particular hair to stand on end
Like quills upon the fretful porcupine.

But this eternal blazon° must not be
To ears of flesh and blood. List, list, O, list!

If thou didst ever thy dear father love—

HAMLET. O God!

GHOST. Revenge his foul and most unnatural murder.

HAMLET. Murder?

GHOST. Murder most foul, as in the best° it is,
But this most foul, strange, and unnatural.

HAMLET. Haste me to know’t, that I, with wings as swift
May sweep to my revenge.

GHOST. I find thee apt;
And duller shouldst thou be° than the fat° weed
That roots itself in case on Lethe° wharf,

Wouldst thou not stir in this. Now, Hamlet, hear. 'Tis given out that, sleeping in my orchard,°
A serpent stung me. So the whole ear of Denmark
Is by a forgèd process° of my death
Rankly abused.° But know, thou noble youth,
The serpent that did sting thy father's life
Now wears his crown.

HAMLET. O, my prophetic soul! My uncle!

PHANTOM. Ay, that incestuous, that adulterate° beast,
With witchcraft of his wit, with traitorous gifts°—
O wicked wit and gifts, that have the power
So to seduce!—won to his shameful lust
The will of my most seeming-virtuous queen.
O Hamlet, what a falling off was there!
From me, whose love was of that dignity
That it went hand in hand even with the vow°
I made to her in marriage, and to decline
Upon a wretch whose natural gifts were poor
To° those of mine!
But virtue, as it° never will be moved,
Though lewdness court it in a shape of heaven,°
So lust, though to a radiant angel linked,
Will sate itself in a celestial bed°
And prey on garbage.
But soft, methinks I scent the morning air.
Brief let me be. Sleeping within my orchard,
My custom always of the afternoon,
Upon my secure° hour thy uncle stole,
With juice of cursed hebona° in a vial,
And in the porches of my ears° did pour
The leprous distillment,° whose effect
Holds such an enmity with blood of man
That swift as quicksilver it courses through
The natural gates and alleys of the body,
And with a sudden vigor it doth posset°
And curd, like eager° droppings into milk,
The thin and wholesome blood. So did it mine,
And a most instant tetter° barked° about,
Most lazar-like,° with vile and loathsome crust,
All my smooth body.
Thus was I, sleeping, by a brother's hand
Of life, of crown, of queen at once dispatched,°
Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,
Unhouseled,° disappointed,° unaneled,°
No reckoning° made, but sent to my account
With all my imperfections on my head.
O, horrible! O, horrible, most horrible!
If thou hast nature° in thee, bear it not.
Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
A couch for luxury° and damned incest.
But, howsoever thou pursues this act,
Taint not thy mind nor let thy soul contrive
Against thy mother aught. Leave her to heaven
And to those thorns that in her bosom lodge,
To prick and sting her. Fare thee well at once.
The glowworm shows the matin° to be near,
And 'gins to pale his° uneffectual fire.
Adieu, adieu, adieu! Remember me.

HAMLET. O all you host of heaven! O earth! What else?
And shall I couple° hell? O, fie! Hold,"° hold, my heart,
And you, my sinews, grow not instant° old,
But bear me stiffly up. Remember thee?
Ay, thou poor ghost, whiles memory holds a seat
In this distracted globe.° Remember thee?
Yea, from the table° of my memory
I'll wipe away all trivial fond° records,
All saws° of books, all forms,° all pressures° past
That youth and observations copied there,
And thy commandment all alone shall live
Within the book and volume of my brain,
Unmixed with baser matter. Yes, by heaven!
O most pernicious woman!
O villain, villain, smiling, damned villain!
My tables°—meet it is° I set it down
That one may smile, and smile, and be a villain.
At least I am sure it may be so in Denmark.

[Writing.]
Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.

HORATIO. My lord, my lord!

MARCELLUS. Lord Hamlet!

HORATIO. Heavens secure him!

HAMLET. So be it.

MARCELLUS. Hilo, ho, ho, my lord!

HAMLET. Hillo, ho, ho, boy! Come, bird, come.

MARCELLUS. How is't, my noble lord?

HORATIO. What news, my lord?

HAMLET. O, wonderful!

HORATIO. Good my lord, tell it.

HAMLET. No, you will reveal it.

HORATIO. Not I, my lord, by heaven.

MARCELLUS. Nor I, my lord.

HAMLET. How say you, then, would heart of man once think it?

But you'll be secret?

HORATIO, MARCELLUS. Ay, by heaven, my lord.

HAMLET. There's never a villain dwelling in all Denmark

But he's an arrant knave.

HORATIO. There needs no ghost, my lord, come from the grave

To tell us this.

HAMLET. Why, right, you are in the right.

And so, without more circumstance at all,

I hold it fit that we shake hands and part,

You as your business and desire shall point you—

For every man hath business and desire,

Such as it is—and for my own poor part,

Look you, I'll go pray.

HORATIO. These are but wild and whirling words, my lord.

HAMLET. I am sorry they offend you, heartily;

Yes, faith, heartily.

HORATIO. There's no offense, my lord.

HAMLET. Yes, but Saint Patrick, but there is, Horatio,

And much offense too. Touching this vision here,

It is an honest ghost, that let me tell you.

For your desire to know what is between us,

O'ermaster't as you may. And now, good friends,

As you are friends, scholars, and soldiers,

Give me one poor request.

111 there you are i.e., there, I've written that down against you.  116 secure him keep him safe.  119 Hilo . . . come (A falconer's call to a hawk in air. Hamlet mocks the hallooing as though it were a part of hawking.)  127 once ever.  130 arrant thoroughly-going.  133 circumstance ceremony, elaboration.  142 Saint Patrick (The keeper of Purgatory and patron saint of all blunders and confusion.)  143 offense (Hamlet deliberately changes Horatio's "no offense taken" to "an offense against all decency.")  144 an honest ghost i.e., a real ghost and not an evil spirit.
HORATIO. What is't, my lord? We will.

HAMLET. Never make known what you have seen tonight.

HORATIO, MARCELLUS. My lord, we will not.

HAMLET. Nay, but swear't.

HORATIO. In faith, my lord, not I.°

MARCELLUS. Nor I, my lord, in faith.

HAMLET. Upon my sword.° [He bolds out bis sword.] 155

MARCELLUS. We have sworn, my lord, already.°

HAMLET. Indeed, upon my sword, indeed.

GHOST [cries under the stage]. Swear.

HAMLET. Ha, ha, boy, sayst thou so? Art thou there, truepenny°

Come on, you hear this fellow in the cellarage.

Consent to swear.

HORATIO. Propose the oath, my lord.

HAMLET. Never to speak of this that you have seen,

Swear by the sword.

GHOST [beneath]. Swear.° [They swear.°]

HAMLET. Hic et ubique?° Then we'll shift our ground. 165 [He moves to another spot.]

Come hither, gentlemen,

And lay your hands again upon my sword.

Swear by my sword

Never to speak of this that you have heard.

GHOST [beneath]. Swear by his sword.° [They swear.°]

HAMLET. Well said, old mole. Canst work i' th' earth so fast?

A worthy pioneer!°—Once more removed, good friends.

[He moves again.]

HORATIO. O day and night, but this is wondrous strange!

HAMLET. And henceforth as a stranger° give it welcome.

There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,

Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.°

But come;

Here, as before, never, so help you mercy,°

How strange or odd soe'er I bear myself—

As I perchance hereafter shall think meet—

To put an antic° disposition on—

That you, at such times seeing me, never shall,

With arms encumbered° thus, or this headshake,

Or by pronouncing of some doubtful phrase

153 In faith . . . I i.e., I swear not to tell what I have seen. (Horatio is not refusing to swear.) 155 sword i.e., the hilt in the form of a cross. 156 We . . . already i.e., we swore in faith. 159 truepenny honest old fellow. 164 s.d. They swear (Seemingly they swear here, and at lines 170 and 190, as they lay their hands on Hamlet's sword. Triple oaths would have particular force; these three oaths deal with what they have seen, what they have heard, and what they promise about Hamlet's antic disposition.) 165 Hic et ubique here and everywhere. (Latin.) 172 pioneer foot soldier assigned to dig tunnels and excavations. 174 as a stranger i.e., needing your hospitality. 176 your philosophy this subject called “natural philosophy” or “science” that people talk about. 178 so help you mercy as you hope for God’s mercy when you are judged. 181 antic fantastic. 183 encumbered folded.
As "Well, we know," or "We could, an if we would,"
Or "If we list" to speak," or "There be, an if they might,"
Or such ambiguous giving out, a, to note
That you know aught of me—this do swear,
So grace and mercy at your most need help you.

GHOST [beneath]. Swear.

HAMLET. Rest, rest, perturbèd spirit! So, gentlemen,
With all my love I do commend me to you;
And what so poor a man as Hamlet is
May do t' express his love and friending to you,
God willing, shall not lack. Let us go in together,
And still your fingers on your lips, I pray.
The time is out of joint. O cursed spite
That ever I was born to set it right!

[They wait for him to leave first.]

Nay, come, let's go together.

Exeunt.

2.1 Enter old POLONIUS with his man [REYNALDO].

POLONIUS. Give him this money and these notes, Reynaldo.

[He gives money and papers.]

REYNALDO. I will, my lord.

POLONIUS. You shall do marvelous wisely, good Reynaldo,
Before you visit him, to make inquire of his behavior.

REYNALDO. My lord, I did intend it.

POLONIUS. Marry, well said, very well said. Look you, sir,
Inquire me first what Danskers are in Paris,
And how, and who, what means, and where they keep,
What company, at what expense; and finding
By this encompassment and drift of question
That they do know my son, come you more nearer
Than your particular demands will touch it.
Take you, as 'twere, some distant knowledge of him,
As thus, "I know his father and his friends,
And in part him. "Do you mark this, Reynaldo?

REYNALDO. Ay, very well, my lord.

POLONIUS. "And in part him, but," you may say, 'not well.
But if 't be he I mean, he's very wild,
Addicted so and so, and there put on him
What forgeries you please—marry, none so rank
As may dishonor him, take heed of that,
But, sir, such wanton, wild, and usual slips
As are companions noted and most known
To youth and liberty.

REYNALDO. As gaming, my lord.

POLONIUS. Ay, or drinking, fencing, swearing,
Quarreling, drabbing—you may go so far.

REYNALDO. My lord, that would dishonor him.

POLONIUS. Faith, no, as you may season it in the charge.

REYNALDO. My lord, that would dishonor him.

POLONIUS. You must not put another scandal on him
That he is open to incontinency
That’s not my meaning. But breathe his faults so quaintly
The flash and outbreak of a fiery mind,
A savageness in unreclaimèd blood,
Of general assault.

REYNALDO. But, my good lord—

POLONIUS. Wherefore should you do this?

REYNALDO. Ay, my lord, I would know that.

POLONIUS. Marry, sir, here’s my drift,
And I believe it is a fetch of warrant.
You laying these slight sullies on my son,
As ’twere a thing a little soiled wi’ the working,
Mark you,
Your party in converse, him you would sound,
Having ever seen in the prenominate crimes
The youth you breathe of guilty, be assured
He closes with you in this consequence:
“Good sir,” or so, or “friend,” or “gentleman,”
According to the phrase or the addition
Of man and country.

REYNALDO. Very good, my lord.

POLONIUS. And then, sir does ‘a this—‘a does—what was I about to say?
By the Mass, I was about to say something. Where did I leave?

REYNALDO. At “closes in the consequence.”

POLONIUS. At “closes in the consequence;” ay, marry.
He closes thus: “I know the gentleman,
I saw him yesterday,” or “th’ other day,”

19 put on impute to. 20 forgeries invented tales. rank gross. 22 wanton sportive, unrestrained. 27 drabbing whoring. 29 season temper, soften. 31 incontinency habitual sexual excess. 32 quaintly artfully, subtly. 33 taints of liberty faults resulting from free living. 35–36 A savageness . . . assault a wildness in untamed youth that assails all indiscriminately. 41 fetch of warrant legitimate trick. 45 soiled wi’ the working soiled by handling while it is being made, i.e., by involvement in the ways of the world. 45 converse conversion. sound i.e., sound out. 46 Having ever if he has ever. prenominate crimes before-mentioned offenses. 47 breathe speak. 48 closes . . . consequence takes you into his confidence in some fashion, as follows. 50 addition title.
Or then, or then, with such or such, “and as you say,
There was ‘a gaming,” “there o’ertook in ‘s rouse,”
There falling out” at tennis,” or perchance
“I saw him enter such a house of sale,” Videlicet° a brothel, or so forth. See you now,
Your bait of falsehood takes this carp° of truth;
And thus do we of wisdom and of reach,°
With windlasses° and with assays of bias,°
By indirections find directions° out.
So by my former lecture and advice
Shall you my son. You have° me, have you not?

REYNALDO. My lord, I have.

POLONIUS. God b’wi° ye; fare ye well.

REYNALDO. Good my lord.

POLONIUS. Observe his inclination in yourself.°

REYNALDO. I shall, my lord.

POLONIUS. And let him ply his music.

REYNALDO. Well, my lord.

POLONIUS. Farewell.

Exit REYNALDO.

Enter OPHELIA.

How now, Ophelia, what’s the matter?

OPHELIA. O my lord, my lord, I have been so affrighted!

POLONIUS. With what, i’ the name of God?

OPHELIA. My lord, as I was sewing in my closet,°

Lord Hamlet, with his doublet° all unbraced,°
No hat upon his head, his stockings fouled,
Ungartered, and down-gyved° to his ankle,
Pale as his shirt, his knees knocking each other,
And with a look so piteous in purport°
As if he had been loosèd out of hell°
To speak of horrors—he comes before me.

POLONIUS. Mad for thy love?

OPHELIA. My lord, I do not know,
But truly I do fear it.

POLONIUS. What said he?

OPHELIA. He took me by the wrist and held me hard.

Then goes he to the length of all his arm,
And, with his other hand thus o’er his brow
He falls to such perusal of my face

---

60 o’ertook in ‘s rouse overcome by drink. 61 falling out quarreling. 63 Videlicet namely. 64 carp a fish. 65 reach capacity, ability. 66 windlasses i.e., circuitous paths. (Literally, circuits made to head off the game in hunting.) assays of bias attempts through indirection (like the curving path of the bowling ball, which is biased or weighted to one side). 67 directions i.e., the way things really are. 69 have understand. 70 b’ wi’ be with. 72 in yourself in your own person (as well as by asking questions). 79 closet private chamber. 80 doublet close-fitting jacket. unbraced unfastened. 82 down-gyved fallen to the ankles (like gyes or fetters). 84 in purport in what it expressed.
As 'a would draw it. Long stayed he so. At last, a little shaking of mine arm And thrice his head thus waving up and down, He raised a sigh so piteous and profound As it did seem to shatter all his bulk And end his being. That done, he lets me go, And with his head over his shoulder turned He seemed to find his way without his eyes, For out o' doors he went without their helps, And to the last bended their light on me.

Polonius. Come, go with me. I will go seek the King. This is the very ecstasy of love, Whose violent property fordoes itself And leads the will to desperate undertakings As oft as any passion under heaven That does afflict our natures. I am sorry. What, have you given him any hard words of late?

Ophelia. No, my good lord, but as you did command I did repel his letters and denied His access to me.

Polonius. That hath made him mad. I am sorry that with better heed and judgment I had not quoted him. I feared he did but trifle And mean to wrack thee. But beshrew my jealousy!

By heaven, it is as proper to our age To cast beyond ourselves in our opinions As it is common for the younger sort To lack discretion. Come, go we to the King. This must be known, which, being kept close, might move More grief to hide than hate to utter love. Come.

Exeunt.

2.2 Flourish. Enter King and Queen, Rosencrantz, and Guildenstern [with others].

King. Welcome, dear Rosencrantz and Guildenstern. Moreover that we much did long to see you, The need we have to use you did provoke Our hasty sending. Something have you heard Of Hamlet's transformation—so call it, Sith nor th' exterior nor the inward man Resembles that it was. What it should be, 93 As as if (also in line 97). 97 bulk body. 104 ecstasy madness. 105 property nature. 114 quoted observed. 115 wrack ruin, seduce. 116 proper . . . age characteristic of us (old) men. 117 cast beyond overshoot, miscalculate (a metaphor from hunting). 120–121 might . . . love i.e., might cause more grief (because of what Hamlet might do) by hiding the knowledge of Hamlet's strange behavior to Ophelia than unpleasantness by telling it. 2.2. Location: The castle. 2 Moreover that besides the fact that. 6 Sith nor since neither. 7 that what.

More than his father's death, that thus hath put him
So much from th' understanding of himself,
I cannot dream of. I entreat you both
That, being of so young days\(^{11}\) brought up with him,
And sith so neighbored to\(^{12}\) his youth and havior,\(^{13}\)
That you vouchsafe your rest\(^{14}\) here in our court
Some little time, so by your companies
To draw him on to pleasures, and to gather
So much as from occasion\(^{15}\) you may glean,
Whether aught to us unknown afflicts him thus
That, opened,\(^{16}\) lies within our remedy.

QUEEN. Good gentlemen, he hath much talked of you,
And sure I am two men there is not living 20
To whom he more adheres. If it will please you
To show us so much gentry\(^{22}\) and good will
To expend your time with us awhile
For the supply and profit of our hope,\(^{24}\)
Your visitation shall receive such thanks 25
As fits a king's remembrance.\(^{26}\)

ROSENCRANTZ. Both Your Majesties
Might, by the sovereign power you have of\(^{27}\) us,
Put your dread\(^{28}\) pleasures more into command
Than to entreaty.

GUILDENSTERN. But we both obey,
And here give up ourselves in the full bent\(^{30}\)
To lay our service freely at your feet,
To be commanded.

KING. Thanks, Rosencrantz and gentle Guildenstern.

QUEEN. Thanks, Guildenstern and gentle Rosencrantz.
And I beseech you instantly to visit 35
My too much changèd son. Go, some of you,
And bring these gentlemen where Hamlet is.

GUILDENSTERN. Heavens make our presence and our practices\(^{38}\)
Pleasant and helpful to him!
QUEEN. Ay, amen!

Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN [with some attendants].

Enter POLONIUS.

POLONIUS. Th' ambassadors from Norway, my good lord, 40
Are joyfully returned.

KING. Thou still\(^{39}\) hast been the father of good news.

POLONIUS. Have I, my lord? I assure my good liege
I hold\(^{41}\) my duty, as\(^{42}\) I hold my soul,

\(^{11}\) of . . . days from such early youth. \(^{12}\) And sith so neighbored to and since you are (or, and since that time you are) intimately acquainted with. \(^{13}\) havior demeanor. \(^{14}\) vouchsafe your rest please to stay. \(^{15}\) occasion opportunity. \(^{16}\) opened being revealed. \(^{22}\) gentry courtesy. \(^{24}\) supply . . . hope aid and furtherance of what we hope for. \(^{26}\) As fits . . . remembrance as would be a fitting gift of a king who rewards true service. \(^{27}\) of over. \(^{28}\) dread inspiring awe. \(^{30}\) in . . . bent to the utmost degree of our capacity (an archery metaphor). \(^{38}\) practices doings. \(^{42}\) still always.
Both to my God and to my gracious king; 45
And I do think, or else this brain of mine
Hunts not the trail of policy° so sure
As it hath used to do, that I have found
The very cause of Hamlet's lunacy.

KING. O, speak of that! That do I long to hear. 50

POLONIUS. Give first admittance to th' ambassadors.
My news shall be the fruit° to that great feast.

KING. Thyself do grace° to them and bring them in.

[Exit polonius.]

He tells me, my dear Gertrude, he hath found
The head and source of all your son's distemper. 55

QUEEN. I doubt° it is no other but the main,°
His father's death and our o'erhasty marriage.

Enter Ambassadors Voltimand and Cornelius, with Polonius.

KING. Well, we shall sift him.°—Welcome, my good friends!

Say, Voltimand, what from our brother° Norway?

VOLTIMAND. Most fair return of greetings and desires.° 60

Upon our first,° he sent out to suppress
His nephew's levies, which to him appeared
To be a preparation 'gainst the Polack,
But, better looked into, he truly found
It was against Your Highness. Whereat grieved 65
That so his sickness, age, and impotence°
Was falsely borne in hand,° sends out arrests°
On Fortinbras, which he, in brief, obeys,
Receives rebuke from Norway, and in fine°
Makes vow before his uncle never more 70
To give th' assay° of arms against Your Majesty.
Whereon old Norway, overcome with joy,
Gives him three thousand crowns in annual fee
And his commission to employ those soldiers,
So levied as before, against the Polack,
With an entreaty, herein further shown,° 75
That it might please you to give quiet pass
Through your dominions for this enterprise
On such regards of safety and allowance°
As therein are set down.

KING. It likes° us well, 80
And at more considered° time we'll read,
Answer, and think upon this business.

Meantime we thank you for your well-took labor.
Go to your rest; at night we'll feast together.
Most welcome home!

Exeunt Ambassadors.

POLONIUS. This business is well ended.
My liege, and madam, to expostulate
What majesty should be, what duty is,
Why day is day, night night, and time is time,
Were nothing but to waste night, day, and time.
Therefore, since brevity is the soul of wit,
And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes,
I will be brief. Your noble son is mad.
Mad call I it, for, to define true madness.
What is’t but to be nothing else but mad?
But let that go.

QUEEN. More matter, with less art.

POLONIUS. Madam, I swear I use no art at all.
That he’s mad, ’tis true: ’tis true ’tis pity,
And pity ’tis ’tis true—a foolish figure,
But farewell it, for I will use no art.
Mad let us grant him, then, and now remains
That we find out the cause of this defect,
Or rather say, the cause of this defect,
For this effect defective comes by cause.
Thus it remains, and the remainder thus.
Perpend.
I have a daughter—have while she is mine—
Who, in her duty and obedience, mark,
Hath given me this. Now gather and surmise.

[He reads the letter] “To the celestial and my soul’s idol, the most beautified Ophelia”— That’s an ill phrase, a vile phrase; “beautified” is a vile phrase. But you shall hear. Thus:
“In her excellent white bosom, these, etc.”

QUEEN. Came this from Hamlet to her?

POLONIUS. Good madam, stay awhile, I will be faithful.

“Doubt thou the stars are fire,
Doubt that the sun doth move,
Doubt truth to be a liar,
But never doubt I love.

O dear Ophelia, I am ill at these numbers. I have not art to reckon my groans. But that I love thee best, O most best, believe it.

Adieu.
Thine evermore, most dear lady, whilst this machine is to him, Hamlet."

This in obedience hath my daughter shown me,
And, more above, hath his solicitings,
As they fell out by time, by means, and place,
All given to mine ear.

KING. But how hath she Received his love?

POLONIUS. What do you think of me?

KING. As of a man faithful and honorable.

POLONIUS. I would fain prove so. But what might you think,
When I had seen this hot love on the wing—
As I perceived it, I must tell you that,
Before my daughter told me—what might you,
Or my dear Majesty your queen here, think,
If I had played the desk or table book,°
Or given my heart a winking,° mute and dumb,
Or looked upon this love with idle sight?°
What might you think? No, I went round to work,
And my young mistress thus I did bespeak:°
"Lord Hamlet is a prince out of thy star;°
This must not be. "And then I prescripts° gave her,
That she should lock herself from his resort,°
Admit no messengers, receive no tokens.
Which done, she took the fruits of my advice;
And he, repellèd—a short tale to make—
Fell into a sadness, then into a fast,
Thence to a watch,° thence into a weakness,
Thence to a lightness,° and by this declension°
Into the madness wherein now he raves,
And all we° mourn for.

KING. [to the QUEEN]. Do you think 'tis this?

QUEEN. It may be, very like.

POLONIUS. Hath there been such a time—I would fain know that—
That I have positively said "'Tis so,"
When it proved otherwise?

KING. Not that I know.

POLONIUS. Take this from this,° if this be otherwise.
If circumstances lead me, I will find
Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed
Within the center.°

KING. How may we try° it further?

POLONIUS. You know sometimes he walks for hours together

Here in the lobby.

QUEEN. So he does indeed.

POLONIUS. At such a time I’ll loose° my daughter to him.
Be you and I behind an arras° then.
Mark the encounter. If he love her not
And be not from his reason fall’n thereon,°
Let me be no assistant for a state,
But keep a farm and carters.°

KING. We will try it.

Enter HAMLET [reading on a book].

QUEEN. But look where sadly° the poor wretch comes reading.

POLONIUS. Away, I do beseech you both, away.
I’ll board° him presently.° O, give me leave.°

Exeunt KING and QUEEN [with attendants].

How does my good Lord Hamlet?

HAMLET. Well, God-a-mercy.°

POLONIUS. Do you know me, my lord?

HAMLET. Excellent well. You are a fishmonger.°

POLONIUS. Not I, my lord.

HAMLET. Then I would you were so honest a man.

POLONIUS. Honest, my lord?

HAMLET. Ay, sir. To be honest, as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.

POLONIUS. That’s very true, my lord.

HAMLET. For if the sun breed maggots in a dead dog, being a good kissing carrion°—Have you a daughter?

POLONIUS. I have, my lord.

HAMLET. Let her not walk i’ the sun.° Conception° is a blessing, but as your daughter may conceive, friend, look to ‘t.

POLONIUS [aside]. How say you by that? Still harping on my daughter.
Yet he knew me not at first; ’a° said I was a fishmonger. ’A is far gone. And truly in my youth I suffered much extremity for love, very near this. I’ll speak to him again.—What do you read, my lord?

HAMLET. Words, words, words.

159 center middle point of the earth (which is also the center of the Ptolemaic universe).
try test, judge. 162 loose (as one might release an animal that is being mated). 163 arras hanging, tapestry. 165 thereon on that account. 167 carters wagon drivers.
168 sadly seriously. 170 board accost. presently at once. give me leave i.e., excuse me, leave me alone (said to those he hurries offstage, including the King and Queen). 172 God a-mercy God have mercy, i.e., thank you. 174 fishmonger fish merchant. 181–182 a good kissing carrion i.e., a good piece of flesh for kissing, or for the sun to kiss. 184 i’ the sun in public (with additional implication of the sunshine of princely favors). Conception (1) understanding (2) pregnancy. 187 ’a he.
POLONIUS. What is the matter, my lord?

HAMLET. Between who?

POLONIUS. I mean, the matter that you read, my lord.

HAMLET. Slanders, sir; for the satirical rogue says here that old men have gray beards, that their faces are wrinkled, their eyes purging thick amber and plum-tree gum, and that they have a plentiful lack of wit, together with most weak hams. All which, sir, though I most powerfully and potently believe, yet I hold it not honesty to have it thus set down, for yourself, sir, shall grow old as I am, if like a crab you could go backward.

POLONIUS [aside]. Though this be madness, yet there is method in 't.—Will you walk out of the air, my lord?

HAMLET. Into my grave.

POLONIUS. Indeed, that's out of the air. [Aside.] How pregnant sometimes his replies are! A happiness that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously be delivered of. I will leave him and suddenly contrive the means of meeting between him and my daughter.—My honorable lord, I will most humbly take my leave of you.

HAMLET. You cannot, sir, take from me anything that I will more willingly part withal—except my life, except my life, except my life.

Enter GUILDENSTERN and ROSENCRANTZ.

POLONIUS. Fare you well, my lord.

HAMLET. These tedious old fools!

ROSENCRANTZ. You go to seek the Lord Hamlet. There he is.

HAMLET. My excellent good friends! How dost thou, Guildenstern? Ah, Rosencrantz! Good lads, how do you both?

ROSENCRANTZ. As the indifferent children of the earth.

GUILDENSTERN. Happy in that we are not overhappy.

On Fortune's cap we are not the very button.

HAMLET. Nor the soles of her shoe?

ROSENCRANTZ. Neither, my lord.

HAMLET. Then you live about her waist, or in the middle of her favors?

GUILDENSTERN. Faith, her privates we.

HAMLET. In the secret parts of Fortune? O, most true, she is a strumpet.

What news?

Act 2, Scene 2

ROSENCRANTZ. None, my lord, but the world’s grown honest.

HAMLET. Then is doomsday near. But your news is not true. Let me question more in particular. What have you, my good friends, deserved at the hands of Fortune that she sends you to prison hither?

GUILDENSTERN. Prison, my lord?

HAMLET. Denmark’s a prison.

ROSENCRANTZ. Then is the world one.

HAMLET. A goodly one, in which there are many confines, wards, and dungeons, Denmark being one of the worst.

ROSENCRANTZ. We think not so, my lord.

HAMLET. Why then ‘tis none to you, for there is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so. To me it is a prison.

ROSENCRANTZ. Why then, your ambition makes it one. ‘Tis too narrow for your mind.

HAMLET. O God, I could be bounded in a nutshell and count myself a king of infinite space, were it not that I have bad dreams.

GUILDENSTERN. Which dreams indeed are ambition, for the very substance of the ambitious is merely the shadow of a dream.

HAMLET. A dream itself is but a shadow.

ROSENCRANTZ. Truly, and I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality that it is but a shadow’s shadow.

HAMLET. Then are our beggars bodies, and our monarchs and out stretched heroes the beggars’ shadows. Shall we to the court? For,
by my fay, I cannot reason.

GUILDENSTERN. We’ll wait upon you.

HAMLET. No such matter. I will not sort you with the rest of my servants, for, to speak to you like an honest man, I am most dreadfully attended. But, in the beaten way of friendship, what make you at Elsinore?

ROSENCRANTZ. To visit you, my lord, no other occasion.

HAMLET. Beggar that I am, I’m even poor in thanks; but I thank you, and sure, dear friends, my thanks are too dear a halfpenny. Were you not sent for? Is it your own inclining? Is it a free visitation? Come, come, deal justly with me. Come, come. Nay, speak.

GUILDENSTERN. What should we say; my lord?

HAMLET. Anything but to the purpose. You were sent for, and there is a kind of confession in your looks which your modesties have not craft enough to color. I know the good King and Queen have sent for you.

236 confines places of confinement. wards cells. 245–246 the very . . . ambitious that seemingly very substantial thing that the ambitious pursue. 250 bodies i.e., solid substances rather than shadows (since beggars are not ambitious). 250–251 outstretched (1) far-reaching in their ambition (2) elongated as shadows. 252 fay faith. 253 wait upon accompany, attend (but Hamlet uses the phrase in the sense of providing menial service). 254 sort class, categorize. 255–256 dreadfully attended waited upon in slovenly fashion. 256 beaten way familiar path, tried-and-true course. make do. 260 too dear a halfpenny (1) too expensive at even a halfpenny, i.e., of little worth (2) too expensive by a halfpenny in return for worthless kindness. 261 free voluntary. 264 Anything but to the purpose anything except a straightforward answer (said ironically). 265 modesties sense of shame. 266 color disguise.
ROSENCRANTZ. To what end, my lord?

HAMLET. That you must teach me. But let me conjure you, by the rights of our fellowship, by the consonancy of our youth, by the obligation of our ever-preserved love, and by what more dear a better proposer could charge you withal, be even and direct with me whether you were sent for or no.

ROSENCRANTZ [aside to GUILDENSTERN]. What say you?

HAMLET [aside]. Nay, then, I have an eye on you.—If you love me, hold not off.

GUILDENSTERN. My lord, we were sent for.

HAMLET. I will tell you why; so shall my anticipation prevent your discovery, and your secrecy to the King and Queen molt no feather. I have of late—but wherefore I know not—lost all my mirth, gone all custom of exercises; and indeed it goes so heavily with my disposition that this goodly frame, the earth, seems to me a sterile promontory; this most excellent canopy, the air, look you, this brave o'erhanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted with golden fire, why, it appeareth nothing to me but a foul and pestilent congregation of vapors. What a piece of work is a man! How noble in reason, how infinite in faculties, in form and moving how express and admirable, in action how like an angel, in apprehension how like a god! The beauty of the world, the paragon of animals! And ye, to me, what is this quintessence of dust? Man delights not me—no, nor woman neither, though by your smiling you seem to say so.

ROSENCRANTZ. My lord, there was no such stuff in my thoughts.

HAMLET. Why did you laugh, then, when I said man delights not me?

ROSENCRANTZ. To think, my lord, if you delight not in man, what Lenten entertainment the players shall receive from you. We coted them on the way, and higher are they coming to offer you service.

HAMLET. He that plays the king shall be welcome; His Majesty shall have tribute of me. The adventurous knight shall use his foil and target, the lover shall not sigh gratis, the humorous man shall end his part in peace, the clown shall make those laugh whose lungs are tickle o' the sear, and the lady shall say her mind freely, or the blank verse shall halt for 't. What players are they?
ROSENCRANTZ. Even those you were wont to take such delight in, the tragedians° of the city.

HAMLET. How chances it they travel? Their residence,° both in reputation and profit, was better both ways.

ROSENCRANTZ. I think their inhibition° comes by the means of the late° innovation.°

HAMLET. Do they hold the same estimation they did when I was in the city? Are they so followed?

ROSENCRANTZ. No, indeed are they not.

HAMLET. How comes it? Do they grow rusty?

ROSENCRANTZ. Nay, their endeavor keeps° in the wonted° pace. But there is, sir, an aerie° of children, little eyases,° that cry out on the top of question° and are most tyrannically° clapped for ‘t. These are now the fashion, and so berattle° the common stages°—so they call them—that many wearing rapiers° are afraid of goose quills° and dare scarce come thither.

HAMLET. What, are they children? Who maintains ‘em? How are they escoted?° Will they pursue the quality° no longer than they can sing?° Will they not say afterwards, if they should grow themselves to common° prayers—as it is most like,° if their means are no better°—their writers do them wrong to make them exclaim against their own succession?°

ROSENCRANTZ. Faith, there has been much to-do° on both sides, and the nation holds it no sin to tar° them to controversy. There was for a while no money bid for argument unless the poet and the player went to cuffs in the question.°

HAMLET. Is ’t possible?

GUILDENSTERN. O, there has been much throwing about of brains.

HAMLET. Do the boys carry it away?°

ROSENCRANTZ. Ay, that they do, my lord—Hercules and his load° too.°

308 inhibition formal prohibition (from acting plays in the city).  309 innovation i.e., the new fashion in satirical plays performed by boy actors in the ‘private’

to a play unless the satirical poets who wrote for the boys and the adult actors came to blows in the play itself.  332 carry it away i.e., win the day.  333 Hercules . . . load the world on his shoulders.)  333–333 How . . . load too (The passage, omitted from the early quartos, alludes to the so-called War of the Theaters, 1599–1602, the rivalry between the children’s companies and the adult actors.)

HAMLET. It is not very strange; for my uncle is King of Denmark, and those that would make mouths\(^{335}\) at him while my father lived give twenty, forty, fifty, a hundred ducats\(^{336}\) apiece for his picture in little.\(^{337}\) 'Sblood,\(^{338}\) there is something in this more than natural, if philosophy\(^{339}\) could find it out.

A flourish [of trumpets within].

GUILDENSTERN. There are the players.

HAMLET. Gentlemen, you are welcome to Elsinore. Your hands, come then. Th' appurtenance\(^{340}\) of welcome is fashion and ceremony. Let me comply\(^{341}\) with you in this garb,\(^{342}\) lest my extent\(^{343}\) to the players, which, I tell you, must show fairly outwards,\(^{344}\) should more appear like entertainment\(^{345}\) than yours. You are welcome. But my uncle-father and aunt-mother are deceived.

GUILDENSTERN. In what, my dear lord?

HAMLET. I am but mad north-north-west.\(^{346}\) When the wind is southerly I know a hawk from a handsaw.\(^{347}\)

Enter POLONIUS.

POLONIUS. Well be with you, gentlemen!

HAMLET. Hark you, Guildenstern, and you too; at each ear a hearer. That great baby you see there is not yet out of his swaddling clouts.\(^{348}\)

ROSENCRANTZ. Haply\(^{349}\) he is the second time come to them, for they say an old man is twice a child.

HAMLET. I will prophesy he comes to tell me of the players. Mark it.—You say right, sir, o' Monday morning, 'twas then indeed.

POLONIUS. My lord, I have news to tell you.

HAMLET. My lord, I have news to tell you. When Roscius\(^{350}\) was an actor in Rome—

POLONIUS. The actors are come hither, my lord.

HAMLET. Buzz,\(^{351}\) buzz!

POLONIUS. Upon my honor—

HAMLET. Then came each actor on his ass.

POLONIUS. What a treasure had he, my lord?
HAMLET. Why,
“One fair daughter, and no more,
The which he lovèd passing° well.”

POLONIUS [aside]. Still on my daughter.

HAMLET. Am I not i’ the right, old Jephthah?

POLONIUS. If you call me Jephthah, my lord, I have a daughter that I love passing well.

HAMLET. Nay, that follows not.

POLONIUS. What follows then, my lord?

HAMLET. Why,
“As by lot,° God wot,”° and then, you know.

“It came to pass, as most like° it was”— the first row° of the pious chanson° will show you more, for look where my abridgement° comes.

Enter the players.

You are welcome, masters; welcome, all. I am glad to see thee well.
Welcome, good friends. O, old friend! Why, thy face is valanced° since I saw thee last. Com’st thou to beard° me in Denmark? What, my young lady° and mistress! By ’r Lady,° your ladyship is nearer to heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine.° Pray God your voice, like a piece of uncurrent° gold, be not cracked within the ring.° Masters, you are all welcome. We’ll e’en to ’t° like French falconers, fly at anything we see. We’ll have a speech straight.° Come, give us a taste of your quality.° Come, a passionate speech.

FIRST PLAYER. What speech, my good lord?

HAMLET. I heard thee speak me a speech once, but it was never acted, or if it was, not above once, for the play, I remember, pleased not the million; ’twas caviar to the general.° But it was—as I received it, and others, whose judgments in such matters cried in the top of mine—an excellent play, well digested in the scenes, set down with as much modesty as cunning. I remember one said there were no sallets in the lines to make the matter savory, nor no matter in the phrase that might indict the author of affectation, but called it an honest method, as wholesome as sweet, and by very much more handsome than fine. One speech in 't I chiefly loved: 'twas Aeneas’tale to Dido, and thereabout of it especially when he speaks of Priam’s slaughter. If it live in your memory, begin at this line: let me see, let me see—

"The rugged Pyrrhus,° like th' Hyrcanian beast°—
'Tis not so. It begins with Pyrrhus:
"The rugged Pyrrhus, he whose sable arms,
Black as his purpose, did the night resemble
When he lay couchèd° in the ominous horse,°
Hath now this dread and black complexion smeared
With heraldry more dismal.° Head to foot
Now is he total gules,° horridly tricked°
With blood of fathers, mothers, daughters, sons,
Baked and impasted° with the parching streets,°
That lend a tyrannous° and a damnèd light
To their lord’s° murder. Roasted in wrath and fire,
And thus o’ersized° with coaglate gore,
With eyes like carbuncles,° the hellish Pyrrhus Old grandsire Priam seeks."

So proceed you.

POLONIUS. 'Fore God, my lord, well spoken, with good accent and good discretion.

FIRST PLAYER. "Anon he finds him
Striking too short at Greeks. His antique° sword, Rebellious to his arm, lies where it falls,
Repugnant° to command. Unequal matched,
Pyrinus at Priam drives, in rage strikes wide,
But with the whiff and wind of his fell sword
Th’ unnervèd father falls. Then senseless Ilium, Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top
Stoops to his base; and with a hideous crash
Takes prisoner Pyrrhus’ car. For, lo! His sword,
Which was declining on the milky head
Of reverend Priam, seemed i’ th’ air to stick.
So as a painted tyrant Pyrrhus stood,
And, like a neutral to his will and matter,
Did nothing.
But as we often see against some storm
A silence in the heavens, the rack stand still,
The bold winds speechless, and the orb below
As hush as death, anon the dreadful thunder
Doth rend the region, so, after Pyrrhus’ pause,
A rousèd vengeance sets him new a-work
And never did the Cyclops’ hammers fall
On Mars’s armor forged for proof eterne
With less remorse than Pyrrhus bleeding sword
Now falls on Priam.
Out, out, thou strumpet Fortune! All you gods
In general synod take away her power!
Break all the spokes and fellies from her wheel,
And bowl the round nave down the hill of heaven
As low as to the fiends!”

Polonius. This is too long.

Hamlet. It shall to the barber’s with your beard.—Prithee, say on.

He’s for a jig or a tale of bawdry, or he sleeps. Say on; come to Hecuba.”

First Player. “But who, ah woe! had seen the moblèd queen”—

Hamlet. “The moblèd queen?”

Polonius. That’s good. “Moblèd queen” is good.

First Player. “Run barefoot up and down, threat’ning the flames

Unless things mortal move them not at all,
Would have made milch° the burning eyes of heaven,°
And passion° in the gods.°

POLONIUS. Look whe'er° he has not turned his color and has tears in 's eyes. Prithec, no more.

HAMLET. 'Tis well; I'll have thee speak out the rest of this soon.—Good my lord, will you see the players well bestowed?° Do you hear, let them be well used, for they are the abstract° and brief chronicles of the time. After your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you live.

POLONIUS. My lord, I will use them according to their desert. 485

HAMLET. God's bodikin,° man, much better. Use every man after his desert, and who shall scape whipping? Use them after° your own honor and dignity. The less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty. Take them in.

POLONIUS. Come, sirs.

[Exit.]

HAMLET. Follow him, friends. We'll hear a play tomorrow. [As they start to leave, HAMLET detains the FIRST PLAYER.] Dost thou hear me, old friend? Can you play The Murder of Gonzago?

FIRST PLAYER. Ay, my lord.

HAMLET. We'll ha 't° tomorrow night. You could, for a need, study° a speech of some dozen or sixteen lines which I would set down and insert in 't, could you not?

FIRST PLAYER. Ay, my lord.

HAMLET. Very well. Follow that lord, and look you mock him not. (Execute players.) My good friends, I'll leave you till night. You are welcome to Elsinore.

ROSENCRANTZ. Good my lord!

HAMLET. Ay, so goodbye to you.—Now I am alone.

O, what a rogue and peasant slave am I!
Is it not monstrous that this player here,
But° in a fiction, in a dream of passion,
Could force his soul so to his own conceit?°

With forms to his conceit And all for nothing!
For Hecuba!
What’s Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her? What would he do
Had he the motive and the cue for passion
That I have? He would drown the stage with tears
And cleave the general ear° with horrid° speech,
Make mad the guilty and appall° the free,°
Confound the ignorant,° and amaze° indeed
The very faculties of eyes and ears. Yet I,
A dull and muddy-mettled° rascal, peak°
Like John-a-dreams,° unpregnant of° my cause,
And can say nothing—no, not for a king
Upon whose property° and most dear life
A damned defeat° was made. Am I a coward?
Who calls me villain? Breaks my pate° across?
Plucks off my beard and blows it in my face?
Tweaks me by the nose? Gives me the lie i’ the throat°
As deep as to the lungs? Who does me this?
Ha, ’swounds,° I should take it; for it cannot be
But I am pigeon-livered° and lack gall
To make oppression bitter,° or ere this
I should ha’ fatted all the region kites°
With this slave’s offal.° Bloody, bawdy villain!
Remorseless,° treacherous, lecherous, kindless° villain!
O, vengeance!
Why, what an ass am I? This is most brave,°
That I, the son of a dear father murdered,
Prompted to my revenge by heaven and hell,
Must like a whore unpack my heart with words
And fall a-cursing, like a very drab,°
A scullion!° Fie upon ’t, foh! About,° my brains!
Hum, I have heard
That guilty creatures sitting at a play
Have by the very cunning° of the scene°
Been struck so to the soul that presently°
They have proclaimed their malefactions;
For murder, though it have no tongue, will speak
With most miraculous organ. I'll have these players Play something like the murder of my father°
Before mine uncle. I'll observe his looks;
I'll tent° him to the quick.° If 'a do blench,°
I know my course. The spirit that I have seen
May be the devil, and the devil hath power
T' assume a pleasing shape; yea, and perhaps,
Out of my weakness and my melancholy,
As he is very potent with such spirits,°
Abuses° me to damn me. I'll have grounds
More relative° than this. The play's the thing Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the King.°

Exit.

3.1 Enter° KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, lords.

KING. And can you by no drift of conference°
Get from him why he puts on this confusion,
Grating so harshly all his days of quiet
With turbulent and dangerous lunacy?
ROSENCRANTZ. He does confess he feels himself distracted,
But from what cause 'a will by no means speak.
GUILDENSTERN. Nor do we find him forward° to be sounded,°
But with a crafty madness keeps aloof
When we would bring him on to some confession
Of his true state.
QUEEN. Did he receive you well?°
ROSENCRANTZ. Most like a gentleman.
GUILDENSTERN. But with much forcing of his disposition.°
ROSENCRANTZ. Niggard° of question,° but of our demands
Most free in his reply.
QUEEN. Did you assay° him
To any pastime?°
ROSENCRANTZ. Madam, it so fell out that certain players
We o'erraught° on the way. Of these we told him,
And there did seem in him a kind of joy
To hear of it. They are here about the court,
And, as I think, they have already order
This night to play before him.

POLONIUS. 'Tis most true,
And he beseeched me to entreat Your Majesties
To hear and see the matter.

KING. With all my heart, and it doth much content me
To hear him so inclined.
Good gentlemen, give him a further edge
And drive his purpose into these delights.

ROSENCRANTZ. We shall, my lord.

Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING. Sweet Gertrude, leave us too,
For we have closely sent for Hamlet hither,
That he, as 'twere by accident, may here
Affront Ophelia.
Her father and myself, lawful espials,
Will so bestow ourselves that seeing, unseen,
We may of their encounter frankly judge,
And gather by him, as he is behaved,
If 't be th' affliction of his love or no
That thus he suffers for.

QUEEN. I shall obey you.
And for your part, Ophelia, I do wish
That your good beauties be the happy cause
Of Hamlet's wildness. So shall I hope your virtues
Will bring him to his wonted way again,
To both your honors.

OPHELIA. Madame, I wish it may.

[Exit QUEEN.]

POLONIUS. Ophelia, walk you here.—Gracious, so please you,
We will bestow ourselves. [To OPHELIA.] Read on this book,
That show of such an exercise may color your loneliness.
We are oft to blame in this—
'Tis too much proved—that with devotion's visage
And pious action we do sugar o'er the devil himself.

KING [aside]. O 'tis too true!
How smart a lash that speech doth give my conscience!
The harlot's check, beautied with plastering art,
Is not more ugly to the thing that helps it
Than is my deed to my most painted word.
O heavy burden!

POLONIUS. I hear him coming. Let's withdraw, my lord.

Enter HAMLET. [OPHELIA pretends to read a book.]

HAMLET. To be, or not to be, that is the question:
Whether ’tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The slings° and arrows of outrageous fortune,
Or to take arms against a sea of troubles
And by opposing end them. To die, to sleep—
No more—and by a sleep to say we end
The heartache and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to. ’Tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished. To die, to sleep;
To sleep, perchance to dream. Ay, there’s the rub,°
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled° off this mortal coil,°
Must give us pause. There’s the respect°
That makes calamity of so long life.°
For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
Th’ oppressor’s wrong, the proud man’s contumely,°
The pangs of disprized° love, the law’s delay,
The insolence of office,° and the spurns°
That patient merit of th’ unworthy takes,°
When he himself might his quietus° make
With a bare bodkin°? Who would fardels° bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
But that the dread of something after death,
The undiscovered country from whose bourn°
No traveler returns, puzzles the will,
And makes us rather bear those ills we have
Than fly to others that we know not of?
Thus conscience does make cowards of us all;
And thus the native hue° of resolution
Is sicklied o’er with the pale cast° of thought,
And enterprises of great pitch° and moment°
With this regard° their currents° turn awry
And lose the name of action.—Soft you° now,
The fair Ophelia. Nymph, in thy orisons°
Be all my sins remembered.

OPHELIA. Good my lord,
How does your honor for this many a day?

HAMLET. I humbly thank you; well, well, well.

OPHELIA. My lord, I have remembrances of yours,
That I have longèd long to redeliver. 95
I pray you, now receive them. [She offers tokens.]

HAMLET. No, not I, I never gave you aught.

OPHELIA. My honored lord, you know right well you did,
And with them words of so sweet breath composed
As made the things more rich. Their perfume lost,
Take these again, for to the noble mind
Rich gifts wax poor when givers prove unkind.
There, my lord. [She gives tokens.]

HAMLET. Ha, ha! Are you honest?

OPHELIA. My lord?

HAMLET. Are you fair?

OPHELIA. What means your lordship?

HAMLET. That if you be honest and fair, your honesty should admit no discourse to your beauty.

OPHELIA. Could beauty, my lord, have better commerce than with honesty?

HAMLET. Ay, truly, for the power of beauty will sooner transform honesty from what it is to a bawd than the force of honesty can translate beauty into his likeness. This was sometime a paradox, but now the time gives it proof. I did love you once.

OPHELIA. Indeed, my lord, you made me believe so.

HAMLET. You should not have believed me, for virtue cannot so inoculate our old stock but we shall relish of it. I loved you not.

OPHELIA. I was the more deceived.

HAMLET. Get thee to a nunnery. Why wouldst thou be a breeder of sin-ers? I am myself indifferent honest, but yet I could accuse me of such things that it were better my mother had not borne me: I am very proud, revengeful, ambitious, with more offenses at my Beck than I have thoughts to put them in, imagination to give them shape, or time to act them in. What should such fellows as I do crawling between earth and heaven? We are arrant knaves all; believe none of us. Go thy ways to a nunnery. Where's your father?

OPHELIA. At home, my lord.

HAMLET. Let the doors be shut upon him, that he may play the fool nowhere but in's own house. Farewell.

OPHELIA. O, help him, you sweet heavens!

HAMLET. If thou dost marry, I'll give thee this plague for thy dowry: be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shall not escape calamity. Get thee to a nunnery, farewell. Or, if thou wilt needs

OPHELIA. Heavenly powers, restore him!

HAMLET. I have heard of your paintings too, well enough. God hath given you one face, and you make yourselves another. You jig,° you amble,° and you lisp, you nickname God's creatures,° and make your wantonness your ignorance.° Go to, I'll no more on 't;° it hath made me mad. I say we will have no more marriage. Those that are married already—all but one—shall live. The rest shall keep as they are. To a nunnery, go.

Exit.

OPHELIA. O, what a nobler mind is here o'erthrown!
The courtier's, soldier's, scholar's, eye, tongue, sword, Th expectancy° and rose° of the fair state, The glass of fashion and the mold of form,° Th' observed of all observers,° quite, quite down! And I, of ladies most deject and wretched, That sucked the honey of his music° vows, Now see that noble and most sovereign reason Like sweet bells jangled out of tune and harsh, That unmatched form and feature of blown° youth Blasted° with ecstasy.° O, woe is me, T' have seen what I have seen, see what I see!

Enter KING and POLONIUS.

KING. Love? His affections° do not that way tend; Nor what he spake, though it lacked form a little, Was not like madness. There's something in his soul O'er which his melancholy sits on brood,° And I do doubt° the hatch and the disclose° Will be some danger, which for to prevent, I have in quick determination Thus set it down:° he shall with speed to England For the demand of° our neglected tribute. This something-settled matter in his heart, Whereon his brains still° beating puts him thus
From fashion of himself.° What think you on 't?

POLONIUS. It shall do well. But yet do I believe
The origin and commencement of his grief
Sprung from neglected love.—How now, Ophelia?
You need not tell us what Lord Hamlet said;
We heard it all.—My lord, do as you please,
But, if you hold it fit, after the play
Let his queen-mother° all alone entreat him
To show his grief. Let her be round° with him;
And I'll be placed, so please you, in the ear
Of all their conference. If she find him not,° To England send him, or confine him where Your wisdom best shall think.

KING. It shall be so.

Madness in great ones must not unwatched to.

Exeunt.

3.2 Enter HAMLET and three of the PLAYERS.

HAMLET. Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you, trippingly on the tongue. But if you mouth it, as many of our players° do, I had as lief° the town crier spoke my lines. Nor do not saw the air too much with your hand, thus, but use all gently; for in the very torrent, tempest, and, as I may say, whirlwind of your passion, you must acquire and beget a temperance that may give it smoothness. O, it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious° periwig-pated° fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings,° who for the most part are capable of° nothing but inexplicable dumb shows° and noise. I would have such a fellow whipped for o’erdoing Termagant.° It out-Herods Herod.° Pray you, avoid it.

FIRST PLAYER. I warrant your honor.

HAMLET. Be not too tame neither, but let your own discretion be your tutor. Suit the action in the word, the word to the action, with this special observance, that you o’erstep not the modesty° of nature. For anything so o’erdone is from° the purpose of playing, whose age, and the very age and body of the time° his° form and pres-unskilful° laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve, the censure of the which one° must in your allowance° o'erweigh a whole theater of others. O, there be players that I have seen play, and heard others praise, and that highly; not to speak it profanely,° that, neither having th' accent of Christians° nor the gait of Christian, pagan, nor man,° have so strutted and bellowed that I have thought some of nature's journeymen° had made men and not made them well, they imitated humanity so abominably.°

FIRST PLAYER. I hope we have reformed that indifferently° with us, sir.

HAMLET. O, reform it altogether. And let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them; for there be of them° that will themselves laugh, to set on some quantity of barren° spectators to laugh too, though in the meantime some necessary question of the play be then to be considered. That's villainous, and shows a most pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it. Go make you ready.

[Exeunt PLAYERS.]

Enter POLONIUS, GUILDENSTERN and ROSENCRANTZ.

How now, my lord, will the King hear this piece of work?

POLONIUS. And the Queen too, and that presently.°

HAMLET. Bid the players make haste.

[Exit POLONIUS.]

Will you two help to hasten them?

ROSENCRANTZ. Ay, my lord.

[Exeunt they two.]

HAMLET. What ho, Horatio!

Enter HORATIO.

HORATIO. Here, sweet lord, at your service.

HAMLET. Horatio, thou art e'en as just a man
As e'er my conversation coped withal.°

HORATIO. O, my dear lord—

To sound what stop° she please. Give me that man
That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him
In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of heart,
As I do thee.—Something too much of this.—
There is a play tonight before the King.
One scene of it comes near the circumstance
Which I have told thee of my father's death.
I prithee, when thou seest that act afoot,
Even with the very comment of thy soul°
Observe my uncle. If his occulted° guilt
Do not itself unkennel° in one speech,
It is a damned° ghost that we have seen,
And my imaginations are as foul
As Vulcan's° stithy.° Give him heedful note,
For I mine eyes will rivet to his face,
And after we will both our judgments join
In censure of his seeming.°

HORATIO. Well, my lord.
If 'a steal aught° the whilst this play is playing
And scape detecting, I will pay the theft.

[FLOURISH.] Enter trumpets and kettledrums, KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, [ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and other lords, with guards carrying torches].

HAMLET. They are coming to the play. I must be idle.°
Get you a place.

KING. How fares our cousin° Hamlet?
HAMLET. Excellent, i' faith, of the chameleon’s dish:° I eat the air, promise-crammed. You cannot feed capons° so.

KING. I have nothing with° this answer, Hamlet. These words are not mine.°

HAMLET. No, nor mine now.° [To POLONIUS.] My lord, you played once i' th’ university, you say?

POLONIUS. That did I, my lord, and was accounted a good actor.

HAMLET. What did you enact?

POLONIUS. I did enact Julius Caesar. I was killed i' the Capitol; Brutus killed me.

HAMLET. It was a brute° part° of him to kill so capital a calf° there.—Be the players ready?

ROSENCRANTZ. Ay, my lord. They stay upon° your patience.

QUEEN. Come hither, my dear Hamlet, sit by me.

HAMLET. No, good Mother, here’s metal° more attractive.

POLONIUS [to the King]. O, ho, do you mark that?

HAMLET. Lady, shall I lie in your lap?

[Placing his head upon OPHELIA’s lap.]

OPHELIA. No, my lord.

HAMLET. I mean, my head upon your lap?

OPHELIA. Ay, my lord.

HAMLET. Do you think I meant country matters?°

OPHELIA. I think nothing, my lord.

HAMLET. That’s a fair thought to lie between maids’ legs.

OPHELIA. What is, my lord?

HAMLET. Nothing.°

OPHELIA. You are merry, my lord.

HAMLET. Who, I?

OPHELIA. Ay, my lord.

HAMLET. O God, your only jig maker.° What should a man do but be merry? For look you how cheerfully my mother looks, and my father died within’s° two hours.

OPHELIA. Nay, 'tis twice two months, my lord.

83 chameleon’s dish (Chameleons were supposed to feed on air. Hamlet deliberately misinterprets the King’s faires as “feeds.” By his phrase eat the air he also plays on the idea of feeding himself with the promise of succession, of being the heir.)

84 capons roosters castrated and crammed with feed to make them succulent.

85 have nothing with° this answer, Hamlet. These words are not mine.°

86 nor mine now (Once spoken, words are proverbially no longer the speaker’s own—and hence should be uttered warily.)

87 stay upon await.

89 metal° substance that is attractive, i.e., magnetic, but with suggestion also of mettle, “disposition.”

90 country matters sexual intercourse (making a bawdy pun on the first syllable of country).

92 Nothing the figure zero or naught, suggesting the female sexual anatomy. (Thing not infrequently has a bawdy connotation of male or female anatomy, and the reference here could be made.)

94 part (1) deed (2) role. calf fool.

95 only jig maker very best composer of jigs, i.e., pointless merriment. (Hamlet replies sardonically to Ophelia’s observation that he is merry by saying, “If you’re looking for someone who is really merry, you’ve come to the right person.”)

96 thing not infrequently has a bawdy connotation of male or female anatomy, and the reference here could be made.)

97 within° within this (i.e., these).
HAMLET. So long? Nay then, let the devil wear black, for I’ll have a suit of sables.° O heavens! Die two months ago, and not forgotten yet?
Then there’s hope a great man’s memory may outlive his life half a year. But, by ’r Lady, ’a must build churches, then, or else shall ’a suffer not thinking on,° with the hobbyhorse, whose epitaph is “For O, for O, the hobbyhorse is forgot.”°

The trumpets sound. Dumb show follows.

Enter a King and a Queen [very lovingly]; the Queen embracing him, and be her. [She kneels, and makes show of protestation unto him.] He takes her up, and declines his head upon her neck. He lies him down upon a bank of flowers. She, seeing him asleep, leaves him. Anon comes in another man, takes off his crown, kisses it, pours poison in the sleeper’s ears, and leaves him. The Queen returns, finds the King dead, makes passionate action. The Poisoner with some three or four come in again, seem to condole with her. The dead body is carried away.
The Poisoner woos the Queen with gifts; she seems barsb awbile, but in the end accepts love.

[Exeunt players.]

OPHELIA. What means this, my lord?
HAMLET. Marry, this’ miching mallico;° it means mischief.
OPHELIA. Belike° this show imports the argument° of the play.

Enter prologue.

HAMLET. We shall know by this fellow. The players cannot keep counsel;°
they’ll tell all
OPHELIA. Will ’a tell us what this show meant?
HAMLET. Ay, or any show that you will show him. Be not you° ashamed to show, he’ll not shame to tell you what it means.
OPHELIA. You are naught,° you are naught. I’ll mark the play.
PROLOGUE. For us and for our tragedy,
Here stooping° to your clemency,
We beg your hearing patiently.

HAMLET. Is this a prologue, or the posy of a ring?°
OPHELIA. ’Tis brief, my lord.
HAMLET. As woman’s love.

Enter [two players as] King and Queen.

mourning once again). 119 suffer . . . on undergone oblivion. 120 For . . . forgot character made up to resemble a horse and rider, appearing in the morris dance and such May-game sports. This song laments the disappearance of such customs under pressure from the Puritans.) 122 this’ miching mallico this is sneaking mischief. 123 Belike 129 naught indecent. (Ophelia is reacting to Hamlet’s pointed remarks about not being ashamed to show all.) 131 stooping bowing. 133 posy . . . ring brief motto in verse inscribed in a ring.

PLAYER KING. Full thirty times hath Phoebus' cart gone round Neptune's salt wash and Tellus' orbèd ground, And thirty dozen moons with borrowed sheen About the world have times twelve thirties been, Since love our hearts and Hymen did our hands Unite commutual in most sacred bands.

PLAYER QUEEN. So many journeys may the sun and moon Make us again count o'er ere love be done! But, woe is me, you are sick of late, So far from cheer and from your former state, That I distrust you. Yet, though I distrust, Discomfort you, my lord, it is nothing must. For women's fear and love hold quantity; In neither aught, or in extremity. Now, what my love is, proof hath made you know, And as my love is sized, my fear is so. Where love is great, the littlest doubts are fear; Where little fears grow great, great love grows there.

PLAYER KING. Faith, I must leave thee, love, and shortly too; My operant powers their functions leave to do. And thou shalt live in this fair world behind, Honored, beloved; and haply one as kind For husband shalt thou—PLAYER QUEEN. O, confound the rest! Such love must needs be treason in my breast. In second husband let me be accurst! None wed the second but who killed the first.

HAMLET. Wormwood, wormwood.

PLAYER QUEEN. The instances that second marriage move Are base respects of thrift, but none of love. A second time I kill my husband dead When second husband kisses me in bed.

PLAYER KING. I do believe you think what now you speak, But what we do determine oft we break. Purpose is but the slave to memory, Which now, like fruit unripe, sticks on the tree,
But fall unshaken when they mellow be.
Most necessary 'tis that we forget
To pay ourselves what to ourselves is debt.
What to ourselves in passion we propose,
The passion ending, doth the purpose lose.
The violence of either grief or joy
Their own enactures° with themselves destroy.
Where joy most revels, grief doth most lament;
Grief joys, joy grieves, on slender accident.°
This world is not for aye,° nor 'tis not strange
That even our loves should with our fortunes change;
For 'tis a question left us yet to prove,
Whether love lead fortune, or else fortune love.
The great man down,° you mark his favorite flies;°
The poor advanced makes friends of enemies.°
And hitherto° doth love on fortune tend;°
For who not needs° shall never lack a friend,
And who in want° a hollow friend doth try°
Directly seasons him° his enemy.

But orderly to end where I begun,
Our wills and fates do so contrary run°
That our devices still° are overthrown;
Our thoughts are ours, their ends° none of our own.
So think thou wilt no second husband wed,
But die thy thoughts when thy first lord is dead.

PLAYER QUEEN. Nor° earth to me give food, nor heaven light,
Sport and repose lock from me day and night,°
To desperation turn my trust and hope,
An anchor's cheer° in prison be my scope!°

HAMLET. If she should break it now! 205

PLAYER KING. 'Tis deeply sworn. Sweet, leave me here awhile;
My spirits grow dull, and fain I would beguile.
The tedious day with sleep.
PLAYER QUEEN. Sleep rock thy brain,
And never come mischance between us twain!

[He sleeps.] Exit [PLAYER QUEEN].

HAMLET. Madam, how like you this play? 210
QUEEN. The lady doth protest too much,° methinks.
HAMLET. O, but she’ll keep her word.
KING. Have you heard the argument?° Is there no offense in ’t?
HAMLET. No, no, they do but jest,° poison in jest. No offense° i’ the world.
KING. What do you call the play?
HAMLET. The Mousetrap. Marry,how?Tropically.° This play is the image of a murder done in Vienna. Gonzago is the Duke’s° name, his wife, Baptista. You shall see anon. 'Tis a knavish piece of work, but what of that? Your Majesty, and we that have free° souls, it touches us not. Let the galled jade° wince, our withers° are unwrung.°

Enter LUCIANUS.

This is one Lucianus, nephew to the King.

OPHELIA. You are as good as a chorus,° my lord.

HAMLET. I could interpret° between you and your love, if I could see the puppets dallying.°

OPHELIA. You are keen,° my lord, you are keen.

HAMLET. It would cost you a groaning to take off mine edge.

OPHELIA. Still better, and worse.°

HAMLET. So° you mis-take° your husbands. Begin, murder; leave thy damnable faces and begin. Come, the croaking raven doth bellow

LUCIANUS. Thoughts black, hands apt, drugs fit, and time agreeing, Confederate season,° else° no creature seeing,° Thou mixture rank, of midnight weeds collected,
With Hecate’s ban\(^\circ\) thrice blasted, thrice infected,
Thy natural magic and dire property\(^\circ\)
On wholesome life usurp immediately.

\[\text{[He pours the poison into the sleeper’s ear]}\]

HAMLET. 'A poisons him i’ the garden for his estate.\(^\circ\) His\(^\circ\) name’s Gonzago. The story is extant, and written in very choice Italian. You shall see anon how the murderer gets the love of Gonzago’s wife.

[CLAUDIUS rises.]

OPHELIA. The King rises.

HAMLET. What, frighted with false fire?°

QUEEN. How fares my lord?

POLONIUS. Give o’er the play.

KING. Give me some light. Away!

POLONIUS. Lights, lights, lights!

Exeunt all but HAMLET and HORATIO.

HAMLET. "Why, let the strucken deer go weep,
The hart ungallèd\(^\circ\) play.
For some must watch,° while some must sleep;
Thus runs the world away."°

Would not this,° sir, and a forest of feathers°—if the rest of my fortunes turn Turk with° me—with two Provincial roses° on my razed° shoes, get me a fellowship in a cry° of players?°

HORATIO. Half a share.

HAMLET. A whole one, I.

“For thou dost know, O Damon\(^\circ\) dear,
This realm dismantled° was
Of Jove himself, and now reigns here
A very, very—pajock.”°

HORATIO. You might have rhymed.

HAMLET. O good Horatio, I’ll take the ghost’s word for a thousand pound.

Didst perceive?

HORATIO. Very well, my lord.

HAMLET. Upon the talk of the poisoning?
HORATIO. I did very well note him.

Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

HAMLET. Aha! Come, some music! Come, the recorders.°

"For if the King like not the comedy,
Why then, belike, he likes it not, perdy."°

Come, some music.

GUILDENSTERN. Good my lord, vouchsafe me a word with you.
HAMLET. Sir, a whole history.
GUILDENSTERN. The King, sir—
HAMLET. Ay, sir, what of him?
GUILDENSTERN. Is in his retirement° marvelous distempered.°

HAMLET. With drink, sir?
GUILDENSTERN. No, my lord, with choler.°

HAMLET. Your wisdom should show itself more richer to signify this to the doctor, for me to put him to his purgation° would perhaps plunge him into more choler.°

GUILDENSTERN. Good my lord, put your discourse into some frame° and start° not so wildly from my affair.

HAMLET. I am tame, sir. Pronounce.

GUILDENSTERN. The Queen, your mother, in most great affliction of spirit, hath sent me to you.

HAMLET. You are welcome.

GUILDENSTERN. Nay, good my lord, this courtesy is not of the right breed.°
If it shall please you to make me a wholesome answer, I will do your mother’s commandment; if not, your pardon° and my return shall be the end of my business.

HAMLET. Sir, I cannot.

ROSENCRANTZ. What, my lord?

HAMLET. Make you a wholesome answer; my wit’s diseased. But, sir, such answer as I can make, you shall command, or rather, as you say, my mother. Therefore no more, but to the matter. My mother, you say—ROSENCRANTZ. Then thus she says: your behavior hath struck her into amazement and admiration.°

HAMLET. O wonderful son, that can so stonish a mother! But is there no sequel at the heels of this mother’s admiration? Impart.

ROSENCRANTZ. She desires to speak with you in her closet° ere you go to bed.

ROSENCRANTZ. My lord, you once did love me.

HAMLET. And so still, by these pickers and stealers.°

ROSENCRANTZ. Good my lord, what is your cause of distemper? You do surely bar the door upon your own liberty° if you deny° your griefs to your friend.

HAMLET. Sir, I lack advancement.

ROSENCRANTZ. How can that be, when you have the voice of the King himself for your succession in Denmark?

HAMLET. Ay, sir, but “While the grass grows”—the proverb is something° musty.

Enter the PLAYERS° WITH RECORDERS.

O, the recorders. Let me see one. [He takes a recorder.]

To withdraw° with you: why do you go about to recover the wind° of me, as if you would drive me into a toil°?

GUILDENSTERN. O, my lord, if my duty be too bold, my love is too unmannerly.°

HAMLET. I do not well understand that.° Will you play upon this pipe?

GUILDENSTERN. My lord, I cannot.

HAMLET. I pray you.

GUILDENSTERN. Believe me, I cannot.

HAMLET. I do beseech you.

GUILDENSTERN. I know no touch of it, my lord.

HAMLET. It is as easy as lying. Govern these ventages° with your fingers and thumb, give it breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most eloquent music. Look you, these are the stops.

GUILDENSTERN. But these cannot I command to any utterance of harmony. I have not the skill.

HAMLET. Why, look you now, how unworthy a thing you make of me! You would play upon me, you would seem to know my stops, you would pluck out the heart of my mystery, you would sound° me from my lowest note to the top of my compass,° and there is much music, excellent voice, in this little organ,° yet cannot you make it speak. 'Sblood, do you think I am easier to be played on than a pipe? Call me what instrument you will, though you can fret° me, you cannot play upon me.

Enter Polonius.

God bless you, sir!

Polonius. My lord, the Queen would speak with you, and presently.⁵

Hamlet. Do you see yonder cloud that’s almost in shape of a camel? ³⁴⁰

Polonius. By the Mass and ’tis, like a camel indeed.

Hamlet. Methinks it is like a weasel.

Polonius. It is backed like a weasel.

Hamlet. Or like a whale.

Polonius. Very like a whale.

Hamlet. Then I will come to my mother by and by.⁷ [Aside.] They fool me to the top of my bent.⁶—I will come by and by.

Polonius. I will say so. [Exit.]

Hamlet. “By and by” is easily said. Leave me, friends. ³⁵⁰

[Exeunt all but Hamlet.]

’Tis now the very witching time⁶ of night,
When churchyards yawn and hell itself breathes out
Contagion to his world. Now could I drink hot blood
And do such bitter business as the day
Would quake to look on. Soft, now to my mother.

O heart, lose not thy nature!⁷ Let not ever
The soul of Nero⁸ enter this firm bosom.
Let me be cruel, not unnatural;
I will speak daggers to her, but use none.
My tongue and soul in this be hypocrites:
How in my words soever⁸ she be shent,⁹ To give them seals⁸ never my soul consent!

Exit.

3.3 Enter King, Rosencrantz, and Guildenstern.

King. I like him not, nor stands it safe with us
To let his madness range. Therefore prepare you.
I your commission will forthwith dispatch,⁹
And he to England shall along with you.

ROSENCRANTZ. The single and peculiar⁠° life is bound
   With all the strength and armor of the mind
   To keep itself from noyance⁠° but much more
   That spirit upon whose weal depends and rests
   The lives of many. The cess° of majesty
   Dies not alone, but like a gulf° doth draw
   What’s near it with it; or it is a massy° wheel
   Fixed on the summit of the highest mount,
   To whose huge spokes ten thousand lesser things
   Are mortised° and adjoined, which, when it falls,°
   Each small annexment, petty consequence,°
   Attends° the boisterous ruin. Never alone
   Did the King sigh, but with a general groan.

KING. Arm° you, I pray you, to this speedy voyage,
   For we will fetters put about this fear, 25
   Which now goes too free-footed.

ROSENCRANTZ. We will haste us.

Enter POLONIUS.

POLONIUS. My lord, he’s going to his mother’s closet.
   Behind the arras° I’ll convey myself
   To hear the process.° I’ll warrant she’ll tax him home,°
   And, as you said—and wisely was it said— 30
   ’Tis meet° that some more audience than a mother,
   Since nature makes them partial, should o’erhear
   The speech, of vantage.° Fare you well, my liege.
   I’ll call upon you ere you go to bed
   And tell you what I know.

KING. Thanks, dear my lord. 35

Exit [POLONIUS].

O, my offense is rank! It smells to heaven.
   It hath the primal eldest curse° upon’t,
   A brother’s murder. Pray can I not,
   Though inclination be as sharp as will;°
   My stronger guilt defeats my strong intent, 40
   And like a man to double business bound°
   I stand in pause where I shall first begin,

11 single and peculiar⁠° individual and private. 13 noyance harm. 15 cess decease, cessation. 16 gulf whirlpool. 17 massy massive. 20 mortised° fastened (as with a fitted joint). 21 Each . . . consequence i.e., every hanger-on and unimportant person or thing connected with the King. 22 Attends participates in. 24 Arm prepare. 28 arras screen of tapestry placed around the walls of household apartments. (On the Elizabethan stage, the arras was presumably over a door or discovery space in the tiring-house facade.) 29 process proceedings. 30 tax him home reprove him severely. 31 meet fitting. 33 of vantage from an advantageous place, or, in addition. 37 the primal eldest curse the curse of Cain, the first murderer; he killed his brother Abel. 39 Though . . . will though my desire is as strong as my determination. 41 bound (1) destined (2) obliged. (The King wants to repent and still enjoy what he has gained.)
And both neglect. What if this cursèd hand
Were thicker than itself with brother’s blood,
Is there not rain enough in the sweet heavens
To wash it white as snow? Whereto serves mercy
But to confront the visage of offense?
And what’s in prayer but this twofold force,
To be forestallèd ere we come to fall,
Or pardoned being down? Then I’ll look up.
My fault is past. But O, what form of prayer
Can serve my turn? “Forgive me my foul murder”?
That cannot be, since I am still possessed
Of those effects for which I did the murder:
My crown, mine own ambition, and my Queen.
May one be pardoned and retain th’ offense?
In the corrupted currents of this world
Offense’s gilded hand may shove by justice,
And oft ’tis seen the wicked prize itself
Buys out the law. But ’tis not so above.
There is no shuffling, there the action lies
In his true nature, and we ourselves compelled,
Even to the teeth and forehead of our faults,
To give in evidence. What then? What rests?
Try what repentance can. What can it not?
Yet what can it, when one cannot repent?
O wretched state, O bosom black as death,
O limèd soul, that, struggling to be free,
Are more engaged! “Help, angels! Make assay.”
Bow, stubborn knees, and heart with strings of steel,
Be soft as sinews of the newborn babe!
All may be well.

[He kneels.]

Enter Hamlet.

Hamlet. Now might I do it pat, now ’a is a-praying;
And now I’ll do ’t. [He draws his sword.] And so ’a goes to heaven,
And so am I revenged. That would be scanned:
A villain kills my father, and for that,
I, his sole son, do this same villain send
To heaven.
Why, this is hire and salary, not revenge.

46–47 Whereto . . . offense what function does mercy serve other than to meet sin face to face? 49 forestalled prevented (from sinning). 56 th’ offense the thing for which one offended. 57 currents courses. 58 gilded hand hand offering gold as a bribe. shove by thrust aside. 59 wicked prize prize won by wickedness. 61 There i.e., in heaven. shuffling escape by trickery. the action lies the accusation is made manifest (a legal metaphor). 62 his its. 63 to the teeth and forehead face to face, concealing nothing. 64 give in provide. rests remains. 68 limèd caught as with birdlime, a sticky substance used to ensnare birds. 69 engaged entangled. assay trial (said to himself). 73 pat opportunely. 75 would be scanned needs to be looked into, or, would be interpreted as follows.
'A took my father grossly, full of bread,°
With all his crimes broad blown,° as flush° as May;
And how his audit° stands who knows save° heaven?
But in our circumstance and course of thought°
'Tis heavy with him. And am I then revenged,
To take him in the purging of his soul,
When he is fit and seasoned° for his passage?
No!
Up, sword, and know thou a more horrid hent.°

When he is drunk asleep, or in his rage,°
Or in th' incestuous pleasure of his bed,
At game,° a-swearing, or about some act
That has no relish° of salvation in 't—
Then trip him, that his heels may kick at heaven,
And that his soul may be as damned and black
As hell, whereto it goes. My mother stays.°

This physic° but prolongs thy sickly days.

Exit.

KING. My words fly up, my thoughts remain below.
Words without thoughts never to heaven go.
Exit.

3.4 Enter [QUEEN] GERTRUDE and POLONIUS.

POLONIUS. 'A will come straight. Look you lay home° to him.
Tell him his pranks have been too broad° to bear with,
And that Your Grace hath screened and stood between Much heat° and him. I'll shroud° me even here.
Pray you, be round° with him.

HAMLET [within]. Mother, Mother, Mother!

QUEEN. I'll warrant you, fear me not.
Withdraw, I hear him coming.

[POLONIUS bides behind the arras.]

Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET. Now, Mother, what's the matter?
QUEEN. Hamlet, thou hast thy father° much offended.
HAMLET. Mother, you have my father much offended.
QUEEN. Come, come, you answer with an idle tongue.

HAMLET. Go, go you question with a wicked tongue.

QUEEN. Why, how now, Hamlet?

HAMLET. What's the matter now?

QUEEN. Have you forgot me?

HAMLET. No, by the rood, not so: You are the Queen your husband's brother's wife, And—would it were not so!—you are my mother.

QUEEN. Nay, then, I'll set those to you that can speak.

HAMLET. Come, come, and sit you down; you shall not budge. You go not till I set you up a glass Where you may see the inmost part of you.

QUEEN. What wilt thou do? Thou wilt not murder me?

Help, ho!

POLONIUS [behind the arras]. What ho! Help!

HAMLET [drawing]. How now? A rat? Dead for a ducat, dead! [He thrusts his rapier through the arras.]

POLONIUS [behind the arras]. O, I am slain! [He falls and dies.]

QUEEN. O me, what hast thou done?

HAMLET. Nay, I know not. Is it the King?

QUEEN. O, what a rash and bloody deed is this!

HAMLET. A bloody deed—almost as bad, good Mother, As kill a King, and marry with his brother.

QUEEN. As kill a King!

HAMLET. Ay, lady, it was my word. [He parts the arras and discovers POLONIUS.]

Thou wretched, rash, intruding fool, farewell! I took thee for thy better. Take thy fortune. Thou find'st to be too busy is some danger.— Leave wringing of your hands. Peace, sit you down, And let me wring your heart, for so I shall, If it be made of penetrable stuff, If damnéd custom have not brazed it so That it be proof and bulwark against sense.

QUEEN. What have I done, that thou dar'st wag thy tongue In noise so rude against me?

HAMLET. Such an act That blurs the grace and blush of modesty, Calls virtue hypocrite, takes off the rose From the fair forehead of an innocent love And sets a blister there, makes marriage vows As false as dicers' oaths. O, such a deed As from the body of contraction plucks 12 idle foolish. 15 forgot me i.e., forgotten that I am your mother. rood cross of Christ. 18 speak i.e., to someone so rude. 25 Dead for a ducat i.e., I bet a ducat he's dead; or a ducat is his life's fee. 34 busy nosy. 38 damnéd custom habitual wickedness. brazed brazened, hardened. 39 proof armor sense feeling. 45 sets a blister i.e., brands as a harlot. 47 contraction the marriage contract.

The very soul, and sweet religion makes\(^*\)
A rhapsody\(^*\) of words. Heaven's face does glow
O'er this solidity and compound mass
With tristful visage, as against the doom,
Is thought-sick at the act.\(^*\)

QUEEN. Ay me, what act,
That roars so loud and thunders in the index?\(^*\)

HAMLET [showing her two likenesses]. Look here upon this picture, and on this,

The counterfeit presentment\(^*\) of two brothers.
See what a grace was seated on this brow:
Hyperion's\(^\) curls, the front\(^\) of Jove himself,
An eye like Mars\(^*\) to threaten and command,
A station\(^\) like the herald Mercury\(^\)
New-lighted\(^*\) on a heaven-kissing hill—

A combination and a form indeed
Where every god did seem to set his seal?\(^*\)
To give the world assurance of a man.
This was your husband. Look you now what follows:
Here is your husband, like a mildewed ear,\(^*\)
Blasting\(^*\) his wholesome brother. Have you eyes?
Could you on this far mountain leave\(^*\) to feed
And batten\(^\) on this moor?\(^\) Ha, have you eyes?
You cannot call it love, for at your age
The heyday\(^\) in the blood\(^\) is tame, it's humble,
And waits upon the judgment, and what judgment
Would step from this to this? Sense,\(^*\) sure, you have,
Else could you not have motion, but sure that sense
Is apoplexed,\(^\) for madness would not err;\(^\)
Nor sense to ecstasy was ne'er so thrall'd,
But\(^*\) it reserved some quantity of choice
To serve in such a difference.\(^*\) What devil was 't
That thus hath cozen'd you at hoodman-blind?\(^*\)
Eyes without feeling, feeling without sight,
Ears without hands or eyes, smelling sans° all,
Or but a sickly part of one true sense
Could not so mope.° O shame, where is thy blush?
Rebellious hell,
If thou canst mutine° in a matron’s bones,
To flaming youth let virtue be as wax
And melt in her own fire.° Proclaim no shame
When the compulsive ardor gives the charge,
Since frost itself as actively doth burn,
And reason panders will.°

QUEEN. O Hamlet, speak no more!
Thou turn'st mine eyes into my very soul,
And there I see such black and grainèd° spots
As will not leave their tinct.°

HAMLET. Nay, but to live
In the rank sweat of an enseamèd° bed,
Stewed° in corruption, honeying and making love
Over the nasty sty!

QUEEN. O, speak to me no more!
These words like daggers enter in my ears.
No more, sweet Hamlet!

HAMLET. A murderer and a villain,
A slave that is not twentieth part the tithe°
Of your precedent lord,° a vice° of kings,
A cutpurse of the empire and the rule,
That from a shelf the precious diadem stole
And put it in his pocket!

QUEEN. No more!

Enter GHOST [in his nightgown].

HAMLET. A king of shreds and patches°—
Save me, and hover o’er me with your wings,
You heavenly guards! What would your gracious figure?

QUEEN. Alas, he’s mad!

HAMLET. Do you not come your tardy son to chide,
That, lapsed° in time and passion, lets go by
Th’ important° acting of your dread command?
O, say!

GHOST. Do not forget. This visitation
Is but to whet thy almost blunted purpose. 115
But look, amazement° on thy mother sits.
O, step between her and her fighting soul!
Conceit° in weakest bodies strongest works.
Speak to her, Hamlet.

HAMLET. How is it with you, lady?

QUEEN. Alas, how is 't with you, 120
That you do bend your eye on vacancy,
And with th' incorporal° air do hold discourse?
Forth at your eyes your spirts wildly peep,
And, as the sleeping soldiers in th' alarm,°
Your bedded° hair, like life in excrements,°
Start up and stand on end. O gentle son,
Upon the heat and flame of thy distemper°
Sprinkle cool patience. Whereon do you look?

HAMLET. On him, on him! Look you how pale he glares!
His form and cause conjoined,° preaching to stones,° 130
Would make them capable.°—Do not look upon me,
Lest with this piteous action you convert
My stern effects.° Then what I have to do
Will want true color—tears perchance for blood.°

QUEEN. To whom do you speak this?

HAMLET. Do you see nothing there?
QUEEN. Nothing at all, yet all that is I see.
HAMLET. Nor did you nothing hear?
QUEEN. No, nothing but ourselves.
HAMLET. Why, look you there, look how it steals away! 140
My father, in his habit° as° he lived!
Look where he goes even now out at the portal!

Exit GHOST.

QUEEN. This is the very° coinage of your brain.
This bodiless creation ecstasy
Is very cunning in.° 145

HAMLET. Ecstasy?
My pulse as yours doth temperately keep time,
And makes as healthful music. It is not madness
That I have uttered. Bring me to the test,
And I the matter will reword,° which madness

Lay not that flattering unction° to your soul
That not your trespass but my madness speaks.
It will but skin° and film the ulcerous place,
Whiles rank corruption, mining° all within,
Infects unseen. Confess yourself to heaven,
Repeat what’s past, avoid what is to come,
And do not spread the compost° on the weeds
To make them ranker. Forgive me this my virtue;°
Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg,
Yea, curb° and woo for leave° to do him good.

QUEEN. O Hamlet, thou hast cleft my heart in twain.
HAMLET. O, throw away the worser part of it,
And live the purer with the other half.
Good night. But go not to my uncle’s bed;
Assume a virtue, if you have it not.
That monster, custom, who all sense doth eat,°
Of habits devil,° is angel yet in this,
That to the use of actions fair and good
He likewise gives a frock or livery°
That aptly° is put on. Refrain tonight,
And that shall lend a kind of easiness
To the next abstinence; the next more easy;
For use° almost can change the stamp of nature,°
And either° . . . the devil, or throw him out
With wondrous potency. Once more, good night;
And when you are desirous to be blest,
I'll blessing beg of you.° For this same lord,

[Pointing to Polonius.]

I do repent; but heaven hath pleased it so
To punish me with this, and this with me,
That I must be their scourge and minister.°
I will bestow° him, and will answer° well
The death I gave him. So again, good night.
I must be cruel only to be kind.
This bad begins, and worse remains behind.
One word more, good lady.

QUEEN. What shall I do?

HAMLET. Not this by no means that I bid you do:
Let the bloat* King tempt you again to bed,
Pinch wanton* on your cheek, call you his mouse,
And let him, for a pair of reechy* kisses,
Or paddling* in your neck with his damned fingers,
Make you to ravel all this matter out*
That I essentially am not in madness,
But mad in craft.* 'Twere good* you let him know,
For who that's but a Queen, fair, sober, wise,
Would from a paddock,° from a bat, a gib,°
Such dear concernings° hide? Who would do so?
No, in despite of sense and secrecy.*
Unpeg the basket° on the house's top,
Let the birds fly, and like the famous ape,*
To try conclusions,° in the basket creep
And break your own neck down.*

QUEEN. Be thou assured, if words be made of breath,
And breath of life, I have no life to breathe
What thou hast said to me.

HAMLET. I must to England. You know that?

QUEEN. Alack,
I had forgot. 'Tis so concluded on.

HAMLET. There's letters sealed, and my two schoolfellows,
Whom I will trust as I will adders fanged,
They bear the mandate; they must sweep my way
And marshall me to knavery.° Let it work.*
For 'tis the sport to have the enginer*
Hoist with° his own petard,* and 't shall go hard
But I will° delve one yard below their mines°
And blow them at the moon. O, 'tis most sweet
When in one line° two crafts° directly meet.

This man shall set me packing.°
I’ll lug the guts into the neighbor room.
Mother, good night indeed. This counselor
Is now most still, most secret, and most grave,
Who was in life a foolish prating knave.—
Come, sir, to draw toward an end° with you.—
Good night, Mother.

Exeunt [separately; hamlet dragging in Polonius].

4.1 Enter King and queen, with Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.

King. There’s matter° in these sighs, these profound heaves.°
You must translate: ’tis fit we understand them.
Where is your son?
Queen. Bestow this place on us a little while.

[Exeunt Rosencrantz and Guildenstern.]

Ah, mine own lord, what have I seen tonight! 5

King. What, Gertrude? How does Hamlet?
Queen. Mad as the sea and wind when both contend
Which is the mightier. In his lawless fit,
Behind the arras hearing something stir,
Whips out his rapier, cries, ”A rat, a rat!”
And in this brainish apprehension° kills
The unseen good old man.

King. O heavy° deed!
It had been so with us,° had we been there.
His liberty is full of threats to all—
To you yourself, to us, to everyone.°
Alas, how shall this bloody deed be answered?°
It will be laid to us, whose providence°
Should have kept short,° restrained, and out of haunt°
This mad young man. But so much was our love,
We would not understand what was most fit,°
But, like the owner of a foul disease,
To keep it from divulging,° let it feed
Even on the pith of life. Where is he gone?

Queen. To draw apart the body he hath killed,
O’er whom his very madness, like some ore°
Among a mineral° of metals base,
Shows itself pure: ’a weeps for what is done.
KING. O Gertrude, come away!
The sun no sooner shall the mountains touch
But we will ship him hence, and this vile deed
We must with all our majesty and skill
Both countenance and excuse.—Ho, Guildenstern!

Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

Friends both, go join you with some further aid.
Hamlet in madness hath Polonius slain,
And from his mother’s closet hath he dragged him.
Go seek him out, speak fair, and bring the body
Into the chapel. I pray you, haste in this.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Come, Gertrude, we’ll call up our wisest friends
And let them know both what we mean to do
And what’s untimely done.
Whose whisper o’er the world’s diameter,
As level as the cannon to his blank,
Transports his poisoned shot, may miss our name
And hit the woundless air. O, come away!
My soul is full of discord and dismay.

Exeunt.

4.2 Enter HAMLET.

HAMLET. Safely stowed.
ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN [within]. Hamlet! Lord Hamlet!

Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

ROSENCRANTZ. What have you done, my lord, with the dead body?
HAMLET. Compounded it with dust, whereto ’tis kin.
ROSENCRANTZ. Tell us where ’tis, that we may take it thence
And bear it to the chapel.
HAMLET. Do not believe it.
ROSENCRANTZ. Believe what?
HAMLET. That I can keep your counsel and not mine own. Besides, to be demanded of a sponge, what replication should be made by the son of a king?
ROSENCRANTZ. Take you me for a sponge, my lord?

32 countenance put the best face on. 40 And . . . done (A defective line; conjectures as to the missing words include So, baply, slander [Capell and others]; For, baply, slander [Theobald and others]; and So envious slander [Jenkins].) 41 diameter extent from side to side. 42 As level with as direct aim. his blank its target at point-blank range. 44 woundless invulnerable. 4.2 Location: The castle. 10 That . . . own i.e., that I can follow your advice (by telling where the body is) and still keep my own secret. 11 demanded of questioned by. replication reply.
HAMLET. Ay, sir, that soaks up the King's countenance,° his rewards, his authorities.° But such officers do the King best service in the end. He keeps them, like an ape, an apple, in the corner of his jaw, first mouthed to be last swallowed. When he needs what you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you, and, sponge, you shall be dry again.

ROSENCRANTZ. I understand you not, my lord.

HAMLET. I am glad of it. A knavish speech sleeps in° a foolish ear.

ROSENCRANTZ. My lord, you must tell us where the body is and go with us to the King.

HAMLET. The body is with the King, but the King is not with the body.°

The King is a thing—

GUILDENSTERN. A thing, my lord?

HAMLET. Of nothing.° Bring me to him. Hide fox, and all after!°

.Exeunt [running].

Enter KING, and two or three.

KING. I have sent to seek him, and to find the body. How dangerous is it that this man goes loose! Yet must not we put the strong law on him. He's loved of° the distracted° multitude, Who like not in their judgment, but their eyes,° And where 'tis so, th' offender's scourge° is weighed,° But never the offense. To bear all smooth and even,° This sudden sending him away must seem Deliberate pause.° Diseases desperate grown By desperate appliance° are relieved, Or not at all.

Enter ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and all the rest.

How now, what hath befall'n?

ROSENCRANTZ. Where the dead body is bestowed, my lord, We cannot get from him.

KING. But where is he?

ROSENCRANTZ. Without, my lord; guarded, to know your pleasure.
KING. Bring him before us.
ROSENCRANTZ. Ho! Bring in the lord.

They enter [with HAMLET].

KING. Now, Hamlet, where’s Polonius?
HAMLET. At supper.
KING. At supper? Where?
HAMLET. Not where he eats, but where ‘a is eaten. A certain convocation of politic worms° are e’en° at him. Your worm° is your only emperor for diet.° We fat all creatures else to fat us, and we fat ourselves for maggots. Your fat king and your lean beggar is but variable service°—two dishes, but to one table. That’s the end.

KING. Alas, alas!
HAMLET. A many may fish with the worm that hath eat° of a king, and eat of the fish that hath fed of that worm.
KING. What dost thou mean by this?
HAMLET. Nothing but to show you how a king may go a progress° through the guts of a beggar.
KING. Where is Polonius?
HAMLET. In heaven. Send thither to see. If your messenger find him not there, seek him i’ th’other place yourself. But if indeed you find him not within this month, you shall nose him as you go up the stairs into the lobby.

KING [to some attendants]. Go seek him there. 35
HAMLET. 'A will stay till you come.

[Exeunt attendants.]

KING. Hamlet, this deed, for thine especial safety—
Which we do tender,° as we dearly° grieve
For that which thou hast done—must send thee hence
With fiery quickness. Therefore prepare thyself. The bark° is ready, and the wind at help,
Th’ associates tend,° and everything is bent° For England.

HAMLET. For England!
KING. Ay, Hamlet.
HAMLET. Good.
KING. So is it, if thou knew’st our purposes.
HAMLET. I see a cherub° that sees them. But come, for England!
Farewell, dear mother.
KING. Thy loving father, Hamlet.

20 politic worms crafty worms (suited to a master spy like Polonius). e’en even now.
Your worm your average worm. (Compare your fat king and your lean beggar in line 22.)
21 diet food, eating (with a punning reference to the Diet of Worms, a famous convocation held in 1521). 22–23 variable service different courses of a single meal.
25 eat eaten. (Pronounced et.) 28 progress royal journey of state. 38 tender regard, hold dear. dearly intensely. 41 bark sailing vessel. 42 tend wait. bent in readiness. 48 cherub (Cherubim are angels of knowledge. Hamlet hints that both he and heaven are onto Claudius’s tricks.)
HAMLET. My mother. Father and mother is man and wife, man and wife is one flesh, and so, my mother. Come, for England!

Exit.

KING. Follow him at foot; tempt him with speed aboard. Delay it not. I'll have him hence tonight. Away! For everything is sealed and done That else leans on th' affair. Pray you, make haste.

[Exeunt all but the KING.]

And, England, if my love thou hold'st at aught— As my great power thereof may give thee sense, Since yet thy cicatrice looks raw and red After the Danish sword, and thy free awe Pays homage to us—thou mayst not coldly set Our sovereign process, which imports at full, By letters congruing to that effect, The present death of Hamlet. Do it, England, For like the hectic in my blood he rages, And thou must cure me. Till I know 'tis done, Howe'er my haps, my joys were ne'er begun.

Exit.

4.4 Enter fortinbras with his army over the stage.

FORTINBRAS. Go, Captain, from me greet the Danish king.

Tell him that by his license Fortinbras Craves the conveyance of a promised march Over his kingdom. You know the rendezvous.

If that His Majesty would aught with us,

We shall express our duty in his eye;

And let him know so.

CAPTAIN. I will do 't, my lord.

FORTINBRAS. Go softly on.

[Exeunt all but the CAPTAIN.]

Enter hamlet, rosen-crantz, [gulden-stern,] etc.

HAMLET. Good sir, whose powers are these?

CAPTAIN. They are of Norway, sir.

HAMLET. How purposed, sir, I pray you?

CAPTAIN. Against some part of Poland.

HAMLET. Who commands them, sir?

CAPTAIN. The nephew to old Norway. Fortinbras.

HAMLET. Goes it against the main of Poland, sir, or for some frontier?

CAPTAIN. Truly to speak, and with no addition, we go to gain a little patch of ground that hath in it no profit but the name. To pay five ducats, five, I would not farm it; nor will it yield to Norway or the Pole a ranker rate, should it be sold in fee.

HAMLET. Why, then the Polack never will defend it.

CAPTAIN. Yes, it is already garrisoned.

HAMLET. Two thousand souls and twenty thousand ducats will not debate the question of this straw. This is th' impostume of much wealth and peace, that inward breaks, and shows no cause without why the man dies. I humbly thank you, sir.

CAPTAIN. God b' wi' you, sir. [Exit.]

ROSENCRANTZ. Will 't please you go, my lord?

HAMLET. I'll be with you straight. Go a little before. [Exeunt all except HAMLET.]

How all occasions do inform against me and spur my dull revenge! What is a man, if his chief good and market of his time be but to sleep and feed? A beast, no more. Sure he that made us with such large discourse looking before and after gave us not that capability and godlike reason to fust in us unused. Now, whether it be bestial oblivion or some craven scruple of thinking too precisely on th' event — a thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom — and ever three parts coward — I do not know why yet I live to say "This thing's to do," sith I have cause, and will, and strength, and means to do 't. Examples gross as earth exhort me: witness this army of such mass and charge, led by a delicate and tender prince, whose spirit with divine ambition puffed makes mouths at the invisible event.
Exposing what is moral and unsure
To all that fortune, death, and danger dare,°
Even for an eggshell. Rightly to be great
Is not to stir without great argument,
But greatly to find quarrel in a straw
When honor’s at the stake.° How stand I, then,
That have a father killed, a mother stained,
Excitements of° my reason and my blood,
And let all sleep, while to my shame I see
The imminent death of twenty thousand men
That for a fantasy° and trick° of fame
Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot°
Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,°
Which is not tomb enough and continent°
To hide the slain? O, from this time forth
My thoughts be bloody or be nothing worth!

Exit.

Enter HORIZIO, [QUEEN] GERTRUDE, and a GENTLEMAN.

QUEEN. I will not speak with her.
GENTLEMAN. She is importunate,
   Indeed distract.° Her mood will needs be pitied.
QUEEN. What would she have?
GENTLEMAN. She speaks much of her father, says she hears There’s tricks° i’ the world, and hems,° and beats her heart,°
   Spurns enviously at straws,° speaks things in doubt°
   That carry but half sense. Her speech is nothing,
   Yet the unshaped use° of it doth move
   The hearers to collection;° they yawn° at it,
   And botch° the words up fit to their own thoughts,
   Which,° as her winks and nods and gestures yield° them,
   Indeed would make one think there might be thought,°
   Though nothing sure, yet much unhappily.°
HORIZIO. ’Twere good she were spoken with, for she may strew
Dangerous conjectures in ill-breeding° minds.

53 dare could do (to him). 54–57 Rightly . . . stake true greatness does not normally consist of rushing into action over some trivial provocation; however, when one’s honor is involved, even a trifling insult requires that one respond greatly (?). at the stake (A metaphor from gambling or bear-baiting.) 59 Excitements of promptings by. 62 fantasy fanciful caprice, illusion. trick trifle, deceit. 63 plot plot of ground. 64 Whereon . . . cause on which there is insufficient room for the soldiers needed to engage in a military contest. 65 continent receptacle; container. 4.5 Location: The castle. 2 distract distracted. 5 tricks deceptions. hems makes “hmm” sounds. 5 heart i.e., breast. 6 Spurns . . . straws kicks spitefully, takes offense at trifles. in doubt obscuringly. 8 unshaped use incoherent manner. 9 collection inference, a guess at some sort of meaning. yawn gape, wonder; grasp. QUEEN. Let her come in.

[Exit GENTLEMAN.]

QUEEN. How now, Ophelia?

OPHELIA [sings].

"How should I your true love know
   From another one?
By his cockle hat° and staff,
   And his sandal shoon."°

OPHELIA. Say you? Nay, pray you, mark.

"He is dead and gone, lady;
   He is dead and gone;
At his head a grass-green turf,
   At his heels a stone."

O, ho!

QUEEN. Nay, but Ophelia—

OPHELIA. Pray you, mark.

"White his shroud as the mountain snow”—

Enter KING.

QUEEN. Alas, look here, my lord.

OPHELIA.

"Larded° with sweet flowers;
   Which bewept to the ground did not go
With true-love showers.”°

KING. How do you, pretty lady?

OPHELIA. Well, God 'ild° you! They say the owl° was a baker’s daughter.

Lord, we know what we are, but know not what we may be. God be at your table!

KING. Conceit° upon her father.

OPHELIA. Pray let’s have no words of this; but when they ask you what it means, say you this:

   "Tomorrow is Saint Valentine’s day, [Song.]"

[18 toy trifle.  amiss calamity.  19–20 So . . . split guilt is so full of suspicion that it

And I a maid at your window,
To be your Valentine.
Then up he rose, and donned his clothes,
And dupped° the chamber door,
Let in the maid, that out a maid
Never departed more."

KING. Pretty Ophelia—

OPHELIA. Indeed, la, without an oath, I'll make an end on 't: [Sings.]
“By Gis° and by Saint Charity,
    Alack, and fie for shame!
Young men will do 't, if they come to 't;
    By Cock,° they are to blame.
Quoth she, 'Before you tumbled me.
    You promised me to wed.'"

He answers:
    ‘So would I ha' done, by yonder sun,
    An° thou hadst not come to my bed.’"

KING. How long hath she been thus?

OPHELIA. I hope all will be well. We must be patient, but I cannot choose but weep to think they would lay him i' the cold ground. My brother shall know of it. And so I thank you for your good counsel.
Come, my coach! Good night, ladies, good night, sweet ladies, good night, good night.

[Exit.]

KING [to HORIZ]. Follow her close. Give her good watch, I pray you.
[Exit HORIZ.]

O, this is the poison of deep grief; it springs
All from her father's death—and now behold!
O Gertrude, Gertrude,
When sorrows come, they come not single spies,°
But in battalions. First, her father slain;
Next, your son gone, and he most violent author
Of his own just remove;° the people muddied,°
Thick and unwholesome in their thoughts and whispers
For good Polonius’ death— and we have done but greenly,°
In hugger-mugger° to inter him; poor Ophelia
Divided from herself and her fair judgment.
Without the which we are pictures or mere beasts;

Act 4, Scene 5

With pestilent speeches of his father’s death,
Wherein necessity, of matter beggared,
Will nothing stick our person to arraign
In ear and ear. O my dear Gertrude, this,
Like to a murdering piece, in many places
Gives me superfluous death.

[Queen. Alack, what noise is this?]

KING. Attend!

Where is my Switzers? Let them guard the door.

Enter a Messenger.

What is the matter?

MESSENGER. Save yourself, my lord!
The ocean, overpeering of his list,
Eats not the flats with more impetuous haste
Than young Laertes, in a riotous head,
O’erbears your officers. The rabble call him lord,
And, as the world were now but to begin,
Antiquity forgot, custom not known,
The ratifiers and props of every word,
They cry, “Choose we! Laertes shall be king!”
Caps, hands, and tongues applaud it to the clouds, “Laertes shall be king, Laertes king!”

QUEEN. How cheerfully on the false trail they cry!

Enter Laertes with others.

KING. The doors are broke.

LAERTES. Where is this king?—Sirs, stand you all without.

ALL. No, let’s come in.

LAERTES. I pray you, give me leave.

ALL. We will, we will.

LAERTES. I thank you. Keep the door. [Exeunt followers.] O thou vile king, Give me my father!

QUEEN [restraining him]. Calmly, good Laertes.
LAERTES. That drop of blood that’s calm proclaims me bastard,
Cries cuckold to my father, brands the harlot
Even here, between° the chaste unsmirchéd brow
Of my true mother.

KING. What is the cause, Laertes,
That thy rebellion looks so giantlike?
Let him go, Gertrude. Do not fear our° person.
There’s such divinity doth hedge° a king
That treason can but peep to what it would,° Acts little of his will."Tell me, Laertes,
Why thou art thus incensed. Let him go, Gertrude.
Speak, man.

LAERTES. Where is my father?

KING. Dead.

QUEEN. But not by him.

KING. Let him demand his fill. 130

LAERTES. How came he dead? I’ll not be juggled with.°
To hell, allegiance! Vows, to the blackest devil!
Conscience and grace, to the profoundest pit!
I dare damnation. To this point I stand,°
That both the worlds I give to negligence,°
Let come what comes, only I’ll be revenged
Most thoroughly° for my father.

KING. Who shall stay you?

LAERTES. My will, not all the world’s.°
And for° my means, I’ll husband them so well
They shall go far with little.

KING. Good Laertes,
If you desire to know the certainty
Of your dear father, is ‘t writ in your revenge
That, swoopstake,° you will draw both friend and foe,
Winner and loser?145

LAERTES. None but his enemies.

KING. Will you know them, then?

LAERTES. To his good friends thus wide I’ll ope my arms,
And like the kind life-rendering pelican°
Repast° them with my blood.

Act 4, Scene 5  Hamlet, Prince of Denmark  1189

KING. Why, now you speak
Like a good child and a true gentleman.
That I am guiltless of your father's death,
And am most sensibly in grief for it,
It shall as level to your judgment 'pear
As day does to your eye. [A noise within.]

LAERTES. How now, what noise is that?

Enter OPHELIA.

KING. Let her come in.

LAERTES. O heat, dry up my brains! Tears seven times salt
Burn out the sense and virtue of mine eye!
By heaven, thy madness shall be paid with weight
Till our scale turn the beam. O rose of May!
Dear maid, kind sister, sweet Ophelia!
O heavens, is 't possible a young maid's wits
Should be as mortal as an old man's life?
Nature is fine in love, and where 'tis fine
It sends some precious instance of itself
After the thing it loves.

OPHELIA. [Song.]

"They bore him barefaced on the bier,
Hey non nonny, nonny, hey nonny,
And in his grave rained many a tear—"
Fare you well, my dove!

LAERTES. Hadst thou thy wits and didst persuade revenge,
It could not move thus.

OPHELIA. You must sing "A-down a-down," and you "call him a-down-a."°
O, how the wheel becomes it! It is the false steward that stole his master's daughter.

LAERTES. This nothing's more than matter.

OPHELIA. There's rosemary,° that's for remembrance; pray you, love, remember. And there is pansies;° that's for thoughts.

LAERTES. A document° in madness, thoughts and remembrance fitted.

OPHELIA. There's fennel° for you, and columbines.° There's rue° for you, and here's some for me; we may call it herb of grace o' Sundays.

153 sensibly feelingly. 154 level plain. 158 virtue faculty, power. 159 paid with weight repaid, avenged equally or more. 160 beam crossbar of a balance. 164 fine in refined by. 165 instance token. 166 After . . . loves i.e., into the grave, along with Polonius. 171 persuade argue cogently for. 173 You . . . a-down-a (Ophelia assigns the singing of refrains, like her own "Hey non nonny," to others present.) 174 wheel spinning wheel as accompaniment to the song, or refrain. false steward (The story is unknown.) 176 This . . . matter this seeming nonsense is more eloquent than sane utterance. 177 rosemary (Used as a symbol of remembrance both at weddings and at funerals.) 178 pansies (Emblems of love and courtship; perhaps from French pensées, "thoughts.") 179 document instruction, lesson. 180 fennel (Emblem of flattery.) columbines (Emblems of unchastity or ingratitude.) rue (Emblem of repentance—a significance that is evident in its popular name, herb of grace.)
You must wear your rue with a difference.° There’s a daisy.°
I would give you some violets,° but they withered all when my father died. They say I made a good end—
[Sings.] “For bonny sweet Robin is all my joy.” 185

LAERTES. Thought° and affliction, passion,° hell itself,
She turns to favor° and to prettiness.

OPHELIA. [Song.]
“And will ’a not come again?
And will ’a not come again?
No, no, he is dead.
Go to thy deathbed,
He never will come again.
“His beard was as white as snow,
All flaxen was his poll.°
He is gone, he is gone,
And we cast away moan.
God ha’ mercy on his soul!”

And of all Christian souls, I pray God. God b’ wi’ you.

[Exit, followed by GERTRUDE.]

LAERTES. Do you see this, O God?

KING. Laertes, I must commune with your grief, 200
Or you deny me right. Go but apart,
Make choice of whom° your wisest friends you will,
And they shall hear and judge twixt you and me.
If by direct or by collateral hand°
They find us touched,° we will our kingdom give,
Our crown, our life, and all that we call ours
To you in satisfaction; but if not,
Be you content to lend your patience to us,
And we shall jointly labor with your soul
To give it due content.

LAERTES. Let this be so. 210

His means of death, his obscure funeral—
No trophy,° sword, nor hatchment° o’er his bones,
No noble rite, nor formal ostentation°—
Cry to be heard, as ’twere from heaven to earth,
That° I must call ’t in question.°

KING. So you shall, 215
And where th’ offense is, let the great ax fall.
I pray you, go with me.

Exeunt.
4.6 Enter Horatio and others.

Horatio. What are they that would speak with me?

Gentleman. Seafaring men, sir. They say they have letters for you.

Horatio. Let them come in.

[Exit Gentleman.]

I do not know from what part of the world
I should be greeted, if not from Lord Hamlet.

Enter Sailors.

First Sailor. God bless you, sir.

Horatio. Let him bless thee too.

First Sailor. 'A shall, sir; an 't° please him. There's a letter for you, sir—it came from th' ambassador° that was bound for England—if your name be Horatio, as I am let to know it is. [He gives a letter]

Horatio [reads]. "Horatio, when thou shalt have overlooked° this, give these fellows some means° to the King; they have letters for him. Ere we were two days old at sea, a pirate of very warlike appointment° gave us chase. Finding ourselves too slow of sail, we put on a compelled valor, and in the grapple I boarded them. On the instant they got clear of our ship, so I alone became their prisoner. They have dealt with me like thieves of mercy,° but they knew what they did: I am to do a good turn for them. Let the King have the letters I have sent, and repair° thou to me with as much speed as thou wouldest fly death. I have words to speak in thine ear will make thee dumb, yet are they much too light for the bore° of the matter. These good fellows will bring thee where I am. Rosencrantz and Guildenstern hold their course for England. Of them I have much to tell thee. Farewell.

He that thou knowest thine, Hamlet." 25

Come, I will give you way° for these your letters.
And do 't the speedier that you may direct me
To him from whom you brought them.

Exeunt.

4.7 Enter King and Laertes.

King. Now must your conscience my acquittance seal,°
And you must put me in your heart for friend,
Sith° you have heard, and with a knowing ear,
That he which hath your noble father slain
Pursued my life.

Laertes. It well appears. But tell me
Why you proceeded not against these feats°
So crimeful and so capital° in nature,
As by your safety, greatness, wisdom, all things else,
You mainly° were stirred up.

KING. O, for two special reasons, 10
Which may to you perhaps seem much unsinewed,°
But yet to me they’re strong. The Queen his mother
Lives almost by his looks, and for myself—
My virtue or my plague, be it either which—
That, as the star moves not but in his° sphere,°
I could not but by her. The other motive
Why to a public count° I might not go
Is the great love the general gender° bear him,
Who, dipping all his faults in their affection,
Work° like the spring° that turneth wood to stone,
Convert his gyves° to graces, so that my arrows,
Too slightly timbered° for so loud° a wind,
Would have reverted° to my bow again
But not where I had aimed them.

LAERTES. And so have I a noble father lost,
A sister driven into desperate terms,°
Whose worth, if praises may go back° again,
Stood challenger on mount° of all the age
For her perfections. But my revenge will come.

KING. Break not your sleeps for that. You must not think
That we are made of stuff so flat and dull
That we can let our beard be shook with danger
And think it pastime. You shortly shall hear more.
I loved your father, and we love ourself;°
And that, I hope, will teach you to imagine—

Enter a MESSENGER with letters.

How now? What news?

MESSENGER. Letters, my lord, from Hamlet:
This to Your Majesty, this to the Queen.

[He gives letters.]

KING. From Hamlet? Who brought them?

MESSENGER. Sailors, my lord, they say. I saw them not.
They were given me by Claudio. He received them
Of him that brought them.
KING. Laertes, you shall hear them.—

Leave us.

[Exit MESSENGER.]

[He reads.] “High and mighty, you shall know I am set naked° on your kingdom. Tomorrow shall I beg leave to see your kingly eyes, when I shall, first asking your pardon,” therunto recount the occasion of my sudden and more strange return.

Hamlet.”

What should this mean? Are all the rest come back?
Or is it some abuse,° and no such thing?”

LAERTES. Know you the hand?

KING. ’Tis Hamlet’s character.° “Naked!”
And in a postscript here he says “alone.”
Can you devise° me?

LAERTES. I am lost in it, my lord. But let him come.

It warms the very sickness in my heart
That I shall live and tell him to his teeth,
“Thus didst thou.”°

KING. If it be so, Laertes—

As how should it be so? How otherwise?°—

Will you be ruled by me?

LAERTES. Ay, my lord,
So° you will not o’errule me to a peace.

KING. To thine own peace. If he be now returned,

As checking at° his voyage, and that° he means
No more to undertake it, I will work him
To an exploit, now ripe in my device,°

Under the which he shall not choose but fall;

And for his death no wind of blame shall breathe,

But even his mother shall uncharge the practice°
And call it an accident.

LAERTES. My lord, I will be ruled,

The rather if you could devise it so

That I might be the organ.°

KING. It falls right.

You have been talked of since your travel much,

And that in Hamlet’s hearing, for a quality

Wherein they say you shine. Your sum of parts°

Did not together pluck such envy from him

As did that one, and that, in my regard,

Of the unworthiest siege.”°

45 naked destitute, unarmed, without following. 47 pardon permission. 50 abuse deceit.  no such thing not what it appears. 51 character handwriting. 53 devise explain to. 57 Thus didst thou i.e., here’s for what you did to my father. 58 As . . . otherwise how can this (Hamlet’s return) be true? Yet how otherwise than true (since we have the evidence of his letter)? 60 So provided that. 62 checking at i.e., turning aside from (like a falcon leaving the quarry to fly at a chance bird). that if. 64 device devising, invention. 67 uncharge the practice acquit the stratagem of being a plot. 70 organ agent, instrument. 73 Your . . . parts i.e., all your other virtues. 76 unworthiest siege least important rank.
LAERTES. What part is that, my lord?

KING. A very ribbon in the cap of youth,
Yet needful too, for youth no less becomes°
The light and careless liverty that it wears
Than settled age his sables° and his weeds°
Importing health and graveness.° Two months since
Here was a gentleman of Normandy.
I have seen myself, and served against, the French,
And they can well° on horseback, but this gallant
 Had witchcraft in 't; he grew unto his seat,
And to such wondrous doing brought his horse
As had he been incorpased and demi-natured"°
With the brave beast. So far he topped° my thought
That I in forgery° of shapes and tricks
Come short of what he did.

LAERTES. A Norman was 't?

KING. A Norman.

LAERTES. Upon my life, Lamord.

KING. The very same.

LAERTES. I know him well. He is the brooch° indeed
And gem of all the nation.°

KING. He made confession° of you,
And gave you such a masterly report
For art and exercise in your defense,°
And for your rapier most especial,
That he cried out 'twould be a sight indeed
If one could match you. Th' escrimers° of their nation,
He swore, had neither motion, guard, nor eye
If you opposed them. Sir, this report of his Did Hamlet so envenom with his envy
That he could nothing do but wish and beg
Your sudden° coming o'er, to play° with you.
Now, out of this—

LAERTES. What out of this, my lord?

KING. Laertes, was your father dear to you?
Or are you like the painting of a sorrow,
A face without a heart?

LAERTES. Why ask you this?

KING. Not that I think you did not love your father,
But that I know love is begun by time,° circumstance and hence subject to change.

And that I see, in passages of proof,°
Time qualifies° the spark and fire of it.
There lives within the very flame of love
A kind of wick or snuff° that will abate it,
And nothing is at a like goodness still,°
For goodness, growing to a pleurisy,°
Dies in his own too much.° That° we would do,
We should do when we would; for this “would” changes
And hath abatements° and delays as many
As there are tongues, are hands, are accidents,°
And then this “should” is like a spendthrift sigh,°
That hurts by easing.° But, to the quick o’ th’ ulcer:°
Hamlet comes back. What would you undertake
To show yourself in deed your father’s son
More than in words?

LAERTES. To cut his throat i’ the church.
KING. No place, indeed, should murder sanctuarize;°
Revenge should have no bounds. But good Laertes,
Will you do this,° keep close within your chamber.
Hamlet returned shall know you are come home.
We’ll put on those shall° praise your excellence
And set a double varnish on the fame
The Frenchman gave you, bring you in fine° together,
And wager on your heads. He, being remiss,°
Most generous,° and free from all contriving,
Will not peruse the foils, so that with ease,
Or with a little shuffling, you may choose
A sword unabated,° and in a pass of practice°
Requite him for your father.

LAERTES. I will do ’t.°
And for that purpose I’ll anoint my sword.
I bought an unction° of a mountebank°
So mortal that, but dip a knife in it,
Where it draws blood no cataplasm° so rare,
Collected from all simples° that have virtue°
Under the moon,° can save the thing from death
That is but scratched withal. I’ll touch my point
With this contagion, that if I gall° him slightly,
It may be death.

KING. Let’s further think of this,
Weigh what convenience both of time and means 150
May fit us to our shape.° If this should fail,
And that our drift look through our bad performance,°
’Twere better not assayed. Therefore this project
Should have a back or second, that might hold
If this did blast in proof.° Soft, let me see We’ll make a solemn wager on your cunnings°—
I ha ’t!
When in your motion you are hot and dry—
As° make your bouts more violent to that end—
And that he calls for drink, I’ll have prepared him
A chalice for the nonce,° whereon but sipping,
If he by chance escape your venomed stuck,°
Our purpose may hold there. [A cry wilthin.] But stay, what noise?

Enter QUEEN.

QUEEN. One woe doth tread upon another’s heel,
So fast they follow. Your sister’s drowned, Laertes. 165
LAERTES. Drowned! O, where
QUEEN. There is a willow grows askant° the brook,
That shows his hoar leaves° in the glassy stream;
Therewith fantastic garlands did she make
Of crowflowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples,°
That liberal° shepherds give a grosser name,°
But our cold° maids do dead men’s fingers call them.
There on the pendent° boughs her crownet° weeds
Clamb’ring to hang, an envious sliver° broke,
When down her weedy° trophies and herself
Fell in the weeping brook. Her clothes spread wide,
And mermaidlike awhile they bore her up,
Which time she chanted snatches of old lauds,°
As one incapable of° her own distress,

146 Under the moon i.e., anywhere (with reference perhaps to the belief that herbs gathered at night had a special power). 148 gall graze, wound. 151 shape part we propose to act. 152 drift . . . performance intention should be made visible by our bungling. 155 blast in proof burst in the test (like a cannon). 156 cunnings respective skills. 159 As i.e., and you should. 161 nonce occasion. 162 stuck thrust. (From stoccado, a fencing term.) 167 askant aslant. 168 hoar leaves white or gray undersides of the leaves. 170 long purples early purple orchids. 171 liberal free-spoken. a grosser name (The testicle-resembling tubers of the orchid, which also in some cases resemble dead men’s fingers, have earned various slang names like “dogstones” and “cullions.”) 172 cold chaste. 173 pendent overhanging. crownet made into a chaplet or coronet. 174 envious sliver malicious branch. 175 weedy i.e., of plants. 178 lauds hymns. 179 incapable of lacking capacity to apprehend.
Or like a creature native and endued°
Unto that element. But long it could not be Till that her garments, heavy with their drink,
Pulled the poor wretch from her melodious lay
To muddy death.

LAERTES. Alas, then she is drowned?

QUEEN. Drowned, drowned.

LAERTES. Too much of water hast thou, poor Ophelia,
And therefore I forbid my tears. But yet
It is our trick;° nature her custom holds,
Let shame say what it will. [He weeps.] When these are gone,
The woman will be out.° Adieu, my lord.
I have a speech of fire that fain would blaze,
But that this folly douts° it.

LAERTES. Alas, then she is drowned?

QUEEN. Drowned, drowned.

KING. Let's follow, Gertrude.

How much I had to do to calm his rage!
Now fear I this will give it start again;
Therefore let's follow.

Exit.

5.1 Enter two clowns° [with spades and mattocks].

FIRST CLOWN. Is she to be buried in Christian burial, when she willfully seeks her own salvation?°
SECOND CLOWN. I tell thee she is; therefore make her grave straight.° The crowner° hath sat on her, and finds it° Christian burial.
FIRST CLOWN. How can that be, unless she drowned herself in her own defense?
SECOND CLOWN. Why, 'tis found so.°
FIRST CLOWN. It must be se offendendo,° it cannot be else. For here lies the point: if I drown myself wittingly, it argues an act, and an act hath three branches—it is to act, to do, and to perform. Argal,° she drowned herself wittingly.
SECOND CLOWN. Nay, but hear you, goodman° delver—
FIRST CLOWN. Give me leave. Here lies the water; good. Here stands the man; good. If the man go to this water and drown himself, it is, will he, nill he,° he goes, mark you that. But if the water come to him and drown him, he drowns not himself. Argal, he that is not guilty of his own death shortens not his own life.

SECOND CLOWN. But is this law?
FIRST CLOWN. Ay, marry, is 't—crowner's quest° law.
SECOND CLOWN. Will you ha' the truth on 't? If this had not been a gentlewoman, she should have been buried out o' Christian burial.
FIRST CLOWN. Why, there thou sayst.° And the more pity that great folk should have countenance° in this world to drown or hang themselves, more than their even-Christian.° Come, my spade. There is no ancient° gentlemen but gardeners, ditches, and grave makers.°
They hold up° Adam's profession.
SECOND CLOWN. Was he a gentleman?
FIRST CLOWN. 'A was the first that ever bore arms.°
SECOND CLOWN. Why, he had none.
FIRST CLOWN. What, art a heathen? How dost thou understand the Scripture? The Scripture says Adam digged. Could he dig without arms?° I'll put another question to thee. If thou answerest me not to the purpose, confess thyself°—
SECOND CLOWN. Go to.
FIRST CLOWN. What is he that builds stronger than either the mason, the shipwright, or the carpenter?
SECOND CLOWN. The gallows maker, for that frame° outlives a thousand tenants.
FIRST CLOWN. I like thy wit well, in good faith. The gallows does well.°
But how does it well? It does well to those that do ill. Now thou dost ill to say the gallows is built stronger than the church. Argal, the gallows may do well to thee. To 't again, come.
SECOND CLOWN. "Who builds stronger than a mason, a shipwright, or a carpenter?"
FIRST CLOWN. Ay, tell me that, and unyoke.°
SECOND CLOWN. Marry, now I can tell.
FIRST CLOWN. To 't.
SECOND CLOWN. Mass,° I cannot tell.

Enter hamlet and horatio [at a distance].

FIRST CLOWN. Cudgel thy brains no more about it, for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating; and when you are asked this question next, say "a grave maker. The houses he makes lasts till doomsday."
Go get thee in and fetch me a stoup° of liquor.

[Exit second clown. first clown digs.]

Song.

19 quest inquest. 22 there thou sayst i.e., that's right. 23 countenance privilege.
24 even-Christian fellow Christians. 25 ancient going back to ancient times.
26 hold up maintain. 28 bore arms (To be entitled to bear a coat of arms would make Adam a gentleman, but as one who bore a spade, our common ancestor was an ordinary delver in the earth.) 31 arms i.e., the arms of the body. 33 confess thyself (The saying continues, "and be hanged.") 37 frame (1) gallows (2) structure. 39 does well
(1) is an apt answer (2) does a good turn. 45 unyoke i.e., after this great effort, you may unharness the team of your wits. 48 Mass by the Mass. 52 stoup two-quart measure.
"In youth, when I did love, did love,"
Methought it was very sweet,
To contract—O—the time for—a—my behove,°
O, methought there—a—was nothing—a—meet.”°

HAMLET. Has this fellow no feeling of his business, 'a° sings in grave-making?

HORATIO. Custom hath made it in him a property of easiness.°

HAMLET. ’Tis e’en so. The hand of little employment hath the daintier sense.°

FIRST CLOWN.
"But age with his stealing steps
Hath clawed me in his clutch,
And hath shipped me into the land,"
As if I had never been such.” 65

[He throws up a skull.]

HAMLET. That skull had a tongue in it and could sing once. How the knave jowls° it to the ground, as if 'twere Cain’s jawbone, that did the first murder! This might be the pate of a politician,° which this ass now o’erreaches,° one that would circumvent God, might it not?°

HORATIO. It might, my lord.

HAMLET. Or of a courtier, which could say,“Good morrow, sweet lord!
How dost thou, sweet lord?”This might be my Lord Such-a-one, that praised my Lord Such-a-one’s horse when 'a meant to beg it, might it not?°

HORATIO. Ay, my lord.

HAMLET. Why c’en so, and now my lady Worm’s, chapless,° and knocked about the mazard° with a sexton’s spade. Here’s fine revolution,° an° we had the trick to see° ’t. Did these bones cost no more the breeding but to play° at loggets° with them? Mine ache to think on ’t.

FIRST CLOWN.
"A pickax and a spade, a spade,
For and” a shrouding sheet;

53 In . . . love (This and the two following stanzas, with nonsensical variations, are from a poem attributed to Lord Vaux and printed in Tottel’s Miscellany, 1557. The O and a [for “ah”] seemingly are the grunts of the digger.) 55 To contract . . . behove i.e., to shorten the time for my own advantage. (Perhaps he means to prolong it.) 56 meet suitable, i.e., more suitable. 57 'a that he. 59 property of easiness something he can do easily and indifferently. 60–61 daintier sense more delicate sense of feeling. 64 into the land i.e., toward my grave (?). (But note the lack of rhyme in steps, land.) 67 jowls dashes (with a pun on jouel, “jawbone”). 68 politician schemer, plotter. 69 o’erreaches circumvents, gets the better of (with a quibble on the literal sense). 77 chapless having no lower jaw. 78 mazard i.e., head (literally, a drinking vessel). 78–79 revolution turn of Fortune’s wheel, change. 79 an if. 79–80 trick to see knack of seeing. 79–80 cost . . . play involve so little expense and care in upbringing that we may play. 80 loggets a game in which pieces of hard wood shaped like Indian clubs or bowling pins are thrown to lie as near as possible to a stake. 83 For and and moreover.
O, a pit of clay for to be made
   For such a guest is meet."

[He throws up another skull.]

HAMLET. There’s another. Why may not that be the skull of a lawyer?
Where be his quiddities\(^8\) now, his quillities,\(^8\) his cases, his tenures,\(^8\) and his tricks? Why does he suffer this mad knave now to knock him about the sconce\(^8\) with a dirty shovel, and will not tell him of his action of battery?\(^9\) Hum, this fellow might be in ’s time a great buyer of land, with his statutes, his recognizances,\(^8\) his fines, his double\(^8\) vouchers,\(^8\) his recoveries.\(^8\) In this the fine of his fines and the recovery of recoveries, to have his fine pate full of fine dirt?\(^8\) Will his vouchers vouch him no more of his purchases, and double ones too, than the length and breadth of a pair of indentures?\(^8\) The very conveyances\(^8\) of his lands will scarcely lie in this box,\(^8\) and must th’ inheritor\(^8\) himself have no more, ha?

HAMLET. Is not parchment made of sheepskins?

HORATIO. Ay, my lord, and of calves’ skins too.

HAMLET. They are sheep and calves, which seek out assurance in that.\(^8\) I will speak to this fellow.—Whose grave’s this, sirrah?\(^8\)

FIRST CLOWN. Mine, sir.

"O, pit of clay for to be made
   For such a guest is meet."

HAMLET. I think it be thine, indeed, for thou liest in ’t.

FIRST CLOWN. You lie out on ’t, sir, and therefore ’tis not yours. For my part, I do not lie in ’t, yet it is mine.

HAMLET. Thou dost lie in ’t, to be in ’t and say it is thine. ’Tis for the dead, not for the quick;\(^8\) therefore thou liest.

FIRST CLOWN. ’Tis a quick lie, sir; ’twill away again from me to you.

HAMLET. What man dost thou dig it for?

FIRST CLOWN. For no man, sir.

HAMLET. What woman, then?

FIRST CLOWN. For none, neither.

HAMLET. Who is to be buried in ’t?

FIRST CLOWN. One that was a woman, sir, but, rest her soul, she’s dead.

87 quiddities subtleties, quibbles (from Latin quid, “a thing”). quillities verbal niceties, subtle distinctions (variation of quiddities). 88 tenures the holding of a piece of property or office, or the conditions or period of such holding. 89 sconce head. 90 action of battery lawsuit about physical assault. 91 statutes, recognizances legal documents guaranteeing a debt by attaching land and property. 91–92 fines . . . recoveries ways of converting entailed estates into “fee simple” or freehold. 92 double signed by two signatories. vouchers guarantees of the legality of a title to real estate. 92–94 fine of his fines . . . fine pate . . . fine dirt end of his legal maneuvers . . . elegant head . . . minutely sifted dirt. 95–96 pair of indentures legal documents drawn up in duplicate on a single sheet and then cut apart on a zigzag line so that each pair was uniquely matched. (Hamlet may refer to two rows of teeth or dentures.) 96 conveyances deeds. 97 box (1) deed box (2) coffin. (“Skull” has been suggested.) inheritor possessor, owner. 101 assurance in that safety in legal parchments. 102 sirrah (A term of address to inferiors.) 110 quick living.
HAMLET. How absolute° the knave is! We must speak by the card,° or equivocation° will undo us. By the Lord, Horatio, this three years I have took° note of it: the age is grown so picked° that the toe of the peasant comes so near the heel of the courtier, he galls his kibe.°—How long has thou been grave maker?

FIRST CLOWN. Of all the days i' the year, I came to ’t that day that our last king Hamlet overcame Fortinbras.

HAMLET. How long is that since?

FIRST CLOWN. Cannot you tell that? Every fool can tell that. It was that very day that young Hamlet was born—he that is mad and sent into England.

HAMLET. Ay, marry, why was he sent into England?

FIRST CLOWN. Why, because ’a was mad. ’A shall recover his wits there, or if ’a do not, ’tis no great matter there.

HAMLET. Why?

FIRST CLOWN. ’Twill not be seen in him there. There the men are as mad as he.

HAMLET. How came he mad?

FIRST CLOWN. Very strangely, they say.

HAMLET. How strangely?

FIRST CLOWN. Faith, e'en with losing his wits.

HAMLET. Upon what ground?°

FIRST CLOWN. Why, here in Denmark. I have been sexton here, man and boy, thirty years.

HAMLET. How long will a man lie i' th' earth ere he rot?

FIRST CLOWN . Faith, if 'a be not rotten before 'a die—as we have many pocky° corpses nowadays, that will scarce hold the laying in°—’a will last you° some eight year or nine year. A tanner will last you nine year.

HAMLET. Why he more than another?

FIRST CLOWN. Why, sir, his hide is so tanned with his trade that ’a will keep out water a great while, and your water is a sore° decayer of your whoreson° dead body. [He picks up a skull.] Here’s a skull now hath lien you° i’ th’ earth three-and-twenty years.

HAMLET. Whose was it?

FIRST CLOWN. A whoreson mad fellow’s it was. Whose do you think it was?

HAMLET. Nay, I know not.

FIRST CLOWN. A pestilence on him for a mad rogue! ’A poured a flagon of Rhenish° on my head once. This same skull, sir, was, sir, Yorick’s skull, the King’s jester.

118 absolute strict, precise.  by the card i.e., with precision. (Literally, by the mariner’s compass-card, on which the points of the compass were marked.) 119 equivocation ambiguity in the use of terms. 120 took taken.  picked refined, fastidious. 121–122 galls his kibe chafes the courtier’s chilblain.  139 ground cause. (But, in the next line, the gravedigger takes the word in the sense of “land,” “country.”) 144 pocky rotten, diseased (literally, with the pox, or syphilis). hold the laying in hold together long enough to be interred. 145 last you last. (You is used colloquially here and in the following lines.) 149 sore i.e., terrible, great. 150 whoreson i.e., vile, scurvy. 151 lien you lain. (See the note at line 145.) 157 Rhenish Rhine wine.
HAMLET. This?
FIRST CLOWN. E'en that.
HAMLET. Let me see. [He takes the skull.] Alas, poor Yorick! I knew him, Horatio, a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy. He hath borne me on his back a thousand times, and now how abhorred in my imagination it is! My gorge rises° at it. Here hung those lips that I have kissed I know not how oft. Where be your gibes now? Your gambols, your songs, your flashes of merriment that were wont° to set the table on a roar? Not one now, to mock your own grinning?° Quite chopfallen?° Now get you to my lady's chamber and tell her, let her paint an inch thick, to this favor° she° must come. Make her laugh at that. Prithee, Horatio, tell me one thing.

HORATIO. What's that, my lord?
HAMLET. Dost thou think Alexander looked o' this fashion i' th' earth?
HORATIO. E'en so.
HAMLET. And smelt so? Pah! [He throws down the skull.]
HORATIO. E'en so, my lord.

HORATIO. 'Twere to consider too curiously° to consider so.
HAMLET. No, faith, not a jot, but to follow him thither with modesty° enough, and likelihood to lead it. As thus: Alexander died, Alexander was buried, Alexander returneth to dust, the dust is earth, of earth we make loam,° and why of that loam whereto he was converted might they not stop a beer barrel?

Imperious° Caesar, dead and turned to clay,°

Might stop a hole to keep the wind away.
O, that that earth which kept the world in awe
Should patch a wall t' expel the winter's flaw!°

Enter KING, QUEEN, LAERTES, and the corpse [of OPHELIA, in procession, with PRIEST, lords, etc.].

But soft,° but soft awhile! Here comes the King, The Queen, the courtiers. Who is this they follow?

And with such maimèd° rites? This doth betoken

The corpse they follow did with desperate hand
Fordo° its own life. 'Twas of some estate.°
Couch we° awhile and mark.

Laertes. What ceremony else? 195

Hamlet [to Horatio]. That is Laertes, a very noble youth. Mark. 199

Laertes. What ceremony else?

Priest. Her obsequies have been as far enlarged 200
As we have warranty.° Her death was doubtful,
And but that great command o'ersways the order°
She should in ground unsanctified been lodged°
Till the last trumpet. For° charitable prayers,
Shards,° flints, and pebbles should be thrown on her.
Yet here she is allowed her virgin crants,°
Her maiden strewments,° and the bringing home
Of bell and burial.°

Laertes. Must there no more be done? 205

Priest. No more be done.
We should profane the service of the dead
To sing a requiem and such rest° to her
As to peace-parted souls.°

Laertes. Lay her i’ th’ earth, 210
And from her fair and unpolluted flesh
May violets° spring! I tell thee, churlish priest,
A ministering angel shall my sister be
When thou liest howling.°

Hamlet [to Horatio]. What, the fair Ophelia! 215

Queen [scattering flowers]. Sweets to the sweet! Farewell.
I hoped thou shouldst have been my Hamlet’s wife.
I thought thy bride-bed to have decked, sweet maid,
And not t’ have strewed thy grave.

Laertes. O, treble woe
Fall ten times treble on that cursed head
Whose wicked deed thy most ingenious sense°
Deprived thee of! Hold off the earth awhile,
Till I have caught her once more in mine arms.

[He leaps into the grave and embraces Ophelia.]

Now pile your dust upon the quick and dead,
Till of this flat a mountain you have made
T’ o’ertop old Pelion or the skyish head
Of blue Olympus.°

HAMLET [coming forward]. What is he whose grief
Bears such an emphasis,° whose phrase of sorrow
Conjures the wandering stars° and makes them stand
Like wonder-wounded° hearers? This is I,
Hamlet the Dane.°

LAERTES [grappling with him°]. The devil take thy soul!

HAMLET. Thou pray'st not well.
I prithee, take thy fingers from my throat,
For though I am not splenitive° and rash,
Yet have I in me something dangerous,
Which let thy wisdom fear. Hold off thy hand.

KING. Pluck them asunder.

QUEEN. Hamlet, Hamlet!

ALL. Gentlemen!

HORATIO. Good my lord, be quiet.

[HAMLET and LAERTES are parted.]

HAMLET. Why, I will fight with him upon this theme Until my eyelids will no longer wag.°

QUEEN. O my son, what theme?

HAMLET. I loved Ophelia. Forty thousand brothers
Could not with all their quantity of love
Make up my sum. What wilt thou do for her?

KING. O, he is mad, Laertes.

QUEEN. For love of God, forbear him.°

HAMLET. 'Swounds,° show me what thou'lt do.
Woo't° weep? Woo't fight? Woo't fast? Woo't tear thyself?
Woo't drink up° eisel?° Eat a crocodile?°
I'll do 't. Dost come here to whine?
To outface me with leaping in her grave?

to many editors the alternative, that Laertes jumps out of the grave to attack Hamlet.

I loved you ever. But it is no matter.

KING. I pray thee, good Horatio, wait upon him.

We’ll put the matter to the present push.°—
Good Gertrude, set some watch over your son.— 270

5.2 Enter Hamlet and Horatio.

HAMLET. So much for this, sir; now shall you see the other.°
You do remember all the circumstance?

HORATIO. Remember it, my lord!

HAMLET. Sir, in my heart there was a kind of fighting
That would not let me sleep. Methought I lay 5
Worse than the mutines° in the bilboes° Rashly,°
And praised be rashness for it—let us know°

HAMLET. Up from my cabin,
    My sea-gown° scarfed° about me, in the dark
Groped I to find out them,° had my desire,
Fingered° their packet, and in fine° withdrew 15
To mine own room again, making so bold,
My fears forgetting manners, to unseal
Their grand commission; where I found, Horatio—
Ah, royal knavery!—an exact command,
Larded° with many several° sorts of reasons 20
Importing° Denmark’s health and England’s too,
With, ho! such bugs° and goblins in my life,°
That on the supervise,° no leisure bated,°
No, not to stay° the grinding of the ax,
My head should be struck off.

HORATIO. Is’t possible? 25

HAMLET. Here’s the commission. Read it at more leisure.
But wilt thou hear now how I did proceed?

HORATIO. I beseech you.

HAMLET. Being thus benetted round with villainies—
Ere I could make a prologue to my brains, 30
They had begun the play°—I sat me down,
Devised a new commission, wrote it fair.°
I once did hold it, as our statist° do,°
A baseness° to write fair, and labored much
How to forget that learning; but, sir, now 35
It did me yeoman’s° service. Wilt thou know
Th’ effect° of what I wrote?

HORATIO. Ay, good my lord.

HAMLET. An earnest conjuration° from the King,
As England was his faithful tributary,
As love between them like the palm° might flourish, 40
As peace should still° her wheaten garland° wear
And stand a comma° ’tween their amities,
And many suchlike° “as”es° of great charge,°
That on the view and knowing of these contents,
Without debatement further more or less,
He should those bearers put to sudden death,
Not shriving time allowed.

HORATIO. How was this sealed?

HAMLET. Why, even in that was heaven ordinant.°
I had my father's signet° in my purse.
Which was the model° of that Danish seal;
Folded the writ° up in the form of th' other,
Subscribed° it, gave 't th' impression,° placed it safely,

Was our sea fight, and what to this was sequent°

HORATIO. So Guildenstern and Rosencrantz go to 't.

HAMLET. Why, man, they did make love to this employment.
They are not near my conscience. Their defeat°
Does by their own insinuation° grow.
'Tis dangerous when the baser° nature comes
Between the pass° and fell° incensèd points
Of mightly opposites.°

HORATIO. Why, what a king is this!

HAMLET. Does it not, think thee, stand me now upon°—
He that hath killed my king and whored my mother,
Popped in between th' election° and my hopes,
Thrown out his angle° for my proper° life,
And with such cozenage°—is 't not perfect conscience
To quit° him with this arm? And is 't not to be damned
To let this canker° of our nature come
In° further evil?

HORATIO. It must be shortly known to him from England
What is the issue of the business there.

HAMLET. It will be short. The interim is mine,
And a man's life's no more than to say "one."°
But I am very sorry, good Horatio,
That to Laertes I forgot myself,
For by the image of my cause I see
The portraiture of his. I'll court his favors.
But, sure, the bravery° of his grief did put me
Into a tow'ring passion.

Enter a Courtier [OSRIC].

HAMLET. I humbly thank you, sir. [To HORATIO.] Dost know this water fly?

OSRIC. Your lordship is right welcome back to Denmark.

HAMLET. Thy state is the more gracious, for 'tis a vice to know him. He hath much land, and fertile. Let a beast be lord of beasts, and his crib shall stand at the King's mess. 'Tis a chuff, but, as I say, spacious in the possession of dirt.

OSRIC. Sweet lord, if your lordship were at leisure, I should impart a thing to you from His Majesty.

HAMLET. I will receive it, sir, with all diligence of spirit.

OSRIC. I thank your lordship, it is very hot.

HAMLET. No, believe me, 'tis very cold. The wind is northerly.

OSRIC. It is indifferent cold, my lord, indeed.

HAMLET. But yet methinks it is very sultry and hot for my complexion.

OSRIC. Exceedingly, my lord, indeed.

HAMLET. But, in the verity of extolment, I take him to be a soul of great

[HAMLET moves him to put on his hat.]

OSRIC. Nay, good my lord; for my case, in good faith. Sir, here is newly come to court Laertes—believe me, an absolute gentleman, full of most excellent differences, of very soft society and great showing. Indeed, to speak feelingly of him, he is the card or calendar of gentry, for you shall find in him the continent of what part a gentleman would see.

HAMLET. Sir, his definition suffers no perdition in you, though I know to divide him inventorially would dozy th' arithmetic of memory, and yet but yaw neither in respect of his quick sail. But, in the verity of extolment, I take him to be a soul of great HORATIO. Is 't not possible to understand in another tongue?° You will do 't,° sir, really.

HAMLET. What imports the nomination° of this gentleman?

OSRIC. Of Laertes?

HORATIO [to HAMLET]. His purse is empty already; all 's golden words are spent.

HAMLET. Of him, sir.

OSRIC. I know you are not ignorant—

HAMLET. I would you did, sir. Yet in faith if you did, it would not much approve° me. Well, sir?

OSRIC. You are not ignorant of what excellence Laertes is—

HAMLET. I dare not confess that, lest I should compare with him in excellence. But to know a man well were to know himself.°

OSRIC. I mean, sir, for° his weapon; but in the imputation laid on him by them,° in his meed° he's unfellowed.°

HAMLET. What's his weapon?

OSRIC. Rapier and dagger.

HAMLET. That's two of his weapons—but well.°

HAMLET. What call you the carriages?

HORATIO. [to HAMLET]. I knew you must be edified by the margin° ere you had done.

OSRIC. The carriages, sir, are the hangers.

HAMLET. The phrase would be more germane to the matter if we could carry a cannon by our sides; I would it might be hangers till then. But, on: six Barbary horses against six French swords, their assigns, and three liberal-conceited carriages; that’s the French bet against the Danish. Why is this impawned, as you call it?

OSRIC. The King, sir, hath laid,° sir, that in a dozen passes° between yourself and him, he shall not exceed you three hits. He hath laid on twelve for nine, and it would come to immediate trial, if your lordship would vouchsafe the answer.°

HAMLET. How if I answer no?

OSRIC. I mean, my lord, the opposition of your person in trial.

HAMLET. Sir, I will walk here in the hall. If it please His Majesty, it is the breathing time° of day with me. Let° the foils be brought, the gentleman willing, and the King hold his purpose. I will win for him an I can; if not, I will gain nothing but my shame and the odd hits.

OSRIC. Shall I deliver you° so?

HAMLET. To this effect, sir—after what flourish your nature will.

OSRIC. I commend° my duty to your lordship.

HAMLET. Yours, yours. [Exit OSRIC.] 'A does well to commend it himself; there are no tongues else for 's turn.°

HORATIO. This lapwing° runs away with the shell on his head.

HAMLET. 'A did comply with his dug° before a’ sucked it. LORD. My lord. His Majesty commended him to you by young Osric, who brings back to him that you attend him in the hall. He sends to know if your pleasure hold to play with Laertes, or that you will take longer time.

HAMLET. I am constant to my purposes; they follow the King’s pleasure. If his fitness speaks, mine is ready; now or whensoever, provided I be so able as now.

LORD. The King and Queen and all are coming down.

HAMLET. In happy time.°

LORD. The Queen desires you to use some gentle entertainment° to Laertes before you fall to play.

HAMLET. She well instructs me. [Exit lord.]

HORATIO. You will lose, my lord.

HAMLET. I do not think so. Since he went into France, I have been in continual practice; I shall win at the odds. But thou wouldst not think how ill all’s here about my heart; but it is no matter.

HORATIO. Nay, good my lord—

HAMLET. It is but foolery, but it is such a kind of gaingiving° as would perhaps trouble a woman.

HORATIO. If your mind dislike anything, obey it. I will forestall their repair° hither and say you are not fit.

HAMLET. Not a whit, we defy augury. There is special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, ’tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come. The readiness is all. Since no man of aught he leaves knows, what is ’t to leave betimes? Let be.°

A table prepared. [Enter] trumpets, drums, and officers with cushions; king, queen, [osric,] and all the state; foils, daggers, [and wine borne in;] and laertes.

KING. Come, Hamlet, come and take this hand from me.

[The king puts laertes’ band into hamlet’s.]

HAMLET [to laertes]. Give me your pardon, sir. I have done you wrong, But pardon ’t as you are a gentleman. This presence° knows, And you must needs have heard, how I am punished° With a sore distraction. And you, the judges, bear a wary eye.

HAMLET. Come on, sir.

LAERTES. Come, my lord. [They play. HAMLET scores a hit.]

HAMLET. Judgment.

OSRIC. A hit, a very palpable hit.

LAERTES. Well, again.

KING. Stay, give me drink. Hamlet, this pearl is thine.

[He drinks, and throws a pearl in HAMLET’s cup.]

Here’s to thy health. Give him the cup.

HAMLET. I’ll play this bout first. Set it by awhile. Come. [They play.] Another hit; what say you?

LAERTES. A touch, a touch, I do confess ‘t.

KING. Our son shall win.

QUEEN. He’s fat° and scant of breath.

Here, Hamlet, take my napkin,° rub thy brows.

The Queen carouses° to thy fortune, Hamlet.

HAMLET. Good, madam!

KING. Gertrude, do not drink.

QUEEN. I will, my lord, I pray you pardon me. [She drinks.]

KING [aside]. It is the poisoned cup. It is too late.

HAMLET. I dare not drink yet, madam; by and by.

QUEEN. Come, let me wipe thy face.

LAERTES [to KING]. My lord, I’ll hit him now.

KING. I do not think ‘t.

LAERTES [aside]. And yet it is almost against my conscience.

HAMLET. Come, for the third, Laertes. You do but dally.

I pray you, pass° with your best violence;

I am afeard you make a wanton of me.°

LAERTES. Say you so? Come on. [They play.]

OSRIC. Nothing neither way.

LAERTES. Have at you now!

[LAERTES wounds HAMLET; then, in scuffling, they change rapiers;° and HAMLET wounds LAERTES.]

KING. Part them! They are incensed.

HAMLET. Nay, come, again. [The QUEEN falls.]

OSRIC. Look to the Queen there, ho!

HORATIO. They bleed on both sides. How is it, my lord?

OSRIC. How is ’t, Laertes?

LAERTES. Why, as a woodcock° to mine own springe,° Osric; I am justly killed with mine own treachery.

HAMLET. How does the Queen?

KING. She swoons to see them bleed.

QUEEN. No, no, the drink, the drink—O my dear Hamlet—The drink, the drink! I am poisoned. [She dies.]

HAMLET. O villainy! Ho, let the door be locked! Treachery! Seek it out.

[LAERTES falls. Exit OSRIC.]

LAERTES. It is here, Hamlet. Hamlet, thou art slain.

No med’cine in the world can do thee good;
In thee there is not half an hour’s life.
The treacherous instrument is in thy hand,
Unbated° and envenomed. The foul practice° Hath turned itself on me. Lo, here I lie, Never to rise again. Thy mother’s poisoned.
I can no more. The King, the King’s to blame.

HAMLET. The point envenomed too? Then, venom, to thy work.

[He stabs the KING.]

ALL. Treason! Treason!

KING. O, yet defend me, friends! I am but hurt.

HAMLET [forcing the KING to drink].
Here, thou incestuous, murderous, damnèd Dane,
Drink off this potion. Is thy union° here?
Follow my mother. [The KING dies.]

LAERTES. He is justly served.

It is a poison tempered° by himself.
Exchange forgiveness with me, noble Hamlet.
Mine and my father’s death come not upon thee,
Nor thine on me! [He dies.]

HAMLET. Heaven make thee free of it! I follow thee.

I am dead, Horatio. Wretched Queen, adieu!
You that look pale and tremble at this chance,°
That are but mutes\(^4\) or audience to this act,
Had I but time—as this fell\(^5\) sergeant,\(^6\) Death,
Is strict\(^7\) in his arrest\(^8\)—O, I could tell you—
But let it be. Horatio, I am dead;\(^{315}\)
Thou livest. Report me and my cause aright
To the unsatisfied.

HORATIO. Never believe it.
I am more an antique Roman\(^9\) than a Dane.

[He attempts to drink from the poisoned cup. HAMLET prevents him.]

HAMLET. As thou’rt a man,
Give me the cup! Let go! By heaven, I’ll ha ‘t.\(^{320}\)
O God, Horatio, what a wounded name,
Things standing thus unknown, shall I leave behind me!
If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,
Absent thee from felicity awhile,
And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain\(^{325}\)
To tell my story.
A march afar off [and a volley within].
What warlike noise is this?

Enter OSRIC.

OSRIC. Young Fortinbras, with conquest come from Poland,
To th’ ambassadors of England gives
This warlike volley.

HAMLET. O, I die, Horatio!
The potent poison quite o’ercrows\(^{5}\) my spirit.
I cannot live to hear the news from England,
But I do prophesy th’ election lights
On Fortinbras. He has my dying voice.\(^6\)

HORATIO. Now cracks a noble heart. Good night, sweet prince,

Act 1

1. The first scene (like many other scenes in this play) is full of expressions of uncertainty. What are some of these uncertainties? The Ghost first appears at 1.1.42. Does his appearance surprise us, or have we been prepared for it? Or is there both preparation and surprise? Do the last four speeches of 1.1 help to introduce a note of hope? If so, how?

2. Does the King’s opening speech in 1.2 reveal him to be an accomplished public speaker—or are lines 10–14 offensive? In his second speech (lines 41–49), what is the effect of naming Laertes four times? Claudius sometimes uses the royal pronouns (“we,” “our”), sometimes the more intimate “I” and “my.” Study his use of these in lines 1–4 and in 106–117. What do you think he is getting at?

3. Hamlet’s first soliloquy (1.2.129–159) reveals that more than just his father’s death distresses him. Be as specific as possible about the causes of Hamlet’s anguish here. What traits does Hamlet reveal in his conversation with Horatio (1.2.160–258)?

4. What do you make of Polonius’s advice to Laertes (1.3.55–81)? Is it sound? Sound advice, but here uttered by a fool? Ignoble advice? How would one follow the advice of line 78: “to thine own self be true”? In his words to Ophelia in 1.3.102–136, what does he reveal about himself?

5. Can 1.4.17–38 reasonably be taken as a speech on the “tragic flaw”? (On this idea, see page 1015.) Or is the passage a much more limited discussion, a comment simply on Danish drinking habits?

6. Hamlet is convinced in 1.5.93–104 that the Ghost has told the truth, indeed, the only important truth. But do we detect in 105–112 a hint of a tone suggesting that Hamlet delights in hating villainy? If so, can it be said that later this delight grows, and that in some scenes (e.g., 3.3) we feel that Hamlet has almost become a diabolic revenger? Explain.
Act 2

1. Characterize Polonius on the basis of 2.1.1–76.
2. In light of what we have seen of Hamlet, is Ophelia’s report of his strange behavior when he visits her understandable?
3. Why does 2.2.33–34 seem almost comic? How do these lines help us to form a view about Rosencrantz and Guildenstern?
4. Is “the hellish Pyrrhus” (2.2.422) Hamlet’s version of Claudius? Or is he Hamlet, who soon will be responsible for the deaths of Polonius, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, Claudius, Gertrude, Ophelia, and Laertes? Explain.
5. Is the First Player’s speech (2.2.427ff) an inflated speech? If so, why? To distinguish it from the poetry of the play itself? To characterize the bloody deeds that Hamlet cannot descend to?
6. In 2.2.504–542 Hamlet rebukes himself for not acting. Why has he not acted? Because he is a coward (line 531)? Because he has a conscience? Because no action can restore his father and his mother’s purity? Because he doubts the Ghost? What reason(s) can you offer?

Act 3

1. What do you make of Hamlet’s assertion to Ophelia: “I loved you not” (3.1.118)? Of his characterization of himself as full of “offenses” (3.1.121–127)? Why is Hamlet so harsh to Ophelia?
2. In 3.3.36–72 Claudius’s conscience afflicts him. But is he repentant? What makes you say so?
3. Is Hamlet other than abhorrent in 3.3.73–96? Do we want him to kill Claudius at this moment, when Claudius (presumably with his back to Hamlet) is praying? Why?
5. How would you characterize the Hamlet who speaks in 3.4.209–224?

Act 4

1. Is Gertrude protecting Hamlet when she says he is mad (4.1.7), or does she believe that he is mad? If she believes he is mad, does it follow that she no longer feels ashamed and guilty? Explain.
2. Why should Hamlet hide Polonius’s body (in 4.2)? Is he feigning madness? Is he on the edge of madness? Explain.
3. How can we explain Hamlet’s willingness to go to England (4.3.52)?

Act 5

1. Would anything be lost if the gravediggers in 5.1 were omitted?
2. To what extent do we judge Hamlet severely for sending Rosencrantz and Guildenstern to their deaths, as he reports in 5.2? On the whole, do we think of Hamlet as an intriguer? What other intrigues has he engendered? How successful were they?
3. Does 5.2.193–197 show a paralysis of the will, or a wise recognition that more is needed than mere human scheming? Explain.

4. Does 5.2.280 suggest that Laertes takes advantage of a momentary pause and unfairly stabs Hamlet? Is the exchange of weapons accidental, or does Hamlet (as in Olivier’s film version), realizing that he has been betrayed, deliberately get possession of Laertes’s deadly weapon?

5. Fortinbras is often cut from the play. How much is lost by the cut? Explain.

6. Fortinbras gives Hamlet a soldier’s funeral. Is this ridiculous? Can it fairly be said that, in a sense, Hamlet has been at war? Explain.

General Questions

1. Hamlet in 5.2.10–11 speaks of a “divinity that shapes our ends.” To what extent does “divinity” (or Fate or mysterious Chance) play a role in the happenings?

2. How do Laertes, Fortinbras, and Horatio help to define Hamlet for us?

Though etymology is not always helpful (after all, is it really illuminating to say that tragedy may come from a Greek word meaning “goat song”?), the etymology of comedy helps to reveal comedy’s fundamental nature. Comedy (Greek: komoidia) is a revel-song; ancient Greek comedies are descended from fertility rituals that dramatized the joy of renewal, the joy of triumphing over obstacles, the joy of being (in a sense) reborn. Whereas the movement of tragedy, speaking roughly, is from prosperity to disaster, the movement of comedy is from some sort of minor disaster to prosperity.

To say, however, that comedy dramatizes the triumph over obstacles is to describe it as though it were melodrama, a play in which, after hairbreadth adventures, good prevails over evil, often in the form of the hero’s unlikely last-minute rescue of the fair Belinda from the clutches of the villain. What distinguishes comedy from melodrama is the pervasive high spirits of comedy. The joyous ending in comedy—usually a marriage—is in the spirit of what has gone before; the entire play, not only the end, is a celebration of fecundity.

The threats in the world of comedy are not taken very seriously; the parental tyranny that makes Romeo and Juliet and Antigone tragedies is, in comedy, laughable throughout. Parents may fret, fume, and lock doors, but in doing so they make themselves ridiculous, for love will find a way. Villains may threaten, but the audience never takes the threats seriously.

The marriage and renewal of society, so usual at the end of comedy, may be most improbable, but they do not therefore weaken the comedy. The stuff of comedy is, in part, improbability. In A Midsummer Night’s Dream, Puck speaks for the spectator when he says:

> And those things do best please me
> That befall preposterously.

In tragedy, probability is important; in comedy, improbability is often desirable, for at least three reasons. First, comedy seeks to include as much as possible, to reveal the rich abundance of life. The motto of comedy (and the implication in the weddings with which it usually concludes) is, “The more the merrier.” Second, the improbable is the surprising; surprise often evokes laughter, and laughter surely has a central place in comedy. Third, by getting the characters into improbable situations, the dramatist can show off the absurdity of their behavior. This point needs amplification.
Comedy often shows the absurdity of ideals. The miser, the puritan, the health faddist, and so on, are people of ideals, but their ideals are suffocating. The miser, for example, treats everything in terms of money; the miser’s ideal causes him or her to renounce much of the abundance and joy of life. He or she is in love, but is unwilling to support a spouse; or he or she has a headache, but will not be so extravagant as to take an aspirin tablet. If a thief accosts the miser with “Your money or your life,” the miser will prefer to give up life—and that is what in fact the miser has been doing all the while. Now, by putting this miser in a series of improbable situations, the dramatist can continue to demonstrate entertainingly the miser’s absurdity.*

The comic protagonist’s tenacious hold on his or her ideals is not very far from that of the tragic protagonist. In general, however, tragedy suggests the nobility of ideals; the tragic hero’s ideals undo him or her, and they may be ideals about which we have serious reservations, but still we admire the nobility of these ideals. Romeo and Juliet will not put off their love for each other; Antigone will not yield to Creon, and Creon holds almost impossibly long to his stern position. But the comic protagonist who is always trying to keep his or her hands clean is funny; we laugh at this refusal to touch dirt with the rest of us, this refusal to enjoy the abundance life has to offer. The comic protagonist who is always talking about his or her beloved is funny; we laugh at the failure to see that the world is filled with people more attractive than the one with whom he or she is obsessed.

In short, the ideals for which the tragic protagonist loses the world seem important to us and gain, in large measure, our sympathy, but the ideals for which the comic protagonist loses the world seem trivial compared with the rich variety that life has to offer, and we laugh at their absurdity. The tragic figure makes a claim on our sympathy. The absurd comic figure continually sets up obstacles to our sympathetic interest; we feel detached from, superior to, and amused by comic figures. Something along these lines is behind William Butler Yeats’s insistence that character is always present in comedy but not in tragedy. Though Yeats is eccentric in his notion that individual character is obliterated in tragedy, he interestingly gets at one of the important elements in comedy:

When the tragic reverie is at its height . . . [we do not say,] “How well that man is realized. I should know him were I to meet him in the street,” for it is always ourselves that we see upon the [tragic] stage. . . . Tragedy must always be a drowning and breaking of the dikes that separate man from man, and . . . it is upon these dikes comedy keeps house.

*A character who is dominated by a single trait—avarice, jealousy, timidity, and so forth—is sometimes called a humor character. Medieval and Renaissance psychology held that an individual’s personality depended on the mixture of four liquids (humors): blood (Latin: sanguis), choler, phlegm, and bile. An overabundance of one fluid produced a dominant trait, and even today “sanguine,” “choleric,” “phlegmatic,” and “bilious” describe personalities.

Not all comedy, of course, depends on humor characters placed in situations that exhibit their absurdity. High comedy is largely verbal, depending on witty language; farce, at the other extreme, is dependent on inherently ludicrous situations—for example, a hobo is mistaken for a millionaire. Situation comedy, then, may use humor characters, but it need not do so.
Most comic plays can roughly be sorted into one of two types: romantic comedy and satiric comedy. Romantic comedy presents an ideal world, a golden world, a world more delightful than our own; if there are difficulties in it, they are not briers but (to quote from Shakespeare’s As You Like It) “burs. . . . thrown. . . . in holiday foolery.” It is the world of most of Shakespeare’s comedies, a world of Illyria, of the Forest of Arden, of Belmont, of the moonlit Athens in A Midsummer Night’s Dream. The chief figures are lovers; the course of their love is not smooth, but the outcome is never in doubt and the course is the more fun for being bumpy. Occasionally in this golden world there is a villain, but if so, the villain is a great bungler who never really does any harm; the world seems to be guided by a benevolent providence who prevents villains from seriously harming even themselves. In these plays, the world belongs to golden lads and lasses. When we laugh, we laugh not so much at them as with them.

If romantic comedy shows us a world with people more attractive than we find in our own, satiric comedy shows us a world with people less attractive. The satiric world seems dominated by morally inferior people—the decrepit wooer, the jealous spouse, the demanding parent. These unengaging figures go through their paces, revealing again and again their absurdity. The audience laughs at (rather than with) such figures, and writers justify this kind of comedy by claiming to reform society: antisocial members of the audience will see their grotesque images on the stage and will reform themselves when they leave the theater. But it is hard to believe that this theory is rooted in fact. Jonathan Swift was probably right when he said, “Satire is a sort of glass wherein beholders do generally discover everybody’s face but their own.”

Near the conclusion of a satiric comedy, the obstructing characters are dismissed, often perfunctorily, allowing for a happy ending—commonly the marriage of figures less colorful than the obstructionist(s). And so all-encompassing are the festivities at the end that even obstructionists are invited to join in the wedding feast. If they refuse to join, we may find them—yet again—laughable rather than sympathetic, though admittedly one may also feel lingering regret that this somewhat shabby world of ours cannot live up to the exalted (even if rigid and rather crazy) standards of the outsider who refuses to go along with the way of the world.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

William Shakespeare (1564–1616) was born in Stratford, England, of middle-class parents. Nothing of interest is known about his early years, but by 1590 he was acting and writing plays in London. By the end of the following decade he had worked in all three Elizabethan dramatic genres—tragedy, comedy, and history. Romeo and Juliet, for example, was written about 1595, the year of Richard II, and in the following year he wrote A Midsummer Night’s Dream. Julius Caesar (1599) probably preceded As You Like It by one year, and Hamlet probably followed As You Like It by less than a year. Among the plays that followed King Lear (1605–1606) were Macbeth (1605–1606) and several “romances”—plays (including The Tempest) that have happy endings but that seem more meditative and closer to tragedy than such comedies as A Midsummer Night’s Dream, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night.

1.1 Enter THESEUS, HIPPOLYTA, [and PHILOSTRATE,] with others.

THESEUS. Now, fair Hippolyta, our nuptial hour Draws on apace. Four happy days bring in Another moon; but, O, methinks, how slow
This old moon wanes! She lingers° my desires,
Like to a stepdame° or a dowager°
Long withering out° a young man’s revenue.

°°A Midsummer Night’s Dream was first published in 1600 in a small book of a type called a quarto. A second quarto edition, printed in 1616 but based on the 1600 text, introduces a few corrections, but it also introduces many errors. The 1619 text in turn was the basis for the text in the first collected edition of Shakespeare’s plays, the First Folio (1623). Bevington’s edition is of course based on the text of 1600, but it includes a few corrections, and it modifies the punctuation in accordance with modern usage. Material added by the editor, such as amplifications in the dramatis personae, is enclosed within square brackets [ ].

HIPPOLYTA. Four days will quickly steep themselves in night,
Four nights will quickly dream away the time;
And then the moon, like to a silver bow
New bent in heaven, shall behold the night
Of our solemnities.

THESEUS. Go, Philostrate,
Stir up the Athenian youth to merriments,
Awake the pert and nimble spirit of mirth,
Turn melancholy forth to funerals;
The pale companion\(^\) is not for our pomp.\(^\) [Exit Philostrate.]

Hippolyta, I wooed thee with my sword\(^*\)
And won thy love doing thee injuries;
But I will wed thee in another key,
With pomp, with triumph,\(^*\) and with reveling.

Enter EGEUS and his daughter HERMIA, and LYSANDE, and DEMETRIUS.

EGEUS. Happy be Theseus, our renowned duke!

THESEUS. Thanks, good Egeus. What's the news with thee?

EGEUS. Full of vexation come I, with complaint Against my child, my daughter Hermia.
Stand forth, Demetrius. My noble lord,
This man hath my consent to marry her.
Stand forth, Lysander. And, my gracious Duke,
This man hath bewitched the bosom of my child.
Thou, thou, Lysander, thou hast given her rhymes
And interchanged love tokens with my child.
Thou hast by moonlight at her window sung
With feigning voice verses of feigning\(^*\) love,
And stol'n the impression of her fantasy\(^*\)
With bracelets of thy hair, rings, gauds,\(^\) conceits,\(^\)

To stubborn harshness. And, my gracious Duke,
Be it so\(^*\) she will not here before Your Grace

Act 1, Scene 1
A Midsummer Night's Dream

THESEUS. What say you, Hermia? Be advised, fair maid.
To you your father should be as a god—
One that composed your beauties, yea, and one
To whom you are but as a form in wax
By him imprinted, and within his power
To leave the figure or disfigure it.
Demetrius is a worthy gentleman.

HERMIA. So is Lysander.

THESEUS. In himself he is;
But in this kind, wanting your father's voice,
The other must be held the worthier.

HERMIA. I would my father looked but with my eyes.

THESEUS. Rather your eyes must with his judgment look.

HERMIA. I do entreat Your Grace to pardon me.
I know not by what power I am made bold,
Nor how it may concern my modesty
In such a presence here to plead my thoughts;
But I beseech Your Grace that I may know
The worst that may befall me in this case
If I refuse to wed Demetrius.

THESEUS. Either to die the death or to abjure
Forever the society of men.
Therefore, fair Hermia, question your desires,
Know of your youth, examine well your blood,
Whether, if you yield not to your father's choice,
You can endure the livery of a nun,
For aye to be in shady cloister mewed,
To live a barren sister all your life,
Chanting faint hymns to the cold fruitless moon.
Thrice blessèd they that master so their blood
To undergo such maiden pilgrimage;
But earthlier happy is the rose distilled
Than that which, withering on the virgin thorn,
Grows, lives, and dies in single blessedness.

HERMIA. So will I grow, so live, so die, my lord,
Ere I will yield my virgin patent up
Unto his lordship, whose unwishèd yoke
My soul consents not to give sovereignty.

THESEUS. Take time to pause, and by the next new moon—
The sealing day betwixt my love and me
For everlasting bond of fellowship—
Upon that day either prepare to die
For disobedience to your father's will,
Or else to wed Demetrius, as he would,
Or on Diana's altar to protest
For aye austerity and single life.

DEMETRIUS. Relent, sweet Hermia, and, Lysander, yield
Thy crazèd° title to my certain right.

LYSANDER. You have her father’s love, Demetrius;
Let me have Hermia’s. Do you marry him.

EGEUS. Scornful Lysander! True, he hath my love,
And what is mine my love shall render him.
And she is mine, and all my right of her
I do estate unto° Demetrius.

LYSANDER. I am, my lord, as well derived° as he,
As well possessed;° my love is more than his;
My fortunes every way as fairly° ranked,
If not with vantage,° as Demetrius’;
And, which is more than all these boasts can be,
I am beloved of beauteous Hermia.
Why should not I then prosecute my right?
Demetrius, I’ll avouch it to his head,°
Made love to Nedar’s daughter, Helena
And won her soul; and she, sweet lady, dotes,
Devoutly dotes, dotes in idolatry,
Upon this spotted° and inconstant man.

THESEUS. I must confess that I have heard so much,
And with Demetrius thought to have spoke thereof;
But, being overfull of self-affairs,°
My mind did lose it. But, Demetrius, come,
And come, Egeus, you shall go with me;
I have some private schooling° for you both.
For you, fair Hermia, look you arm° yourself
To fit your fancies° to your father’s will;
Or else the law of Athens yields you up—
Which by no means we may extenuate°—
To death or to a vow of single life.
Come, my Hippolyta. What cheer, my love?
Demetrius and Egeus, go° along.
I must employ you in some business
Against° our nuptial and confer with you
Of something nearly that° concerns yourselves.

EGEUS. With duty and desire we follow you.

\[Exeunt [all but LYSANDER and HERMIA].\]

LYSANDER. How now, my love, why is your cheek so pale?
How chance the roses there do fade so fast?

HERMIA. Belike° for want of rain, which I could well
Beteem° them from the tempest of my eyes.

Lysander. Ay me! For aught that I could ever read,
Could ever hear by tale or history,
The course of true love never did run smooth
But either it was different in blood—

Hermia. O cross!° Too high to be enthralled to low.

Lysander. Or else misgrafted° in respect of years—
Hermia. O spite!° Too old to be engaged to young.

Lysander. Or else it stood upon the choice of friends°—
Hermia. O hell, to choose love by another’s eyes!

Lysander. Or if there were a sympathy° in choice,
War, death, or sickness did lay siege to it,
Making it momentary° as a sound,
Swift as a shadow, short as any dream,
That in a spleen° unfolds both heaven and earth,
And ere a man hath power to say “Behold!”°
The jaws of darkness do devour it up.
So quick° bright things come to confusion.°

Hermia. If then true lovers have been ever crossed,°
It stands as an edict in destiny.
Then let us teach our trial patience,°
Because it is a customary cross,
As due to love as thoughts and dreams and sighs,
Wishes and tears, poor fancy’s° followers.°

Lysander. A good persuasion.° Therefore, hear me, Hermia:
I have a widow aunt, a dowager
Of great revenue, and she hath no child.
From Athens is her house remote seven leagues;
And she respects° me as her only son.°

There, gentle Hermia, may I marry thee,
And to that place the sharp Athenian law
Cannot pursue us. If thou lovest me, then,
Steal forth thy father’s house tomorrow night;
And in the wood, a league without the town,°
Where I did meet thee once with Helena
To do observance to a morn of May‚°
There will I stay for thee.

Chapter 27 / Comedy
Act 1, Scene 1

By the simplicity° of Venus' doves,°
By that which knitteth souls and prospers loves,
And by that fire which burned the Carthage queen°
When the false Trojan° under sail was seen,
By all the vows that ever men have broke,
In number more than ever women spoke,
In that same place thou hast appointed me
Tomorrow truly will I meet with thee.

Lysander. Keep promise, love. Look, here comes Helena.

Enter Helena.

Hermia. God speed, fair° Helena! Whither away?

Helena. Call you me fair? That “fair” again unsay.
Demetrius loves your fair.° O happy fair!°
Your eyes are lodestars,° and your tongue’s sweet air°
More tunable° than lark to shepherd’s car
When wheat is green, when hawthorn buds appear.
Sickness is catching. O, were favor° so!
Yours would I catch, fair Hermia, ere I go;
My ear should catch your voice, my eye your eye,
My tongue should catch your tongue’s sweet melody.
Were the world mine, Demetrius being bated,°
The rest I’d give to be to you translated.°
O, teach me how you look and with what art
You sway the motion° of Demetrius’ heart.

Hermia. I frown upon him, yet he loves me still.

Helena. O, that your frowns would teach my smiles such skill!

Hermia. I give him curses, yet he gives me love.

Helena. O, that my prayers could such affection° move!°

Hermia. The more I hate, the more he follows me.

Helena. The more I love, the more he hateth me.

Hermia. His folly, Helena, is no fault of mine.

Helena. None but your beauty. Would that fault were mine!

Hermia. Take comfort. He no more shall see my face.
Lysander and myself will fly this place.
Before the time I did Lysander see
Seemed Athens as a paradise to me.
O, then, what graces in my love do dwell
That he hath turned a heaven unto a hell!

Lysander. Helen, to you our minds we will unfold.

Tomorrow night, when Phoebe° doth behold

Act 1, Scene 1

A Midsummer Night’s Dream

Her silver visage in the watery glass,
Decking with liquid pearl the bladed grass,
A time that lovers’ flights doth still conceal,
Through Athens’ gates have we devised to steal.

Hermia. And in the wood, where often you and I
Upon faint primrose beds were wont to lie,
Emptying our bosoms of their counsel sweet,
There my Lysander and myself shall meet;
And thence from Athens turn away our eyes,
To seek new friends and stranger companies.
Farewell, sweet playfellow. Pray thou for us,
And good luck grant thee thy Demetrius!
Keep word, Lysander. We must starve our sight
From lovers’ food till morrow deep midnight.

Lysander. I will, my Hermia.

Exit Hermia.

Helena, adieu. As you on him, Demetrius dote on you!

Exit Lysander.

Helena. How happy some o’er other some can be!
Through Athens I am thought as fair as she.
But what of that? Demetrius thinks not so;
He will not know what all but he do know.
And as he errs, doting on Hermia’s eyes,
So I, admiring of his qualities.
Things base and vile, holding no quantity,
Love can transpose to form and dignity.
Love looks not with the eyes, but with the mind,
And therefore is winged Cupid painted blind.

Nor hath Love’s mind of any judgment taste;
Wings, and no eyes, figure unheedly haste.
And therefore is Love said to be a child,
Because in choice he is so oft beguiled.
As waggish boys in game themselves forswear,
So the boy Love is perjured everywhere.
For ere Demetrius looked on Hermia’s eyne,
He hailed down oaths that he was only mine;
And when this hail some heat from Hermia felt,
So he dissolved, and showers of oaths did melt.
I will go tell him of fair Hermia’s flight.
Then to the wood will he tomorrow night
Pursue her; and for this intelligence
If I have thanks, it is a dear expense.
But herein mean I to enrich my pain,
To have his sight thither and back again.

Exit.
Enter Quince the carpenter, and Snug the joiner, and Bottom the weaver, and Flute the bellows mender, and Snout the tinker, and Starveling the tailor.

Quince. Is all our company here?

Bottom. You were best to call them generally,° man by man, according to the scrip.°

Quince. Here is the scroll of every man’s name which is thought fit, through all Athens, to play in our interlude before the Duke and the Duchess on his wedding day at night.

Bottom. First, good Peter Quince, say what the play treats on, then read the names of the actors, and so grow to° a point.

Quince. Marry,° our play is “The most lamentable comedy and most cruel death of Pyramus and Thisbe.”

Bottom. A very good piece of work, I assure you, and a merry. Now, good Peter Quince, call forth your actors by the scroll. Masters, spread yourselves.

Quince. Answer as I call you. Nick Bottom,° the weaver.

Bottom. Ready. Name what part I am for, and proceed.° 15

Quince. You, Nick Bottom, are set down for Pyramus.

Bottom. What is Pyramus? A lover or a tyrant?

Quince. A lover, that kills himself most gallant for love.

Bottom. That will ask some tears in the true performing of it. If I do it, let the audience look to their eyes. I will move storms; I will condole° in some measure. To the rest—yet my chief humor° is for a tyrant. I could play Ercles° rarely, or a part to tear a cat° in, to make all split.° 20–21

“The raging rocks
And shivering shocks
Shall break the locks
Of prison gates:
And Phibbus’ car°
Shall shine from far
And make and mar
The foolish Fates.”

This was lofty! Now name the rest of the players. This is Ercles’ vein, a tyrant’s vein. A lover is more condoling.

Quince. Francis Flute, the bellows mender.

Flute. Here, Peter Quince.

Quince. Flute, you must take Thisbe on you.

Flute. What is Thisbe? A wandering knight?

Quince. It is the lady that Pyramus must love.

Flute. Nay, faith, let not me play a woman. I have a beard coming.

(The tradition of ranting came from Seneca’s Hercules Furens.) 22–23 make all split i.e., cause a stir, bring the house down. 28 Phibbus’ car Phoebus’s (the sun god) chariot.
Act 1, Scene 2

QUINCE. That's all one.° You shall play it in a mask, and you may speak as small° as you will.

BOTTOM. An° I may hide my face, let me play Thisbe too. I'll speak in a monstrous little voice, "Thisne, Thisne!" "Ah Pyramus, my lover dear! Thy Thisbe dear, and lady dear!"

QUINCE. No, no, you must play Pyramus, and, Flute, you Thisbe.

BOTTOM. Well, proceed.

QUINCE. Robin Starveling, the tailor.

STARVELING. Here, Peter Quince.

QUINCE. Robin Starveling, you must play Thisbe's mother. Tom Snout, the tinker.

SNOUT. Here, Peter Quince.

QUINCE. You, Pyramus' father; myself, Thisbe's father; Snug, the joiner, you, the lion's part, and I hope here is a play fitted.

SNUG. Have you the lion's part written? Pray you, if it be, give it me, for I am slow of study.

QUINCE. You may do it extempore, for it is nothing but roaring.

BOTTOM. Let me play the lion too. I will roar that I will do any man's heart good to hear me. I will roar that I will make the Duke say, "Let him roar again, let him roar again."

QUINCE. An you should do it too terribly, you would fright the Duchess and the ladies, that they would shriek; and that were enough to hang us all.

ALL. That would hang us, every mother's son.

BOTTOM. I grant you, friends, if you should fright the ladies out of their wits, they would have no more discretion but to hang us; but I will aggravate° my voice so that I will roar you° as gently as any sucking dove;° I will roar you an 'twere any nightingale.

QUINCE. You can play no part but Pyramus; for Pyramus is a sweet-faced man, a proper° man as one shall see in a summer's day, a most lovely gentlemanlike man. Therefore you must needs play Pyramus.

BOTTOM. Well, I will undertake it. What beard were I best to play it in?

QUINCE. Why, what you will.

BOTTOM. I will discharge° it in either your° straw-color beard, your orange-tawny beard, your purple-in-grain° beard, or your French-crown-color° beard, your perfect yellow.

QUINCE. Some of your French crowns° have no hair at all, and then you will play barefaced. But, masters, here are your parts. [He distributes parts.] And I am to entreat you, request you, and desire you to con° them by tomorrow night; and meet me in the palace wood, a mile without the town, by moonlight. There will we rehearse; for if courageously. Take pains, be perfect;\(^86\) adieu.

QUINCE. At the Duke's oak we meet.

BOTTOM. Enough. Hold, or cut bowstrings.\(^88\)

Exeunt.

2.1 Enter a FAIRY at one door, and ROBIN GOODFELLOW [PUCK] at another.

PUCK. How now, spirit, whither wander you?

FAIRY.

Over hill, over dale,
Thorough\(^8\) bush, thorough brier,
Over park, over pale,\(^8\)
Thorough flood, thorough fire,
I do wander everywhere,
Swifter than the moon's sphere;\(^9\)
And I serve the Fairy Queen,
To dew her orbs\(^10\) upon the green.
The cowslips tall her pensioners\(^10\) be.
In their gold coats spots you see:
Those be rubies, fairy favors;\(^10\)
In those freckles live their savors.\(^10\)
I must go seek some dewdrops here
And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear.
Farewell, thou lob\(^16\) of spirits: I'll be gone.
Our Queen and all her elves come here anon.\(^17\)

PUCK. The King doth keep his revels here tonight.
Take heed the Queen come not within his sight.
For Oberon is passing fell\(^20\) and wrath,\(^20\)
Because that she as her attendant hath
A lovely boy, stolen from an Indian king;
She never had so sweet a changeling.\(^25\)
And jealous Oberon would have the child
Knight of his train, to trace\(^25\) the forests wild.
But she perforce\(^26\) withholds the loved boy,
Crows him with flowers, and makes him all her joy.
And now they never meet in grove or green,

But they do square,° that all their elves for fear
Creep into acorn cups and hide them there.

FAIRY. Either I mistake your shape and making quite,
Or else you are that shrewd° and knavish sprite° Called Robin Goodfellow. Are not you he
That frights the maidens of the villagery,°
Skim milk, and sometimes labor in the quern,°
And bootless° make the breathless huswife° churn,
And sometimes make the drink to bear no barm,°
Mislead night wanderers, laughing at their harm?
Those that “Hobgoblin” call you, and “Sweet Puck,”
You do their work, and they shall have good luck.
Are you not he?

PUCK. Thou speakest aright;
I am that merry wanderer of the night.

I jest to Oberon and make him smile
When I a fat and bean-fed horse beguile,
Neighing in likeness of a filly foal;
And sometimes lurk I in a gossip’s° bowl,
In very likeness of a roasted crab,°
And when she drinks, against her lips I bob
And on her withered dewlap° pour the ale.

The wisest aunt,° telling the saddest° tale,
Sometimes for three-foot stool mistaketh me;
Then slip I from her bum, down topples she,
And “Tailor”° cries, and falls into a cough;
And then the whole choir° hold their hips and laugh,
And waxen° in their mirth, and neeze,° and swear
A merrier hour was never wasted there.

But, room,° fairy! Here comes Oberon.

FAIRY. And here my mistress. Would that he were gone!

Enter [OBERON] the King of Fairies at one door, with his train; and [TITANIA] the Queen at another, with hers.

OBERON. Ill met by moonlight, proud Titania.

TITANIA. What, jealous Oberon? Fairies, skip hence.

OBERON. Tarry, rash wanton.° Am not I thy lord?

TITANIA. Then I must be thy lady; but I know
When thou hast stolen away from Fairyland
And in the shape of Corin° sat all day,

To amorous Phillida. Why art thou here
Come from the farthest step of India
But that, forsooth, the bouncing Amazon,
Your buskined mistress and your warrior love,
To Theseus must be wedded, and you come
To give their bed joy and prosperity.

OBERON. How canst thou thus for shame, Titania,
Glance at my credit with Hippolyta,
Knowing I know thy love to Theseus?
Didst not thou lead him through the glimmering night
From Perigenta, whom he ravished?
And make him with fair Aegles break his faith,
With Ariadne and Antiopa?

TITANIA. These are the forgeries of jealousy;
And never, since the middle summer’s spring,
Met we on hill, in dale, forest, or mead,
By paved fountain or by rushy brook,
Or in the beached margent of the sea,
To dance our ringlets to the whistling wind,
But with thy brawls thou hast disturbed our sport.
Therefore the winds, piping to us in vain,
As in revenge, have sucked up from the sea
Contagious fogs; which, falling in the land,
Hath every pelting river made so proud
That they have overborne their continents.
The ox hath therefore stretched his yoke in vain,
The plowman lost his sweat, and the green corn
Hath rotted ere his youth attained a beard;
The fold stands empty in the drownèd field,
And crows are fatted with the murrain flock;
The nine-men’s-morris is filled up with mud,
And the quaint mazes in the wanton green
For lack of tread are undistinguishable.

The human mortals want their winter here;
No night is now with hymn or carol blessed.
Therefore the moon, the governess of floods,
Pale in her anger, washes all the air,
That rheumatic diseases do abound. And thorough this distemperature we see
The seasons alter: hoary-headed frosts
Fall in the fresh lap of the crimson rose,
And on old Hiems’ thin and icy crown
An odorous chaplet of sweet summer buds
Is, as in mockery, set. The spring, the summer,
The childing autumn, angry winter, change
Their wonted liveries, and the mazed world
By their increase now knows not which is which.
And this same progeny of evils comes
From our debate, from our dissension;
We are their parents and original.

OBERON. Do you amend it, then; it lies in you.
Why should Titania cross her Oberon?
I do but beg a little changeling boy
To be my henchman.

TITANIA. Set your heart at rest.
The fairy land buys not the child of me.
His mother was a votress of my order,
And in the spiced Indian air by night
Full often hath she gossiped by my side
And sat with me on Neptune’s yellow sands,
Marking th’ embarkèd traders on the flood,
When we have laughed to see the sails conceive
And grow big-bellied with the wanton wind;
Which she, with pretty and with swimming gait,
Following—her womb then rich with my young squire—
Would imitate, and sail upon the land
To fetch me trifles, and return again
As from a voyage, rich with merchandise.
But she, being mortal, of that boy did die;
And for her sake do I rear up her boy,
And for her sake I will not part with him.

OBERON. How long within this wood intend you stay?
TITANIA. Perchance till after Theseus’ wedding day.
If you will patiently dance in our round
And see our moonlight revels, go with us;
If not, shun me, and I will spare your haunts.

TITANIA. Not for thy fairy kingdom. Fairies, away!

We shall chide downright if I longer stay.

Exeunt [TITANIA with her train].

OBERON. Well, go thy way. Thou shalt not from this grove

Till I torment thee for this injury.

My gentle Puck, come hither. Thou rememb'rest

Since once I sat upon a promontory,

And heard a mermaid on a dolphin's back

Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath

That the rude sea grew civil at her song,

And certain stars shot madly from their spheres

To hear the sea-maid's music?

PUCK. I remember.

OBERON. That very time I saw, but thou couldst not,

Flying between the cold moon and the earth,

Cupid all armed. A certain aim he took

At a fair vestal thronèd by the west,

And loosed his love shaft smartly from his bow

As it should pierce a hundred thousand hearts;

But I might see young Cupid's fiery shaft

Quenched in the chaste beams of the watery moon,

And the imperial vot'ress passèd on

In maiden meditation, fancy-free.°

Yet marked I where the bolt of Cupid fell:

It fell upon a little western flower,

Before milk-white, now purple with love's wound,

And maidens call it "love-in-idleness."

Fetch me that flower; the herb I showed thee once.

The juice of it on sleeping eyelids laid

Will make or man or woman madly dote

Upon the next live creature that it sees.

Fetch me this herb, and be thou here again

Ere the leviathan can swim a league.

PUCK. I'll put a girdle round about the earth

In forty minutes. [Exit.

OBERON. Having once this juice,

I'll watch Titania when she is asleep

And drop the liquor of it in her eyes.

The next thing then she waking looks upon,

Be it on lion, bear, or wolf, or bull,

On meddling monkey, or on busy ape,

She shall pursue it with the soul of love.
And ere I take this charm from off her sight,
As I can take it with another herb,
I’ll make her render up her page to me.
But who comes here? I am invisible,
And I will overhear their conference.

Enter DEMETRIUS, HELENA following him.

DEMETRIUS. I love thee not; therefore pursue me not.
Where is Lysander and fair Hermia?
The one I’ll slay; the other slayeth me.
Thou toldst me they were stol’n unto this wood;
And here am I, and wode within this wood,
Because I cannot meet my Hermia.
Hence, get thee gone, and follow me no more.

HELENA. You draw me, you hardhearted adamant!
But yet you draw not iron, for my heart
Is true as steel. Leave your power to draw,
And I shall have no power to follow you.

DEMETRIUS. Do I entice you? Do I speak you fair?
Or rather do I not in plainest truth
Tell you I do not nor I cannot love you?

HELENA. And even for that do I love you the more.
I am your spaniel; and, Demetrius,
The more you beat me, I will fawn on you.
Use me but as your spaniel, spurn me, strike me,
Neglect me, lose me; only give me leave,
Unworthy as I am, to follow you.
What worser place can I beg in your love—
And yet a place of high respect with me—
Than to be used as you use your dog?

DEMETRIUS. Tempt not too much the hatred of my spirit,
For I am sick when I do look on thee.

HELENA. And I am sick when I look not on you.

DEMETRIUS. You do impeach your modesty too much
To leave the city and commit yourself
Into the hands of one that loves you not,
To trust the opportunity of night
And the ill counsel of a desert place
With the rich worth of your virginity.

HELENA. Your virtue is my privilege. For that
It is not night when I do see your face,
Therefore I think I am not in the night;
Nor doth this wood lack worlds of company,
For you, in my respect, are all the world.

Then how can it be said I am alone
When all the world is here to look on me?
DEMETRIUS. I'll run from thee and hide me in the brakes,°
And leave thee to the mercy of wild beasts.
HELENA. The wildest hath not such a heart as you.
Run when you will, the story shall be changed:
Apollo flies and Daphne holds the chase,°
The dove pursues the griffin,° the mild hind°
Makes speed to catch the tiger—bootless° speed,
When cowardice pursues and valor flies!
DEMETRIUS. I will not stay° thy questions.° Let me go!
Or if thou follow me, do not believe
But I shall do thee mischief in the wood.
HELENA. Ay, in the temple, in the town, the field,
You do me mischief. Fie, Demetrius!
Your wrongs do set a scandal on my sex.°
We cannot fight for love, as men may do;
We should be wooed and were not made to woo.
[Exit DEMETRIUS.]
I'll follow thee and make a heaven of hell,
To die upon° the hand I love so well.
[Exit.]
OBERON. Fare thee well, nymph. Ere he do leave this grove,
Thou shalt fly him and he shall seek thy love.

Enter puck.

Hast thou the flower there? Welcome, wanderer.
PUCK. Ay, there it is. [He offers the flower]
OBERON. I pray thee, give it me.
I know a bank where the wild thyme blows,°
Where oxlips° and the nodding violet grows,
Quite overcanopied with luscious woodbine,°
With sweet muskroses° and with eglantine.°
There sleeps Titania sometimes of the night,
Lulled in these flowers with dances and delight;
And there the snake throws° her enameled skin,
Weed° wide enough to wrap a fairy in.
And with the juice of this I'll streak° her eyes
And make her full of hateful fantasies.
Take thou some of it, and seek through this grove.
[He gives some love juice.]

More fond on° her than she upon her love;
And look thou meet me ere the first cock crow.

Puck. Fear not, my lord, your servant shall do so.

Exeunt.

2.2 Enter Titania, Queen of Fairies, with her train.

Titania. Come, now a roundel° and a fairy song;
Then, for the third part of a minute, hence—
Some to kill cankers° in the muskrose buds,
Some war with reremice° for their leathern wings
To make my small elves coats, and some keep back
The clamorous owl, that nightly hoots and wonders
At our quaint° spirits. Sing me now asleep.
Then to your offices, and let me rest.

Fairies sing.

First Fairy.

You spotted snakes with double° tongue,
Thorny hedgehogs, be not seen;
Newts° and blindworms, do no wrong,
Come not near our Fairy Queen.

Chorus.

Philomel,° with melody
Sing in our sweet lullaby;
Lulla, lulla, lullaby, lulla, lulla, lullaby.

Come our lovely lady nigh.
So good night, with lullaby.

First Fairy.

Weaving spiders, come not here;
Hence, you long-legged spinners, hence!
Beetles black, approach not near;
Worm nor snail, do no offense.

Chorus.

Sing in our sweet lullaby;

daughter of King Pandion, was transformed into a nightingale, according to Ovid’s Metamorphoses 6, after she had been raped by her sister Procne’s husband, Tereus.)

Never harm

Come our lovely lady nigh.
So good night, with lullaby.

[Titania sleeps.]

Second Fairy.
Hence, away! Now all is well.
One aloof stand sentinel.

[Exeunt fairies.]

Enter Oberon [and squeezes the flower on Titania’s eyelids].

Oberon.
What thou seest when thou dost wake,
Do it for thy true love take;
Love and languish for his sake.
Be it ounce,° or cat, or bear,
Pard,° or boar with bristled hair,
In thy eye that shall appear
When thou wak’st, it is thy dear.
Wake when some vile thing is near. [Exit.] 40

Enter Lysander and Hermia.

Lysander. Fair love, you faint with wandering in the wood;
And to speak truth, I have forgot our way.
We’ll rest us, Hermia, if you think it good,
And tarry for the comfort of the day.

Hermia. Be it so, Lysander. Find you out a bed,
For I upon this bank will rest my head.

Lysander. One turf shall serve as pillow for us both;
One heart, one bed, two bosoms, and one troth.°

Hermia. Nay, good Lysander, for my sake, my dear, Lie further off yet; do not lie so near.

Lysander. O, take the sense, sweet, of my innocence!°
Love takes the meaning in love’s conference.°
I mean that my heart unto yours is knit
So that but one heart we can make of it;
Two bosoms interchainèd with an oath—
So then two bosoms and a single troth.
Then by your side no bed-room me deny,
For lying so, Hermia, I do not lie.°

Hermia. Lysander riddles very prettily.
Now much beshrew° my manners and my pride
If Hermia meant to say Lysander lied.

(But mildly meant.)
But, gentle friend, for love and courtesy
Lie further off, in human° modesty;
Such separation as may well be said
Becomes a virtuous bachelor and a maid,
So far be distant; and good night, sweet friend.
Thy love ne’er alter till thy sweet life end!

LYSANDER. Amen, amen, to that fair prayer, say I,
And then end life when I end loyalty!
Here is my bed. Sleep give thee all his rest!

HERMIA. With half that wish the wisher’s eyes be pressed!°

[They sleep, separated by a short distance.]

Enter PUCK.

PUCK.

Through the forest have I gone,
But Athenian found I none
On whose eyes I might approve°
This flower’s force in stirring love.
Night and silence.—Who is here?
Weeds of Athens he doth wear.
This is he, my master said,
Despised the Athenian maid;
And here the maiden, sleeping sound,
On the dank and dirty ground.
Pretty soul, she durst not lie
Near this lack-love, this kill-courtesy.
Churl, upon thy eyes I throw
All the power this charm doth owe.°

[He applies the love juice.]

When thou wak’st, let love forbid
Sleep his seat on thy eyelid.
So awake when I am gone,
For I must now to Oberon. Exit.

Enter DEMETRIUS and HELENA, running.

HELENA. Stay, though thou kill me, sweet Demetrius!

DEMETRIUS. I charge thee, hence, and do not haunt me thus.

HELENA. O, wilt thou darkling° leave me? Do not so.

DEMETRIUS. Stay, on thy peril!° I alone will go. [Exit.]

HELENA. O, I am out of breath in this fond° chase!
The more my prayer, the lesser is my grace.°
Happy is Hermia, wheresoe’er she lies,
For she hath blessed and attractive eyes.
How came her eyes so bright? Not with salt tears;
If so, my eyes are oftener washed than hers.
No, no, I am as ugly as a bear; For beasts that meet me run away for fear. Therefore no marvel though Demetrius Do, as a monster, fly my presence thus. What wicked and dissembling glass of mine Made me compare° with Hermia’s sphery eyne° But who is here? Lysander, on the ground? Dead, or asleep? I see no blood, no wound. Lysander, if you live, good sir, awake.

LYSANDER [awaking]. And run through fire I will for thy sweet sake. Transparent° Helena! Nature shows art, That through thy bosom makes me see thy heart. Where is Demetrius? O, how fit a word Is that vile name to perish on my sword!

HELENA. Do not say so, Lysander, say not so. What though he love your Hermia? Lord, what though? Yet Hermia still loves you. Then be content.

LYSANDER. Content with Hermia? No! I do repent The tedious minutes I with her have spent. Not Hermia but Helena I love. Who will not change a raven for a dove? The will of man is by his reason swayed, And reason says you are the worthier maid. Things growing are not ripe until their season; So I, being young, till now ripe not° to reason. And touching° now the point° of human skill,° Reason becomes the marshal to my will And leads me to your eyes, where I o’erlook° Love’s stories written in love’s richest book.

HELENA. Wherefore° was I to this keen mockery born? When at your hands did I deserve this scorn? Is’t not enough, is’t not enough, young man, That I did never, no, nor never can, Deserve a sweet look from Demetrius’ eye, But you must flout my insufficiency? Good troth,° you do me wrong, good sooth,° you do, In such disdainful manner me to woo. But fare you well. Perforce I must confess I thought you lord of° more true gentleness.° O, that a lady, of° one man refused, Should of another therefore be abused!”° LYSANDER. She sees not Hermia. Hermia, sleep thou there, And never mayst thou come Lysander near!

Exit.

HERMIA [awaking]. Help me, Lysander, help me! Do thy best
To pluck this crawling serpent from my breast!
Ay me, for pity! What a dream was here!
Lysander, look how I do quake with fear.
Methought a serpent ate my heart away,
And you sat smiling at his cruel prey.°
Lysander! What, removed? Lysander! Lord!
What, out of hearing? Gone? No sound, no word?
Alack, where are you? Speak, an if you hear;
Speak, of all loves!° I swoon almost with fear.
Either death, or you, I'll find immediately.

Exit. [The sleeping TITANIA remains.]

3.1 Enter the clowns [QUINCE, SNUG, BOTTOM, FLUTE, SNOUT, and STARVELING].

BOTTOM. Are we all met?
QUINCE. Pat, pat;° and here's a marvelous convenient place for our rehearsal. This green plot shall be our stage, this hawthorn brake° our tiring-house,° and we will do it in action as we will do it before the Duke.

BOTTOM. Peter Quince?
QUINCE. What sayest thou, bully° Bottom?
BOTTOM. There are things in this comedy of Pyramus andThisbe that will never please. First, Pyramus must draw a sword to kill himself, which the ladies cannot abide. How answer you that?

SNOUT. By 'r lakin,° a parlous° fear.
STARVELING. I believe we must leave the killing out, when all is done.°
BOTTOM. Not a whit. I have a device to make all well. Write me° a prologue, and let the prologue seem to say we will do no harm with our swords, and that Pyramus is not killed indeed; and for the more better assurance, tell them that I, Pyramus, am not Pyramus but Bottom the weaver. This will put them out of fear.

Chapter 27 / Comedy Act 3, Scene 1

QUINCE. Well, we will have such a prologue, and it shall be written in eight and six.°

BOTTOM. No, make it two more; let it be written in eight and eight. 20

SNOUT. Will not the ladies be afraid of the lion?

STARVELING. I fear it, I promise you.

BOTTOM. Masters, you ought to consider with yourselves, to bring in—God shield us!—a lion among ladies° is a most dreadful thing. For there is not a more fearful° wildfowl than your lion living; and we ought to look to 't.

SNOUT. Therefore another prologue must tell he is not a lion.

BOTTOM. Nay, you must name his name, and half his face must be seen through the lion's neck, and he himself must speak through, saying thus, or to the same defect: “Ladies”—or “Fair ladies—I would wish you”—or “I would request you”—or “I would entreat you—not to fear, not to tremble; my life for yours.” If you think I come hither as a lion, it were pity of my life.° No, I am no such thing: I am a man as other men are.” And there indeed let him name his name and tell them plainly he is Snug the joiner.

QUINCE. Well, it shall be so. But there is two hard things: that is, to bring the moonlight into a chamber; for, you know, Pyramus and Thisbe meet by moonlight.

SNOUT. Doth the moon shine that night we play our play?

BOTTOM. A calendar, a calendar! Look in the almanac. Find out moonshine, find out moonshine. [They consult an almanac.]

QUINCE. Yes, it doth shine that night.

BOTTOM. Why, then, may you leave a casement of the great chamber window, where we play, open, and the moon may shine in at the casement.

QUINCE. Ay; or else one must come in with a bush of thorns° and a lantern and say he comes to disfigure,° or to present,° the person of Moonshine. Then there is another thing: we must have a wall in the great chamber; for Pyramus and Thisbe, says the story, did talk through the chink of a wall.

SNOUT. You can never bring in a wall. What say you, Bottom?

BOTTOM. Some man or other must present Wall. And let him have some plaster, or some loam, or some roughcast° about him, to signify wall; or let him hold his fingers thus, and through that cranny shall Pyramus and Thisbe whisper.

19 eight and six alternate lines of eight and six syllables, a common ballad measure.

24 lion among ladies (A contemporary pamphlet tells how at the christening in 1594 of Prince Henry, eldest son of King James VI of Scotland, later James I of England, a “black-amoor” instead of a lion drew the triumphal chariot, since the lion’s presence might have “brought some fear to the nearest.”) 25 fearful fear-inspiring. 30 defect (Bottom’s blunder for effect) 32 my life for yours i.e., I pledge my life to make your lives safe. 33 it were . . . life my life would be endangered. 46 bush of thorns bundle of thorn-bush faggots (part of the accoutrements of the man in the moon, according to the popular notions of the time, along with his lantern and his dog). 47 disfigure (Quince’s blunder for figure) present represent. 53 roughcast a mixture of lime and gravel used to plaster the outside of buildings.
Act 3, Scene 1

QUINCE. If that may be, then all is well. Come, sit down, every mother's son, and rehearse your parts. Pyramus, you begin. When you have spoken your speech, enter into that brake, and so everyone according to his cue.

Enter ROBIN [PUCK].

PUCK. What hempen homespuns° have we swaggering here
So near the cradle° of the Fairy Queen?
What, a play toward?° I'll be an auditor;
An actor too perhaps, if I see cause.

QUINCE. Speak, Pyramus. Thisbe, stand forth.

BOTTOM [AS PYRAMUS].

“Thisbe, the flowers of odious savors sweet—”

QUINCE. Odors, odors.

BOTTOM. ”—Odors savors sweet;
So hath thy breath, my dearest Thisbe dear.
But hark, a voice! Stay thou but here awhile,
And by and by I will to thee appear.”

Exit.

PUCK. A stranger Pyramus than e'er played here.°

FLUTE. Must I speak now?

QUINCE. Ay, marry, must you; for you must understand he goes but to see a noise that he heard, and is to come again.

FLUTE [AS THISBE]. “Most radiant Pyramus, most lily-white of hue,
Of color like the red rose on triumphant° brier,
Most brisky juvenal° and eke° most lovely Jew,°
As true as truest horse, that yet would never tire.
I'll meet thee, Pyramus, at Ninny's tomb.”

QUINCE. “Ninus° tomb,” man. Why, you must not speak that yet. That you answer to Pyramus. You speak all your part° at once, cues and all. Pyramus, enter. Your cue is past; it is “never tire.”

FLUTE. O—“As true as truest horse, that yet would never tire.”

[Enter PUCK, and BOTTOM as PYRAMUS with the ass bead.”]

BOTTOM. “If I were fair,° Thisbe, I were° only thine.”

QUINCE. O, monstrous! O, strange! We are haunted. Pray, masters! Fly, masters! Help!

[Exeunt QUINCE, SNUG, FLUTE, SNOUT, and STARVELING.]

PUCK. I'll follow you, I'll lead you about a round,°

_Bottom._ Why do they run away? This is a knavery of them to make me afraid.

_Enter Snout._

_Snout._ O Bottom, thou art changed! What do I see on thee?

_Bottom._ What do you see? You see an ass head of your own, do you?

[Exit Snout.]

_Enter Quince._

_Quince._ Bless thee, Bottom, bless thee! Thou art translated.°

_Bottom._ I see their knavery. This is to make an ass of me, to fright me, if they could. But I will not stir from this place, do what they can. I will walk up and down here, and will sing, that they shall hear I am not afraid.

Sings.

The ouzel cock° so black of hue,

The thrrostle° with his note so true,
The wren with little quill"—

_Titania [awaking]._ What angel wakes me from my flowery bed?

_Bottom [sings].

The plainsong° cuckoo gray,
Whose note full many a man doth mark,
And dares not answer nay°—

For, indeed, who would set his wit to so foolish a bird? Who would give a bird the lie,° though he cry “cuckoo” never so?°

_Titania._ I pray thee, gentle mortal, sing again.

Mine ear is much enamored of thy note;
So is mine eye enthralled to thy shape;
And thy fair virtue’s force° perforce doth move me
On the first view to say, to swear, I love thee.

_Bottom._ Methinks, mistress, you should have little reason for that. And yet, to say the truth, reason and love keep little company together nowadays. The more the pity that some honest neighbors will not make them friends. Nay, I can gleek° upon occasion.

_Titania._ Thou art as wise as thou art beautiful.

_Bottom._ Not so, neither. But if I had wit enough to get out of this
Act 3, Scene 1

TITANIA. Out of this wood do not desire to go.
Thou shalt remain here, whether thou wilt or no.
I am a spirit of no common rate.
The summer still doth tend upon my state,
And I do love thee. Therefore go with me.
I'll give thee fairies to attend on thee
And they shall fetch thee jewels from the deep,
And sing while thou on pressed flowers dost sleep.
And I will purge thy mortal grossness so
That thou shalt like an airy spirit go.
Peaseblossom, Cobweb, Mote, and Mustardseed!

Enter four fairies [Peaseblossom, Cobweb, Mote, and Mustardseed].

PEASEBLOSSOM. Ready.
COBWEB. And I.
MOTE. And I.
MUSTARDSEED. And I.
ALL. Where shall we go?

TITANIA. Be kind and courteous to this gentleman.
Hop in his walks and gambol in his eyes;
Feed him with apricots and dewberries,
With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries;
The honey bags steal from the humble-bees,
And for night tapers crop their waxen thighs
And light them at the fiery glowworms' eyes,
To have my love to bed and to arise;
And pluck the wings from painted butterflies
To fan the moonbeams from his sleeping eyes.
Nod to him, elves, and do him courtesies.

PEASEBLOSSOM. Hail, mortal!
COBWEB. Hail!
MOTE. Hail!
MUSTARDSEED. Hail!

BOTTOM. I cry your worship's mercy, heartily. I beseech your worship's name.

COBWEB. Cobweb.

BOTTOM. I shall desire you of more acquaintance, good Master Cobweb.
If I cut my finger, I shall make bold with you. —Your name, honest gentleman?

PEASEBLOSSOM. Peaseblossom.

MUSTARDSEED. Mustardseed.

BOTTOM. Good Master Mustardseed I know your patience well. That same cowardly giantlike ox-beef hath devoured many a gentleman of your house. I promise you, your kindred hath made my eyes water ere now. I desire you of more acquaintance, good Master Mustardseed.

TITANIA. Come, wait upon him; lead him to my bower.

The moon methinks looks with a watery eye; And when she weeps, weeps every little flower, Lamenting some enforced chastity. Tie up my lover's tongue, bring him silently.

[Exeunt.]

3.2 Enter [OBERON,] King of Fairies.

OBERON. I wonder if Titania be awaked; Then what it was that next came in her eye, Which she must dote on in extremity.

[Enter] ROBIN GOODFELLOW [PUCK].

Here comes my messenger. How now, mad spirit? What night-rule now about this haunted grove?

PUCK. My mistress with a monster is in love. Near to her close and consecrated bower, While she was in her dull and sleeping hour, A crew of patches, rude mechanicals, That work for bread upon Athenian stalls, Were met together to rehearse a play Intended for great Theseus' nuptial day. Some, sleeves—some, hats; from yielders all things catch.

I led them on in this distracted fear
And left sweet Pyramus translated there,
When in that moment, so it came to pass,
Titania waked and straightway loved an ass.

OBERON. This falls out better than I could devise.
But hast thou yet latched the Athenian’s eyes
With the love juice, as I did bid thee do?
PUCK. I took him sleeping—that is finished too—
And the Athenian woman by his side,
That, when he waked, of force she must be eyed.

Enter DEMETRIUS and HERMIA.

OBERON. Stand close. This is the same Athenian.
PUCK. This is the woman, but not this the man.

[They stand aside.]

DEMETRIUS. O, why rebuke you him that loves you so?
Lay breath so bitter on your bitter foe.
HERMIA. Now I but chide; but I should use thee worse,
For thou, I fear, hast given me cause to curse.
If thou hast slain Lysander in his sleep,
Being o’er shoes in blood, plunge in the deep,
And kill me too.
The sun was not so true unto the day
As he to me. Would he have stolen away
From sleeping Hermia? I’ll believe as soon
This whole earth may be bored, and that the moon
May through the center creep, and so displease
Her brother’s noontide with th’ Antipodes.
It cannot be but thou hast murdered him;
So should a murderer look, so dead, so grim.

DEMETRIUS. So should the murdered look, and so should I
Pierced through the heart with your stern cruelty.
Yet you, the murderer, look as bright, as clear,
As yonder Venus in her glimmering sphere.

HERMIA. What’s this to my Lysander? Where is he?

Ah, good Demetrius, wilt thou give him me?

DEMETRIUS. I had rather give his carcass to my hounds.

HERMIA. Out, dog! Out, cur! Thou driv'st me past the bounds
Of maiden's patience. Hast thou slain him, then?
Henceforth be never numbered among men.
O, once tell true, tell true, even for my sake:
Durst thou have looked upon him being awake?
And hast thou killed him sleeping? O brave touch!°
Could not a worm,° an adder, do so much?
An adder did it; for with doubler tongue
Than thine, thou serpent, never adder stung.

DEMETRIUS. You spend your passion° on a misprised mood.°
I am not guilty of Lysander's blood,
Nor is he dead, for aught that I can tell.

HERMIA. I pray thee, tell me then that he is well.

DEMETRIUS. An if I could, what should I get therefor?

HERMIA. A privilege never to see me more.
And from thy hated presence part I so.
See me no more, whether he be dead or no.

DEMETRIUS. There is no following her in this fierce vein.
Here therefore for a while I will remain.
So sorrow's heaviness doth heavier° grow
For debt that bankrupt° sleep doth sorrow owe;
Which now in some slight measure it will pay,
If for his tender here I make some stay.°

OBERON. What hast thou done? Thou hast mistaken quite
And laid the love juice on some true love's sight.
Of thy misprision° must perforce ensue°
Some true love turned, and not a false turned true.

PUCK. Then fate o'errules, that, one man holding troth,°
A million fail, confounding oath on oath.°

OBERON. About the wood go swifter than the wind,
And Helena of Athens look° thou find.

Helena is here at hand,
And the youth, mistook by me,
Pleading for a lover's fee.°
Shall we their fond pageant° see?
Lord, what fools these mortals be!

OBERON. Stand aside. The noise they make
Will cause Demetrius to awake.

PUCK. Then will two at once woo one;
That must needs be sport alone.°
And those things do best please me
That befall preposterously.°

[They stand aside.]

Enter lysander and helena.

LYSANDER. Why should you think that I should woo in scorn?
Scorn and derision never come in tears.
Look when° I vow, I weep; and vows so born,
In their nativity all truth appears.°
How can these things in me seem scorn to you,
Bearing the badge° of faith to prove them true?

HELENA. You do advance° your cunning more and more.
When truth kills truth,° O, devilish-holy fray!
These vows are Hermia's. Will you give her o'er?
Weigh oath with oath, and you will nothing weigh.
Your vows to her and me, put in two scales,
Will even weigh, and both as light as tales.°

LYSANDER. I had no judgment when to her I swore.

HELENA. Nor none, in my mind, now you give her o'er.

LYSANDER. Demetrius loves her, and he loves not you.

Chapter 27 / Comedy

Act 3, Scene 2

To what, my love, shall I compare thine eyne? Crystal is muddy. O, how ripe in show Thy lips, those kissing cherries, tempting grow! That pure congealèd white, high Taurus° snow; Fanned with the eastern wind, turns to a crow
When thou holdest up thy hand. O, let me kiss This princess of pure white, this seal° of bliss!

HELENA. O spite! O hell! I see you all are bent To set against° me for your merriment. If you were civil and knew courtesy, You would not do me thus much injury. Can you not hate me, as I know you do, But you must join in souls to mock me too? If you were men, as men you are in show, You would not use a gentle lady so—
To vow, and swear, and superpraise° my parts,° When I am sure you hate me with your hearts. You both are rivals, and love Hermia; And now both rivals, to mock Helena. A trim° exploit, a manly enterprise, To conjure tears up in a poor maid’s eyes With your derision! None of noble sort° Would so offend a virgin and extort° A poor soul’s patience, all to make you sport.

LYSANDER. You are unkind, Demetrius. Be not so; For you love Hermia; this you know I know. And here, with all good will, with all my heart, In Hermia’s love I yield you up my part; And yours of Helena to me bequeath, Whom I do love and will do till my death.

HELENA. Never did mockers waste more idle breath.

DEMETRIUS. Lysander, keep thy Hermia; I will none.° If e’er I loved her, all that love is gone. My heart to her but as guest-wise sojourned,° And now to Helen is it home returned, There to remain.

LYSANDER. Helen, it is not so.

DEMETRIUS. Disparage not the faith thou dost not know, Lest, to thy peril, thou aby° it dear.

Look where thy love comes; yonder is thy dear.

Enter HERMIA.

HERMIA. Dark night, that from the eye his\(^\text{177}\) function takes,
   The ear more quick of apprehension makes;
   Wherein it doth impair the seeing sense
   It pays the hearing double recompense.
   Thou art not by mine eye, Lysander, found;
   Mine ear, I thank it, brought me to thy sound.
   But why unkindly didst thou leave me so?

LYSANDER. Why should he stay whom love doth press to go?

HERMIA. What love could press Lysander from my side?

LYSANDER. Lysander\'s love, that would not let him bide—
   Fair Helena, who more engilds\(^\text{187}\) the night
   Than all yon fiery oes\(^\text{188}\) and eyes of light.
   Why seek\'st thou me? Could not this make thee know,
   The hate I bear thee made me leave thee so?

HERMIA. You speak not as you think. It cannot be.

HELENA. Lo, she is one of this confederacy!
   Now I perceive they have conjoined all three
   To fashion this false sport in spite of me.\(^\text{194}\)
   Injurious Hermia, most ungrateful maid!
   Have you conspired, have you with these contrived\(^\text{196}\)
   To bait\(^\text{197}\) me with this foul derision?
   Is all the counsel\(^\text{198}\) that we two have shared,
   The sisters\' vows, the hours that we have spent,
   When we have chid the hasty-footed time
   For parting us—O, is all forgot?
   All schooldays\' friendship, childhood innocence?
   We, Hermia, like two artificial\(^\text{199}\) gods,
   Have with our needles created both one flower,
   Both on one sampler, sitting on one cushion,
   Both warbling of one song, both in one key,
   As if our hands, our sides, voices, and minds
   Had been incorporate.\(^\text{200}\) So we grew together
   Like to a double cherry, seeming parted
   But yet an union in partition,
   Two lovely\(^\text{201}\) berries molded on one stem;
   So with two seeming bodies but one heart,
   Two of the first, like coats in heraldry,
   Due but to one and crowned with one crest.\(^\text{202}\)
   And will you rend our ancient love asunder
   To join with men in scorning your poor friend?
   It is not friendly, tis not maidenly.
   Our sex, as well as I, may chide you for it,
   Though I alone do feel the injury.

\(^{177}\) his\': its.
\(^{187}\) engilds: brightens with a golden light.
\(^{188}\) oes: spangles (here, stars).
\(^{194}\) in spite of me: to vex me.
\(^{196}\) contrived: plotted.
\(^{197}\) bait: torment, as one sets on dogs to bait a bear.
\(^{198}\) counsel: confidential talk.
\(^{200}\) incorporate: of one body.
\(^{201}\) lovely: loving.
\(^{202}\) crest: i.e., we have two separate bodies, just as a coat of arms in heraldry can be represented twice on a shield but surmounted by a single crest.
HERMIA. I am amazed at your passionate words.
I scorn you not. It seems that you scorn me.

HELENA. Have you not set Lysander, as in scorn,
To follow me and praise my eyes and face?
And made your other love, Demetrius,
Who even but now did spurn me with his foot,
To call me goddess, nymph, divine and rare,
Precious, celestial? Wherefore speaks he this
To her he hates? And wherefore doth Lysander
Deny your love, so rich within his soul,
And tender me, forsooth, affection,
But by your setting on, by your consent?
What though I be not so in grace as you,
So hung upon with love, so fortunate,
But miserable most, to love unloved?
This you should pity rather than despise. 255

HERMIA. I understand not what you mean by this.

HELENA. Ay, do! Persever, counterfeit sad looks,
Make mouths upon me when I turn my back.
Wink each at other, hold the sweet jest up. 240
This sport, well carried, shall be chronicled.
If you have any pity, grace, or manners,
You would not make me such an argument. 245
But fare ye well. 'Tis partly my own fault,
Which death, or absence, soon shall remedy.

LYSANDER. Stay, gentle Helena; hear my excuse,
My love, my life, my soul, fair Helena! 249

HELENA. O excellent!

HERMIA [to LYSANDER]. Sweet, do not scorn her so.

DEMETRIUS. If she cannot entreat, I can compel.

LYSANDER. Thou canst compel no more than she entreat.

DEMETRIUS. Thy threats have no more strength than her weak prayers.

LYSANDER. If thou say so, withdraw, and prove it too. 255

DEMETRIUS. Quick, come!

HERMIA. Lysander, whereto tends all this?

LYSANDER. Away, you Ethiop! 258
[He tries to break away from HERMIA.]

DEMETRIUS. No, no; he'll
Seem to break loose; take on as you would follow,
But yet come not. You are a tame man, go!

Act 3, Scene 2

LYSANDER. Hang off,° thou cat, thou burl! Vile thing, let loose, 260
Or I will shake thee from me like a serpent!

HERMIA. Why are you grown so rude? What change is this,
Sweet love?

LYSANDER. Thy love? Out, tawny Tartar, out! 265
Out, loathed med’cine!° O hated potion, hence!

HERMIA. Do you not jest?

HELENA. Yes, sooth,° and so do you.

LYSANDER. Demetrius, I will keep my word with thee.

DEMETRIUS. I would I had your bond, for I perceive 270
A weak bond° holds you. I’ll not trust your word.

LYSANDER. What, should I hurt her, strike her, kill her dead?
Although I hate her, I’ll not harm her so.

HERMIA. What, can you do me greater harm than hate?
Hate me? Wherefore? O me, what news,° my love?
Am not I Hermia? Are not you Lysander?
I am as fair now as I was erewhile.°
Since night you loved me; yet since night you left me.
Why, then you left me—O, the gods forbid!—
In earnest, shall I say?

LYSANDER. Ay, by my life! 275
And never did desire to see thee more.
Therefore be out of hope, of question, of doubt;
Be certain, nothing truer. ’Tis no jest
That I do hate thee and love Helena.

HERMIA [to HELENA]. O me! You juggler! You cankerblossom!° 280
You thief of love! What, have you come by night
And stol’n my love’s heart from him?

HELENA. Fine, i faith!
Have you no modesty, no maiden shame,
No touch of bashfulness? What, will you tear
Impatient answers from my gentle tongue?
Fie, fie! You counterfeit, you puppet,° you!

HERMIA. “Puppet”? Why, so!° Ay, that way goes the game.
Now I perceive that she hath made compare 285
Between our stature: she hath urged her height,
And with her personage, her tall personage,
Her height, forsooth, she hath prevailed with him.
And are you grown so high in his esteem
Because I am so dwarfish and so low?
How low am I, thou painted maypole? Speak!
How low am I? I am not yet so low
But that my nails can reach unto thine eyes.

She flails at HELENA but is restrained.

[She flails at HELENA but is restrained.]

260 Hang off let go. 264 med’cine i.e., poison. 265 sooth truly. 268 weak bond i.e., Hermia’s arm (with a pun on bond, oath, in the previous line). 272 what news what is the matter. 274 erewhile just now. 282 cankerblossom worm that destroys the flower bud (?). 288 puppet (1) counterfeit (2) dwarfish woman (in reference to Hermia’s smaller stature). 289 Why, so i.e., Oh, so that’s how it is.
HELENA. I pray you, though you mock me, gentlemen,
Let her not hurt me. I was never curst;°
I have no gift at all in shrewishness;
I am a right° maid for my cowardice.
Let her not strike me. You perhaps may think,
Because she is something° lower than myself,
That I can match her.

HERMIA. Lower? Hark, again!

HELENA. Good Hermia, do not be so bitter with me.
I evermore did love you, Hermia,
Did ever keep your counsels, never wronged you;
Save that, in love unto Demetrius,
I told him of your stealth° unto this wood.
He followed you; for love I followed him.
But he hath chid me hence° and threatened me
To strike me, spurn me, nay, to kill me too.
And now, so° you will let me quiet go,
To Athens will I bear my folly back°
And follow you no further. Let me go.
You see how simple and how fond° I am.

HERMIA. Why, get you gone. Who is ’t that hinders you?

HELENA. A foolish heart, that I leave here behind.

HERMIA. What, with Lysander?

HELENA. With Demetrius.

LYSANDER. Be not afraid; she shall not harm thee, Helena.

DEMETRIUS. No, sir, she shall not, though you take her part.

HELENA. O, when she is angry, she is keen° and shrewd.°
She was a vixen when she went to school,
And though she be but little, she is fierce.

HERMIA. “Little” again? Nothing but “low” and “little”?
Why will you suffer her to flout me thus?
Let me come to her.

LYSANDER. Get you gone, you dwarf!
You minimus,° of hindering knotgrass° made!
You bead, you acorn!

DEMETRIUS. You are too officious
In her behalf that scorns your services.
Let her alone. Speak not of Helena;
Take not her part. For, if thou dost intend°
Never so little show of love to her,
Thou shalt aby° it.

LYSANDER. Now she holds me not;
Now follow, if thou dar’st, to try whose right,
Of thine or mine, is most in Helena. [Exit.]

300 curst shrewish. 302 right true. 304 something somewhat. 310 stealth stealing away. 312 chid me hence driven me away with his scolding. 314 so if only. 317 fond foolish. 323 keen fierce, cruel. shrewd shrewish. 329 minimus diminutive creature. knotgrass a weed, an infusion of which was thought to stunt the growth. 333 intend give sign of. 335 aby pay for.
DEMETRIUS. Follow? Nay, I'll go with thee, cheek by jowl.°

HERMIA. You, mistress, all this coil° is 'long of° you.
Nay, go not back.°

HELENA. I will not trust you, I,
Nor longer stay in your curst company.
Your hands than mine are quicker for a fray;
My legs are longer, though, to run away. [Exit.]

HERMIA. I am amazed and know not what to say. [Exit.]

[OBERON and PUCK come forward.]

OBERON. This is thy negligence. Still thou mistak'st,
Or else committ'st thy knaveries willfully.
PUCK. Believe me, king of shadows, I mistook.
Did not you tell me I should know the man
By the Athenian garments he had on?
And so far blameless proves my enterprise
That I have 'nointed an Athenian's eyes;
And so far am I glad it so did sort,°
As° this their jangling I esteem a sport.

OBERON. Thou seest these lovers seek a place to fight.
Hie° therefore, Robin, overcast the night;
The starry welkin° cover thou anon
With drooping fog as black as Acheron,°
And lead these testy rivals so astray
As one come not within another's way.
Like to Lysander sometimes frame thy tongue,
Then stir Demetrius up with bitter wrong;°
And sometimes rail thou like Demetrius.
And from each other look thou lead them thus,
Till o'er their brows death-counterfeiting sleep
With leaden legs and batty° wings doth creep.
Then crush this herb° into Lysander's eye, [Giving herb.]
Whose liquor hath this virtuous° property,
To take from thence all error with his° might
And make his eyeballs roll with wonted° sight.
When they next wake, all this derision°
Shall seem a dream and fruitless vision,
And back to Athens shall the lovers wend
With league whose date° till death shall never end.
Whiles I in this affair do thee employ,
I'll to my queen and beg her Indian boy;

---

338 cheek by jowl i.e., side by side. 339 coil turmoil, dissension. 'long of on account of. 340 go not back i.e., don't retreat. (Hermia is again proposing a fight.) 342 sort turn out. 353 As that (also at line 359). 355 Hie hasten. 356 welkin sky. 357 Acheron river of Hades (here representing Hades itself). 361 wrong insults. 365 batty batlike. 366 this herb i.e., the antidote (mentioned in 2.1.184) to love-in-idleness. 367 virtuous efficacious. 368 his its. 369 wonded accustomed. 370 derision laughable business. 373 date term of existence.
And then I will her charmèd eye release
From monster’s view, and all things shall be peace.

PUCK. My fairy lord, this must be done with haste,
For night’s swift dragons° cut the clouds full fast,
And yonder shines Aurora’s harbinger.°
At whose approach, ghosts, wand’ring here and there,
Troop home to churchyards. Damned spirits all,
That in crossways and floods have burial,°
Already to their wormy beds are gone.
For fear lest day should look their shames upon,
They willfully themselves exile from light
And must for aye° consort with black-browed night.

OBERON. But we are spirits of another sort.
I with the Morning’s love° have oft made sport,
And, like a forester,° the groves may tread
Even till the eastern gate, all fiery red,
Opening on Neptune with fair blessèd beams,
Turns into yellow gold his salt green streams.
But notwithstanding, haste, make no delay.
We may effect this business yet ere day. [Exit.] 395

PUCK.

Up and down, up and down,
I will lead them up and down.
I am feared in field and town.
Goblin, lead them up and down.

Here comes one.

Enter LYSANDER.

LYSANDER. Where art thou, proud Demetrius? Speak thou now.

PUCK. [mimicking DEMETRIUS].

Here, villain, drawn° and ready. Where art thou?

LYSANDER. I will be with thee straight.°

PUCK. Follow me, then,
To plainer° ground.

[LYSANDER wanders about,° following the voice.]

Enter DEMETRIUS.

DEMETRIUS. Lysander! Speak again!
Thou runaway, thou coward, art thou fled?
Speak! In some bush? Where dost thou hide thy head?

379 dragons (Supposed by Shakespeare to be yoked to the car of the goddess of night.)
380 Aurora’s harbinger the morning star, precursor of dawn. 383 crossways . . . burial (Those who had committed suicide were buried at crossways, with a stake driven through them; those drowned, i.e., buried in floods or great waters, would be condemned to wander disconsolate for want of burial rites.) 387 for aye forever. 389 Morning’s love Cephalus, a beautiful youth beloved by Aurora; or perhaps the goddess of the dawn herself. 390 forester keeper of a royal forest. 402 drawn with drawn sword. 403 straight immediately. 404 plainer more open. s.d. Lysander wanders about (It is not clearly necessary that Lysander exit at this point; neither exit nor reentrance is indicated in the early texts.)
Act 3, Scene 2

PUCK [mimicking LYSANDER].
Thou coward, art thou bragging to the stars,
Telling the bushes that thou look’st for wars,
And wilt not come? Come, recreant; come, thou child,
I’ll whip thee with a rod. He is defiled
That draws a sword on thee.

DEMETRIUS. Yea, art thou there?

PUCK. Follow my voice. We'll try no manhood here.

Exeunt.

[LYSANDER returns.]

LYSANDER. He goes before me and still dares me on.
When I come where he calls, then he is gone.
The villain is much lighter-heeled than I.
I followed fast, but faster he did fly,
That fallen am I in dark uneven way,
And here will rest me. [He lies down.] Come, thou gentle day!
For if but once thou show me thy gray light,
I’ll find Demetrius and revenge this spite. [He sleeps.]

[Enter] ROBIN [PUCK] and DEMETRIUS.

PUCK. Ho, ho, ho! Coward, why com’st thou not?
DEMETRIUS. Abide° me, if thou dar’st; for well I wot°
Thou runn’st before me, shifting every place,
And dar’st not stand nor look me in the face.
Where art thou now?

PUCK. Come hither. I am here.

DEMETRIUS. Nay, then, thou mock’st me. Thou shalt buy° this dear,°
If ever I thy face by daylight see.
Now, go thy way. Faintness constraineth me
To measure out my length on this cold bed.
By day’s approach look to be visited.

[He lies down and sleeps.]

[Enter HELENA.]

HELENA. O weary night, O long and tedious night,
Abate° thy hours! Shine comforts from the east,
That I may back to Athens by daylight,
From these that my poor company detest;
And sleep, that sometimes shuts up sorrow’s eye,
Steal me awhile from mine own company.

[She lies down and sleeps.]

PUCK. Yet but three? Come one more;
Two of both kinds makes up four.
Here she comes, curst° and sad.

---

Chapter 27 / Comedy Act 4, Scene 1

Cupid is a knavish lad,
Thus to make poor females mad.

[Enter Hermia.]

Hermia. Never so weary, never so in woe,
Bedabbled with the dew and torn with briers
I can no further crawl, no further go;
My legs can keep no pace with my desires.
Here will I rest me till the break of day.
Heavens shield Lysander, if they mean a fray!

[She lies down and sleeps.]

Puck.

On the ground
Sleep sound.
I'll apply
To your eye,
Gentle lover, remedy.

[Squeezing the juice on Lysander's eyes.]

When thou wak'st,
Thou tak'st
True delight
In the sight
Of thy former lady's eye;
And the country proverb known,
That every man should take his own,
In your waking shall be shown:
Jack shall have Jill;
Naught shall go ill;
The man shall have his mare again, and all shall be well.

[Exit. The four sleeping lovers remain.]

4.1 Enter [Titania] Queen of Fairies, and [Bottom] the clown, and Fairies; and [Oberon,] the King, behind them.

Titania. Come, sit thee down upon this flowery bed,
While I thy amiable° cheeks do coy,°
And stick muskroses in thy sleek smooth head,
And kiss thy fair large ears, my gentle joy.

[They recline.]

Bottom. Where's Peaseblossom?

Peaseblossom. Ready.

Bottom. Scratch my head, Peaseblossom. Where's Monsieur Cobweb?

Cobweb. Ready.

Bottom. Monsieur Cobweb, good monsieur, get you your weapons in your hand, and kill me a red-hipped humble-bee on the top of a thistle; and, good monsieur, bring me the honey bag. Do not fret yourself too much in the action, monsieur, and, good monsieur, have a care the honey bag break not; I would be loath to have you overflown with a honey bag, signor. [Exit Cobweb.] Where's Monsieur Mustardseed?

Mustardseed. Ready.

Bottom. Give me your neaf, Monsieur Mustardseed. Pray you, leave your courtesy, good monsieur.

Mustardseed. What's your will?

Bottom. Nothing, good monsieur, but to help Cavalery Cobweb to scratch. I must to the barber's, monsieur, for methinks I am marvelous hairy about the face; and I am such a tender ass, if my hair do but tickle me, I must scratch.

Titania. What, wilt thou hear some music, my sweet love?

Bottom. I have a reasonable good ear in music. Let's have the tongs and the bones.

[Music: tongs, rural music.]

Titania. Or say, sweet love, what thou desirest to eat.

Bottom. Truly, a peck of provender I could munch your good dry oats. Methinks I have a great desire to a bottle of hay. Good hay, sweet hay, hath no fellow.

Titania. I have a venturous fairy that shall seek The squirrel's hoard, and fetch thee new nuts.

Bottom. I had rather have a handful or two of dried peas. But, I pray you, let none of your people stir me. I have an exposition of sleep come upon me.

Titania. Sleep thou, and I will wind thee in my arms.

Fairies, begone, and be all ways away.

[Exeunt Fairies.]

So doth the woodbine the sweet honeysuckle Gently entwist; the female ivy so Enrings the barky fingers of the elm.

O, how I love thee! How I dote on thee!

[They sleep.]

Enter Robin Goodfellow [Puck].

Oberon [coming forward].

Welcome, good Robin. Seest thou this sweet sight? Her dotage now I do begin to pity.

For, meeting her of late behind the wood,

17 neaf fist. 17–18 leave your courtesy i.e., stop bowing, or put on your hat. 20 Cavalery cavalier. (Form of address for a gentleman.) Cobweb (Seemingly an error, since Cobweb has been sent to bring honey while Peaseblossom has been asked to scratch.) 25–26 tongs . . . bones instruments for rustic music. (The tongs were played like a triangle, whereas the bones were held between the fingers and used as clappers.) 25–26 s.d. Music . . . music (This stage direction is added from the Folio.) 28 peck of provender one-quarter bushel of grain. 29 bottle bundle. 30 fellow equal. 34 stir disturb. 34 exposition (Bottom's word for disposition.) 37 all ways in all directions.
Seeking sweet favors\(^4\) for this hateful fool, 45
I did upbraid her and fall out with her.
For she his hairy temples then had rounded
With coronet of fresh and fragrant flowers;
And that same dew, which sometime\(^5\) on the buds
Was wont to swell like round and orient pearls,\(^6\)
Stood now within the pretty flowerets' eyes
Like tears that did their own disgrace bewail.
When I had at my pleasure taunted her,
And she in mild terms begged my patience,
I then did ask of her her changeling child,
Which straight she gave me, and her fairy sent
To bear him to my bower in Fairyland.
And, now I have the boy, I will undo
This hateful imperfection of her eyes.
And, gentle Puck, take this transformèd scalp
From off the head of this Athenian swain,
That he, awaking when the other\(^7\) do,
May all to Athens back again repair,\(^8\)
And think no more of this night's accidents
But as the fierce vexation of a dream.
But first I will release the Fairy Queen.

[He squeezes a herb on her eyes.]

Be as thou wast wont to be;
See as thou wast wont to see.
Dian's bud\(^9\) o'er Cupid's flower
Hath such force and blessèd power.
Now, my Titania, wake you, my sweet queen.

TITANIA [waking]. My Oberon! What visions have I seen!
Methought I was enamored of an ass.

OBERON. There lies your love.

TITANIA. How came these things to pass?
O, how mine eyes do loathe his visage now!

OBERON. Silence awhile. Robin, take off this head.
Titania, music call, and strike more dead
Than common sleep of all these five\(^9\) the sense.

TITANIA. Music, ho! Music, such as charmeth\(^9\) sleep!

[Music.]

PUCK [removing the ass head].

Now, when thou wak'st, with thine own fool's eyes peep.

OBERON. Sound, music! Come, my queen, take hands with me,
And rock the ground whereon these sleepers be. [They dance.]

Now thou and I are new in amity,

Fairy King, attend, and mark:
I do hear the morning lark. 90

OBERON.
Then, my queen, in silence sad,°
Trip we after night’s shade.
We the globe can compass soon,

TITANIA.
Come, my lord, and in our flight 95
Tell me how it came this night
That I sleeping here was found
With these mortals on the ground. \[Exeunt.\]

Wind born \([within]\).
Enter THESEUS and all his train; \[HIPPOLYTA, EGEUS\].

THESEUS. Go, one of you, find out the forester,
For now our observation\(^{100}\) is performed;
And since we have the vaward\(^{101}\) of the day,
My love shall hear the music of my hounds.
Uncouple\(^{103}\) in the western valley, let them go.
Dispatch, I say, and find the forester. \[Exit an Attendant.\]
We will, fair queen, up to the mountain’s top 105
And mark the musical confusion
Of hounds and echo in conjunction.

HIPPOLYTA. I was with Hercules and Cadmus\(^{108}\) once,
When in a wood of Crete they bayed\(^{109}\) the bear
With hounds of Sparta.\(^{109}\) Never did I hear
Such gallant chiding;\(^{110}\) for, besides the groves,
The skies, the fountains, every region near Seemed all one mutual cry. I never heard
So musical a discord, such sweet thunder.

THESEUS. My hounds are bred out of the Spartan kind,\(^{115}\)
So flewed,\(^{116}\) so sanded;\(^{117}\) and their heads are hung
With ears that sweep away the morning dew;
Crook-kneed, and dewlapped\(^{118}\) like Thessalian bulls;
Slow in pursuit, but matched in mouth like bells,

Was never holloed to, nor cheered° with horn,
In Crete, in Sparta, nor in Thessaly.
Judge when you hear. [He sees the sleepers.] But, soft!
What nymphs are these?

EGEUS. My lord, this is my daughter here asleep,
And this Lysander; this Demetrius is,
This Helena, old Nedar's Helena.
I wonder of° their being here together.

THESEUS. No doubt they rose up early to observe
The rite of May, and hearing our intent,
Came here in grace of our solemnity.°
But speak, Egeus. Is not this the day
That Hermia should give answer of her choice?

EGEUS. It is, my lord.

THESEUS. Go, bid the huntsmen wake them with their horns.

[Exit an Attendant.]

Shout within. Wind horns. They all start up.

LYSANDER. Pardon, my lord. [They kneel.]

THESEUS. I pray you all, stand up.
I know you two are rival enemies;
How comes this gentle concord in the world,
That hatred is so far from jealousy°
To sleep by hate and fear no enmity?

LYSANDER. My lord, I shall reply amazedly,
Half sleep, half waking; but as yet, I swear,
I cannot truly say how I came here.
But, as I think—for truly would I speak,
And now I do bethink me, so it is—
I came with Hermia hither. Our intent
Was to be gone from Athens, where° we might,
Without° the peril of the Athenian law—

EGEUS. Enough, enough, my lord; you have enough.
I beg the law, the law, upon his head.
They would have stol'n away; they would, Demetrius,
Thereby to have defeated° you and me,
You of your wife and me of my consent,
Of my consent that she should be your wife.

DEMETRIUS. My lord, fair Helen told me of their stealth,
Of this their purpose hither° to this wood,

And I in fury hither followed them,
Fair Helena in fancy following me.
But, my good lord, I wot not by what power—
But by some power it is—my love to Hermia,
Melted as the snow, seems to me now
As the remembrance of an idle gaud\(^\circ\)
Which in my childhood I did dote upon;
And all the faith, the virtue of my heart,
The object and the pleasure of mine eye,
Is only Helena. To her, my lord,
Was I betrothed ere I saw Hermia,
But like a sickness did I loathe this food;
But, as in health, come to my natural taste,
Now I do wish it, love it, long for it,
And will for evermore be true to it.

THESEUS. Fair lovers, you are fortunately met.
Of this discourse we more will hear anon.
Egeus, I will overbear your will;
For in the temple, by and by, with us
These couples shall eternally be knit.
And, for the morning now is something worn,
Our purposed hunting shall be set aside.
Away with us to Athens. Three and three,
We'll hold a feast in great solemnity.
Come, Hippolyta.

[Exeunt THESEUS, HIPPOLYTA, EGEOUS, and train.]

DEMETRIUS. These things seem small and undistinguishable,
Like far-off mountains turned into clouds.
HERMIA. Methinks I see these things with parted\(^\circ\) eye,
When everything seems double.

HELENA. So methinks;
And I have found Demetrius like a jewel,
Mine own, and not mine own.\(^*\)

DEMETRIUS. Are you sure
That we are awake? It seems to me
That yet we sleep, we dream. Do not you think
The Duke was here, and bid us follow him?

HERMIA. Yea, and my father.

HELENA. And Hippolyta.

LYSANDER. And he did bid us follow to the temple.

DEMETRIUS. Why, then, we are awake. Let's follow him,
And by the way let us recount our dreams.  [Exeunt.]

BOTTOM [awaking]. When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer.
My next is, “Most fair Pyramus.” Heigh—ho! Peter Quince! Flute, the bellows mender! Snout, the tinker! Starveling! God’s\(^\) my life, Methought I was—there is no man can tell what. Methought I was—and methought I had—but man is but a patched\(^\) fool if he will offer\(^\) to say what methought I had. The eye of man hath not heard, the ear of man hath not seen, man's hand is not able to taste, his tongue to conceive, nor his heart to report,\(^\) what my dream was. I will get Peter Quince to write a ballad of this dream. It shall be called "Bottom's Dream," because it hath no bottom; and I will sing it in the latter end of a play, before the Duke. Peradventure, to make it the more gracious, I shall sing it at her\(^*\) death.

[Exit.]

4.2 Enter Quince, Flute, [Snout, and Starveling].

Quince. Have you sent to Bottom's house? Is he come home yet?

Starveling. He cannot be heard of. Out of doubt he is transported.\(^*\)

Flute. If he come not, then the play is marred. It goes not forward, doth it?

Quince. It is not possible. You have not a man in all Athens able to discharge\(^*\) Pyramus but he.

Flute. No, he hath simply the best wit\(^*\) of any handicraft man in Athens.

Quince. Yea, and the best person\(^*\) too, and he is a very paramour for a sweet voice.

Flute. You must say "paragon." A paramour is, God bless us, a thing of naught.\(^*\)

Enter Snug the joiner.

Snug. Masters, the Duke is coming from the temple and there is two or three lords and ladies more married. If our sport had gone forward, we had all been made men.\(^*\)

Flute. O sweet bully Bottom! Thus hath he lost sixpence a day during his life; he could not have scaped sixpence a day. An the Duke had not given him sixpence a day\(^*\) for playing Pyramus, I'll be hanged. He would have deserved it. Sixpence a day in Pyramus, or nothing.

Enter Bottom.

Bottom. Where are these lads? Where are these hearts?\(^*\)

Quince. Bottom! O most courageous day! O most happy hour!

Bottom. Masters, I am to discourse wonders.\(^*\) But ask me not what; for if I tell you, I am no true Athenian. I will tell you everything, right as it fell out.

Act 5, Scene 1

QUINCE. Let us hear, sweet Bottom.

BOTTOM. Not a word of° me. All that I will tell you is—that the Duke hath dined. Get your apparel together, good strings° to your beards, new ribbons to your pumps;° meet presently° at the palace; every man look o’er his part; for the short and the long is, our play is preferred.° In any case, let Thisbe have clean linen; and let not him that plays the lion pare his nails, for they shall hang out for the lion’s claws. And, most dear actors, eat no onions nor garlic, for we are to utter sweet breath; and I do not doubt but to hear them say it is a sweet comedy. No more words. Away! Go, away!

[Exeunt.]

5.1 Enter THESEUS, HIPPOLYTA, and PHILOSTRATE [lords, and attendants].

HIPPOLYTA. ‘Tis strange, my Theseus, that° these lovers speak of.

Enter lovers: LYSANDER, DEMETRIUS, HERMIA, and HELENA.

THESUS. Here come the lovers, full of joy and mirth.
Joy, gentle friends! Joy and fresh days of love Accompany your hearts!

LYSANDER. More than to us 30
Wait in your royal walks, your board, your bed!

THESEUS. Come now, what masques,° what dances shall we have
To wear away this long age of three hours
Between our after-supper and bedtime?
Where is our usual manager of mirth?
What revels are in hand? Is there no play
To ease the anguish of a torturing hour?
Call Philostrate.

PHILOSTRATE. Here, mighty Theseus.

THESEUS. Say what abridgment° have you for this evening?
What masque? What music? How shall we beguile 40
The lazy time, if not with some delight?

PHILOSTRATE [giving him a paper].
There is a brief° how many sports are ripe.
Make choice of which Your Highness will see first.

THESEUS [reads]. “The battle with the Centaurs,° to be sung
By an Athenian eunuch to the harp”? 45
We’ll none of that. That have I told my love,
In glory of my kinsman° Hercules.

That is an old device;° and it was played
When I from Thebes came last a conqueror.

Merry and tragical? Tedious and brief?
That is hot ice and wondrous strange snow.
How shall we find the concord of this discord?

PHILOSTRATE. A play there is, my lord, some ten words long,
Which is as brief as I have known a play;
But by ten words, my lord, it is too long,
Which makes it tedious. For in all the play
There is not one word apt, one player fitted.
And tragical, my noble lord, it is,
For Pyramus therein doth kill himself.
Which, when I saw rehearsed, I must confess,
Made mine eyes water; but more merry tears
The passion of loud laughter never shed.

THESEUS. What are they that do play it?

PHILOSTRATE. Hard-handed men that work in Athens here,
Which never labored in their minds till now,
And now have toiled their unbreathed memories
With this same play, against your nuptial.

THESEUS. And we will hear it.

PHILOSTRATE. No, my noble lord,
It is not for you. I have heard it over,
And it is nothing, nothing in the world;
Unless you can find sport in their intents,
Extremely stretched and conned with cruel pain
To do you service.

THESEUS. I will hear that play;
For never anything can be amiss
When simpleness and duty tender it.
Go bring them in; and take your places, ladies.

PHILOSTRATE goes to summon the players.

HIPPOLYTA. I love not to see wretchedness o’ercharged,
And duty in his service perishing.

THESEUS. Why, gentle sweet, you shall see no such thing.

HIPPOLYTA. He says they can do nothing in this kind.

THESEUS. The kinder we, to give them thanks for nothing.
Our sport shall be to take what they mistake;
And what poor duty cannot do, noble respect
Takes it in might, not merit.

Of saucy and audacious eloquence.
Love, therefore, and tongue-tied simplicity

[PHILOSTRATE returns.]

PHILOSTRATE. So please Your Grace, the Prologue° is addressed.°

THESEUS. Let him approach. [A flourish of trumpets.]

Enter the Prologue [QUINCE].

PROLOGUE.

If we offend, it is with our good will.
That you should think, we come not to offend,
But with good will. To show our simple skill,
That is the true beginning of our end.
Consider then, we come but in despite.
We do not come, as minding° to content you,
Our true intent is. All for your delight.
We are not here. That you should here repent you,
The actors are at hand, and, by their show,
You shall know all that you are like to know.

THESEUS. This fellow doth not stand upon points.° LYSANDER. He hath rid° his prologue like a rough° colt; he knows not the stop.° A good moral, my lord: it is not enough to speak, but to speak true.

HIPPOLYTA. Indeed he hath played on his prologue like a child on a recorder;° a sound, but not in government.°

THESEUS. His speech was like a tangled chain: nothing° impaired, but all disordered. Who is next?

Enter PYRAMUS [BOTTOM] and THISBE [FLUTE], and WALL [SNOUT], and MOON-SHINE [STARVELING], and LION [SNUG].

PROLOGUE.

Gentles, perchance you wonder at this show,
But wonder on, till truth makes all things plain.
This man is Pyramus, if you would know;
This beauteous lady Thisbe is certain.

Act 5, Scene 1

This man with lime and roughcast doth present
Wall, that vile Wall which did these lovers sunder;
And through Wall’s chink, poor souls, they are content
To whisper. At the which let no man wonder.
This man, with lantern, dog, and bush of thorn,
Presenteth Moonshine; for, if you will know,
By moonshine did these lovers think no scorn°
To meet at Ninus’ tomb, there, there to woo.
This grisly beast, which Lion hight° by name,
The trusty Thisbe coming first by night
Did scare away, or rather did affright;
And as she fled, her mantle she did fall,°
Which Lion vile with bloody mouth did stain.
Anon comes Pyramus, sweet youth and tall,°
And finds his trusty Thisbe’s mantle slain;
Whereat, with blade, with bloody blameful blade,
He bravely broached° his boiling bloody breast.
And Thisbe, tarrying in mulberry shade,
His dagger drew, and died. For all the rest,
Let Lion, Moonshine, Wall, and lovers twain
At large° discourse while here they do remain.

Exeunt Lion, Thisbe, and Moonshine.

THESEUS. I wonder if the lion be to speak.
DEMETRIUS. No wonder, my lord. One lion may, when many asses do.

WALL. In this same interlude° it doth befall
That I, one Snout by name, present a wall;
And such a wall as I would have you think
That had in it a crannied hole or chink,
Through which the lovers, Pyramus and Thisbe,
Did whisper often, very secretly.
This loam, this roughcast, and this stone doth show
That I am that same wall; the truth is so.
And this the cranny is, right and sinister,°
Through which the fearful lovers are to whisper.

THESEUS. Would you desire lime and hair to speak better?
DEMETRIUS. It is the wittiest partition° that ever I heard discourse, my lord.

[Pyramus comes forward.]

THESEUS. Pyramus draws near the wall. Silence!

PYRAMUS.
O grim-looked° night! O night with hue so black!
O night, which ever art when day is not!
O night, O night! Alack, alack, alack,
I fear my Thisbe’s promise is forgot.

Chapter 27 / Comedy  Act 5, Scene 1

And thou, O wall, O sweet, O lovely wall,
That stand'st between her father's ground and mine,
Thou wall, O wall, O sweet and lovely wall,
Show me thy chink to blink through with mine eyne!

[WALL makes a chink with his fingers.]

Thanks, courteous wall. Jove shield thee well for this.

But what see I? No Thisbe do I see.

O wicked wall, through whom I see no bliss!

Cursed by thy stones for thus deceiving me!

THESEUS. The wall, methinks, being sensible," should curse again.

PYRAMUS. No, in truth, sir, he should not. "Deceiving me" is Thisbe's cue:
she is to enter now, and I am to spy her through the wall. You shall see, it will fall pat° as I told you. Yonder she comes.

Enter THISBE.

O wall, full often hast thou heard my moans,
For parting my fair Pyramus and me.
My cherry lips have often kissed thy stones,
Thy stones with lime and hair knit up in thee.

PYRAMUS. I see a voice. Now will I to the chink,
To spy an° I can hear my Thisbe's face.

Thisbe! My love! Thou art my love, I think.

PYRAMUS. Think what thou wilt, I am thy lover's grace,°
And like Limander° am I trusty still.

THISBE. And I like Helen,° till the Fates me kill.

PYRAMUS. Not Shafalus to Procrus° was so true.

THISBE. As Shafalus to Procrus, I to you.

PYRAMUS. O, kiss me through the hole of this vile wall!

THISBE. I kiss the wall's hole, not your lips at all.

PYRAMUS. Wilt thou at Ninny's tomb meet me straightway?

THISBE. 'Tide life, 'tide death, I come without delay.

[Exeunt PYRAMUS and THISBE.]

WALL. Thus have I, Wall, my part discharged so;
And, being done, thus Wall away doth go. [Exit.]

THESEUS. Now is the mural down between the two neighbors.

DEMETRIUS. No remedy, my lord, when walls are so willful° to hear without warning.°

HIPPOLYTA. This is the silliest stuff that ever I heard.

THESEUS. The best in this kind° are but shadows;° and the worst are no worse, if imagination amend them.

(Demetrius makes a joke on the proverb "Walls have ears.") 205 in this kind of this sort. shadows likenesses, representations.
HIPPOLYTA. It must be your imagination then, and not theirs.

THESEUS. If we imagine no worse of them than they of themselves, they may pass for excellent men. Here come two noble beasts in, a man and a lion.

Enter LION and MOONSHINE.

LION.

You, ladies, you whose gentle hearts do fear

The smallest monstrous mouse that creeps on floor,

May now perchance both quake and tremble here,

When lion rough in wildest rage doth roar.

Then know that I, as Snug the joiner, am

A lion fell,° nor else no lion's dam;

For, if I should as lion come in strife

Into this place, 'twere pity on my life.

THESEUS. A very gentle beast, and of a good conscience.

DEMETRIUS. The very best at a beast, my lord, that e'er I saw.

LYSANDER. This lion is a very fox for his valor.°

THESEUS. True; and a goose for his discretion.°

DEMETRIUS. Not so, my lord; for his valor cannot carry his discretion; and the fox carries the goose.

THESEUS. His discretion, I am sure, cannot carry his valor; for the goose carries not the fox. It is well. Leave it to his discretion, and let us listen to the moon.

MOON. This lanthorn° doth the hornèd moon present—

DEMETRIUS. He should have worn the horns on his head.°

THESEUS. He is no crescent, and his horns are invisible within the circumference.

MOON. This lanthorn doth the hornèd moon present;

Myself the man i' the moon do seem to be.

THESEUS. This is the greatest error of all the rest. The man should be put into the lanthorn. How is it else the man i' the moon?

DEMETRIUS. He dares not come there for the° candle, for you see, it is already in snuff.°

HIPPOLYTA. I am aweary of this moon. Would he would change!

THESEUS. It appears, by his small light of discretion, that he is in the wane; but yet, in courtesy, in all reason, we must stay the time.

LYSANDER. Proceed, Moon.

MOON. All that I have to say is to tell you that the lanthorn is the moon, I the man i' the moon, this thornbush my thornbush, and this dog my dog.

216 lion fell fierce lion (with a play on the idea of “lion skin”). 221 is . . . valor i.e., his valor consists of craftiness and discretion. 222 goose . . . discretion i.e., as discreet as a goose, that is, more foolish than discreet. 228 lanthorn (This original spelling, lanbourn, may suggest a play on the born of which lanterns were made, and also on a cuckold's horns; but the spelling lanbourn is not used consistently for comic effect in this play or elsewhere. At 5.1.134, for example, the word is lantern in the original.) 229 on his head (As a sign of cuckoldry.) 236 for the because of the. 237 in snuff (1) offended (2) in need of snuffing or trimming.
DEMETRIUS. Why, all these should be in the lanthorn, for all these are in the moon. But silence! Here comes Thisbe.

Enter Thisbe.

THISBE. This is old Ninny’s tomb. Where is my love?

LION [roaring]. O!

DEMETRIUS. Well roared, Lion.

[TISBE runs off, dropping her mantle.]

THESEUS. Well run, Thisbe.

HIPPOLYTA. Well shone, Moon. Truly, the moon shines with a good grace.

[The lion worries Thisbe’s mantle.]

THESEUS. Well moused, Lion.

Enter Pyramus.

DEMETRIUS. And then came Pyramus.

LYSANDER. And so the lion vanished.

PYRAMUS.

Sweet Moon, I thank thee for thy sunny beams;
I thank thee, Moon, for shining now so bright;
For, by thy gracious, golden, glittering gleams,
I trust to take of truest Thisbe sight.
But stay, O spite!
But mark, poor knight,
What dreadful dole is here?

Eyes, do you see?
How can it be?
O dainty duck! O dear!
Thy mantle good,
What, stained with blood!
Approach, ye Furies° come, come,
Cut thread and thrum;°
Quail,° crush, conclude, and quell!°

THESEUS. This passion, and the death of a dear friend, would go near to make a man look sad.°

HIPPOLYTA. Beshrew my heart, but I pity the man.

PYRAMUS. O, wherefore, Nature, didst thou lions frame?

Since lion vile hath here deflowered my dear,
Which is—no, no, which was—the fairest dame
That lived, that loved, that liked, that looked with cheer.°

Come, tears, confound,
Out, sword, and wound

Act 5, Scene 1

The pap of Pyramus;
Ay, that left pap,
Where heart doth hop. [He stabs himself.]
Thus die I, thus, thus, thus.
Now am I dead,
Now am I fled;
My soul is in the sky.
Tongue, lose thy light;
Moon, take thy flight. [Exit MOONSHINE.]
Now die, die, die, die, die. [PYRAMUS dies.]

DEMETRIUS. No die, but an ace,° for him; for he is but one.°
LYSANDER. Less than an ace, man; for he is dead, he is nothing.
THESEUS. With the help of a surgeon he might yet recover, and yet prove an ass.°

HIPPOLYTA. How chance Moonshine is gone before Thisbe comes back and finds her lover?
THESEUS. She will find him by starlight.

[Enter THISBE.]

Here she comes, and her passion ends the play.

HIPPOLYTA. Methinks she should not use a long one for such a Pyramus.
I hope she will be brief.

DEMETRIUS. A mote° will turn the balance, which Pyramus, which°
Thisbe, is the better: he for a man, God warrant us; she for a woman, God bless us.

LYSANDER. She hath spied him already with those sweet eyes.
DEMETRIUS. And thus she means,° videlicet:°

THISBE.
Asleep, my love?
What, dead, my dove?
O Pyramus, arise!
Speak, speak. Quite dumb?
Dead, dead? A tomb
Must cover thy sweet eyes.
These lily lips,
This cherry nose,
These yellow cowslip checks,
Are gone, are gone!
Lovers, make moan.

His eyes were green as leeks.
O Sisters Three,°
Come, come to me,
With hands as pale as milk;
Lay them in gore,

° pap breast.
° ace the side of the die featuring the single pip, or spot. (The pun is on die as a singular of dice; Bottom’s performance is not worth a whole die but rather one single face of it, one small portion.)
° one (1) an individual person (2) unique.
° ass (With a pun on ace.)
° mote small particle.

° videlicet to wit.
°° Sisters Three the Fates.
Since you have shore°
With shears his thread of silk.
  Tongue, not a word.
  Come, trusty sword.
  Come, blade, my breast imbrue!°
  [Stabs herself.] 325
  And farewell, friends.
  Thus Thisbe ends.
  Adieu, adieu, adieu.

THESEUS. Moonshine and Lion are left to bury the dead.
DEMETRIUS. Ay, and Wall too. 330 BOTTOM [starting up, as FLUTE does also]. No, I assure you, the wall is down that parted their fathers. Will it please you to see the epilogue, or to hear a Bergomask dance° between two of our company?

[The other players enter] THESEUS. No epilogue, I pray you; for your play needs no excuse. Never excuse; for when the players are all dead, there need none to be blamed. Marry, if he that writ it had played Pyramus and hanged himself in Thisbe’s garter, it would have been a fine tragedy; and so it is, truly, and very notably discharged. But, come, your Bergomask.
Let your epilogue alone.

The iron tongue° of midnight hath told° twelve. 340
Lovers, to bed, ’tis almost fairy time.
I fear we shall outsleep the coming morn
As much as we this night have overwatched.”
This palpable-gross° play hath well beguiled
The heavy° gait of night. Sweet friends, to bed. 345
A fortnight hold we this solemnity,
In nightly revels and new jollity.

Exeunt.

Enter PUCK [carrying a broom].

PUCK.

Now the hungry lion roars,
  And the wolf behowls the moon;
Whilst the heavy° plowman snores,
  All with weary task fordone.”
Now the wasted brands° do glow,
  Whilst the screech owl, screeching loud
Puts the wretch that lies in woe
  In remembrance of a shroud. 355

Every one lets forth his sprite,”

And we fairies, that do run
By the triple Hecate's° team
From the presence of the sun,
Following darkness like a dream,
Now are frolic.° Not a mouse
Shall disturb this hallowed house.
I am sent with broom before,
To sweep the dust behind° the door.

Enter [OBERON and TITANIA,] King and Queen of Fairies, with all their train.

OBERON.
Through the house give glimmering light,
By the dead and drowsy fire;
Every elf and fairy sprite
Hop as light as bird from brier;
And this ditty, after me,
Sing, and dance it trippingly.

TITANIA.
First, rehearse your song by rote,
To each word a warbling note.
Hand in hand, with fairy grace,
Will we sing, and bless this place.

[Song and dance.]

OBERON. Now, until the break of day,
Through this house each fairy stray.
To the best bride-bed will we,
Which by us shall blessed be;
And the issue there create°
Ever shall be fortunate.
So shall all the couples three Ever true in loving be;
And the blots of Nature's hand
Shall not in their issue stand;
Never mole, harelip, nor scar,
Nor mark prodigious,° such as are Despised in nativity,
Shall upon their children be.
With this field dew consecrate°
Every fairy take his gait,°
And each several° chamber bless,
Through this palace, with sweet peace;
And the owner of it blest

Trip away; make no stay;
Meet me all by break of day.

PUCK [to the audience]. If we shadows have offended,

Think but this, and all is mended,
That you have but slumbered here\(^1\)
While these visions did appear.
And this weak and idle theme,
No more yielding but\(^1\) a dream,
Gentles, do not reprehend.
If you pardon, we will mend.\(^2\)
And, as I am an honest Puck,
If we have unearned luck
Now to scape the serpents tongue,\(^3\)
We will make amends ere long;
Else the Puck a liar call.
So, good night unto you all.
Give me your hands,\(^4\) if we be friends,
And Robin shall restore amends.\(^4\)

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

Act 1

1. On the basis of the first scene, how would you characterize Theseus? Egeus? Hermia? Do you agree with some critics that Egeus is presented comically? (Support your view.)
2. What connections can you make between 1.2 and the first scene?

Act 2

1. Why do you suppose that in 2.1 Shakespeare included material about Theseus’s past (lines 76–80)?
2. When the play is staged, audiences invariably laugh loudly at 2.2.109, when Lysander awakens and sees Helena. What’s so funny about this?

Act 3

1. What assumptions does Bottom seem to make about the nature of drama? How do they compare with your own?
2. Puck himself has said that he is mischievous, but how mischievous is he? Why did he anoint the eyes of the wrong lover?
Act 4

1. Bottom is the only mortal who sees the fairies. What can we make of this? Or should we not try to make anything of it?

Act 5

1. What do you make of the debate between Theseus and Hippolyta (lines 1–27)? Which of the two seems to you to come closer to the truth? Explain.
2. Do you think it is cruel to laugh at the unintentional antics of the rustic performers? Why, or why not?
3. Puck is sometimes played by a woman. What advantages or disadvantages do you see to giving the part to a woman?

General Questions

1. Some critics speak of the play as a delightful fantasy that is engaging because it has so little connection with real life, but others find in it intimations of dark and dangerous elements in human beings. Where do you stand, and why?
2. Today Shakespeare’s plays are sometimes done in modern dress or in costumes that reflect a particular time and place, such as the Wild West of the mid-nineteenth century or the South before the Civil War. How would you costume the play? What advantages might there be in your choice?
Two Plays About Marriage

Probably most of us think of marriage chiefly in romantic terms—

Love and marriage, love and marriage
Go together like a horse and carriage—

but history tells us that in most Western societies marriage has been a way for males to transfer their property and their power to their offspring. Men could sow their wild oats, but women were expected to be faithful. Speaking generally, the husband provided food and shelter, and the wife—sometimes regarded as not much more than a property of her husband—bore and reared his children, and the male offspring would inherit the estate.

Amazingly, in popular culture as evinced by cartoons and jokes, women set out to entrap men, and the man is the long-suffering member of the team. A recent cartoon, for instance, showed a husband looking up from his newspaper and saying to his stern-faced wife, “Gay marriage! Haven’t they already suffered enough?” Mother-in-law jokes (it is always the wife’s mother who is damaging the marriage) are another sign of the widespread view that in marriage the husband is the disadvantaged party.

In this chapter we present two dramatists who explore the nature of marriage in our time. We say “in our time,” but even Clare Boothe Luce’s play is more than thirty years old, and Henrik Ibsen’s is more than a hundred years old. Read the plays, and then ask yourself if either is dated.

HENRIK IBSEN

Henrik Ibsen (1828–1906) was born in Skien, Norway, of wealthy parents who soon after his birth lost their money. Ibsen worked as a pharmacist’s apprentice, but at the age of 22 he had written his first play, a promising melodrama entitled Cataline. He engaged in theater work first in Norway and then in Denmark and Germany. By 1865 his plays had won him a state pension that enabled him to settle in Rome. After writing romantic, historic, and poetic plays, he turned to realistic drama with The League of Youth (1869). Among his major realistic “problem plays” are A Doll’s House (1879), Ghosts (1881), and An Enemy of the People (1882). In The Wild Duck (1884) he moved toward a more symbolic tragic comedy, and his last plays, written in the nineties, are highly symbolic. Hedda Gabler (1890) looks backward to the plays of the eighties rather than forward to the plays of the nineties.
A Doll’s House. In Act 3, Nora lights Dr. Rank’s cigar while Torvald impatiently waits for him to leave.

HELENE, the maid
THE HELMERS’ THREE CHILDREN
A PORTER

The action takes place in the Helmers’ flat.

Act I

A pleasant room, tastefully but not expensively furnished. On the back wall, one door on the right leads to the entrance hall, a second door on the left leads to Helmer’s study. Between these two doors, a piano. In the middle of the left wall, a door; and downstage from it, a window. Near the window a round table with armchairs and a small sofa. In the right wall, upstage, a door; and on the same wall downstage, a porcelain stove with a couple of armchairs and a rocking chair. Between the stove and the door a small table. Etchings on the walls. A whatnot with china and other small objects d’art; a small bookcase with books in handsome bindings. Carpet on the floor; a fire burns in the stove. A winter’s day.

The front doorbell rings in the hall; a moment later, there is the sound of the front door being opened. Nora comes into the room, happily humming to herself. She is dressed in her outdoor things, and is carrying lots of parcels which she then puts down on the table, right. She leaves the door into the hall standing open; a porter can be seen outside holding a Christmas tree and a basket; he hands them to the maid who has opened the door for them.

Nora. Hide the Christmas tree away carefully, Helene. The children mustn’t see it till this evening when it’s decorated. [To the porter, taking out her purse.] How much?

Porter. Fifty öre.

Nora. There’s a crown. Keep the change.

[The porter thanks her and goes. Nora shuts the door. She continues to laugh quietly and happily to herself as she takes off her things. She takes a bag of macaroons out of her pocket and eats one or two; then she walks stealthily across and listens at her husband’s door.]

Nora. Yes, he’s in.

[She begins humming again as she walks over to the table, right.]

Helmer [in his study]. Is that my little skylark chirruping out there?

Nora [busy opening some of the parcels]. Yes, it is.

Helmer. Is that my little squirrel frisking about?

Nora. Yes!

Helmer. When did my little squirrel get home?

Nora. Just this minute. [She stuffs the bag of macaroons in her pocket and wipes her mouth.] Come on out, Torvald, and see what I’ve bought.

Helmer. I don’t want to be disturbed! [A moment later, he opens the door and looks out, his pen in his hand.] “Bought,” did you say? All that? Has my little spendthrift been out squandering money again?

Nora. But, Torvald, surely this year we can spread ourselves just a little. This is the first Christmas we haven’t had to go carefully.

Helmer. Ah, but that doesn’t mean we can afford to be extravagant, you know.

Nora. Oh yes, Torvald, surely we can afford to be just a little bit extravagant now, can’t we? Just a teeny-weeny bit. You are getting quite a good salary now, and you are going to earn lots and lots of money.

Helmer. Yes, after the New Year. But it’s going to be three whole months before the first pay cheque comes in.

Nora. Pooh! We can always borrow in the meantime.

Helmer. Nora! [Crosses to her and takes her playfully by the ear.] Here we go again, you and your frivolous ideas! Suppose I went and borrowed a thousand crowns today, and you went and spent it all over Christmas, then on New Year’s Eve a slate fell and hit me on the head and there I was . . . .

Nora [putting her hand over his mouth]. Sh! Don’t say such horrid things.
HELMER. Yes, but supposing something like that did happen... what then?
NORA. If anything as awful as that did happen, I wouldn't care if I owed anybody anything or not.
HELMER. Yes, but what about the people I'd borrowed from?
NORA. Them? Who cares about them! They are only strangers!
HELMER. Nora, Nora! Just like a woman! Seriously though, Nora, you know what I think about these things. No debts! Never borrow! There's always something inhibited, something unpleasant, about a home built on credit and borrowed money. We two have managed to stick it out so far, and that's the way we'll go on for the little time that remains.
NORA [walks over to the stove]. Very well, just as you say, Torvald.
HELMER [following her]. There, there! My little singing bird mustn't go drooping her wings, eh? Has it got the sulks, that little squirrel of mine? [Takes out his wallet.] Nora, what do you think I've got here?
NORA [quickly turning round]. Money!
HELMER. There! [He hands her some notes]. Good heavens, I know only too well how Christmas runs away with the housekeeping.
NORA [counts]. Ten, twenty, thirty, forty. Oh, thank you, thank you, Torvald! This will see me quite a long way.
HELMER. Yes, it'll have to.
NORA. Yes, yes, I'll see that it does. But come over here, I want to show you all the things I've bought. And so cheap! Look, some new clothes for Ivar... and a little sword. There's a horse and a trumpet for Bob. And a doll and a doll's cot for Emmy. They are not very grand but she'll have them all broken before long anyway. And I've got some dress material and some handkerchiefs for the maids. Though, really, dear old Anne Marie should have had something better.
HELMER. And what's in this parcel here?
NORA [shrieking]. No, Torvald! You mustn't see that till tonight!
HELMER. All right. But tell me now, what did my little spendthrift fancy for herself?
NORA. For me? Puh, I don't really want anything.
HELMER. Of course you do. Anything reasonable that you think you might like, just tell me.
NORA. Well, I don't really know. As a matter of fact, though, Torvald...
HELMER. Well?
NORA [toying with his coat buttons, and without looking at him]. If you did want to give me something, you could... you could always...
HELMER. Well, well, out with it!
NORA [quickly]. You could always give me money, Torvald. Only what you think you could spare. And then I could buy myself something with it later on.
HELMER. But Nora... .
NORA. Oh, please, Torvald dear! Please! I beg you. Then I'd wrap the money up in some pretty gilt paper and hang it on the Christmas tree. Wouldn't that be fun?
HELMER. What do we call my pretty little pet when it runs away with all the money?
NORA. I know, I know, we call it a spendthrift. But please let's do what I said, Torvald. Then I'll have a bit of time to think about what I need most. Isn't that awfully sensible, now, eh?
HELMER [smiling]. Yes, it is indeed—that is, if only you really could hold on to the money I gave you, and really did buy something for yourself with it. But it just gets mixed up with the housekeeping and frittered away on all sorts of useless things, and then I have to dig into my pocket all over again.

NORA. Oh but, Torvald.

HELMER. You can’t deny it, Nora dear. [Puts bis arm round her waist.] My pretty little pet is very sweet, but it runs away with an awful lot of money. It’s incredible how expensive it is for a man to keep such a pet.

NORA. For shame! How can you say such a thing? As a matter of fact I save everything I can.

HELMER [laughs]. Yes, you are right there. Everything you can. But you simply can’t.

NORA [hums and smiles quietly and happily]. Ah, if you only knew how many expenses the likes of us skylarks and squirrels have, Torvald!

HELMER. What a funny little one you are! Just like your father. Always on the lookout for money, wherever you can lay your hands on it; but as soon as you’ve got it, it just seems to slip through your fingers. You never seem to know what you’ve done with it. Well, one must accept you as you are. It’s in the blood. Oh yes, it is, Nora. That sort of thing is hereditary.

NORA. Oh, I only wish I’d inherited a few more of Daddy’s qualities.

HELMER. And I wouldn’t want my pretty little songbird to be the least bit different from what she is now. But come to think of it, you look rather . . . rather . . . how shall I put it? . . . rather guilty today.

NORA. Do I?

HELMER. Yes, you do indeed. Look me straight in the eye.

NORA [looks at him]. Well?

HELMER [wagging bis finger at ber]. My little sweet-tooth surely didn’t forget herself in town today?

NORA. No, whatever makes you think that?

HELMER. She didn’t just pop into the confectioner’s for a moment?

NORA. No, I assure you, Torvald . . . !

HELMER. Didn’t try sampling the preserves?

NORA. No, really I didn’t.

HELMER. Didn’t go nibbling a macaroon or two?

NORA. No, Torvald, honestly, you must believe me . . . !

HELMER. All right then! It’s really just my little joke . . .

NORA [crosses to the table]. I would never dream of doing anything you didn’t want me to.

HELMER. Of course not, I know that. And then you’ve given me your word. . . . [Crosses to ber] Well then, Nora dearest, you shall keep your little Christmas secrets. They’ll all come out tonight, I dare say, when we light the tree.

NORA. Did you remember to invite Dr. Rank?

HELMER. No. But there’s really no need. Of course he’ll come and have dinner with us. Anyway, I can ask him when he looks in this morning. I’ve ordered some good wine. Nora, you can’t imagine how I am looking forward to this evening.

NORA. So am I. And won’t the children enjoy it, Torvald!
HELMER. Oh, what a glorious feeling it is, knowing you've got a nice, safe job, and a good fat income. Don't you agree? Isn't it wonderful, just thinking about it?

NORA. Oh, it's marvelous!

HELMER. Do you remember last Christmas? Three whole weeks beforehand you shut yourself up every evening till after midnight making flowers for the Christmas tree and all the other splendid things you wanted to surprise us with. Ugh, I never felt so bored in all my life.

NORA. I wasn't the least bit bored.

HELMER [smiling]. But it turned out a bit of an anticlimax, Nora.

NORA. Oh, you are not going to tease me about that again! How was I to know the cat would get in and pull everything to bits?

HELMER. No, of course you weren't. Poor little Nora! All you wanted was for us to have a nice time—and it's the thought behind it that counts, after all. All the same, it's a good thing we've seen the back of those lean times.

NORA. Yes, really it's marvelous.

HELMER. Now there's no need for me to sit here all on my own, bored to tears. And you don't have to strain your dear little eyes, and work those dainty little fingers to the bone. . . .

NORA [clapping her hands]. No, Torvald, I don't, do I? Not any more. Oh, how marvelous it is to hear that! [Takes his arm.] Now I want to tell you how I've been thinking we might arrange things, Torvald. As soon as Christmas is over. . . . [The door-bell rings in the hall.] Oh, there's the bell. [Tidies one or two things in the room.] It's probably a visitor. What a nuisance!

HELMER. Remember I'm not at home to callers.

MAID [in the doorway]. There's a lady to see you, ma'am.

NORA. Show her in, please.

MAID [to HELMER]. And the doctor's just arrived, too, sir.

HELMER. Did he go straight into my room?

MAID. Yes, he did, sir.

[HELMER goes into his study. The MAID shows in MRS. LINDE, who is in traveling clothes, and closes the door after her.]

MRS. LINDE [subdued and rather hesitantly]. How do you do, Nora?

NORA [uncertainly]. How do you do?

MRS. LINDE. I'm afraid you don't recognize me.

NORA. No, I don't think I . . . And yet I seem to. . . . [Bursts out suddenly.] Why! Kristine! Is it really you?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, it's me.

NORA. Kristine! Fancy not recognizing you again! But how was I to, when . . . [Gently:] How you've changed, Kristine!

MRS. LINDE. I dare say I have. In nine . . . ten years . . .

NORA. Is it so long since we last saw each other? Yes, it must be. Oh, believe me these last eight years have been such a happy time. And now you've come up to town, too? All that long journey in wintertime. That took courage.

MRS. LINDE. I just arrived this morning on the steamer.

NORA. To enjoy yourself over Christmas, of course. How lovely! Oh, we'll have such fun, you'll see. Do take off your things. You are not cold, are you? [Helps her.] There now! Now let’s sit down here in comfort beside the stove. No, here, you take the armchair, I’ll sit here on the rocking chair. [Takes ber hands.] Ah, now you look a bit more like your old self again. It was just that when I first saw you. . . . But you are a little paler, Kristine . . . and perhaps even a bit thinner!

MRS. LINDE. And much, much older, Nora.

NORA. Yes, perhaps a little older . . . very, very little, not really very much. [Stops suddenly and looks serious.] Oh, what a thoughtless creature I am, sitting here chattering on like this! Dear, sweet Kristine, can you forgive me?

MRS. LINDE. What do you mean, Nora?

NORA [gently]. Poor Kristine, of course you’re a widow now.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, my husband died three years ago.

NORA. Oh, I remember now. I read about it in the papers. Oh, Kristine, believe me I often thought at the time of writing to you. But I kept putting it off, something always seemed to crop up.

MRS. LINDE. My dear Nora, I understand so well.

NORA. No, it wasn’t very nice of me, Kristine. Oh, you poor thing, what you must have gone through. And didn’t he leave you anything?

MRS. LINDE. No.

NORA. And no children?

MRS. LINDE. No.

NORA. Absolutely nothing?

MRS. LINDE. Nothing at all . . . not even a broken heart to grieve over.

NORA [looks at ber incredulously]. But, Kristine, is that possible?

MRS. LINDE [smiles sadly and strokes NORA’s hair]. Oh, it sometimes happens, Nora.

NORA. So utterly alone. How terribly sad that must be for you. I have three lovely children. You can’t see them for the moment, because they’re out with their nanny. But now you must tell me all about yourself. . . .

MRS. LINDE. No, no, I want to hear about you.

NORA. No, you start. I won’t be selfish today. I must think only about your affairs today. But there’s just one thing I really must tell you. Have you heard about the great stroke of luck we’ve had in the last few days?

MRS. LINDE. No. What is it?

NORA. What do you think? My husband has just been made Bank Manager!

MRS. LINDE. Your husband? How splendid!

NORA. Isn’t it tremendous! It’s not a very steady way of making a living, you know, being a lawyer, especially if he refuses to take on anything that’s the least bit shady—which of course is what Torvald does, and I think he’s quite right. You can imagine how pleased we are! He starts at the Bank straight after New Year, and he’s getting a big salary and lots of commission. From now on we’ll be able to live quite differently . . . we’ll do just what we want. Oh, Kristine, I’m so happy and relieved. I must say it’s lovely to have plenty of money and not have to worry. Isn’t it?

MRS. LINDE. Yes. It must be nice to have enough, at any rate.

NORA. No, not just enough, but pots and pots of money.

MRS. LINDE [smiles]. Nora, Nora, haven’t you learned any sense yet? At school you used to be an awful spendthrift.
NORA. Yes, Torvald still says I am. [Wags her finger.] But little Nora isn’t as stupid as everybody thinks. Oh, we haven’t really been in a position where I could afford to spend a lot of money. We’ve both had to work.

MRS. LINDE. You too?

NORA. Yes, odd jobs—sewing, crochetwork, embroidery and things like that.
(Casually.) And one or two other things, besides. I suppose you know that Torvald left the Ministry when we got married. There weren’t any prospects of promotion in his department, and of course he needed to earn more money than he had before. But the first year he wore himself out completely. He had to take on all kinds of extra jobs, you know, and he found himself working all hours of the day and night. But he couldn’t go on like that; and he became seriously ill. The doctors said it was essential for him to go South.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I believe you spent a whole year in Italy, didn’t you?

NORA. That’s right. It wasn’t easy to get away, I can tell you. It was just after I’d had Ivar. But of course we had to go. Oh, it was an absolutely marvelous trip. And it saved Torvald’s life. But it cost an awful lot of money, Kristine.

MRS. LINDE. That I can well imagine.

NORA. Twelve hundred dollars. Four thousand eight hundred crowns. That’s a lot of money, Kristine.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, but in such circumstances, one is very lucky if one has it.

NORA. Well, we got it from Daddy, you see.

MRS. LINDE. Ah, that was it. It was just about then your father died, I believe, wasn’t it?

NORA. Yes, Kristine, just about then. And do you know, I couldn’t even go and look after him. Here was I expecting Ivar any day. And I also had poor Torvald, gravely ill, on my hands. Dear, kind Daddy! I never saw him again, Kristine. Oh, that’s the saddest thing that has happened to me in all my married life.

MRS. LINDE. I know you were very fond of him. But after that you left for Italy?

NORA. Yes, we had the money then, and the doctors said it was urgent. We left a month later.

MRS. LINDE. And your husband came back completely cured?

NORA. Fit as a fiddle!

MRS. LINDE. But . . . what about the doctor?

NORA. How do you mean?

MRS. LINDE. I thought the maid said something about the gentleman who came at the same time as me being a doctor.

NORA. Yes, that was Dr. Rank. But this isn’t a professional visit. He’s our best friend and he always looks in at least once a day. No, Torvald has never had a day’s illness since. And the children are fit and healthy, and so am I. [Jumps up and claps her hands.] Oh God, oh God, isn’t it marvelous to be alive, and to be happy, Kristine! . . . Oh, but I ought to be ashamed of myself . . . Here I go on talking about nothing but myself.
[She sits on a low stool near MRS. LINDE and lays her arms on her lap.] Oh, please, you mustn’t be angry with me! Tell me, is it really true that you didn’t love your husband? What made you marry him, then?

MRS. LINDE. My mother was still alive; she was bedridden and helpless. And then I had my two young brothers to look after as well. I didn’t think I would be justified in refusing him.
Nora. No, I dare say you are right. I suppose he was fairly wealthy then?
Mrs. Linde. He was quite well off, I believe. But the business was shaky.
When he died, it went all to pieces, and there just wasn’t anything left.
Nora. What then?
Mrs. Linde. Well, I had to fend for myself, opening a little shop, running a littile school, anything I could turn my hand to. These last three years have been one long relentless drudge. But now it’s finished, Nora. My poor dear mother doesn’t need me any more, she’s passed away. Nor the boys either; they’re at work now, they can look after themselves.
Nora. What a relief you must find it. . . .
Mrs. Linde. No, Nora! Just unutterably empty. Nobody to live for any more.
[Stands up restless.] That’s why I couldn’t stand it any longer being cut off up there. Surely it must be a bit easier here to find something to occupy your mind. If only I could manage to find a steady job of some kind, in an office perhaps. . . .
Nora. But, Kristine, that’s terribly exhausting; and you look so worn out even before you start. The best thing for you would be a little holiday at some quiet little resort.
Mrs. Linde [crosses to the window]. I haven’t any father I can fall back on for the money, Nora.
Nora [rises]. Oh, please, you mustn’t be angry with me!
Mrs. Linde [goes to her]. My dear Nora, you mustn’t be angry with me either. That’s the worst thing about people in my position, they become so bitter. One has nobody to work for, yet one has to be on the look-out all the time. Life has to go on, and one starts thinking only of oneself. Believe it or not, when you told me the good news about your step up, I was pleased not so much for your sake as for mine.
Nora. How do you mean? Ah, I see. You think Torvald might be able to do something for you.
Mrs. Linde. Yes, that’s exactly what I thought.
Nora. And so he shall, Kristine. Just leave things to me. I’ll bring it up so cleverly . . . I’ll think up something to put him in a good mood. Oh, I do so much want to help you.
Mrs. Linde. It is awfully kind of you, Nora, offering to do all this for me, particularly in your case, where you haven’t known much trouble or hardship in your own life.
Nora. When I . . . ? I haven’t known much . . . ?
Mrs. Linde [smiling]. Well, good heavens, a little bit of sewing to do and a few things like that. What a child you are, Nora!
Nora [tosses her bead and walks across the room]. I wouldn’t be too sure of that, if I were you.
Mrs. Linde. Oh?
Nora. You’re just like the rest of them. You all think I’m useless when it comes to anything really serious. . . .
Mrs. Linde. Come, come. . . .
Nora. You think I’ve never had anything much to contend with in this hard world.
Mrs. Linde. Nora dear, you’ve only just been telling me all the things you’ve had to put up with.
Nora. Pooh! They were just trivialities! [Softly:] I haven’t told you about the really big thing.
Mrs. Linde. What big thing? What do you mean?
NORA. I know you rather tend to look down on me, Kristine. But you shouldn’t, you know. You are proud of having worked so hard and so long for your mother.

MRS. LINDE. I’m sure I don’t look down on anybody. But it’s true what you say: I am both proud and happy when I think of how I was able to make Mother’s life a little easier towards the end.

NORA. And you are proud when you think of what you have done for your brothers, too.

MRS. LINDE. I think I have every right to be.

NORA. I think so too. But now I’m going to tell you something, Kristine. I too have something to be proud and happy about.

MRS. LINDE. I don’t doubt that. But what is it you mean?

NORA. Not so loud. Imagine if Torvald were to hear! He must never on any account . . . nobody must know about it, Kristine, nobody but you.

MRS. LINDE. But what is it?

NORA. Come over here. [She pulls her down on the sofa beside her.] Yes, Kristine, I too have something to be proud and happy about. I was the one who saved Torvald’s life.

MRS. LINDE. Saved . . . ? How . . . ?

NORA. I told you about our trip to Italy. Torvald would never have recovered but for that. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Well? Your father gave you what money was necessary. . . .

NORA [smiles]. That’s what Torvald thinks, and everybody else. But . . .

MRS. LINDE. But . . . ?

NORA. Daddy never gave us a penny. I was the one who raised the money.

MRS. LINDE. You? All that money?

NORA. Twelve hundred dollars. Four thousand eight hundred crowns. What do you say to that!

MRS. LINDE. But, Nora, how was it possible? Had you won a sweepstake or something?

NORA [contemptuously]. A sweepstake? Pooh! There would have been nothing to it then.

MRS. LINDE. Where did you get it from, then?

NORA [bums and smiles secretly]. H’m, tra-la-la!

MRS. LINDE. Because what you couldn’t do was borrow it.

NORA. Oh? Why not?

MRS. LINDE. Well, a wife can’t borrow without her husband’s consent.

NORA [fussing her bead]. Ah, but when it happens to be a wife with a bit of a sense for business . . . a wife who knows her way about things, then. . . .

MRS. LINDE. But, Nora, I just don’t understand. . . .

NORA. You don’t have to. I haven’t said I did borrow the money. I might have got it some other way. [Throws herself back on the sofa.] I might even have got it from some admirer. Anyone as reasonably attractive as I am. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Don’t be so silly!

NORA. Now you must be dying of curiosity, Kristine.

MRS. LINDE. Listen to me now, Nora dear—you haven’t done anything rash, have you?

NORA [sitting up again]. Is it rash to save your husband’s life?
MRS. LINDE. I think it was rash to do anything without telling him. . . .

NORA. But the whole point was that he mustn’t know anything. Good heavens, can’t you see! He wasn’t even supposed to know how desperately ill he was. It was me the doctors came and told his life was in danger, that the only way to save him was to go South for a while. Do you think I didn’t try talking him into it first? I began dropping hints about how nice it would be if I could be taken on a little trip abroad, like other young wives. I wept, I pleaded. I told him he ought to show some consideration for my condition, and let me have a bit of my own way. And then I suggested he might take out a loan. But at that he nearly lost his temper, Kristine. He said I was being frivolous, that it was his duty as a husband not to give in to all these whims and fancies of mine—as I do believe he called them. All right, I thought, somehow you’ve got to be saved. And it was then I found a way. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Did your husband never find out from your father that the money hadn’t come from him?

NORA. No, never. It was just about the time Daddy died. I’d intended letting him into the secret and asking him not to give me away. But when he was so ill . . . I’m sorry to say it never became necessary.

MRS. LINDE. And you never confided in your husband?

NORA. Good heavens, how could you ever imagine such a thing! When he’s so strict about such matters! Besides, Torvald is a man with a good deal of pride—it would be terribly embarrassing and humiliating for him if he thought he owed anything to me. It would spoil everything between us; this happy home of ours would never be the same again.

MRS. LINDE. Are you never going to tell him?

NORA [reflectively, half smiling]. Oh yes, some day perhaps . . . in many years time, when I’m no longer as pretty as I am now. You mustn’t laugh! What I mean of course is when Torvald isn’t quite so much in love with me as he is now, when he’s lost interest in watching me dance, or get dressed up, or recite. Then it might be a good thing to have something in reserve. . . . [Breaks off.] What nonsense! That day will never come. Well, what have you got to say to my big secret, Kristine? Still think I’m not much good for anything? One thing, though, it’s meant a lot of worry for me, I can tell you. It hasn’t always been easy to meet my obligations when the time came. You know in business there is something called quarterly interest, and other things called instalments, and these are always terribly difficult things to cope with. So what I’ve had to do is save a little here and there, you see, wherever I could. I couldn’t really save anything out of the housekeeping, because Torvald has to live in decent style. I couldn’t let the children go about badly dressed either—I felt any money I got for them had to go on them alone. Such sweet little things!

MRS. LINDE. Poor Nora! So it had to come out of your own allowance?

NORA. Of course. After all, I was the one it concerned most. Whenever Torvald gave me money for new clothes and such-like, I never spent more than half. And always I bought the simplest and cheapest things. It’s a blessing most things look well on me, so Torvald never noticed anything. But sometimes I did feel it was a bit hard, Kristine, because it is nice to be well dressed, isn’t it?
MRS. LINDE. Yes, I suppose it is.

NORA. I have had some other sources of income, of course. Last winter I was lucky enough to get quite a bit of copying to do. So I shut myself up every night and sat and wrote through to the small hours of the morning. Oh, sometimes I was so tired, so tired. But it was tremendous fun all the same, sitting there working and earning money like that. It was almost like being a man.

MRS. LINDE. And how much have you been able to pay off like this?

NORA. Well, I can’t tell exactly. It’s not easy to know where you are with transactions of this kind, you understand. All I know is I’ve paid off just as much as I could scrape together. Many’s the time I was at my wit’s end. [Smiles.] Then I used to sit here and pretend that some rich old gentleman had fallen in love with me. . . .

MRS. LINDE. What! What gentleman?

NORA. Oh, rubbish! . . . and that now he had died, and when they opened his will, there in big letters were the words: “My entire fortune is to be paid over, immediately and in cash, to charming Mrs. Nora Helmer.”

MRS. LINDE. But my dear Nora—who is this man?

NORA. Good heavens, don’t you understand? There never was any old gentleman; it was just something I used to sit here pretending, time and time again, when I didn’t know where to turn next for money. But it doesn’t make very much difference; as far as I’m concerned, the old boy can do what he likes, I’m tired of him; I can’t be bothered any more with him or his will. Because now all my worries are over. [Jumping up.] Oh God, what a glorious thought, Kristine! No more worries! Just think of being without a care in the world . . . being able to romp with the children, and making the house nice and attractive, and having things just as Torvald likes to have them! And then spring will soon be here, and blue skies. And maybe we can go away somewhere. I might even see something of the sea again. Oh, yes! When you’re happy, life is a wonderful thing!

[The doorbell is heard in the hall.]

MRS. LINDE [gets up]. There’s the bell. Perhaps I’d better go.

NORA. No, do stay, please. I don’t suppose it’s for me; it’s probably somebody for Torvald . . .

MAID [in the doorway]. Excuse me, ma’am, but there’s a gentleman here wants to see Mr. Helmer, and I didn’t quite know . . . because the doctor is in there. . . .

NORA. Who is the gentleman?

KROGSTAD [in the doorway]. It’s me, Mrs. Helmer.

[MRS. LINDE starts, then turns away to the window.]

NORA [fense, takes a step towards him and speaks in a low voice]. You? What is it? What do you want to talk to my husband about?

KROGSTAD. Bank matters . . . in a manner of speaking. I work at the bank, and I hear your husband is to be the new manager. . . .

NORA. So it’s . . .

KROGSTAD. Just routine business matters, Mrs. Helmer. Absolutely nothing else.

NORA. Well then, please go into his study.
[She nods impassively and shuts the ball door behind him; then she walks across and sees to the stove.]

MRS. LINDE. Nora . . . who was that man?
NORA. His name is Krogstad.
MRS. LINDE. So it really was him.
NORA. Do you know the man?
MRS. LINDE. I used to know him . . . a good many years ago. He was a solicitor’s clerk in our district for a while.
NORA. Yes, so he was.
MRS. LINDE. How he’s changed!
NORA. His marriage wasn’t a very happy one, I believe.
MRS. LINDE. He’s a widower now, isn’t he?
NORA. With a lot of children. There, it’ll burn better now.

[She closes the stove door and moves the rocking chair a little to one side.]

MRS. LINDE. He does a certain amount of business on the side, they say?
NORA. Oh? Yes, it’s always possible. I just don’t know . . . But let’s not think about business . . . it’s all so dull.

[DR. RANK comes in from HEMER’s study.]

DR. RANK [still in the doorway]. No, no, Torvald, I won’t intrude. I’ll just look in on your wife for a moment. [Shuts the door and notices MRS. LINDE.] Oh, I beg your pardon. I’m afraid I’m intruding here as well.
NORA. No, not at all! [Introduces them.] Dr. Rank . . . Mrs. Linde.
RANK. Ah! A name I’ve often heard mentioned in this house. I believe I came past you on the stairs as I came in.
MRS. LINDE. I have to take things slowly going upstairs. I find it rather a trial.
RANK. Ah, some little disability somewhere, eh?
MRS. LINDE. Just a bit run down, I think, actually.
RANK. Is that all? Then I suppose you’ve come to town for a good rest—doing the rounds of the parties?
MRS. LINDE. I have come to look for work.
RANK. Is that supposed to be some kind of sovereign remedy for being run down?
MRS. LINDE. One must live, Doctor.
RANK. Yes, it’s generally thought to be necessary.
NORA. Come, come, Dr. Rank. You are quite as keen to live as anybody.
RANK. Quite keen, yes. Miserable as I am, I’m quite ready to let things drag on as long as possible. All my patients are the same. Even those with a moral affliction are no different. As a matter of fact, there’s a bad case of that kind in talking with Helmer at this very moment . . .
MRS. LINDE [softly]. Ah!
NORA. Whom do you mean?
RANK. A person called Krogstad—nobody you would know. He’s rotten to the core. But even he began talking about having to live, as though it were something terribly important.
NORA. Oh? And what did he want to talk to Torvald about?
RANK. I honestly don’t know. All I heard was something about the Bank.
NORA. I didn’t know that Krog . . . that this Mr. Krogstad had anything to do with the Bank.

RANK. Oh yes, he’s got some kind of job down there. [To MRS. LINDE.] I wonder if you’ve got people in your part of the country too who go rushing round sniffing out cases of moral corruption, and then installing the individuals concerned in nice, well-paid jobs where they can keep them under observation. Sound, decent people have to be content to stay out in the cold.

MRS. LINDE. Yet surely it’s the sick who most need to be brought in.

RANK [shrugs his shoulders]. Well, there we have it. It’s that attitude that’s turning society into a clinic.

[NORA, lost in her own thoughts, breaks into smothered laughter and claps her hands.]

RANK. Why are you laughing at that? Do you know in fact what society is?

NORA. What do I care about your silly old society? I was laughing about something quite different . . . something frightfully funny. Tell me, Dr. Rank, are all the people who work at the Bank dependent on Torvald now?

RANK. Is that what you find so frightfully funny?

NORA [smiles and hums]. Never you mind! Never you mind! [Walks about the room.] Yes, it really is terribly amusing to think that we . . . that Torvald now has power over so many people. [She takes the bag out of her pocket.] Dr. Rank, what about a little macaroon?

RANK. Look at this, eh? Macaroons. I thought they were forbidden here.

NORA. Yes, but these are some Kristine gave me.

MRS. LINDE. What? I . . . ?

NORA. Now, now, you needn’t be alarmed. You weren’t to know that Torvald had forbidden them. He’s worried in case they ruin my teeth, you know. Still . . . what’s it matter once in a while! Don’t you think so, Dr. Rank? Here! [She pops a macaroon into his mouth.] And you too, Kristine. And I shall have one as well; just a little one . . . or two at the most. [She walks about the room again.] Really I am so happy. There’s just one little thing I’d love to do now.

RANK. What’s that?

NORA. Something I’d love to say in front of Torvald.

RANK. Then why can’t you?

NORA. No, I daren’t. It’s not very nice.

MRS. LINDE. Not very nice?

RANK. Well, in that case it might not be wise. But to us, I don’t see why . . . .

What is this you would love to say in front of Helmer?

NORA. I would simply love to say: “Damn.”

RANK. Are you mad!

MRS. LINDE. Good gracious, Nora . . . !

RANK. Say it! Here he is!

NORA [hiding the bag of macaroons]. Sh! Sh!

[HelmER comes out of his room, his overcoat over his arm and his hat in his hand.]

NORA [going over to him]. Well, Torvald dear, did you get rid of him?

HELMER. Yes, he’s just gone.
NORA. Let me introduce you. This is Kristine, who has just arrived in town. . . .
HELMER. Kristine . . . ? You must forgive me, but I don’t think I know . . .
HELMER. Ah, indeed. A school friend of my wife’s, presumably.
MRS. LINDE. Yes, we were girls together.
NORA. Fancy, Torvald, she’s come all this long way just to have a word with you.
HELMER. How is that?
MRS. LINDE. Well, it wasn’t really . . .
NORA. The thing is, Kristine is terribly clever at office work, and she’s frightfully keen on finding a job with some efficient man, so that she can learn even more. . . .
HELMER. Very sensible, Mrs. Linde.
NORA. And then when she heard you’d been made Bank Manager—there was a bit in the paper about it—she set off at once. Torvald please! You will try and do something for Kristine, won’t you? For my sake?
HELMER. Well, that’s not altogether impossible. You are a widow, I presume?
MRS. LINDE. Yes.
HELMER. And you’ve had some experience in business?
MRS. LINDE. A fair amount.
HELMER. Well, it’s quite probable I can find you a job, I think. . . .
NORA [clapping her hands]. There, you see!
HELMER. You have come at a fortunate moment, Mrs. Linde . . .
MRS. LINDE. Oh, how can I ever thank you . . . ?
HELMER. Not a bit. [He puts on his overcoat.] But for the present I must ask you to excuse me. . . .
RANK. Wait. I’m coming with you.
[He fetches his fur coat from the ball and warms it at the stove.]
NORA. Don’t be long, Torvald dear.
HELMER. Not more than an hour, that’s all.
NORA. Are you leaving too, Kristine?
MRS. LINDE [putting on her things]. Yes, I must go and see if I can’t find myself a room.
HELMER. Perhaps we can all walk down the road together.
NORA [helping her]. What a nuisance we are so limited for space here. I’m afraid it just isn’t possible. . . .
MRS. LINDE. Oh, you mustn’t dream of it! Goodbye, Nora dear, and thanks for everything.
NORA. Goodbye for the present. But . . . you’ll be coming back this evening, of course. And you too, Dr. Rank? What’s that? If you are up to it? Of course you’ll be up to it. Just wrap yourself up well.
[They go out, talking, into the ball; children’s voices can be heard on the stairs.]
NORA. Here they are! Here they are! [She runs to the front door and opens it. ANNE MARIE, the nursemaid, enters with the children.] Come in!
Come in! [She bends down and kisses them.] Ah! my sweet little darlings. . . . You see them, Kristine? Aren’t they lovely!
RANK. Don’t stand here chattering in this draught!
HELMER. Come along, Mrs. Linde. The place now becomes unbearable for anybody except mothers.

[DR. RANK, HELMER and MRS. LINDE go down the stairs: the NURSEMAID comes into the room with the children, then Nora, shutting the door behind her]

NORA. How fresh and bright you look! My, what red cheeks you've got! Like apples and roses. [During the following, the children keep chattering away to her.] Have you had a nice time? That's splendid. And you gave Emmy and Bob a ride on your sledge? Did you now? Both together! Fancy that! There's a clever boy, Ivar. Oh, let me take her a little while, Anne Marie. There's my sweet little babypdoll! [She takes the youngest of the children from the NURSEMAID and dances with her] All right, Mummy will dance with Bobby too. What? You've been throwing snowballs? Oh, I wish I'd been there. No, don't bother, Anne Marie, I'll help them off with their things. No, please, let me—I like doing it. You go on in, you look frozen. You'll find some hot coffee on the stove. [The NURSEMAID goes into the room, left. NORA takes off the children's coats and hats and throws them down anywhere, while the children all talk at once.] Really! A great big dog came running after you? But he didn't bite. No, the doggies wouldn't bite my pretty little dollies. You mustn't touch the parcels, Ivar! What are they? Wouldn't you like to know! No, no, that's nasty. Now? Shall we play something? What shall we play? Hide and seek? Yes, let's play hide and seek. Bob can hide first. Me first? All right, let me hide first.

[She and the children play, laughing and shrieking, in this room and in the adjacent room on the right. Finally NORA hides under the table; the children come rushing in to look for her but cannot find her; they hear her stifled laughter, rush to the table, lift up the tablecloth and find her. Tremendous shouts of delight. She creeps out and pretends to frighten them. More shouts. Meanwhile there has been a knock at the front door, which nobody has heard. The door half opens, and KROGSTAD can be seen. He waits a little; the game continues.]

KROGSTAD. I beg your pardon, Mrs. Helmer.

NORA [turns with a stifled cry and half jumps up]. Ah! What do you want?

KROGSTAD. Excuse me. The front door was standing open. Somebody must have forgotten to shut it.

NORA [standing up]. My husband isn't at home, Mr. Krogstad.

KROGSTAD. I know.

NORA. Well. . . . what are you doing here?

KROGSTAD. I want a word with you.

NORA. With . . . ? [Quietly, to the children.] Go to Anne Marie. What? No, the strange man won't do anything to Mummy. When he's gone we'll have another game. [She leads the children into the room, left, and shuts the door after them; tense and uneasy.] You want to speak to me?

KROGSTAD. Yes, I do.

NORA. Today? But it isn't the first of the month yet. . . .
Chapter 28 / Two Plays about Marriage

Act I

KROGSTAD. No, it's Christmas Eve. It depends entirely on you what sort of Christmas you have.

NORA. What do you want? Today I can't possibly . . .

KROGSTAD. Let's not talk about that for the moment. It's something else. You've got a moment to spare?

NORA. Yes, I suppose so, though . . .

KROGSTAD. Good. I was sitting in Olsen's café, and I saw your husband go down the road . . .

NORA. Did you?

KROGSTAD. . . . with a lady.

NORA. Well?

KROGSTAD. May I be so bold as to ask whether that lady was a Mrs. Linde?

NORA. Yes.

KROGSTAD. Just arrived in town?

NORA. Yes, today.

KROGSTAD. And she's a good friend of yours?

NORA. Yes, she is. But I can't see . . .

KROGSTAD. I also knew her once.

NORA. I know.

KROGSTAD. Oh? So you know all about it. I thought as much. Well, I want to ask you straight: is Mrs. Linde getting a job in the Bank?

NORA. How dare you cross-examine me like this, Mr. Krogstad? You, one of my husband's subordinates? But since you've asked me, I'll tell you. Yes, Mrs. Linde has got a job. And I'm the one who got it for her, Mr. Krogstad. Now you know.

KROGSTAD. So my guess was right.

NORA. [walking up and down]. Oh, I think I can say that some of us have a little influence now and again. Just because one happens to be a woman, that doesn't mean . . . . People in subordinate positions, ought to take care they don't offend anybody . . . . who . . . him . . .

KROGSTAD. . . . has influence?

NORA. Exactly.

KROGSTAD. [changing his tone]. Mrs. Helmer, will you have the goodness to use your influence on my behalf?

NORA. What? What do you mean?

KROGSTAD. Will you be so good as to see that I keep my modest little job at the Bank?

NORA. What do you mean? Who wants to take it away from you?

KROGSTAD. Oh, you needn't try and pretend to me you don't know. I can quite see that this friend of yours isn't particularly anxious to bump up against me. And I can also see now whom I can thank for being given the sack.

NORA. But I assure you . . .

KROGSTAD. All right, all right. But to come to the point: there's still time. And I advise you to use your influence to stop it.

NORA. But, Mr. Krogstad, I have no influence.

KROGSTAD. Haven't you? I thought just now you said yourself . . .

NORA. I didn't mean it that way, of course. Me? What makes you think I've got any influence of that kind over my husband?

KROGSTAD. I know your husband from our student days. I don't suppose he is any more steadfast than other married men.
Act I

Henrik Ibsen

NORA. You speak disrespectfully of my husband like that and I'll show you the door.

KROGSTAD. So the lady's got courage.

NORA. I'm not frightened of you any more. After New Year's I'll soon be finished with the whole business.

KROGSTAD [controlling himself]. Listen to me, Mrs. Helmer. If necessary I shall fight for my little job in the Bank as if I were fighting for my life.

NORA. So it seems.

KROGSTAD. It's not just for the money, that's the last thing I care about. There's something else... well, I might as well out with it. You see it's like this. You know as well as anybody that some years ago I got myself mixed up in a bit of trouble.

NORA. I believe I've heard something of the sort.

KROGSTAD. It never got as far as the courts; but immediately it was as if all paths were barred to me. So I started going in for the sort of business you know about. I had to do something, and I think I can say I haven't been one of the worst. But now I have to get out of it. My sons are growing up; for their sake I must try and win back what respectability I can. That job in the Bank was like the first step on the ladder for me. And now your husband wants to kick me off the ladder again, back into the mud.

NORA. But in God's name, Mr. Krogstad, it's quite beyond my power to help you.

KROGSTAD. That's because you haven't the will to help me. But I have ways of making you.

NORA. You wouldn't go and tell my husband I owe you money?

KROGSTAD. Suppose I did tell him?

NORA. It would be a rotten shame. [Half choking with tears.] That secret is all my pride and joy—why should he have to hear about it in this nasty, horrid way... hear about it from you. You would make things horribly unpleasant for me... .

KROGSTAD. Merely unpleasant?

NORA [vehemently]. Go on, do it then! It'll be all the worse for you. Because then my husband will see for himself what a bad man you are, and then you certainly won't be able to keep your job.

KROGSTAD. I asked whether it was only a bit of domestic unpleasantness you were afraid of?

NORA. If my husband gets to know about it, he'll pay off what's owing at once. And then we'd have nothing more to do with you.

KROGSTAD [taking a pace towards her]. Listen, Mrs. Helmer, either you haven't a very good memory, or else you don't understand much about business. I'd better make the position a little bit clearer for you.

NORA. How do you mean?

KROGSTAD. When your husband was ill, you came to me for the loan of twelve hundred dollars.

NORA. I didn't know of anybody else.

KROGSTAD. I promised to find you the money. . . .

NORA. And you did find it.

KROGSTAD. I promised to find you the money on certain conditions. At the time you were so concerned about your husband's illness, and so anxious to get the money for going away with, that I don't think you paid very much attention to all the incidentals. So there is perhaps some point in reminding you of them. Well, I promised to find you the money against an IOU which I drew up for you.

NORA. Yes, and which I signed.

KROGSTAD. Very good. But below that I added a few lines, by which your father was to stand security. This your father was to sign.

NORA. Was to . . . ? He did sign it.

KROGSTAD. I had left the date blank. The idea was that your father was to add the date himself when he signed it. Remember?

NORA. Yes, I think . . .

KROGSTAD. I then gave you the IOU to post to your father. Wasn’t that so?

NORA. Yes.

KROGSTAD. Which of course you did at once. Because only about five or six days later you brought it back to me with your father’s signature. I then paid out the money.

NORA. Well? Haven’t I paid the installments regularly?

KROGSTAD. Yes, fairly. But . . . coming back to what we were talking about . . . that was a pretty bad period you were going through then, Mrs. Helmer.

NORA. Yes. It was.

KROGSTAD. Your father was seriously ill, I believe.

NORA. He was very near the end.

KROGSTAD. And died shortly afterwards?

NORA. Yes.

KROGSTAD. Tell me, Mrs. Helmer, do you happen to remember which day your father died? The exact date, I mean.

NORA. Daddy died on 29 September.

KROGSTAD. Quite correct. I made some inquiries. Which brings up a rather curious point [takes out a paper] which I simply cannot explain.

NORA. Curious . . . ? I don’t know . . .

KROGSTAD. The curious thing is, Mrs. Helmer, that your father signed this document three days after his death.

NORA. What? I don’t understand . . .

KROGSTAD. Your father died on 29 September. But look here. Your father has dated his signature 2 October. Isn’t that rather curious, Mrs. Helmer? [NORA remains silent.] It’s also remarkable that the words ‘2 October’ and the year are not in your father’s handwriting, but in a handwriting I rather think I recognize. Well, perhaps that could be explained. Your father might have forgotten to date his signature, and then somebody else might have made a guess at the date later, before the fact of your father’s death was known. There is nothing wrong in that. What really matters is the signature. And that is of course genuine, Mrs. Helmer? It really was your father who wrote his name here?

NORA [after a moment’s silence, throws her head back and looks at him defiantly]. No, it wasn’t. It was me who signed father’s name.

KROGSTAD. Listen to me. I suppose you realize that that is a very dangerous confession?

NORA. Why? You’ll soon have all your money back.

KROGSTAD. Let me ask you a question: why didn’t you send that document to your father?
NORA. It was impossible. Daddy was ill. If I’d asked him for his signature, I’d have to tell him what the money was for. Don’t you see, when he was as ill as that I couldn’t go and tell him that my husband’s life was in danger. It was simply impossible.

KROGSTAD. It would have been better for you if you had abandoned the whole trip.

NORA. No, that was impossible. This was the thing that was to save my husband’s life. I couldn’t give it up.

KROGSTAD. But did it never strike you that this was fraudulent . . . ?

NORA. That wouldn’t have meant anything to me. Why should I worry about you? I couldn’t stand you, not when you insisted on going through with all those cold-blooded formalities, knowing all the time what a critical state my husband was in.

KROGSTAD. Mrs. Helmer, it’s quite clear you still haven’t the faintest idea what it is you’ve committed. But let me tell you, my own offence was no more and no worse than that, and it ruined my entire reputation.

NORA. You? Are you trying to tell me that you once risked everything to save your wife’s life?

KROGSTAD. The law takes no account of motives.

NORA. Then they must be very bad laws.

KROGSTAD. Bad or not, if I produce this document in court, you’ll be condemned according to them.

NORA. I don’t believe it. Isn’t a daughter entitled to try and save her father from worry and anxiety on his deathbed? Isn’t a wife entitled to save her husband’s life? I might not know very much about the law, but I feel sure of one thing: it must say somewhere that things like this are allowed. You mean to say you don’t know that—you, when it’s your job? You must be a rotten lawyer, Mr. Krogstad.

KROGSTAD. That may be. But when it comes to business transactions—like the sort between us two—perhaps you’ll admit I know something about them? Good. Now you must please yourself. But I tell you this: if I’m pitched out a second time, you are going to keep me company.

NORA [stands thoughtfully for a moment, then tosses her head]. Rubbish! He’s just trying to scare me. I’m not such a fool as all that. [Begins gathering up the children’s clothes; after a moment she stops.] Yet . . . ? No, it’s impossible! I did it for love, didn’t I?

THE CHILDREN [in the doorway, left]. Mummy, the gentleman’s just gone out of the gate.

NORA. Yes, I know. But you mustn’t say anything to anybody about that gentleman. You hear? Not even to Daddy!

THE CHILDREN. All right, Mummy. Are you going to play again?

NORA. No, not just now.

THE CHILDREN. But Mummy, you promised!

NORA. Yes, but I can’t just now. Off you go now, I have a lot to do. Off you go, my darlings. [She bends them carefully into the other room and shuts the door behind them. She sits down on the sofa, picks up her embroidery and works a few stitches, but soon stops.] No! [She flings her work down, stands up, goes to the ball door and calls out.] Helene! Fetch the tree in for me, please. [She walks across to the table, left, and opens the drawer; again pauses.] No, really, it’s quite impossible!

MAID [with the Christmas tree]. Where shall I put it, ma’am?

NORA. On the floor there, in the middle.

MAID. Anything else you want me to bring?

NORA. No, thank you. I’ve got what I want.

[The maid has put the tree down and goes out.]

NORA [busy decorating the tree]. Candles here . . . and flowers here—Revolting man! It’s all nonsense! There’s nothing to worry about. We’ll have a lovely Christmas tree. And I’ll do anything you want me to, Torvald; I’ll sing for you, dance for you. . . .

[HELMER, with a bundle of documents under his arm, comes in by the hall door.]

NORA. Ah, back again already?

HELMER. Yes. Anybody been?

NORA. Here? No.

HELMER. That’s funny. I just saw Krogstad leave the house.

NORA. Oh? O yes, that’s right. Krogstad was here a minute.

HELMER. Nora, I can tell by your face he’s been asking you to put a good word in for him.

NORA. Yes.

HELMER. And you were to pretend it was your own idea? You were to keep quiet about his having been here. He asked you to do that as well, didn’t he?

NORA. Yes, Torvald. But . . .

HELMER. Nora, Nora, what possessed you to do a thing like that? Talking to a person like him, making him promises? And then on top of everything, to tell me a lie!

NORA. A lie . . . ?

HELMER. Didn’t you say that nobody had been here? [Wagging his finger at her.] Never again must my little song-bird do a thing like that! Little song-birds must keep their pretty little beaks out of mischief; no chirruping out of tune! [Puts his arm round her waist.] Isn’t that the way we want things to be? Yes, of course it is. [Lets her go.] So let’s say no more about it. [Sits down by the stove.] Ah, nice and cozy here!

[He glances through his papers.]

NORA [busy with the Christmas tree, after a short pause]. Torvald!

HELMER. Yes.

NORA. I’m so looking forward to the fancy dress ball at the Stenborgs on Boxing Day.

HELMER. And I’m terribly curious to see what sort of surprise you’ve got for me.

NORA. Oh, it’s too silly.

HELMER. Oh?

NORA. I just can’t think of anything suitable. Everything seems so absurd, so pointless.

HELMER. Has my little Nora come to that conclusion?
Act I Henrik Ibsen

NORA [behind his chair; her arms on the chair-back]. Are you very busy, Torvald?

HELMER. Oh... . .

NORA. What are all those papers?

HELMER. Bank matters.

NORA. Already?

HELMER. I have persuaded the retiring manager to give me authority to make any changes in organization or personnel I think necessary. I have to work on it over the Christmas week. I want everything straight by the New Year.

NORA. So that was why that poor Krogstad... . .

HELMER. Hm!

NORA [still leaning against the back of the chair; running her fingers through his hair]. If you hadn’t been so busy, Torvald, I’d have asked you to do me an awfully big favor.

HELMER. Let me hear it. What’s it to be?

NORA. Nobody’s got such good taste as you. And the thing is I do so want to look my best at the fancy dress ball. Torvald, couldn’t you give me some advice and tell me what you think I ought to go as, and how I should arrange my costume?

HELMER. Aha! So my impulsive little woman is asking for somebody to come to her rescue, eh?

NORA. Please, Torvald, I never get anywhere without your help.

HELMER. Very well, I’ll think about it. We’ll find something.

NORA. That’s sweet of you. [She goes across to the tree again; pause.] How pretty these red flowers look. —Tell me, was it really something terribly wrong this man Krogstad did?

HELMER. Forgery. Have you any idea what that means?

NORA. Perhaps circumstances left him no choice?

HELMER. Maybe. Or perhaps, like so many others, he just didn’t think. I am not so heartless that I would necessarily want to condemn a man for a single mistake like that.

NORA. Oh no, Torvald, of course not!

HELMER. Many a man might be able to redeem himself, if he honestly confessed his guilt and took his punishment.

NORA. Punishment?

HELMER. But that wasn’t the way Krogstad chose. He dodged what was due to him by a cunning trick. And that’s what has been the cause of his corruption.

NORA. Do you think it would... . .?

HELMER. Just think how a man with a thing like that on his conscience will always be having to lie and cheat and dissemble; he can never drop the mask, not even with his own wife and children. And the children—that’s the most terrible part of it, Nora.

NORA. Why?

HELMER. A fog of lies like that in a household, and it spreads disease and infection to every part of it. Every breath the children take in that kind of house is reeking with evil germs.

NORA [closer behind him]. Are you sure of that?

HELMER. My dear Nora, as a lawyer I know what I’m talking about. Practically all juvenile delinquents come from homes where the mother is dishonest.
Chapter 28 / Two Plays about Marriage

Act II

NORA. Why mothers particularly?

HELMER. It’s generally traceable to the mothers, but of course fathers can have the same influence. Every lawyer knows that only too well. And yet there’s Krogstad been poisoning his own children for years with lies and deceit. That’s the reason I call him morally depraved. [Holds out his hands to her.] That’s why my sweet little Nora must promise me not to try putting in any more good words for him. Shake hands on it. Well? What’s this? Give me your hand. There now! That’s settled. I assure you I would have found it impossible to work with him. I quite literally feel physically sick in the presence of such people.

NORA [draws her hand away and walks over to the other side of the Christmas tree]. How hot it is in here! And I still have such a lot to do.

HELMER [stands up and collects his papers together]. Yes, I’d better think of getting some of this read before dinner. I must also think about your costume. And I might even be able to lay my hands on something to wrap in gold paper and hang on the Christmas tree. [He lays his hand on her head.] My precious little singing bird.

[He goes into his study and shuts the door behind him.]

NORA [quietly, after a pause]. Nonsense! It can’t be. It’s impossible. It must be impossible.

MAID [in the doorway, left]. The children keep asking so nicely if they can come in and see Mummy.

NORA. No, no, don’t let them in! You stay with them, Anne Marie.

MAID. Very well, ma’am.

[She shuts the door.]

NORA [pale with terror]. Corrupt my children . . . ! Poison my home? [Short pause; she throws back her head.] It’s not true! It could never, never be true!

Act II

The same room. In the corner beside the piano stands the Christmas tree, stripped, bedraggled and with its candles burnt out. NORA’S outdoor things lie on the sofa. NORA, alone there, walks about restlessly; at last she stops by the sofa and picks up her coat.

NORA [putting her coat down again]. Somebody’s coming! [Crosses to the door, listens.] No, it’s nobody. Nobody will come today, of course, Christmas Day—nor tomorrow, either. But perhaps . . . [She opens the door and looks out.] No, nothing in the letter box; quite empty. [Comes forward.] Oh, nonsense! He didn’t mean it seriously. Things like that can’t happen. It’s impossible. Why, I have three small children.

[The NURSEMAID comes from the room, left, carrying a big cardboard box.]

NURSEMAID. I finally found it, the box with the fancy dress costumes.

NORA. Thank you. Put it on the table, please.

NURSEMAID [does this]. But I’m afraid they are in an awful mess.

NORA. Oh, if only I could rip them up into a thousand pieces!
NURSEMAID. Good heavens, they can be mended all right, with a bit of patience.

NORA. Yes, I'll go over and get Mrs. Linde to help me.

NURSEMAID. Out again? In this terrible weather? You'll catch your death of cold, Ma'am.

NORA. Oh, worse things might happen. —How are the children?

NURSEMAID. Playing with their Christmas presents, poor little things, but...

NORA. Do they keep asking for me?

NURSEMAID. They are so used to being with their Mummy.

NORA. Yes, Anne Marie, from now on I can't be with them as often as I was before.

NURSEMAID. Ah well, children get used to anything in time.

NORA. Do you think so? Do you think they would forget their Mummy if she went away for good?

NURSEMAID. Good gracious—for good?

NORA. Tell me, Anne Marie—I've often wondered—how on earth could you bear to hand your child over to strangers?

NURSEMAID. Well, there was nothing else for it when I had to come and nurse my little Nora.

NORA. Yes but... how could you bring yourself to do it?

NURSEMAID. When I had the chance of such a good place? When a poor girl's been in trouble she must make the best of things. Because he didn't help, the rotter.

NORA. But your daughter will have forgotten you.

NURSEMAID. Oh no, she hasn't. She wrote to me when she got confirmed, and again when she got married.

NORA. [putting her arms round her neck]. Dear old Anne Marie, you were a good mother to me when I was little.

NURSEMAID. My poor little Nora never had any other mother but me.

NORA. And if my little ones only had you, I know you would. ... Oh, what am I talking about! [She opens the box.] Go in to them. I must... Tomorrow I'll let you see how pretty I am going to look.

NURSEMAID. Ah, there'll be nobody at the ball as pretty as my Nora.

NORA. [begins unpacking the box, but soon throws it down]. Oh, if only I dare go out. If only I could be sure nobody would come. And that nothing would happen in the meantime here at home. Rubbish—nobody's going to come. I mustn't think about it. Brush this muff. Pretty gloves, pretty gloves! I'll put it right out of my mind. One, two, three, four, five, six... [Screams.] Ah, they are coming. ... [She starts towards the door, but stops irresolute. MRS. LINDE comes from the ball, where she has taken off her things.] Oh, it's you, Kristine. There's nobody else out there, is there? I'm so glad you've come.

MRS. LINDE. I heard you'd been over looking for me.

NORA. Yes, I was just passing. There's something you must help me with. Come and sit beside me on the sofa here. You see, the Stenborgs are having a fancy dress party upstairs tomorrow evening, and now Torvald wants me to go as a Neapolitan fisher lass and dance the tarantella. I learned it in Capri, you know.

MRS. LINDE. Well, well! So you are going to do a party piece?
NORA. Torvald says I should. Look, here’s the costume, Torvald had it made for me down there. But it’s got all torn and I simply don’t know.

MRS. LINDE. We’ll soon have that put right. It’s only the trimming come away here and there. Got a needle and thread? Ah, here’s what we are after.

NORA. It’s awfully kind of you.

MRS. LINDE. So you are going to be all dressed up tomorrow, Nora? Tell you what—I’ll pop over for a minute to see you in all your finery. But I’m quite forgetting to thank you for the pleasant time we had last night.

NORA [gets up and walks across the room]. Somehow I didn’t think yesterday was as nice as things generally are.—You should have come to town a little earlier, Kristine.—Yes, Torvald certainly knows how to make things pleasant about the place.

MRS. LINDE. You too, I should say. You are not your father’s daughter for nothing. But tell me, is Dr. Rank always as depressed as he was last night?

NORA. No, last night it was rather obvious. He’s got something seriously wrong with him, you know. Tuberculosis of the spine, poor fellow. His father was a horrible man, who used to have mistresses and things like that. That’s why the son was always ailing, right from being a child.

MRS. LINDE [lowering her sewing]. But my dear Nora, how do you come to know about things like that?

NORA [walking about the room]. Huh! When you’ve got three children, you get these visits from . . . women who have had a certain amount of medical training. And you hear all sorts of things from them.

MRS. LINDE [begins sewing again; short silence]. Does Dr. Rank call in every day?

NORA. Every single day. He was Torvald’s best friend as a boy, and he’s a good friend of mine, too. Dr. Rank is almost like one of the family.

MRS. LINDE. But tell me—is he really genuine? What I mean is: doesn’t he sometimes rather turn on the charm?

NORA. No, on the contrary. What makes you think that?

MRS. LINDE. When you introduced me yesterday, he claimed he’d often heard my name in this house. But afterwards I noticed your husband hadn’t the faintest idea who I was. Then how is it that Dr. Rank should. . . .

NORA. Oh yes, it was quite right what he said, Kristine. You see Torvald is so terribly in love with me that he says he wants me all to himself. When we were first married, it even used to make him sort of jealous if I only as much as mentioned any of my old friends from back home. So of course I stopped doing it. But I often talk to Dr. Rank about such things. He likes hearing about them.

MRS. LINDE. Listen, Nora! In lots of ways you are still a child. Now, I’m a good deal older than you, and a bit more experienced. I’ll tell you something: I think you ought to give up all this business with Dr. Rank.

NORA. Give up what business?

MRS. LINDE. The whole thing, I should say. Weren’t you saying yesterday something about a rich admirer who was to provide you with money. . . .

NORA. One who’s never existed, I regret to say. But what of it?

MRS. LINDE. Has Dr. Rank money?
NORA. Yes, he has.

MRS. LINDE. And no dependents?

NORA. No, nobody. But . . . ?

MRS. LINDE. And he comes to the house every day?

NORA. Yes, I told you.

MRS. LINDE. But how can a man of his position want to pester you like this?

NORA. I simply don’t understand.

MRS. LINDE. Don’t pretend, Nora. Do you think I don’t see now who you borrowed the twelve hundred from?

NORA. Are you out of your mind? Do you really think that? A friend of ours who comes here every day? The whole situation would have been absolutely intolerable.

MRS. LINDE. It really isn’t him?

NORA. No, I give you my word. It would never have occurred to me for one moment . . . . Anyway, he didn’t have the money to lend then. He didn’t inherit it till later.

MRS. LINDE. Just as well for you, I’d say, my dear Nora.

NORA. No, it would never have occurred to me to ask Dr. Rank . . . . All the same I’m pretty certain if I were to ask him . . .

MRS. LINDE. But of course you won’t.

NORA. No, of course not. I can’t ever imagine it being necessary. But I’m quite certain if ever I were to mention it to Dr. Rank . . .

MRS. LINDE. Behind your husband’s back?

NORA. I have to get myself out of that other business. That’s also behind his back. I must get myself out of that.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, that’s what I said yesterday. But . . .

NORA [walking up and down]. A man’s better at coping with these things than a woman. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Your own husband, yes.

NORA. Nonsense! [Stops.] When you’ve paid everything you owe, you do get your IOU back again, don’t you?

MRS. LINDE. Of course.

NORA. And you can tear it up into a thousand pieces and burn it—the nasty, filthy thing!

MRS. LINDE [looking fixedly at her, puts down her sewing and slowly rises]. Nora, you are hiding something from me.

NORA. Is it so obvious?

MRS. LINDE. Something has happened to you since yesterday morning. Nora, what is it?

NORA [going towards her]. Kristine! [Listens.] Hush! There’s Torvald back. Look, you go and sit in there beside the children for the time being. Torvald can’t stand the sight of mending lying about. Get Anne Marie to help you.

MRS. LINDE [gathering a lot of the things together]. All right, but I’m not leaving until we have thrashed this thing out.

NORA [going to meet him]. I’ve been longing for you to be back, Torvald, dear.

HELMER. Was that the dressmaker . . . ?

NORA. No, it was Kristine; she’s helping me with my costume. I think it’s going to look very nice . . .
HELMER. Wasn’t that a good idea of mine, now?

NORA. Wonderful! But wasn’t it also nice of me to let you have your way?

HELMER [taking her under the chin]. Nice of you—because you let your husband have his way? All right, you little rogue, I know you didn’t mean it that way. But I don’t want to disturb you. You’ll be wanting to try the costume on, I suppose.

NORA. And I dare say you’ve got work to do?

HELMER. Yes. [After her a bundle of papers.] Look at this. I’ve been down at the Bank. . . .

[He turns to go into his study.]

NORA. Torvald!

HELMER [stopping]. Yes.

NORA. If a little squirrel were to ask ever so nicely . . . ?

HELMER. Well?

NORA. Would you do something for it?

HELMER. Naturally I would first have to know what it is.

NORA. Please, if only you would let it have its way, and do what it wants, it’d scamper about and do all sorts of marvelous tricks.

HELMER. What is it?

NORA. And the pretty little skylark would sing all day long. . . .

HELMER. Huh! It does that anyway.

NORA. I’d pretend I was an elfin child and dance a moonlight dance for you, Torvald.

HELMER. Nora—I hope it’s not that business you started on this morning?

NORA [coming closer]. Yes, it is, Torvald. I implore you!

HELMER. You have the nerve to bring that up again?

NORA. Yes, yes, you must listen to me. You must let Krogstad keep his job at the Bank.

HELMER. My dear Nora, I’m giving his job to Mrs. Linde.

NORA. Yes, it’s awfully sweet of you. But couldn’t you get rid of somebody else in the office instead of Krogstad?

HELMER. This really is the most incredible obstinacy! Just because you go and make some thoughtless promise to put in a good word for him, you expect me . . .

NORA. It’s not that, Torvald. It’s for your own sake. That man writes in all the nastiest papers, you told me that yourself. He can do you no end of harm. He terrifies me to death. . . .

HELMER. Aha, now I see. It’s your memories of what happened before that are frightening you.

NORA. What do you mean?

HELMER. It’s your father you are thinking of.

NORA. Yes . . . yes, that’s right. You remember all the nasty insinuations those wicked people put in the papers about Daddy? I honestly think they would have had him dismissed if the Ministry hadn’t sent you down to investigate, and you hadn’t been so kind and helpful.

HELMER. My dear little Nora, there is a considerable difference between your father and me. Your father’s professional conduct was not entirely above suspicion. Mine is. And I hope it’s going to stay that way as long as I hold this position.

NORA. But nobody knows what some of these evil people are capable of. Things could be so nice and pleasant for us here, in the peace and quiet of our home—you and me and the children, Torvald! That's why I implore you . . .

HELMER. The more you plead for him, the more impossible you make it for me to keep him on. It's already known down at the Bank that I am going to give Krogstad his notice. If it ever got around that the new manager had been talked over by his wife. . . .

NORA. What of it?

HELMER. Oh, nothing! As long as the little woman gets her own stubborn way . . . ! Do you want me to make myself a laughing stock in the office? . . . Give people the idea that I am susceptible to any kind of outside pressure? You can imagine how soon I'd feel the consequences of that! Anyway, there's one other consideration that makes it impossible to have Krogstad in the Bank as long as I am manager.

NORA. What's that?

HELMER. At a pinch I might have overlooked his past lapses. . . .

NORA. Of course you could, Torvald!

HELMER. And I'm told he's not bad at his job, either. But we knew each other rather well when we were younger. It was one of those rather rash friendships that prove embarrassing in later life. There's no reason why you shouldn't know we were once on terms of some familiarity. And he, in his tactless way, makes no attempt to hide the fact, particularly when other people are present. On the contrary, he thinks he has every right to treat me as an equal, with his "Torvald this" and "Torvald that" every time he opens his mouth. I find it extremely irritating, I can tell you. He would make my position at the Bank absolutely intolerable.

NORA. Torvald, surely you aren't serious?

HELMER. Oh? Why not?

NORA. Well, it's all so petty.

HELMER. What's that you say? Petty? Do you think I'm petty?

NORA. No, not at all, Torvald dear! And that's why . . .

HELMER. Doesn't make any difference! . . . You call my motives petty; so I must be petty too. Petty! Indeed! Well, we'll put a stop to that, once and for all. [He opens the hall door and calls.] Helene!

HELMER [searching among his papers]. Settle things. [The maid comes in.]

See this letter? I want you to take it down at once. Get hold of a messenger and get him to deliver it. Quickly. The address is on the outside. There's the money.

MAID. Very good, sir.

HELMER [putting his papers together]. There now, my stubborn little miss.

NORA [breathless]. Torvald . . . what was that letter?

HELMER. Krogstad's notice.

NORA. Get it back, Torvald! There's still time! Oh, Torvald, get it back! Please for my sake, for your sake, for the sake of the children! Listen, Torvald, please! You don't realize what it can do to us.

HELMER. Too late.

NORA. Yes, too late.

HELMER. My dear Nora, I forgive you this anxiety of yours, although it is actually a bit of an insult. Oh, but it is, I tell you! It's hardly flattering to suppose that anything this miserable pen-pusher wrote could frighten me! But I forgive you all the same, because it is rather a sweet way of showing how much you love me. [He takes her in his arms.] This is how things must be, my own darling Nora. When it comes to the point, I’ve enough strength and enough courage, believe me, for whatever happens. You’ll find I’m man enough to take everything on myself.

NORA [terrified]. What do you mean?

HELMER. Everything, I said. . . .

NORA [in command of herself]. That is something you shall never, never do.

HELMER. All right, then we’ll share it, Nora—as man and wife. That’s what we’ll do. [Caressing her] Does that make you happy now? There, there, don’t look at me with those eyes, like a little frightened dove. The whole thing is sheer imagination.—Why don’t you run through the tarantella and try out the tambourine? I’ll go into my study and shut both the doors, then I won’t hear anything. You can make all the noise you want. [Turns in the doorway.] And when Rank comes, tell him where he can find me.

[He nods to her; goes with his papers into his room, and shuts the door behind him.]

NORA [wild-eyed with terror; stands as though transfixed]. He’s quite capable of doing it! He would do it! No matter what, he’d do it.—No, never in this world! Anything but that! Help? Some way out. . . . ? [The doorbell rings in the hall.] Dr. Rank . . . ! Anything but that, anything! [She brushes her hands over her face, pulls herself together and opens the door into the hall.]

DR. RANK is standing outside hanging up his fur coat. During what follows it begins to grow dark.]

Hello, Dr. Rank. I recognized your ring. Do you mind not going in to Torvald just yet, I think he’s busy.

RANK. And you?

[DR. RANK comes into the room and she closes the door behind him.]

NORA. Oh, you know very well I’ve always got time for you.

RANK. Thank you. A privilege I shall take advantage of as long as I am able.

NORA. What do you mean—as long as you are able?

RANK. Does that frighten you?

NORA. Well, it’s just that it sounds so strange. Is anything likely to happen?

RANK. Only what I have long expected. But I didn’t think it would come quite so soon.

NORA [catching at his arm]. What have you found out? Dr. Rank, you must tell me!

RANK. I’m slowly sinking. There’s nothing to be done about it.

NORA [with a sigh of relief]. Oh, it’s you you’re . . . ?

RANK. Who else? No point in deceiving oneself. I am the most wretched of all my patients, Mrs. Helmer. These last few days I’ve made a careful analysis of my internal economy. Bankrupt! Within a month I shall probably be lying rotting up there in the churchyard.

NORA. Come now, what a ghastly thing to say!

RANK. The whole damned thing is ghastly. But the worst thing is all the ghastliness that has to be gone through first. I only have one more test to make; and when that’s done I’ll know pretty well when the final disintegration will start. There’s something I want to ask you. Helmer is a sensitive soul; he loathes anything that’s ugly. I don’t want him visiting me. . . .

NORA. But Dr. Rank. . . .

RANK. On no account must he. I won’t have it. I’ll lock the door on him.—As soon as I’m absolutely certain of the worst, I’ll send you my visiting card with a black cross on it. You’ll know then the final horrible disintegration has begun.

NORA. Really, you are being quite absurd today. And here was I hoping you would be in a thoroughly good mood.

RANK. With death staring me in the face? Why should I suffer for another man’s sins? What justice is there in that? Somewhere, somehow, every single family must be suffering some such cruel retribution. . . .

NORA [stopping up her ears]. Rubbish! Do cheer up!

RANK. Yes, really the whole thing’s nothing but a huge joke. My poor innocent spine must do penance for my father’s gay subaltern life.

NORA [by the table, left]. Wasn’t he rather partial to asparagus and _pâté de foie gras?_

RANK. Yes, he was. And truffles.

NORA. Truffles, yes. And oysters, too, I believe?

RANK. Yes, oysters, oysters, of course.

NORA. And all the port and champagne that goes with them. It does seem a pity all these delicious things should attack the spine.

RANK. Especially when they attack a poor spine that never had any fun out of them.

NORA. Yes, that is an awful pity.

RANK [looks at her sharply]. Hm. . . .

NORA [after a pause]. Why did you smile?

RANK. No, it was you who laughed.

NORA. No, it was you who smiled, Dr. Rank!

RANK [getting up]. You are a bigger rascal than I thought you were.

NORA. I feel full of mischief today.

RANK. So it seems.

NORA [putting her hands on his shoulders]. Dear, dear Dr. Rank, you mustn’t go and die on Torvald and me.

RANK. You wouldn’t miss me for long. When you are gone, you are soon forgotten.

NORA [looking at him anxiously]. Do you think so?

RANK. People make new contacts, then . . .

NORA. Who make new contacts?

RANK. Both you and Helmer will, when I’m gone. You yourself are already well on the way, it seems to me. What was this Mrs. Linde doing here last night?

NORA. Surely you aren’t jealous of poor Kristine?

RANK. Yes, I am. She’ll be my successor in this house. When I’m done for, I can see this woman. . . .

NORA. Hush! Don’t talk so loud, she’s in there.

RANK. Today as well? There you are, you see!

NORA. Just to do some sewing on my dress. Good Lord, how absurd you are! [She sits down on the sofa.] Now Dr. Rank, cheer up. You’ll see tomorrow how nicely I can dance. And you can pretend I’m doing it just for you—and for Torvald as well, of course. [She takes various things out of the box.] Come here, Dr. Rank. I want to show you something.

RANK [sits]. What is it?
NORA. Look!
RANK. Silk stockings.
NORA. Flesh-coloured! Aren’t they lovely! Of course, it’s dark here now, but tomorrow. . . . No, no, no, you can only look at the feet. Oh well, you might as well see a bit higher up, too.

RANK. Hm. . . .
NORA. Why are you looking so critical? Don’t you think they’ll fit?
RANK. I couldn’t possibly offer any informed opinion about that.
NORA [looks at him for a moment]. Shame on you. [Hits him lightly across the ear with the stockings.] Take that! [Folds them up again.]
RANK. And what other delights am I to be allowed to see?
NORA. Not another thing. You are too naughty. [She bums a little and searches among her things.]
RANK [after a short pause]. Sitting here so intimately like this with you, I can’t imagine. . . . I simply cannot conceive what would have become of me if I had never come to this house.
NORA [smiles]. Yes, I rather think you do enjoy coming here.
RANK [in a low voice, looking fixedly ahead]. And the thought of having to leave it all. . . .

RANK. Nonsense. You aren’t leaving.
NORA. Supposing I were to ask you to. . . .? No. . . .
RANK. What?
NORA. . . . to show me the extent of your friendship . . .
RANK. Yes?
NORA. I mean. . . . to do me a tremendous favor. . . .
RANK. Would you really, for once, give me that pleasure?
NORA. You have no idea what it is.
RANK. All right, tell me.
NORA. No, really I can’t, Dr. Rank. It’s altogether too much to ask. . . . because I need your advice and help as well. . . .
RANK. The more the better. I cannot imagine what you have in mind. But tell me anyway. You do trust me, don’t you?
NORA. Yes, I trust you more than anybody I know. You are my best and my most faithful friend. I know that. So I will tell you. Well then, Dr. Rank, there is something you must help me to prevent. You know how deeply, how passionately Torvald is in love with me. He would never hesitate for a moment to sacrifice his life for my sake.
RANK [bending towards her]. Nora . . . do you think he’s the only one who . . . .?
NORA [stiffening slightly]. Who . . . .?
RANK. Who wouldn’t gladly give his life for your sake.
NORA [sadly]. Oh!
RANK. I swore to myself you would know before I went. I’ll never have a better opportunity. Well, Nora! Now you know. And now you know too that you can confide in me as in nobody else.
Act II

NORA [rises and speaks evenly and calmly]. Let me past.
RANK [makes way for her, but remains seated]. Nora.
NORA [in the ball doorway]. Helene, bring the lamp in, please. [Walks over to the stove.] Oh, my dear Dr. Rank, that really was rather horrid of you.
RANK [getting up]. That I have loved you every bit as much as anybody? Is that horrid?
NORA. No, but that you had to go and tell me. When it was all so unnecessary.
RANK. What do you mean? Did you know . . . ?
[Nora in the hall doorway. Helene, bring the lamp in, please. [Walks over to the stove.]
NORA. Oh, my dear Dr. Rank, that really was rather horrid of you.
RANK. Getting up. That I have loved you every bit as much as anybody? Is that horrid?
NORA. No, but that you had to go and tell me. When it was all so unnecessary.
RANK. What do you mean? Did you know . . . ?

[The maid comes in with the lamp, puts it on the table, and goes out again.]
RANK. Nora . . . Mrs. Helmer . . . I’m asking you if you knew?
NORA. How can I tell whether I did or didn’t. I simply can’t tell you.
RANK. Oh, how could you be so clumsy, Dr. Rank! When everything was so nice.
NORA. Anyway, you know now that I’m at your service, body and soul. So you can speak out.
NORA [looking at him]. After this?
RANK. I beg you to tell me what it is.
NORA. I can tell you nothing now.
RANK. You must. You can’t torment me like this. Give me a chance—I’ll do anything that’s humanly possible.
NORA. You can do nothing for me now. Actually, I don’t really need any help.
It’s all just my imagination, really it is. Of course! [She sits down in the rocking chair; looks at him and smiles.]
RANK. Nora! Don’t you feel ashamed of yourself, now the lamp’s been brought in?
NORA. No, not exactly. But perhaps I ought to go—for good?
NORA. No, you mustn’t do that. You must keep coming just as you’ve always done. You know very well Torvald would miss you terribly.
RANK. And you?
NORA. I always think it’s tremendous fun having you.
RANK. That’s exactly what gave me wrong ideas. I just can’t puzzle you out.
I often used to feel you’d just as soon be with me as with Helmer.
NORA. Well, you see, there are those people you love and those people you’d almost rather be with.
RANK. Yes, there’s something in that.
NORA. When I was a girl at home, I loved Daddy best, of course. But I also thought it great fun if I could slip into the maids’ room. For one thing they never preached at me. And they always talked about such exciting things.
RANK. Aha! So it’s their role I’ve taken over!
NORA [jumps up and crosses to him]. Oh, my dear, kind Dr. Rank, I didn’t mean that at all. But you can see how it’s a bit with Torvald as it was with Daddy.

[The maid comes in from the ball.]
MAID. Please, ma’am . . . !

[She whispers and hands her a card.]
NORA [glances at the card]. Ah!

[She puts it in her pocket.]

RANK. Anything wrong?

NORA. No, no, not at all. It's just... it's my new costume. . . .

RANK. How is that? There's your costume in there.

NORA. That one, yes. But this is another one. I've ordered it. Torvald mustn't hear about it. . . .

RANK. Ah, so that's the big secret, is it!

NORA. Yes, that's right. Just go in and see him, will you? He's in the study. Keep him occupied for the time being. . . .

RANK. Don't worry. He shan't escape me.

[He goes into Helmer's study.]

NORA [to the Maid]. Is he waiting in the kitchen?

MAID. Yes, he came up the back stairs. . . .

NORA. But didn't you tell him somebody was here?

MAID. Yes, but it was no good.

NORA. Won't he go?

MAID. No, he won't till he's seen you.

NORA. Let him in, then. But quietly. Helene, you mustn't tell anybody about this. It's a surprise for my husband.

MAID. I understand, ma'am. . . .

[She goes out.]

NORA. Here it comes! What I've been dreading! No, no, it can't happen, it can't happen.

[She walks over and bolts Helmer's door. The Maid opens the ball door for Krogstad and shuts it again behind him. He is wearing a fur coat, overshoes, and a fur cap.]

NORA [goes towards him]. Keep your voice down, my husband is at home.

KROGSTAD. What if he is?

NORA. What do you want with me?

KROGSTAD. To find out something.

NORA. Hurry, then. What is it?

KROGSTAD. You know I've been given notice.

NORA. I couldn't prevent it, Mr. Krogstad, I did my utmost for you, but it was no use.

KROGSTAD. Has your husband so little affection for you? He knows what I can do to you, yet he dares. . . .

NORA. You don't imagine he knows about it!

KROGSTAD. No, I didn't imagine he did. It didn't seem a bit like my good friend Torvald Helmer to show that much courage. . . .

NORA. Mr. Krogstad, I must ask you to show some respect for my husband.

KROGSTAD. Oh, sure! All due respect! But since you are so anxious to keep this business quiet, Mrs. Helmer, I take it you now have a rather clearer idea of just what it is you've done, than you had yesterday.

NORA. Clearer than you could ever have given me.

KROGSTAD. Yes, being as I am such a rotten lawyer. . . .

NORA. What do you want with me?
KROGSTAD. I just wanted to see how things stood, Mrs. Helmer. I’ve been thinking about you all day. Even a mere money-lender, a hack journalist, a—well, even somebody like me has a bit of what you might call feeling.

NORA. Show it then. Think of my little children.

KROGSTAD. Did you or your husband think of mine? But what does it matter now? There was just one thing I wanted to say: you needn’t take this business too seriously. I shan’t start any proceedings, for the present.

NORA. Ah, I knew you wouldn’t.

KROGSTAD. The whole thing can be arranged quite amicably. Nobody need know. Just the three of us.

NORA. My husband must never know.

KROGSTAD. How can you prevent it? Can you pay off the balance?

NORA. No, not immediately.

KROGSTAD. Perhaps you’ve some way of getting hold of the money in the next few days.

NORA. None I want to make use of.

KROGSTAD. Well, it wouldn’t have been very much help to you if you had. Even if you stood there with the cash in your hand and to spare, you still wouldn’t get your IOU back from me now.

NORA. What are you going to do with it?

KROGSTAD. Just keep it—have it in my possession. Nobody who isn’t implicated need know about it. So if you are thinking of trying any desperate remedies . . .

NORA. Which I am. . . .

KROGSTAD. . . . if you happen to be thinking of running away . . .

NORA. Which I am!

KROGSTAD. . . . or anything worse . . .

NORA. How did you know?

KROGSTAD. . . . forget it!

NORA. How did you know I was thinking of that?

KROGSTAD. Most of us think of that, to begin with. I did, too; but I didn’t have the courage. . . .

NORA [tonelessly]. I haven’t either.

KROGSTAD [relieved]. So you haven’t the courage either, eh?

NORA. No, I haven’t! I haven’t!

KROGSTAD. It would also be very stupid. There’d only be the first domestic storm to get over. . . . I’ve got a letter to your husband in my pocket here. . . .

NORA. And it’s all in there?

KROGSTAD. In as tactful a way as possible.

NORA [quickly]. He must never read that letter. Tear it up. I’ll find the money somehow.

KROGSTAD. Excuse me, Mrs. Helmer, but I’ve just told you. . . .

NORA. I’m not talking about the money I owe you. I want to know how much you are demanding from my husband, and I’ll get the money.

KROGSTAD. I want no money from your husband.

NORA. What do you want?

KROGSTAD. I’ll tell you. I want to get on my feet again, Mrs. Helmer; I want to get to the top. And your husband is going to help me. For the last eighteen months I’ve gone straight; all that time it’s been hard going; I was content to work my way up, step by step. Now I’m being kicked out, and I won’t stand for being taken back again as an act of charity. I’m going to get to the top, I tell you. I’m going back into that Bank—with a better job. Your husband is going to create a new vacancy, just for me. . . .

NORA. He’ll never do that!

KROGSTAD. He will do it. I know him. He’ll do it without so much as a whimper. And once I’m in there with him, you’ll see what’s what. In less than a year I’ll be his right-hand man. It’ll be Nils Krogstad, not Torvald Helmer, who’ll be running that Bank.

NORA. You’ll never live to see that day!

KROGSTAD. You mean you . . . ?

NORA. Now I have the courage.

KROGSTAD. You can’t frighten me! A precious pampered little thing like
you. . . .

NORA. I’ll show you! I’ll show you!

KROGSTAD. Under the ice, maybe? Down in the cold, black water? Then being washed up in the spring, bloated, hairless, unrecognizable. . . .

NORA. You can’t frighten me.

KROGSTAD. You can’t frighten me, either. People don’t do that sort of thing, Mrs. Helmer. There wouldn’t be any point to it, anyway, I’d still have him right in my pocket.

NORA. Afterwards? When I’m no longer . . .

KROGSTAD. Aren’t you forgetting that your reputation would then be entirely in my hands? [NORA stands looking at him, speechless.] Well, I’ve warned you. Don’t do anything silly. When Helmer gets my letter, I expect to hear from him. And don’t forget: it’s him who is forcing me off the straight and narrow again, your own husband! That’s something I’ll never forgive him for. Goodbye, Mrs. Helmer.

[He goes out through the ball. NORA crosses to the door, opens it slightly, and listens.]

NORA. He’s going. He hasn’t left the letter. No, no, that would be impossible!
[Opens the door further and further.] What’s he doing? He’s stopped outside. He’s not going down the stairs. Has he changed his mind? Is he
. . . ? [A letter falls into the letter box. Then KROGSTAD’s footsteps are heard receding as he walks downstairs. NORA gives a stifled cry; runs across the room to the sofa table; pause.] In the letter box! [She creeps stealthily across to the ball door.] There it is! Torvald, Torvald! It’s hopeless now!

MRS. LINDE. [comes into the room, left, carrying the costume]. There, I think that’s everything. Shall we try it on?

NORA [in a low, boarse voice]. Kristine, come here.

MRS. LINDE [brows the dress down on the sofa]. What’s wrong with you?
You look upset.

NORA. Come here. Do you see that letter? There, look! Through the glass in the letter box.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, yes, I can see it.

NORA. It’s a letter from Krogstad.

MRS. LINDE. Nora! It was Krogstad who lent you the money!
NORA. Yes. And now Torvald will get to know everything.

MRS. LINDE. Believe me, Nora, it’s best for you both.

NORA. But there’s more to it than that. I forged a signature. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Heavens above!

NORA. Listen, I want to tell you something, Kristine, so you can be my witness.

MRS. LINDE. What do you mean, “witness”? What do you want me to . . . ?

NORA. If I should go mad . . . which might easily happen . . .

MRS. LINDE. Nora!

NORA. Or if anything happened to me . . . which meant I couldn’t be here. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Nora, Nora! Are you out of your mind?

NORA. And if somebody else wanted to take it all upon himself, the whole blame, you understand. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Yes, yes. But what makes you think . . . ?

NORA. Then you must testify that it isn’t true, Kristine. I’m not out of my mind; I’m quite sane now. And I tell you this: nobody else knew anything, I alone was responsible for the whole thing. Remember that!

MRS. LINDE. I will. But I don’t understand a word of it.

NORA. Why should you? You see something miraculous is going to happen.

MRS. LINDE. Something miraculous?

NORA. Yes, a miracle. But something so terrible as well, Kristine—oh, it must never happen, not for anything.

MRS. LINDE. I’m going straight over to talk to Krogstad.

NORA. Don’t go. He’ll only do you harm.

MRS. LINDE. There was a time when he would have done anything for me.

NORA. Him!

MRS. LINDE. Where does he live?

NORA. How do I know . . . ? Wait a minute. [She feels in her pocket.] Here’s his card. But the letter, the letter . . . !

HELMER [from his study, knocking on the door]. Nora!

NORA [cries out in terror]. What’s that? What do you want?

HELMER. Don’t be frightened. We’re not coming in. You’ve locked the door.

Are you trying on?

NORA. Yes, yes, I’m trying on. It looks so nice on me, Torvald.

MRS. LINDE [who has read the card]. He lives just round the corner.

NORA. It’s no use. It’s hopeless. The letter is there in the box.

MRS. LINDE. Your husband keeps the key?

NORA. Always.

MRS. LINDE. Krogstad must ask for his letter back unread, he must find some sort of excuse. . . .

NORA. But this is just the time that Torvald generally . . .

MRS. LINDE. Put him off! Go in and keep him busy. I’ll be back as soon as I can.

NORA. Torvald!

HELMER [in the study]. Well, can a man get into his own living room again now? Come along, Rank, now we’ll see . . . [In the doorway.] But what’s this?

NORA. What, Torvald dear?
HELMER. Rank led me to expect some kind of marvelous transformation.

RANK [in the doorway]. That’s what I thought too, but I must have been mistaken.

NORA. I’m not showing myself off to anybody before tomorrow.

HELMER. Nora dear, you look tired. You haven’t been practising too hard?

NORA. No, I haven’t practised at all yet.

HELMER. You’ll have to, though.

NORA. Yes, I certainly must, Torvald. But I just can’t get anywhere without your help: I’ve completely forgotten it.

HELMER. We’ll soon polish it up.

NORA. Yes, do help me, Torvald. Promise? I’m so nervous. All those people... You must devote yourself exclusively to me this evening. Pens away! Forget all about the office! Promise me, Torvald dear!

HELMER. I promise. This evening I am wholly and entirely at your service... helpless little thing that you are. Oh, but while I remember, I’ll just look first...

[He goes towards the ball door.]

NORA. What do you want out there?

HELMER. Just want to see if there are any letters.

NORA. No, don’t, Torvald!

HELMER. Why not?

NORA. Torvald, please! There aren’t any.

HELMER. Just let me see.

[He starts to go. NORA, at the piano, plays the opening bars of the tarantella.]

HELMER [at the door, stops]. Aha!

NORA. I shan’t be able to dance tomorrow if I don’t rehearse it with you.

HELMER [walks to her]. Are you really so nervous, Nora dear?

NORA. Terribly nervous. Let me run through it now. There’s still time before supper. Come and sit here and play for me, Torvald dear. Tell me what to do, keep me right—as you always do.

HELMER. Certainly, with pleasure, if that’s what you want.

[He sits at the piano. NORA snatches the tambourine out of the box, and also a long gaily coloured shawl which she drapes round herself, then with a bound she leaps forward.]

NORA [shouts]. Now play for me! Now I’ll dance!

[HelmER plays and Nora dances; DR. RANK stands at the piano behind, and looks on.]

HELMER [playing]. Not so fast! Not so fast!

NORA. I can’t help it.

HELMER. Not so wild, Nora!

NORA. This is how it has to be.

HELMER [stops]. No, no, that won’t do at all.

NORA [laughs and swings the tambourine]. Didn’t I tell you?

RANK. Let me play for her.
Act II Henrik Ibsen

HELMER [gets up]. Yes, do. Then I'll be better able to tell her what to do.

[RANK sits down at the piano and plays. NORA dances more and more wildly. HELMER stands by the stove giving her repeated directions as she dances; she does not seem to hear them. Her hair comes undone and falls about her shoulders; she pays no attention and goes on dancing.

MRS. LINDE [standing as though spellbound in the doorway]. Ah . . . !

NORA [dancing]. See what fun we are having, Kristine.

HELMER. But my dear darling Nora, you are dancing as though your life depended on it.

NORA. It does.

HELMER. Stop, Rank! This is sheer madness. Stop, I say.

[RANK stops playing and NORA comes to a sudden halt.]

HELMER [crosses to her]. I would never have believed it. You have forgotten everything I ever taught you.

NORA [throwing away the tambourine]. There you are, you see.

HELMER. Well, some more instruction is certainly needed there.

NORA. Yes, you see how necessary it is. You must go on coaching me right up to the last minute. Promise me, Torvald?

HELMER. You can rely on me.

NORA. You mustn’t think about anything else but me until after tomorrow . . . mustn’t open any letters . . . mustn’t touch the letter box.

HELMER. Ah, you are still frightened of what that man might . . .

NORA. Yes, yes, I am.

HELMER. I can see from your face there’s already a letter there from him.

NORA. I don’t know. I think so. But you mustn’t read anything like that now. We don’t want anything horrid coming between us until all this is over.

RANK [softly to HELMER]. I shouldn’t cross her.

HELMER [puts his arm round her]. The child must have her way. But tomorrow night, when your dance is done . . .

NORA. Then you are free.

MAID [in the doorway, right]. Dinner is served, madam.

NORA. We’ll have champagne, Helene.

MAID. Very good, madam.

[She goes.]

HELMER. Aha! It’s to be quite a banquet, eh?

NORA. With champagne flowing until dawn. [Shouts.] And some macaroons, Helene . . . lots of them, for once in a while.

HELMER [seizing her hands]. Now, now, not so wild and excitable! Let me see you being my own little singing bird again.

NORA. Oh yes, I will. And if you’ll just go in . . . you, too, Dr. Rank. Kristine, you must help me to do my hair.

RANK [softly, as they leave]. There isn’t anything . . . anything as it were, impending, is there?

HELMER. No, not at all, my dear fellow. It’s nothing but these childish fears I was telling you about.

[They go out to the right.]
NORA. Well?
MRS. LINDE. He’s left town.
NORA. I saw it in your face.
MRS. LINDE. He’s coming back tomorrow evening. I left a note for him.
NORA. You shouldn’t have done that. You must let things take their course.
Because really it’s a case for rejoicing, waiting like this for the miracle.
MRS. LINDE. What is it you are waiting for?
NORA. Oh, you wouldn’t understand. Go and join the other two. I’ll be there in a minute.

[mrs. linde goes into the dining-room. nora stands for a moment as though to collect herself, then looks at her watch.]

NORA. Five. Seven hours to midnight. Then twenty-four hours till the next midnight. Then the tarantella will be over. Twenty-four and seven?
Thirty-one hours to live.
HELMER [in the doorway, right]. What’s happened to our little sky-lark?
NORA [running towards him with open arms]. Here she is!

Act III

The same room. The round table has been moved to the center of the room, and the chairs placed round it. A lamp is burning on the table. The door to the ball stands open. Dance music can be heard coming from the floor above. MRS. LINDE is sitting by the table, idly turning over the pages of a book; she tries to read, but does not seem able to concentrate. Once or twice she listens, tensely, for a sound at the front door.

MRS. LINDE [looking at her watch]. Still not here. There isn’t much time left. I only hope he hasn’t . . . [She listens again.] Ah, there he is. [She goes out into the ball, and cautiously opens the front door. Soft footsteps can be heard on the stairs. She whispers.] Come in. There’s nobody here.
KROGSTAD [in the doorway]. I found a note from you at home. What does it all mean?
MRS. LINDE. I had to talk to you.
KROGSTAD. Oh? And did it have to be here, in this house?
MRS. LINDE. It wasn’t possible over at my place, it hasn’t a separate entrance.
Come in. We are quite alone. The maid’s asleep and the Helmers are at a party upstairs.
KROGSTAD [comes into the room]. Well, well! So the Helmers are out dancing tonight! Really?
MRS. LINDE. Yes, why not?
KROGSTAD. Why not indeed!
MRS. LINDE. Well then, Nils. Let’s talk.
KROGSTAD. Have we two anything more to talk about?
MRS. LINDE. We have a great deal to talk about.
KROGSTAD. I shouldn’t have thought so.
MRS. LINDE. That’s because you never really understood me.
KROGSTAD. What else was there to understand, apart from the old, old story?
A heartless woman throws a man over the moment something more profitable offers itself.
MRS. LINDE. Do you really think I’m so heartless? Do you think I found it easy to break it off?

KROGSTAD. Didn’t you?

MRS. LINDE. You didn’t really believe that?

KROGSTAD. If that wasn’t the case, why did you write to me as you did?

MRS. LINDE. There was nothing else I could do. If I had to make the break, I felt in duty bound to destroy any feeling that you had for me.

KROGSTAD [clenching his hands]. So that’s how it was. And all that . . . was for money!

MRS. LINDE. You mustn’t forget I had a helpless mother and two young brothers. We couldn’t wait for you, Nils. At that time you hadn’t much immediate prospect of anything.

KROGSTAD. That may be. But you had no right to throw me over for somebody else.

MRS. LINDE. Well, I don’t know. Many’s the time I’ve asked myself whether I was justified.

KROGSTAD [more quietly]. When I lost you, it was just as if the ground had slipped away from under my feet. Look at me now: a broken man clinging to the wreck of his life.

MRS. LINDE. Help might be near.

KROGSTAD. It was near. Then you came along and got in the way.

MRS. LINDE. Quite without knowing, Nils. I only heard today it’s you I’m supposed to be replacing at the Bank.

KROGSTAD. If you say so, I believe you. But now you do know, aren’t you going to withdraw?

MRS. LINDE. No, that wouldn’t benefit you in the slightest.

KROGSTAD. Benefit, benefit . . . ! I would do it just the same.

MRS. LINDE. I have learned to go carefully. Life and hard, bitter necessity have taught me that.

KROGSTAD. And life has taught me not to believe in pretty speeches.

MRS. LINDE. Then life has taught you a very sensible thing. But deeds are something you surely must believe in?

KROGSTAD. How do you mean?

MRS. LINDE. You said you were like a broken man clinging to the wreck of his life.

KROGSTAD. And I said it with good reason.

MRS. LINDE. And I am like a broken woman clinging to the wreck of her life. Nobody to care about, and nobody to care for.

KROGSTAD. It was your own choice.

MRS. LINDE. At the time there was no other choice.

KROGSTAD. Well, what of it?

MRS. LINDE. Nils, what about us two castaways joining forces?

KROGSTAD. What’s that you say?

MRS. LINDE. Two of us on one wreck surely stand a better chance than each on his own.

KROGSTAD. Kristine!

MRS. LINDE. Why do you suppose I came to town?

KROGSTAD. You mean, you thought of me?

MRS. LINDE. Without work I couldn’t live. All my life I have worked, for as long as I can remember; that has always been my one great joy. But now I’m completely alone in the world, and feeling horribly empty and forlorn. There’s no pleasure in working only for yourself. Nils, give me somebody and something to work for.

KROGSTAD. I don’t believe all this. It’s only a woman’s hysteria, wanting to be all magnanimous and self-sacrificing.

MRS. LINDE. Have you ever known me hysterical before?

KROGSTAD. Would you really do this? Tell me—do you know all about my past?

MRS. LINDE. Yes.

KROGSTAD. And you know what people think about me?

MRS. LINDE. Just now you hinted you thought you might have been a different person with me.

KROGSTAD. I’m convinced I would.

MRS. LINDE. Couldn’t it still happen?

KROGSTAD. Kristine! You know what you are saying, don’t you? Yes, you do. I can see you do. Have you really the courage . . . ?

MRS. LINDE. I need someone to mother, and your children need a mother. We two need each other. Nils, I have faith in what, deep down, you are: With you I can face anything.

KROGSTAD [seizing her hands]. Thank you, thank you, Kristine. And I’ll soon have everybody looking up to me, or I’ll know the reason why. Ah, but I was forgetting. . . .

MRS. LINDE. Hush! The tarantella! You must go!

KROGSTAD. Why? What is it?

MRS. LINDE. You hear that dance upstairs? When it’s finished they’ll be coming.

KROGSTAD. Yes, I’ll go. It’s too late to do anything. Of course, you know nothing about what steps I’ve taken against the Helmers.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, Nils, I do know.

KROGSTAD. Yet you still want to go on. . . .

MRS. LINDE. I know how far a man like you can be driven by despair.

KROGSTAD. Oh, if only I could undo what I’ve done!

MRS. LINDE. You still can. Your letter is still there in the box.

KROGSTAD. Are you sure?

MRS. LINDE. Quite sure. But . . .

KROGSTAD [regards her searchingly]. Is that how things are? You want to save your friend at any price? Tell me straight. Is that it?

MRS. LINDE. When you’ve sold yourself once for other people’s sake, you don’t do it again.

KROGSTAD. I shall demand my letter back.

MRS. LINDE. No, no.

KROGSTAD. Of course I will, I’ll wait here till Helmer comes. I’ll tell him he has to give me my letter back . . . that it’s only about my notice . . . that he mustn’t read it. . . .

MRS. LINDE. No, Nils, don’t ask for it back.

KROGSTAD. But wasn’t that the very reason you got me here?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, that was my first terrified reaction. But that was yesterday, and it’s quite incredible the things I’ve witnessed in this house in the last twenty-four hours. Helmer must know everything. This unhappy secret must come out. Those two must have the whole thing out between them. All this secrecy and deception, it just can’t go on.
KROGSTAD. Well, if you want to risk it . . . But one thing I can do, and I'll do it at once. . . .

MRS. LINDE [listening]. Hurry! Go, go! The dance has stopped. We aren't safe a moment longer.

KROGSTAD. I'll wait for you downstairs.

MRS. LINDE. Yes, do. You must see me home.

KROGSTAD. I've never been so incredibly happy before.

[He goes out by the front door. The door out into the hall remains standing open.]

MRS. LINDE [tidies the room a little and gets her hat and coat ready]. How things change! How things change! Somebody to work for . . . to live for. A home to bring happiness into. Just let me get down to it. . . . I wish they'd come. . . . [Listens.] Ah, there they are. . . . Get my things.

[She takes her coat and hat. The voices of HELMER and NORA are heard outside. A key is turned and HELMER pushes NORA almost forcibly into the hall. She is dressed in the Italian costume, with a big black shawl over it. He is in evening dress, and over it a black cloak, open.]

NORA [still in the doorway, reluctantly]. No, no, not in here! I want to go back up again. I don't want to leave so early.

HELMER. But my dearest Nora . . .

NORA. Oh, please, Torvald, I beg you. . . . Please, just for another hour.

HELMER. Not another minute, Nora my sweet. You remember what we agreed. There now, come along in. You'll catch cold standing there.

[He leads her, in spite of her resistance, gently but firmly into the room.]

MRS. LINDE. Good evening.

NORA. Kristine!

HELMER. Why, Mrs. Linde. You here so late?

MRS. LINDE. Yes. You must forgive me but I did so want to see Nora all dressed up.

NORA. Have you been sitting here waiting for me?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I'm afraid I wasn't in time to catch you before you went upstairs. And I felt I couldn't leave again without seeing you.

HELMER [removing NORA's shawl]. Well take a good look at her. I think I can say she's worth looking at. Isn't she lovely, Mrs. Linde?

MRS. LINDE. Yes, I must say. . . .

HELMER. Isn't she quite extraordinarily lovely? That's what everybody at the party thought, too. But she's dreadfully stubborn . . . the sweet little thing! And what shall we do about that? Would you believe it, I nearly had to use force to get her away.

NORA. Oh Torvald, you'll be sorry you didn't let me stay, even for half an hour.

HELMER. You hear that, Mrs. Linde? She dances her tarantella, there's wild applause—which was well deserved, although the performance was perhaps rather realistic . . . I mean, rather more so than was strictly necessary from the artistic point of view. But anyway! The main thing is she was a success, a tremendous success. Was I supposed to let her stay after that? Spoil the effect? No thank you! I took my lovely little Capri girl—my capricious little Capri girl, I might say—by the arm, whisked her once round the room, a curtsey all round, and then—as they say in novels—the beautiful vision vanished. An exit should always be effective, Mrs. Linde. But I just can’t get Nora to see that. Phew! It’s warm in here. [He throws his cloak over a chair and opens the door to his study:] What? It’s dark. Oh yes, of course. Excuse me. . . .

[He goes in and lights a few candles.]

NORA [quickly, in a breathless whisper]. Well?
MRS. LINDE [softly]. I’ve spoken to him.
NORA. And . . . ?
MRS. LINDE. Nora . . . you must tell your husband everything.
NORA [tonelessly]. I knew it.
MRS. LINDE. You’ve got nothing to fear from Krogstad. But you must speak.
NORA. I won’t.
MRS. LINDE. Then the letter will.
NORA. Thank you, Kristine. Now I know what’s to be done. Hush . . . .!
HELMER [comes in again]. Well, Mrs. Linde, have you finished admiring her?
MRS. LINDE. Yes. And now I must say good night.
HELMER. Oh, already? Is this yours, this knitting?
MRS. LINDE [takes it]. Yes, thank you. I nearly forgot it.
HELMER. So you knit, eh?
MRS. LINDE. Yes.
HELMER. You should embroider instead, you know.
MRS. LINDE. Oh? Why?
HELMER. So much prettier. Watch! You hold the embroidery like this in the left hand, and then you take the needle in the right hand, like this, and you describe a long, graceful curve. Isn’t that right?
MRS. LINDE. Yes, I suppose so. . . .
HELMER. Whereas knitting on the other hand just can’t help being ugly. Look!
Arms pressed into the sides, the knitting needles going up and down—there’s something Chinese about it. . . . Ah, that was marvelous champagne they served tonight.
MRS. LINDE. Well, good night, Nora! And stop being so stubborn.
HELMER. Well said, Mrs. Linde!
MRS. LINDE. Good night, Mr. Helmer.
HELMER [accompanying ber to the door]. Good night, good night! You’ll get home all right, I hope? I’d be only too pleased to. . . . But you haven’t far to walk. Good night, good night! [She goes; he shuts the door behind ber and comes in again.] There we are, got rid of her at last. She’s a frightful bore, that woman.
NORA. Aren’t you very tired, Torvald?
HELMER. Not in the least.
NORA. Not sleepy?
HELMER. Not at all. On the contrary, I feel extremely lively. What about you?
Yes, you look quite tired and sleepy.
NORA. Yes, I’m very tired. I just want to fall straight off to sleep.
HELMER. There you are, you see! Wasn’t I right in thinking we shouldn’t stay any longer.
NORA. Oh, everything you do is right.
HELMER [kissing her forehead]. There’s my little sky-lark talking common sense. Did you notice how gay Rank was this evening?

NORA. Oh, was he? I didn’t get a chance to talk to him.

HELMER. I hardly did either. But it’s a long time since I saw him in such a good mood. [Looks at NORA for a moment or two, then comes nearer her] Ah, it’s wonderful to be back in our own home again, and quite alone with you. How irresistibly lovely you are, Nora!

NORA. Don’t look at me like that, Torvald!

HELMER. Can’t I look at my most treasured possession? At all this loveliness that’s mine and mine alone, completely and utterly mine.

NORA [walks round to the other side of the table]. You mustn’t talk to me like that tonight.

HELMER [following her]. You still have the tarantella in your blood, I see. And that makes you even more desirable. Listen! The guests are beginning to leave now. [Softly] Nora . . . soon the whole house will be silent.

NORA. I should hope so.

HELMER. Of course you do, don’t you, Nora my darling? You know, whenever I’m out at a party with you . . . do you know why I never talk to you very much, why I always stand away from you and only steal a quick glance at you now and then . . . do you know why I do that? It’s because I’m pretending we are secretly in love, secretly engaged and nobody suspects there is anything between us.

NORA. Yes, yes. I know your thoughts are always with me, of course.

HELMER. And when it’s time to go, and I lay your shawl round those shapely, young shoulders, round the exquisite curve of your neck . . . I pretend that you are my young bride, that we are just leaving our wedding, that I am taking you to our new home for the first time . . . to be alone with you for the first time . . . quite alone with your young and trembling loveliness! All evening I’ve been longing for you, and nothing else. And as I watched you darting and swaying in the tarantella, my blood was on fire . . . I couldn’t bear it any longer . . . and that’s why I brought you down here with me so early. . . .

NORA. Go away, Torvald! Please leave me alone. I won’t have it.

HELMER. What’s this? It’s just your little game isn’t it, my little Nora. Won’t! Won’t! Am I not your husband . . . ?

[There is a knock on the front door]

NORA [startled]. Listen . . . !

HELMER [going towards the ball]. Who’s there?

RANK [outside]. It’s me. Can I come in for a minute?

RANK. I fancied I heard your voice and I thought I would just look in. [He takes a quick glance round.] Ah yes, this dear, familiar old place! How cozy and comfortable you’ve got things here, you two.

HELMER. You seemed to be having a pretty good time upstairs yourself.

RANK. Capital! Why shouldn’t I? Why not make the most of things in this world? At least as much as one can, and for as long as one can. The wine was excellent. . . .

HELMER. Especially the champagne.
Chapter 28 / Two Plays about Marriage

Act III

RANK. You noticed that too, did you? It’s incredible the amount I was able to put away.
NORA. Torvald also drank a lot of champagne this evening.
RANK. Oh?
NORA. Yes, and that always makes him quite merry.
RANK. Well, why shouldn’t a man allow himself a jolly evening after a day well spent?
HELMER. Well spent? I’m afraid I can’t exactly claim that.
RANK [clapping him on the shoulder]. But I can, you see!
NORA. Dr. Rank, am I right in thinking you carried out a certain laboratory test today?
RANK. Exactly.
HELMER. Look at our little Nora talking about laboratory tests!
NORA. And may I congratulate you on the result?
RANK. You may indeed.
NORA. So it was good?
RANK. The best possible, for both doctor and patient—certainty!
NORA [quickly and searchingly]. Certainty?
RANK. Absolute certainty. So why shouldn’t I allow myself a jolly evening after that?
NORA. Quite right, Dr. Rank.
HELMER. I quite agree. As long as you don’t suffer for it in the morning.
RANK. Well, you never get anything for nothing in this life.
NORA. Dr. Rank . . . you are very fond of masquerades, aren’t you?
RANK. Yes, when there are plenty of amusing disguises . . .
NORA. Tell me, what shall we two go as next time?
HELMER. There’s frivolity for you . . . thinking about the next time already!
RANK. We two? I’ll tell you. You must go as Lady Luck . . .
HELMER. Yes, but how do you find a costume to suggest that?
RANK. Your wife could simply go in her everyday clothes . . .
HELMER. That was nicely said. But don’t you know what you would be?
RANK. Yes, my dear friend, I know exactly what I shall be.
HELMER. Well?
RANK. At the next masquerade, I shall be invisible.
HELMER. That’s a funny idea!
RANK. There’s a big black cloak . . . haven’t you heard of the cloak of invisibility? That comes right down over you, and then nobody can see you.
HELMER [suppressing a smile]. Of course, that’s right.
RANK. But I’m clean forgetting what I came for. Helmer, give me a cigar, one of the dark Havanas.
HELMER. With the greatest of pleasure.

[He offers bis case.]

RANK [takes one and cuts the end off]. Thanks.
NORA [strikes a match]. Let me give you a light.
RANK. Thank you. [She holds out the match and be lights bis cigar.] And now, goodbye!
HELMER. Goodbye, goodbye, my dear fellow!
NORA. Sleep well, Dr. Rank.
RANK. Thank you for that wish.
NORA. Wish me the same.
RANK. You? All right, if you want me to. . . . Sleep well. And thanks for the light.

[He nods to them both, and goes.]

HELMER [subdued]. He’s had a lot to drink.
NORA [absently]. Very likely.

[HELMER takes a bunch of keys out of his pocket and goes out into the hall.]

NORA. Torvald . . . what do you want there?
HELMER. I must empty the letter box, it’s quite full. There’ll be no room for the papers in the morning. . . .
NORA. Are you going to work tonight?
HELMER. You know very well I’m not. Hello, what’s this? Somebody’s been at the lock.
NORA. At the lock?
HELMER. Yes, I’m sure of it. Why should that be? I’d hardly have thought the maids . . . ? Here’s a broken hairpin. Nora, it’s one of yours. . . .
NORA [quickly]. It must have been the children. . . .
HELMER. Then you’d better tell them not to. Ah . . . there . . . I’ve managed to get it open. [He takes the things out and shouts into the kitchen.]
HELMER. Helene! . . . Helene, put the light out in the hall. [He comes into the room again with the letters in his hand and shuts the hall door.] Look how it all mounts up. [Runs through them.] What’s this?
NORA. The letter! Oh no, Torvald, no!
HELMER. Two visiting cards . . . from Dr. Rank.
NORA. From Dr. Rank?
HELMER [looking at them]. Dr. Rank, Medical Practitioner. They were on top.
HELMER. He must have put them in as he left.
NORA. Is there anything on them?
HELMER. There’s a black cross above his name. Look. What an uncanny idea. It’s just as if he were announcing his own death.
NORA. He is.
HELMER. What? What do you know about it? Has he said anything to you?
NORA. Yes. He said when these cards came, he would have taken his last leave of us. He was going to shut himself up and die.
HELMER. Poor fellow! Of course I knew we couldn’t keep him with us very long. But so soon. . . . And hiding himself away like a wounded animal.
NORA. When it has to happen, it’s best that it should happen without words. Don’t you think so, Torvald?
HELMER [walking up and down]. He had grown so close to us. I don’t think I can imagine him gone. His suffering and his loneliness seemed almost to provide a background of dark cloud to the sunshine of our lives. Well, perhaps it’s all for the best. For him at any rate. [Pauses.] And maybe for us as well, Nora. Now there’s just the two of us. [Puts bis arms round her.] Oh, my darling wife, I can’t hold you close enough. You know, Nora . . . many’s the time I wish you were threatened by some terrible danger so I could risk everything, body and soul, for your sake.
NORA [tears herself free and says firmly and decisively]. Now you must read your letters, Torvald.

HELMER. No, no, not tonight. I want to be with you, my darling wife.

NORA. Knowing all the time your friend is dying . . .?

HELMER. You are right. It's been a shock to both of us. This ugly thing has come between us . . . thoughts of death and decay. We must try to free ourselves from it. Until then . . . we shall go our separate ways.

NORA [her arms round his neck]. Torvald . . . good night! Good night!

HELMER [kisses her forehead]. Goodnight, my little singing bird. Sleep well, Nora, I'll just read through my letters.

[He takes the letters into his room and shuts the door behind him.]

NORA [gropes around her; wild-eyed, seizes HELMER'S cloak, wraps it round herself, and with a quick, hoarsely, spasmodically]. Never see him again. Never, never, never. [Throws her shawl over her head.] And never see the children again either. Never, never. Oh, that black icy water. Oh, that bottomless . . .! If only it were all over! He's got it now. Now he's reading it. Oh no, no! Not yet! Torvald, goodbye . . . and my children. . . .

[She rushes out in the direction of the hall; at the same moment HELMER flings open his door and stands there with an open letter in his hand.]

HELMER. Nora!

NORA [screeks]. Ah!

HELMER. What is this? Do you know what is in this letter?

NORA. Yes, I know. Let me go! Let me out!

HELMER [holds her back]. Where are you going?

NORA [trying to tear herself free]. You mustn't try to save me, Torvald!

HELMER [reels back]. True! Is it true what he writes? How dreadful! No, no, it can't possibly be true.

NORA. It is true. I loved you more than anything else in the world.

HELMER. Don't come to me with a lot of paltry excuses!

NORA [taking a step towards him]. Torvald . . .!

HELMER. Miserable woman . . . what is this you have done?

NORA. Let me go. I won't have you taking the blame for me. You mustn't take it on yourself.

HELMER. Stop play-acting! [Locks the front door.] You are staying here to give an account of yourself. Do you understand what you have done? Answer me! Do you understand?

NORA [looking fixedly at him, her face hardening]. Yes, now I'm really beginning to understand.

HELMER [walking up and down]. Oh, what a terrible awakening this is. All these eight years . . . this woman who was my pride and joy . . . a hypocrite, a liar, worse than that, a criminal! Oh, how utterly squalid it all is! Ugh! Ugh! [NORA remains silent and looks fixedly at him.] I should have realized something like this would happen. I should have seen it coming. All your father's irresponsible ways. . . . Quiet! All your father's irresponsible ways are coming out in you. No religion, no morals, no sense of duty. . . . Oh, this is my punishment for turning a blind eye to him. It was for your sake I did it, and this is what I get for it.
Act III Henrik Ibsen

NORA. Yes, this.
HELMER. Now you have ruined my entire happiness, jeopardized my whole future. It's terrible to think of. Here I am, at the mercy of a thoroughly unscrupulous person; he can do whatever he likes with me, demand anything he wants, order me about just as he chooses... and I daren't even whimper. I'm done for, a miserable failure, and it's all the fault of a feather-brained woman!

NORA. When I've left this world behind, you will be free.
HELMER. Oh, stop pretending! Your father was just the same, always ready with fine phrases. What good would it do me if you left this world behind, as you put it? Not the slightest bit of good. He can still let it all come out, if he likes; and if he does, people might even suspect me of being an accomplice in these criminal acts of yours. They might even think I was the one behind it all, that it was I who pushed you into it! And it's you I have to thank for this... and when I've taken such good care of you, all our married life. Now do you understand what you have done to me?

NORA [coldly and calmly]. Yes.
HELMER. I just can't understand it, it's so incredible. But we must see about putting things right. Take that shawl off. Take it off, I tell you! I must see if I can't find some way or other of appeasing him. The thing must be hushed up at all costs. And as far as you and I are concerned, things must appear to go on exactly as before. But only in the eyes of the world, of course. In other words you'll go on living here; that's understood. But you will not be allowed to bring up the children, I can't trust you with them... Oh, that I should have to say this to the woman I loved so dearly, the woman I still... Well, that must be all over and done with. From now on, there can be no question of happiness. All we can do is save the bits and pieces from the wreck, preserve appearances... [The front door-bell rings. HELMER gives a start.]

What's that? So late? How terrible, supposing...? Hide, Nora! Say you are not well.

[NORA stands motionless. HELMER walks across and opens the door into the hall.]

MAID [half dressed, in the hall]. It's a note for Mrs. Helmer.
HELMER. Give it to me. [He snatches the note and shuts the door.] Yes, it's from him. You can't have it. I want to read it myself.

NORA. You read it then.
HELMER [by the lamp]. I hardly dare. Perhaps this is the end, for both of us. Well, I must know. [He opens the note hurriedly, reads a few lines, looks at another enclosed sheet, and gives a cry of joy!] Nora! [NORA looks at him inquiringly.] Nora! I must read it again. Yes, yes, it's true! I am saved! Nora, I am saved!

NORA. And me?
HELMER. You too, of course, we are both saved, you as well as me. Look, he's sent your IOU back. He sends his regrets and apologies for what he has done... His luck has changed... Oh, what does it matter what he says. We are saved, Nora! Nobody can do anything to you now. Oh, Nora, Nora... but let's get rid of this disgusting thing first. Let me see... [He glances at the IOU.] No, I don't want to see it. I don't want it to be anything but a dream. [He tears up the IOU and both letters, throws all the pieces into the stove and watches them burn.] Well, that’s the end of that. He said in his note you’d known since Christmas Eve. . . . You must have had three terrible days of it, Nora.

NORA. These three days haven’t been easy.

HELMER. The agonies you must have gone through! When the only way out seemed to be. . . . No, let’s forget the whole ghastly thing. We can rejoice and say: It’s all over! It’s all over! Listen to me, Nora! You don’t seem to understand: it’s all over! Why this grim look on your face? Oh, poor little Nora, of course I understand. You can’t bring yourself to believe I’ve forgiven you. But I have, Nora, I swear it. I forgive you everything. I know you did what you did because you loved me.

NORA. That’s true.

HELMER. You loved me as a wife should love her husband. It was simply that you didn’t have the experience to judge what was the best way of going about things. But do you think I love you any the less for that; just because you don’t know how to act on your own responsibility? No, no, you just lean on me, I shall give you all the advice and guidance you need. I wouldn’t be a proper man if I didn’t find a woman doubly attractive for being so obviously helpless. You mustn’t dwell on the harsh things I said in that first moment of horror, when I thought everything was going to come crashing down about my ears. I have forgiven you, Nora, I swear it! I have forgiven you!

NORA. Thank you for your forgiveness.

[She goes out through the door, right.]

HELMER. No, don’t go! [He looks through the doorway.] What are you doing in the spare room?

NORA. Taking off this fancy dress.

HELMER [standing at the open door]. Yes, do. You try and get some rest, and set your mind at peace again, my frightened little songbird. Have a good long sleep; you know you are safe and sound under my wing. [Walks up and down near the door] What a nice, cozy little home we have here, Nora! Here you can find refuge. Here I shall hold you like a hunted dove I have rescued unscathed from the cruel talons of the hawk, and calm your poor beating heart. And that will come, gradually, Nora, believe me. Tomorrow you’ll see everything quite differently. Soon everything will be just as it was before. You won’t need me to keep on telling you I’ve forgiven you; you’ll feel convinced of it in your own heart. You don’t really imagine me ever thinking of turning you out, or even of reproaching you? Oh, a real man isn’t made that way, you know, Nora. For a man, there’s something indescribably moving and very satisfying in knowing that he has forgiven his wife—forgiven her, completely and genuinely, from the depths of his heart. It’s as though it made her his property in a double sense: he has, as it were, given her a new life, and she becomes in a way both his wife and at the same time his child. That is how you will seem to me after today, helpless, perplexed little thing that you are. Don’t you worry your pretty little head about anything, Nora. Just you be frank with me, and I’ll take all the decisions for you. . . . What’s this? Not in bed? You’ve changed your things?
NORA [in her everyday dress]. Yes, Torvald, I’ve changed.
HELMER. What for? It’s late.
NORA. I shan’t sleep tonight.
HELMER. But my dear Nora . . . .
NORA [looks at her watch]. It’s not so terribly late. Sit down, Torvald. We two have a lot to talk about.

[She sits down at one side of the table.]

HELMER. Nora, what is all this? Why so grim?
NORA. Sit down. It’ll take some time. I have a lot to say to you.
HELMER [sits down at the table opposite her]. You frighten me, Nora. I don’t understand you.
NORA. Exactly. You don’t understand me. And I have never understood you, either—until tonight. No, don’t interrupt. I just want you to listen to what I have to say. We are going to have things out, Torvald.
HELMER. What do you mean?
NORA. Isn’t there anything that strikes you about the way we two are sitting here?
HELMER. What’s that?
NORA. We have now been married eight years. Hasn’t it struck you this is the first time you and I, man and wife, have had a serious talk together?
HELMER. Depends what you mean by “serious.”
NORA. Eight whole years—no, more, ever since we first knew each other—and never have we exchanged one serious word about serious things.
HELMER. What did you want me to do? Get you involved in worries that you couldn’t possibly help me to bear?
NORA. I’m not talking about worries. I say we’ve never once sat down together and seriously tried to get to the bottom of anything.
HELMER. But, my dear Nora, would that have been a thing for you?
NORA. That’s just it. You have never understood me . . . I’ve been greatly wronged, Torvald. First by my father, and then by you.
HELMER. What! Us two! The two people who loved you more than anybody?
NORA [imperturbably]. What I mean is: I passed out of Daddy’s hands into yours. You arranged everything to your tastes, and I acquired the same tastes. Or I pretended to . . . I don’t really know . . . I think it was a bit of both, sometimes one thing and sometimes the other. When I look back, it seems to me I have been living here like a beggar, from hand to mouth. I lived by doing tricks for you, Torvald. But that’s the way you wanted it. You and Daddy did me a great wrong. It’s your fault that I’ve never made anything of my life.
HELMER. Nora, how unreasonable . . . how ungrateful you are! Haven’t you been happy here?
NORA. No, never. I thought I was, but I wasn’t really.
HELMER. Not . . . not happy!
NORA. No, just gay. And you’ve always been so kind to me. But our house has never been anything but a playroom. I have been your doll wife, just as at home I was Daddy’s doll child. And the children in turn have been my dolls. I thought it was fun when you came and played with me, just as they thought it was fun when I went and played with them. That’s been our marriage, Torvald.
HELMER. There is some truth in what you say, exaggerated and hysterical though it is. But from now on it will be different. Playtime is over; now comes the time for lessons.
NORA. Whose lessons? Mine or the children’s?
HELMER. Both yours and the children’s, my dear Nora.
NORA. Ah, Torvald, you are not the man to teach me to be a good wife for you.
HELMER. How can you say that?
NORA. And what sort of qualifications have I to teach the children?
HELMER. Nora!
NORA. Didn’t you say yourself, a minute or two ago, that you couldn’t trust me with that job?
HELMER. In the heat of the moment! You shouldn’t pay any attention to that.
NORA. On the contrary, you were quite right. There’s another problem needs solving first. I must take steps to educate myself. You are not the man to help me there. That’s something I must do on my own. That’s why I’m leaving you.
HELMER. [jumps up]. What did you say?
NORA. If I’m ever to reach any understanding of myself and the things around me, I must learn to stand alone. That’s why I can’t stay here with you any longer.
HELMER. Nora! Nora!
NORA. I’m leaving here at once. I dare say Kristine will put me up for tonight . . .
HELMER. You are out of your mind! I won’t let you! I forbid you!
NORA. It’s no use forbidding me anything now. I’m taking with me my own personal belongings. I don’t want anything of yours, either now or later.
HELMER. This is madness!
NORA. Tomorrow I’m going home—to what used to be my home, I mean. It will be easier for me to find something to do there.
HELMER. Oh, you blind, inexperienced . . .
NORA. I must set about getting experience, Torvald.
HELMER. And leave your home, your husband and your children? Don’t you care what people will say?
NORA. That’s no concern of mine. All I know is that this is necessary for me.
HELMER. This is outrageous! You are betraying your most sacred duty.
NORA. And what do you consider to be my most sacred duty?
HELMER. Does it take me to tell you that? Isn’t it your duty to your husband and your children?
NORA. I have another duty equally sacred.
HELMER. You have not. What duty might that be?
NORA. My duty to myself.
HELMER. First and foremost, you are a wife and mother.
NORA. That I don’t believe any more. I believe that first and foremost I am an individual, just as much as you are—or at least I’m going to try to be. I know most people agree with you, Torvald, and that’s also what it says in books. But I’m not content any more with what most people say, or with what it says in books. I have to think things out for myself, and get things clear.
HELMER. Surely you are clear about your position in your own home? Haven’t you an infallible guide in questions like these? Haven’t you your religion?
NORA. Oh, Torvald, I don’t really know what religion is.
HELMER. What do you say!
NORA. All I know is what Pastor Hansen said when I was confirmed. He said religion was this, that and the other. When I’m away from all this and on my own, I’ll go into that, too. I want to find out whether what Pastor Hansen told me was right—or at least whether it’s right for me.
HELMER. This is incredible talk from a young woman! But if religion cannot keep you on the right path, let me at least stir your conscience. I suppose you do have some moral sense? Or tell me—perhaps you don’t?
NORA. Well, Torvald, that’s not easy to say. I simply don’t know. I’m really very confused about such things. All I know is my ideas about such things are very different from yours. I’ve also learnt that the law is different from what I thought; but I simply can’t get it into my head that that particular law is right. Apparently a woman has no right to spare her old father on his deathbed, or to save her husband’s life, even. I just don’t believe it.
HELMER. You are talking like a child. You understand nothing about the society you live in.
NORA. No, I don’t. But I shall go into that too. I must try to discover who is right, society or me.
HELMER. You are ill, Nora. You are delirious. I’m half inclined to think you are out of your mind.
NORA. Never have I felt so calm and collected as I do tonight.
HELMER. Calm and collected enough to leave your husband and children?
NORA. Yes.
HELMER. Then only one explanation is possible.
NORA. And that is?
HELMER. You don’t love me any more.
NORA. Exactly.
HELMER. Nora! Can you say that!
NORA. I’m desperately sorry, Torvald. Because you have always been so kind to me. But I can’t help it. I don’t love you any more.
HELMER [struggling to keep his composure]. Is that also a “calm and collected” decision you’ve made?
NORA. Yes, absolutely calm and collected. That’s why I don’t want to stay here.
HELMER. And can you also account for how I forfeited your love?
NORA. Yes, very easily. It was tonight, when the miracle didn’t happen. It was then I realized you weren’t the man I thought you were.

HELMER. Explain yourself more clearly. I don’t understand.

NORA. For eight years I have been patiently waiting. Because, heavens, I knew miracles didn’t happen every day. Then this devastating business started, and I became absolutely convinced the miracle would happen. All the time Krogstad’s letter lay there, it never so much as crossed my mind that you would ever submit to that man’s conditions. I was absolutely convinced you would say to him: Tell the whole wide world if you like. And when that was done . . .

HELMER. Yes, then what? After I had exposed my own wife to dishonor and shame . . . !

NORA. When that was done, I was absolutely convinced you would come forward and take everything on yourself, and say: I am the guilty one.

HELMER. Nora!

NORA. You mean I’d never let you make such a sacrifice for my sake? Of course not. But what would my story have counted for against yours?—That was the miracle I went in hope and dread of. It was to prevent it that I was ready to end my life.

HELMER. I would gladly toil day and night for you, Nora, enduring all manner of sorrow and distress. But nobody sacrifices his honor for the one he loves.

NORA. Hundreds and thousands of women have.

HELMER. Oh, you think and talk like a stupid child.

NORA. All right. But you neither think nor talk like the man I would want to share my life with. When you had got over your fright—and you weren’t concerned about me but only about what might happen to you—and when all danger was past, you acted as though nothing had happened. I was your little skylark again, your little doll, exactly as before; except you would have to protect it twice as carefully as before, now that it had shown itself to be so weak and fragile. [Rises.] Torvald, that was the moment I realized that for eight years I’d been living with a stranger, and had borne him three children . . . Oh, I can’t bear to think about it! I could tear myself to shreds.

HELMER [sadly]. I see. I see. There is a tremendous gulf dividing us. But, Nora, is there no way we might bridge it?

NORA. As I am now, I am no wife for you.

HELMER. I still have it in me to change.

NORA. Perhaps . . . if you have your doll taken away.

HELMER. And be separated from you! No, no, Nora, the very thought of it is inconceivable.

NORA [goes into the room, right]. All the more reason why it must be done.

[She comes back with her outdoor things and a small traveling bag, which she puts on the chair beside the table.]

HELMER. Nora, Nora, not now! Wait till the morning.

NORA [putting on her coat]. I can’t spend the night in a strange man’s room.

HELMER. Couldn’t we go on living here like brother and sister . . . ?

NORA [tying on her hat]. You know very well that wouldn’t last. [She draws the shawl round her.] Goodbye, Torvald. I don’t want to see the children. I know they are in better hands than mine. As I am now, I can never be anything to them.
Act III Henrik Ibsen

HELMER. But some day, Nora, some day . . . ?
NORA. How should I know? I’ve no idea what I might turn out to be.
HELMER. But you are my wife, whatever you are.
NORA. Listen, Torvald, from what I’ve heard, when a wife leaves her husband’s house as I am doing now, he is absolved by law of all responsibility for her. I can at any rate free you from all responsibility. You must not feel in any way bound, any more than I shall. There must be full freedom on both sides. Look, here’s your ring back. Give me mine.
HELMER. That too?
NORA. That too.
HELMER. There it is.
NORA. Well, that’s the end of that. I’ll put the keys down here. The maids know where everything is in the house—better than I do, in fact. Kristine will come in the morning after I’ve left to pack up the few things I brought with me from home. I want them sent on.
HELMER. The end! Nora, will you never think of me?
NORA. I dare say I’ll often think about you and the children and this house.
HELMER. May I write to you, Nora?
NORA. No, never. I won’t let you.
HELMER. But surely I can send you . . .
NORA. Nothing, nothing.
HELMER. Can’t I help you if ever you need it?
NORA. I said no. I don’t accept things from strangers.
HELMER. Nora, can I never be anything more to you than a stranger?
NORA [takes her bag]. Ah, Torvald, only by a miracle of miracles . . .
HELMER. Name it, this miracle of miracles!
NORA. Both you and I would have to change to the point where . . . Oh, Torvald, I don’t believe in miracles any more.
HELMER. But I will believe. Name it! Change to the point where . . . ?
NORA. Where we could make a real marriage of our lives together. Goodbye!

[She goes out through the hall door]

HELMER [sinks down on a chair near the door, and covers his face with his bands]. Nora! Nora! [He rises and looks round.] Empty! She’s gone! [With sudden hope.] The miracle of miracles . . . ?

[The heavy sound of a door being slammed is heard from below.]

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Near the beginning of the play, how does Mrs. Linde’s presence help to define Nora’s character? How does Nora’s response to Krogstad’s entrance tell us something about Nora?
2. What does Dr. Rank contribute to the play? If he were eliminated, what would be lost?
3. In view of the fact that the last act several times seems to be moving toward a “happy ending” (e.g., Krogstad promises to recall his letter), what is wrong with the alternate ending (see page 1335) that Ibsen reluctantly provided for a German production?
4. Can it be argued that although at the end Nora goes out to achieve self-realization, her abandonment of her children—especially to Torvald’s loathsome conventional morality—is a crime? (By the way, exactly why does Nora leave the children? She seems to imply, in some passages, that because she forged a signature she is unfit to bring them up. But do you agree with her?)

5. Michael Meyer, in his splendid biography Henrik Ibsen, says that the play is not so much about women’s rights as about “the need of every individual to find out the kind of person he or she really is, and to strive to become that person.” What evidence can you offer to support or refute this interpretation?

6. In The Quintessence of Ibsenism Bernard Shaw says that Ibsen, reacting against a common theatrical preference for strange situations, “saw that . . . the more familiar the situation, the more interesting the play. Shakespeare[e] had put ourselves on the stage but not our situations. Our uncles seldom murder our fathers and . . . marry our mothers. . . . Ibsen . . . gives us not only ourselves, but ourselves in our own situations. The things that happen to his stage figures are things that happen to us. One consequence is that his plays are much more important to us than Shakespeare[e]’s. Another is that they are capable both of hurting us cruelly and of filling us with excited hopes of escape from idealistic tyrannies, and with visions of intenser life in the future.” How much of this do you believe? Focus on details in the play to explain your response.

CONTEXTS FOR A DOLL’S HOUSE

HENRIK IBSEN

Notes for the Tragedy of Modern Times

The University Library, Oslo, has the following preliminary notes for A Doll’s House.

Rome 19.10.78

There are two kinds of moral law, two kinds of conscience, one in man and a completely different one in woman. They do not understand each other; but in matters of practical living the woman is judged by man’s law, as if she were not a woman but a man.

The wife in the play ends up quite bewildered and not knowing right from wrong; her natural instincts on the one side and her faith in authority on the other leave her completely confused.

A woman cannot be herself in contemporary society, it is an exclusively male society with laws drafted by men, and with counsel and judges who judge feminine conduct from the male point of view.

She has committed a crime, and she is proud of it; because she did it for love of her husband and to save his life. But the husband, with his conventional views of honour, stands on the side of the law and looks at the affair with male eyes.

Mental conflict. Depressed and confused by her faith in authority, she loses faith in her moral right and ability to bring up her children. Bitterness. A mother in contemporary society, just as certain insects go away and die when she has done her duty in the propagation of the race. Love of life, of home and husband and children and family. Now and then, woman-like, she shrugs off her thoughts. Sudden return of dread and terror. Everything must be borne alone. The catastrophe approaches, ineluctably, inevitably. Despair, resistance, defeat.

[The following note was later added in the margin:]

Krogstad has done some dishonest business, and thus made a bit of money; but his prosperity does not help him, he cannot recover his honour.

Adaptation of A Doll’s House for a German Production

Because Norwegian works were not copyrighted in Germany, German theaters could stage and freely adapt Ibsen’s works without his consent. When he heard that a German director was going to change the ending to a happy one, Ibsen decided that he had better do the adaptation himself, though he characterized it as “a barbaric outrage” against the play.

NORA. Where we could make a real marriage out of our lives together. Goodbye. (Begins to go.)

HELMER. Go then! (Seizes her arm.) But first you shall see your children for the last time!

NORA. Let me go! I will not see them! I cannot!

HELMER (draws her over to the door, left). You shall see them. (Opens the door and says softly.) Look, there they are asleep, peaceful and care-free. Tomorrow, when they wake up and call for their mother, they will be—motherless.

NORA (trembling). Motherless . . .!

HELMER. As you once were.

NORA. Motherless! (Struggles with herself, lets her traveling-bag fall, and says.) Oh, this is a sin against myself, but I cannot leave them. (Half sinks down by the door.)

HELMER (joyfully, but softly). Nora!

THE CURTAIN FALLS.

Speech at the Banquet of the Norwegian League for Women’s Rights

After the official birthday celebrations were over, Ibsen and his wife were invited to a banquet in his honor given by the leading Norwegian feminist society.

Christiania, May 26, 1898
I am not a member of the Women’s Rights League. Whatever I have written has been without any conscious thought of making propaganda. I have been more the poet and less the social philosopher than people generally seem inclined to believe. I thank you for the toast, but must disclaim the honor of having consciously worked for the women’s rights movement. I am not even quite clear as to just what this women’s rights movement really is. To me it has seemed a problem of mankind in general. And if you read my books carefully you will understand this. True enough, it is desirable to solve the woman problem, along with all the others; but that has not been the whole purpose. My task has been the description of humanity. To be sure, whenever such a description is felt to be reasonably true, the reader will read his own feelings and sentiments into the work of the poet. These are then attributed to the poet; but incorrectly so. Every reader remolds the work beautifully and neatly, each according to his own personality. Not only those who write but also those who read are poets. They are collaborators. They are often more poetical than the poet himself.

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

Clare Boothe Luce (1903–1987) gained distinction in two fields, playwrighting and politics. After working on two magazines, Vogue and Vanity Fair (she was managing editor of Vanity Fair from 1933 to 1934), she married Henry Luce, the founder of Fortune, Time, Life, and Sports Illustrated, and began a career as a playwright. Her first play, Abide with Me (1935), was unsuccessful, but she soon achieved critical acclaim and financial success with The Women (1936) and Kiss the Boys Good-bye (1938), both of which are social satires, and a comedy-mystery, Margin for Error (1939). She then embarked on a second career, serving two terms in Congress as a representative from Connecticut (1943–1947) and later serving as ambassador to Italy (1953–1956). Ill health compelled her to resign the ambassadorship, but in 1959 she was well enough to be appointed ambassador to Brazil—although because of a controversy she resigned the post in the same year, without having served.

Slam the Door Softly—the title evokes what is probably the most famous stage direction in drama, “The street door is slammed shut downstairs,” in Ibsen’s A Doll’s House—was first published in Life magazine, in 1970, where it was titled A Doll’s House (with Apologies to Henrik Ibsen), but the author later retitled it, calling it Slam the Door Softly. The play, set in the year it was published, was preceded by a note that said:

Most of Clare Boothe Luce’s life has been that of a woman doing a man’s job. But even before she became a successful magazine editor, a successful playwright, war correspondent, congresswoman and ambassador, she was an active crusader for the feminist cause. In 1923, at the age of 20, she worked as a secretary at the Washington headquarters of the National Women’s party and toured the country on behalf of an equal rights for women campaign. . . . In the following play she brings up to date Henrik Ibsen’s famous 1879 drama about a woman who rebelled against her role as a subservient wife.
Slam the Door Softly [1970]

The scene is the Thaw Walds’ cheerfully furnished middle-class living room in New York’s suburbia. There are a front door and ball, a door to the kitchen area, and a staircase to the bedroom floor. Two easy chairs and two low bassocks with toys on them, grouped around a television, indicate a family of four. Drinks are on a bar cart at one end of a comfortable sofa, and an end table at the other. There are slightly more than the average number of bookshelves. The lamps are on, but as we don’t hear the children, we know it is the Parents’ Hour.

As the curtain rises, THAW WALD, a good-looking fellow, about 35, is sitting in one of the easy chairs, smoking and watching TV. His back is to the sofa and staircase, so he does not see his wife coming down the stairs. NORA WALD is a rather pretty woman of about 32. She is carrying a suitcase, handbag, and an armful of books.

THAW switches channels, and lands in the middle of a panel show. During the TV dialogue that follows NORA somewhat furtively deposits her suitcase in the hall, takes her coat out of the hall closet, and comes back to the sofa carrying coat, purse, and books. She lays her coat on the sofa, and the books on the end table. The books are full of little paper slips—bookmarkers. All of the above actions are unobserved by THAW. We cannot see the TV screen, but we hear the voices of four women, all talking excitedly at once.

THAW (to the screen and the world in general). God, these Liberation gals! Still at it.

MALE MODERATOR’S VOICE (full of paternal patience wearing a bit thin). Ladies! Lay-deez! Can’t we switch now from the question of the sex-typing of jobs to what the Women’s Liberation Movement thinks about—

OLDER WOMAN’S VOICE. May I finish! In the Soviet Union 83% of the dentists, 75% of the doctors and 37% of the lawyers are women. In Poland and Denmark—

MODERATOR. I think you have already amply made your point, Mrs. Epstein—anything men can do, women can do better!

YOUNG WOMAN’S VOICE (angrily). That was not her point—and you know it! What she said was, there are very few professional jobs men are doing that women couldn’t do, if only—

THAW. Well, for God’s sake then, shaddup, and go do ’em—

BLACK WOMAN’S VOICE. What she’s been saying, what we’ve all been saying, and you men just don’t want to hear us, is—things are the same for women as they are for us black people. We try to get up, you just sit down on us, like a big elephant sits down on a bunch of poor little mice.

MODERATOR. Well, sometimes moderators have to play the elephant, and sit down on one subject in order to develop another. As I was about to say, ladies, there is one thing a woman can do, no man can do—(in his best holy-night-all-is-bright voice) give birth to a child.

YOUNG WOMAN’S VOICE. So what else is new?

THAW. One gets you ten, she’s a Lesbo—

MODERATOR (forcefully). And that brings us to marriage! Now, if I may be permitted to get in just one statistic, edgewise: two-thirds of all adult American females are married women. And now! (At last he’s got them Hedren be wants them.) What is the Women’s Lib view of Woman’s No. 1 job—Occupation Housewife?

THAW. Ha! That’s the one none of ‘em can handle—

YOUNG WOMAN’S VOICE (loud and clear). Marriage, as an institution, is as thoroughly corrupt as prostitution. It is, in fact, legalized and romanticized prostitution. A woman who marries is selling her sexual services and domestic services for permanent bed and board—

BLACK WOMAN’S VOICE. There’s no human being a man can buy anymore—except a woman—

THAW (snapping off the TV). Crr-ap! Boy, what a bunch of battle-axes! (He goes back to studying his TV listings.)

NORA (raising her voice). Thaw! I’d like to say something about what they just said about marriage—

THAW (in a warning voice). Uh-uh, Nora! We both agreed months ago, you’d lay off the feminist bit, if I’d lay off watching Saturday football—

NORA. And do something with the children . . . But Thaw, there’s something maybe, I ought to try to tell you myself—

(THAW is not listening. NORA makes a “what’s the use” gesture, then opens her purse, takes out three envelopes, carefully inserts two of them under the covers of the top two books.)

THAW. Like to hear Senators Smithers, Smethers and Smathers on “How Fast Can We Get Out of Vietnam?”

NORA (cool mockery). That bunch of pot-bellied, bald-headed old goats! Not one of them could get a woman—well, yes, maybe for two dollars.

THAW. You don’t look at Senators, Nora. You listen to them.

NORA (nodding). Women are only to look at. Men are to listen to. Got it.

(THAW snaps off the TV. He is now neither looking at her nor listening to her, as he methodically turns pages of the magazine he has picked up.)

THAW. Finished reading to the kids?

NORA. I haven’t been reading to the children. I’ve been reading to myself—and talking to myself—for a long time now.

THAW. That’s good. (She passes him, carrying the third envelope, and goes into kitchen.)

THAW (unenthusiastically). Want some help with the dishes?

NORA’S VOICE. I’m not doing the dishes.

THAW (enthusiastically). Say, Nora, this is quite an ad we’ve got in Life for Stove Mountain Life Insurance.

NORA’S VOICE. Yes, I saw it. Great. (She comes back and goes to sofa.)

THAW. It’s the kind of ad that grabs you. This sad-faced, nice-looking woman of 50, sitting on a bench with a lot of discouraged old biddies, in an employment agency. Great caption—(reading)

NORA and THAW (together). “Could this happen to your wife?”

NORA. I’ll let you know the answer very shortly. (A pause.) You really don’t hear me anymore, do you? (He really doesn’t. She buttons herself into her coat, pulls on her gloves.) Well, there are enough groceries for a week. All the telephone numbers you’ll need and menus for the children are in the envelope on the spindle. A girl will come in to take care of them after school—until your mother gets here.
THAW. Uh-huh . . .

NORA (looks around sadly). Well, good-bye dear little doll house. Good-bye dear husband. You've had the best ten years of my life.

(She goes to the staircase, blows two deep kisses upstairs, just as THAW glances up briefly at her, but returns automatically to his magazine.
NORA picks up suitcase, opens the door, goes out, closing it quietly.)

THAW (like a man suddenly snapping out of a hypnotic trance). Nora? Nora? NOR-RA! (He is out of the door in two seconds.)

THAW’S and NORA’S VOICES. Nora, where’re you going?—I’ll miss my train—I don’t understand—it’s all in my letter—let me go!—You come back—

(They return. He is pulling her by the arm. He yanks the suitcase away from her, drops it in the hall.)

NORA. Ouch! You’re hurting me!

THAW. Now what is this all about? (He shoves her into the room, then stands between her and door) Why the hell . . . What’re you sneaking out of the house . . . What’s that suitcase for?

NORA. I wasn’t sneaking. I told you. But you weren’t listening.

THAW. I was listening . . . it just didn’t register. You said you were reading to yourself. Then you started yakking about the kids and the groceries and the doll house mother sent . . . (flabbergasted) Good-bye?! What the hell do you mean, good-bye?!

NORA. Just that. I’m leaving you. (Pointing to books.) My letter will explain everything—

THAW. Have you blown your mind?

NORA. Thaw, I’ve got to scoot, or I’ll miss the eight-o-nine.

THAW. You’ll miss it. (He backs her to the sofa, pushes her onto it, goes and slams the door and strides back.) Now, my girl, explain all this.

NORA. That’s easy. Muscle. The heavier musculature of the male is a secondary sexual characteristic. Although that’s not certain. It could be just the result of selective breeding. In primitive times, of course, the heavier musculature of the male was necessary to protect the pregnant female and the immobile young—

THAW (bis anger evaporates). Nora, are you sick?

NORA. But what’s just happened now shows that nothing has changed—I mean, fundamentally changed—in centuries, in the relations between the sexes. You still Tarzan, me still Jane.

THAW (sits on sofa beside her, feels her head). I’ve noticed you’ve been . . . well . . . acting funny lately . . .

NORA. Funny?

THAW. Like there was something on your mind. . . . Tell me, what’s wrong, sweetheart? Where does it hurt?

NORA. It hurts (taps bead) here. Isn’t that where thinking hurts you? No. You’re used to it. I was, too, when I was at Wellesley. But I sort of stopped when I left. It’s really hard to think of anything else when you’re having babies.

THAW. Nora, isn’t it about time for your period?

NORA. But if God had wanted us to think just with our wombs, why did He give us a brain? No matter what men say, Thaw, the female brain is not a vestigial organ, like a vermiform appendix.

THAW. Nora . . .
NORA. Thaw, I can just about make my train. I’ll leave the car and keys in the usual place at the station. Now, I have a very important appointment in the morning. (She starts to rise.)

THAW. Appointment? (Grabs her shoulders.) Nora, look at me! You weren’t sneaking out of the house to . . . get an abortion?

NORA. When a man can’t explain a woman’s actions, the first thing he thinks about is the condition of her uterus. Thaw, if you were leaving me and I didn’t know why, would I ask, first thing, if you were having prostate trouble?

THAW. Don’t try to throw me off the track, sweetie! Now, if you want another baby . . .

NORA. Thaw, don’t you remember, we both agreed about the overpopulation problem—

THAW. To hell with the overpopulation problem. Let Nixon solve that. Nora, I can swing another baby—

NORA. Maybe you can. I can’t. For me there are no more splendid, new truths to be learned from scanning the contents of babies’ diapers. Thaw, I am pregnant. But not in a feminine way. In the way only men are supposed to get pregnant.

THAW. Men, pregnant?

NORA (nodding). With ideas. Pregnancies there (taps his head) are masculine. And a very superior form of labor. Pregnancies here (taps her tummy) are feminine—a very inferior form of labor. That’s an example of male linguistic chauvinism. Mary Ellmann is great on that. You’ll enjoy her Thinking about Women . . .

THAW (going to telephone near bookshelf). I’m getting the doctor. (NORA makes a dash for the door, he drops the phone.) Oh, no you don’t!

(He reaches for her as she passes, misses. Grabs her ponytail and hauls her back by it, and shoves her into the easy chair.)

NORA. Brother, Millett sure had you typed.

THAW. Milly who? (A new thought comes to him.) Has one of your goddam-gossipy female friends been trying to break up our marriage? (He suddenly checks his conscience. It is not altogether pure.) What did she tell you? That she saw me having lunch, uh, dinner, with some girl?

NORA (nodding to herself). Right on the button!

THAW. Now, Nora, I can explain about that girl—

NORA. You don’t have to. Let’s face it. Monogamy is not natural to the male—

THAW. You know I’m not in love with anybody but you—

NORA. It’s not natural to the female, either. Making women think it is man’s most successful form of brainwashing—

THAW. Nora, I swear, that girl means nothing to me—

NORA. And you probably mean nothing to her. So whose skin is off whose nose?

THAW (relieved, but puzzled). Well, uh, I’m glad you feel that way about— uh—things.

NORA. Oh, it’s not the way I feel. It’s the way things really are. What with the general collapse of the mores, and now the Pill, women are becoming as promiscuous as men. It figures. We’re educated from birth to think of ourselves just as man-traps. Of course, in my mother’s day, good women thought of themselves as private man-traps. Only bad women were public man-traps. Now we’ve all gone public. (Looks at watch.) I’ll have to take the eight-forty.

(She gets out of her coat, lays it, ready to slip into, on back of sofa.)

THAW (a gathering suspicion). Nora, are you trying to tell me . . . that you—

NORA. Of course, a lot of it, today, is the fault of the advertising industry. Making women think they’re failures in life if they don’t make like sex-pots around the clock. We’re even supposed to wear false eyelashes when we’re vacuuming. Betty Friedan’s great on that. She says many lonely suburban housewives, unable to identify their real problem, think more sex is the answer. So they sleep with the milkman, or the delivery boy. If I felt like sleeping with anybody like that, I’d pick the plumber. When you need him, boy you need him!

THAW (the unpleasant thought he has been wrestling with has now jelled). Nora . . . are you . . . trying to tell me you are leaving me—for someone else?

NORA. Why, Thaw Wald! How could you even think such a thing? (To herself.) Now, how naive can I be? What else do men think about, in connection with women, but sex? He is saying to himself, she’s not having her period, she’s not pregnant, she’s not jealous; it’s got to be another man.

THAW. Stop muttering to yourself, and answer my question.

NORA. I forgot what it was. Oh, yes.

THAW. No what?

NORA. No, I’m not in love with anybody else. I was a virgin when I married you. And intacta. And that wasn’t par for the course—even at Wellesley. And I’ve never slept with anybody else, partly because I never wanted to. And partly because, I suppose, of our family’s Presbyterian hangup. So, now that all the vital statistics are out of the way, I’ll just drive around until—

(* Begins to slip her arms into coat. He grabs coat, throws it on easy chair *)

THAW. You’re not leaving until you tell me why.

NORA. But it’s all in my letter. (Points.) The fat one sticking out of Simone de Beauvoir’s Second Sex—

THAW. If you have a bill of particulars against me, I want it—straight. From you.

NORA. Oh, darling, I have no bill of particulars. By all the standards of our present-day society, you are a very good husband. And, mark me, you’ll be president of Stove Mountain Life Insurance Company before you’re 50. The point is, what will I be when I’m 50—

THAW. You’ll be my wife, if I have anything to say. Okay. So you’re not leaving me because I’m a bad husband, or because my financial future is dim.

NORA. No. Oh, Thaw, you just wouldn’t understand.

THAW (patiently). I might, if you would try, for just one minute, to talk logically—

NORA. Thaw, women aren’t trained to talk logically. Men don’t like women who talk logically. They find them unfeminine—aggressive—

THAW. Dammit, Nora, will you talk sense . . .
NORA. But Boy! does a man get sore when a woman won’t talk logically when be wants her to, and (snaps fingers) like that! And that isn’t illogical? What women men are! Now, if you will step aside—THAW (grabbing her and shaking her). You’re going to tell me why you’re walking out on me, if I have to sock you!
NORA. Thaw, eyeball to eyeball, I am leaving you—and not for a man. For reasons of my own I just don’t think you can understand. And if you mean to stop me, you’ll have to beat me to a pulp. But I’m black and blue already.
THAW (seizes her tenderly in his arms, kisses her). Nora, sweetheart! You know I couldn’t really hurt you. (Kisses, kisses.) Ba-aaby, what do you say we call it a night? (Scoops her up in his arms.) You can tell me all about it in bed . . .
NORA. The classical male one-two. Sock ’em and screw ’em.
THAW (dumping her on sofa). Well, it’s been known to work on a lot of occasions. Something tells me this isn’t one of them. (Pours a drink.)
NORA. I guess I need one, too. (He mixes them.) Thaw?
THAW. Yes.
NORA. I couldn’t help being a little pleased when you made like a caveman.
It shows you really do value my sexual services.
THAW. Jee-zus!
NORA. Well, it can’t be my domestic services—you don’t realize, yet, what they’re worth. (Drinks.) Thaw, you do have a problem with me. But you can’t solve it with force. And I do have a problem. But I can’t solve it with sex.
THAW. Could you, would you, try to tell me what my-you-our problem is?
NORA. Friedan’s Feminine Mystique is very good on The Problem. I’ve marked all the relevant passages. And I’ve personalized them in my letter—(He goes to book. Yanks out letter, starts to tear it up. NORA groans. He changes his mind, and stuffs it in his pocket.)
THAW. Look, Nora, there’s one thing I’ve always said about you. For a woman, you’re pretty damn honest. Don’t you think you owe it to me to level and give me a chance to defend myself?
NORA. The trouble is, you would have to listen to me. And that’s hard for you.
I understand why. Not listening to women is a habit that’s been passed on from father to son for generations. You could almost say, tuning out on women is another secondary sexual male characteristic.
THAW. So our problem is that I don’t listen?
NORA. Thaw, you always go on talking, no matter how hard I’m interrupting.
THAW. Okay. You have the floor.
NORA. Well, let’s begin where this started tonight. When you oppressed me, and treated me as an inferior—
THAW. I oppressed . . . (Hesitates.) Lay on, MacDuff.
NORA. You honestly don’t think that yanking me around by my hair and threatening to sock me are not the oppressive gestures of a superior male toward an inferior female?
THAW. For Chrissake, Nora, a man isn’t going to let the woman he loves leave him, if he can stop her!
NORA. Exactly. Domination of the insubordinate female is an almost instinctive male reflex. In extremis, Thaw, it is rape. Now, would I like it if you should say you were going to leave me? No. But could I drag you back—THAW. You'd just have to crook your little finger.

NORA. Flattery will get you nowhere this evening. So, where was I?

THAW. I am a born rapist.

NORA. Wasn’t that what you had in mind when you tried to adjourn this to our bedroom? But that’s just your primitive side. There’s your civilized side, too. You are a patriarchal pater familias.

THAW. What am I now?

NORA. Thaw, you do realize we all live in a patriarchy, where men govern women by playing sexual politics?

THAW. Look, you’re not still sore because I talked you into voting for Nixon?

(She gives him a withering look.) Okay. So we all live in a patriarchy. . .

NORA. Our little family, the Walds, are just one nuclear patriarchal unit among the millions in our patriarchal male-dominated civilization, which is worldwide. It’s all in that book—

THAW. Look Nora, I promise I’ll read the damn book—but . . .

NORA. So who’s interrupting? Well, Thaw, all history shows that the hand that cradles the rock has ruled the world, not the hand that rocks the cradle! Do you know what brutal things men have done to women? Bought and sold them like cattle. Bound their feet at birth to deform them—so they couldn’t run away—like in China. Made widows throw themselves on the funeral pyres of their husbands, like in India. Cut off their clitorises, so they could be bred but not enjoy sex. Thaw, did you know that the clitoris is the only sexual organ, in either sex, solely designed by nature for sexual pleasure?

THAW. That fascinating fact, up to now, has escaped me.

NORA. Yes, it’s a pity. Well . . . men who committed adultery were almost never punished. But women were always brutally punished. Why, in many countries unfaithful wives were stoned to death—

THAW. This is America, 1970, Nora. And here, when wives are unfaithful, husbands get stoned. (Drinks.) Mind if I do?

NORA. Be your guest. Oh, there’s no doubt that relations between the sexes have been greatly ameliorated . . .

THAW. Now, about our relations, Nora. You’re not holding it against me that men, the dirty bastards, have done a lot of foul things to women in the past?

NORA (indignant). What do you mean, in the past?

THAW (determined to be patient). Past, present, future—what has what other men have done to other women got to do with us?

NORA. Quite a lot. We are a male and a female—

THAW. That’s the supposition I’ve always gone on. But Nora, we are a particular male and a particular female: Thaw Wald and his wife, Nora—

NORA. Yes. That’s why it’s so shattering when you find out you are such a typical husband and—

THAW (a new effort to take command). Nora, how many men do you know who are still in love with their wives after ten years?

NORA. Not many. And, Thaw, listen, maybe the reason is—

THAW. So you agree that’s not typical? Okay. Now, do I ever grumble about paying the bills? So that’s not typical. I liked my mother-in-law, even when she was alive. And God knows that’s not typical. And don’t I do every damn thing I can to keep my mother off your back? And that’s not typical. I’m even thoughtful about the little things. You said so yourself, remember, when I bought you that black see-through nightgown for Mother's Day. That I went out and chose myself. And which you never wear.

NORA. I had to return it. It was too small. And do you know what the saleswoman said? She said, "Men who buy their wives things in this department are in love with them. But why do they all seem to think they are married to midgets?" That's it, Thaw, that's it! Men “think little”—like ‘thinking thin’—even about women they love. They don’t think at all about women they don’t love or want to sleep with. Now, I can’t help it if you think of me as a midget. But don’t you see, I’ve got to stop thinking of myself as one. Thaw, listen . . .

THAW. Why the devil should you think of yourself as a midget? I think you’re a great woman. A real woman! Why, you’re the dearest, sweetest, most understanding little wife—most of the time—a man ever had. And the most intelligent and wonderful little mother! Dammit, those kids are the smartest, best-behaved, most self-reliant little kids . . .

NORA. Oh, I’ve been pretty good at Occupation Housewife, if I do say so myself. But Thaw, listen. Can’t you even imagine that there might be something more a woman needs and wants—

THAW. My God, Nora, what more can a woman want than a nice home, fine children and a husband who adores her?

NORA (discouraged). You sound like old Dr. Freud, in person.

THAW. I sound like Freud? I wish I were. Then I’d know why you’re so uptight.

NORA. Oh, no you wouldn’t. Know what Freud wrote in his diary, when he was 77? “What do women want? My God, what do they want?” Fifty years this giant brain spends analyzing women. And he still can’t find out what they want. So this makes him the world’s greatest expert on feminine psychology? (She starts to look at her watch.) To think I bought him, in college.

THAW. You’ve got plenty of time. You were saying about Freud—(He lights a cigarette, hands it to her, determined to stick with it to the end.)

NORA. History is full of ironies! Freud was the foremost exponent of the theory of the natural inferiority of women. You know, “Anatomy is destiny”?

THAW. I was in the School of Business, remember?

NORA. Well, old Freud died in 1939. He didn’t live to see what happened when Hitler adopted his theory that “anatomy is destiny.” Six million of his own people went to the gas chambers. One reason, Hitler said, that the Jews were naturally inferior was because they were effeminate people, with a slave mentality. He said they were full of those vices which men always identify with women—when they’re feeling hostile: You know, sneakiness and deception, scheming and wheedling, whining and pushiness, oh, and materialism, sensuousness and sexuality. Thaw, what’s your favorite feminine vice?

THAW. At this moment, feminine monologues.

NORA. I didn’t think you’d have the nerve to say sneakiness. I saw you sneak a look at your watch, and egg me on to talk about Freud, hoping I’ll miss my train. I won’t.

THAW. So nothing I’ve said—what little I’ve had a chance to say . . . (She shakes her bead)—you still intend to divorce me?
NORA. Oh, I never said I was divorcing you. I’m deserting you. So you can divorce me.

THAW. You do realize, Nora, that if a wife deserts her husband he doesn’t have to pay her alimony?

NORA. I don’t want alimony. But I do want severance pay. (Points to books.)

There’s my bill, rendered for ten years of domestic services—the thing sticking in Woman’s Place, by Cynthia Fuchs Epstein. I figured it at the going agency rates for a full-time cook, cleaning woman, handy-man, laudress, seamstress, and part-time gardener and chauffeur, I’ve worked an average ten-hour day. So I’ve charged for overtime. Of course, you’ve paid my rent, taxes, clothing, medical expenses, and food. So I’ve deducted those. Even though as a housewife, I’ve had no fringe benefits. Just the same, the bill . . . well, I’m afraid you’re going to be staggered. I was. It comes to over $53,000. I’d like to be paid in ten installments.

THAW (be is staggered). Mathematics isn’t really your bag, Nora.

NORA. I did it on that little calculating machine you gave me at Christmas. If you think it’s not really fair, I’ll be glad to negotiate. And, please notice, I haven’t charged anything for sleeping with you!

THAW. Wow! (He is really punch drunk.)

NORA. I’m not a prostitute. And this is what I wanted to say about the Lib girls. They’re right about women who marry just for money. But they’re wrong about women who marry for love. It’s love makes all the difference—

THAW (dispirited). Well, vive la différence.

NORA. And, of course, I haven’t charged anything for being a nurse. I’ve adored taking care of the children, especially when they were babies.

I’m going to miss them—awfully.

THAW (on his feet, with outrage). You’re deserting the children, too? My God, Nora, what kind of woman are you? You’re going to leave those poor little kids alone in this house—

NORA. You’re here. And I told you, your mother is coming. I wired her that her son needed her. She’ll be happy again—and be needed again—for the first time in years—

THAW (this is a real blow). My mother! Oh, migod, you can’t, Nora. You know how she—swarms over me! She thinks I’m still 12 years old . . .

(His head is now in his hands.) You know she drives me out of my cotton-picking mind.

NORA. Yes. But you never said so before.

THAW. I love my mother. She’s been a good mother, and wife. But Nora, she’s a very limited woman! Yak, yak—food, shopping, the kids . . .

NORA. Thaw, the children love this house, and I don’t want to take them out of school. And I can’t give them another home. Women, you know, can’t borrow money to buy a house. Besides, legally this house and everything in it, except mother’s few things, are yours. All the worldly goods with which thou didst me endow seem to be in that suitcase.

THAW. Nora, you know damn well that all my life insurance is in your name.
If I died tomorrow—and I may blow my brains out tonight—everything would go to you and the kids.

NORA. Widowhood is one of the few fringe benefits of marriage. But, today, all the money I have is what I’ve saved in the past year out of my clothes allowance—$260.33. But I hope you will give me my severance pay—THAW. And if I don’t—you know legally I don’t have to—how do you propose to support yourself?

NORA. Well, if I can’t get a job right away—sell my engagement ring. That’s why they say diamonds are a gal’s best friend. What else do jobless women have they can turn into ready cash—except their bodies?

THAW. What kind of job do you figure on getting?

NORA. Well, I do have a master’s in English. So I’m going to try for a spot in Time Research. That’s the intellectual harem kept by the Time Inc. editors. The starting pay is good.

THAW. How do you know that?

NORA. From your own research assistant, Molly Peapack. We’re both Wellesley, you know. She’s a friend of the chief researcher at Time, Marylois Vega. Also, Molly says, computer programming is a field that may open to women—

THAW (indignant). You told Peapack you were leaving me? Before you even told me? How do you like that for treating a mate like an inferior!

NORA. Thaw, I’ve told you at least three times a week for the last year that with the kids both in school, I’d like to get a job. You always laughed at me. You said I was too old to be a Playboy Bunny, and that the only job an inexperienced woman my age could get would be as a saleswoman—

THAW. Okay. Where are you going to live? That 200 won’t go far—

NORA. Peapack’s offered to let me stay with her until I find something.

THAW. I’m going to have a word with Miss Molly Peapack tomorrow. She’s been too damned aggressive lately, anyway—

NORA. She’s going to have a word with you, too. She’s leaving.

THAW. Peapack is leaving? Leaving me?

NORA. When you got her from Prudential, you promised her, remember, you’d recommend her for promotion to office manager. So, last week you took on a man. A new man. Now she’s got a job offer where she’s sure she’s got a 40–60 chance for advancement to management. (Pause.) So you’ve lost your home wife and your office wife.

THAW. Jesus! And this is a male-dominated world?

NORA. Well, I’ve got five minutes—

THAW. You’ve still not told me why.

NORA. Oh, Thaw darling! You poor—man. I have told you why: I’m leaving because I want a job. I want to do some share, however small, of the world’s work, and be paid for it. Isn’t the work you do in the world—and the salary you get—what makes you respect yourself, and other men respect you? Women have begun to want to respect themselves a little, too—

THAW. You mean, the real reason you are leaving is that you want a paying job?

NORA. Yes.

THAW. God, Nora, why didn’t you say that in the beginning. All right, go get a job, if it’s that important to you. But that doesn’t mean you have to leave me and the kids.

NORA. I’m afraid it does. Otherwise, I’d have to do two jobs. Out there. And here.

THAW. Look, Nora, I heard some of the Lib gals say there are millions of working wives and mothers who are doing two jobs. Housework can’t be all that rough—

THAW. Listen, Nora, what say, you work, I work. And we split the housework? How’s that for a deal?

NORA. It’s a deal you are not quite free to make, Thaw. You sometimes can’t get home until very late. And you have to travel a lot, you know. Oh, it might work for a little while. But not for long. After ten years, you still won’t empty an ashtray, or pick up after yourself in the bathroom. No. I don’t have the physical or moral strength to swing two jobs. So I’ve got to choose the one, before it’s too late, that’s most important to me—oh, not for me just now, but for when I’m 50—

THAW. When you’re 50, Nora, if you don’t leave me, you’ll be the wife of the president of Stove Mountain Life Insurance Company. Sharing my wealth, sharing whatever status I have in the community. And with servants of your own. Now you listen to me, Nora. It’s a man’s world, out there. It’s a man’s world where there are a lot of women working. I see them every day. What are most of them really doing? Marking time, and looking, always looking, for a man who will offer them a woman’s world . . . the world you have here. Marriage is still the best deal that the world has to offer women. And most women know it. It’s always been like that. And it’s going to be like that for a long, long time.

NORA. Just now I feel that the best deal I, Nora Wald, can hope to get out of life is to learn to esteem myself as a person . . . to stop feeling that every day a little bit more of my mind—and heart—is being washed down the drain with the soapsuds . . . Thaw—listen. If I don’t stop shrinking, I’ll end up secretly hating you, and trying to cut you—and your son—down to my size. The way your poor, dear mother does you and your father. And you’ll become like your father, the typical henpecked husband. Thinking of his old wife as the Ball and Chain. You know he has a mistress? (Thaw knows.) A smart gal who owns her own shop . . . who doesn’t bore him.

THAW. Well, Nora . . . (Pours drinks.) One for the road?

NORA. Right. For the road.

THAW. Nora . . . I’ll wait. But I don’t know how long—

NORA. I’ve thought of that, too . . . that you might remarry . . . that girl, maybe, who means nothing—

THAW. Goddammit, a man needs a woman of his own—

NORA (nodding). I know. A sleep-in, sleep-with body servant of his very own. Well, that’s your problem. Just now, I have to wrestle with mine. (Goes to door; picks up suitcase.) I’m not bursting with self-confidence, Thaw. I do love you. And I also need . . . a man. So I’m not slamming the door. I’m closing it . . . very . . . softly.

(EXIT. CURTAIN FALLS.)

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Based on the little that we hear of the television program at the start of the play, characterize the moderator of the program.
2. What dramatic purposes are served by including the bit about the television program?

3. Very early in the dialogue Thaw warns Nora: “Uh-uh, Nora! We both agreed months ago, you’d lay off the feminist bit if I’d lay off watching Saturday football.” What does this tell us about Thaw? And about Nora? Do you think they made a fair bargain? (Notice also the first line that Nora speaks after Thaw’s line.)

4. What are the implications of the ad by Stove Mountain Life Insurance? Why does Thaw think it is “quite an ad”? What do you think of it?

5. Trace the course of Thaw’s methods in his attempts to keep Nora from leaving.

6. How much do you think Thaw has learned by the end of the play?

7. In some ways the play—though certainly serious—is a comedy. What, if anything, do you find funny in it?

Students Writing about Plays

Perhaps more evidently than stories or poems, plays are writings that offer arguments. Characters, pitted against other characters, are likely to try to justify their behavior. At the end of Othello, for instance, the protagonist offers an account of his behavior—an account that some readers and spectators find convincing and emotionally satisfying, but that others find self-deluded and emotionally unsatisfying. Essays about plays often set forth highly controversial positions; for instance, “The women in Glaspell’s Trifles are justified in concealing evidence of the murder” or, to take a more nuanced position, “Although viewers can scarcely approve of withholding evidence of murder in Glaspell’s Trifles viewers probably approve for three reasons: First, ..., second, ..., and third ....”

Assertions of a thesis will interest readers only when supported by evidence. In all probability you can find a thesis by examining your basic responses or by scanning the questions we give below, but almost certainly you will modify this thesis during the course of your reexamination of the play. Thinking skeptically about your own assertions is the heart of critical thinking, and critical thinking is at the heart of writing an effective argument. It is not, however, the whole of writing an argument. Once you have drafted your argument, and you are satisfied with the position that you have taken, you still need to make sure that you set forth this position effectively, in words that will engage your readers.

The following questions may help you to formulate ideas for an essay on a play.

PLOT AND CONFLICT

1. Does the exposition introduce elements that will be ironically fulfilled? During the exposition do you perceive things differently from the way the characters perceive them?
2. Are certain happenings or situations recurrent? If so, what significance do you attach to them?
3. If there is more than one plot, do the plots seem to you to be related? Is one plot clearly the main plot and another plot a subplot, a minor variation on the theme?
4. Do any scenes strike you as irrelevant?
5. Are certain scenes so strongly foreshadowed that you anticipated them? If so, did the happenings in these scenes merely fulfill your expectations, or did they also in some way surprise you?
6. What kinds of conflict are there? One character against another, one group against another, one part of a personality against another part in the same person?
7. How is the conflict resolved? By an unambiguous triumph of one side or by a triumph that is also in some degree a loss for the triumphant side? Do you find the resolution satisfying, unsettling, or what? Why?

CHARACTER

1. A dramatic character is not likely to be thoroughly realistic, a copy of someone we might know. Still, we can ask if the character is consistent and coherent. We can also ask if the character is complex or, on the other hand, a simple representative of some human type.
2. How is the character defined? Consider what the character says and does and what others say about him or her and do to him or her. Also consider other characters who more or less resemble the character in question, for the similarities—and the differences—may be significant.
3. How trustworthy are the characters when they characterize themselves? When they characterize others?
4. Do characters change as the play goes on, or do we simply know them better at the end?
5. What do you make of the minor characters? Are they merely necessary to the plot, or are they foils to other characters? Or do they serve other functions?
6. If a character is tragic, does the tragedy seem to you to proceed from a moral flaw, from an intellectual error, from the malice of others, from sheer chance, or from some combination of these elements?
7. What are the character's goals? To what degree do you sympathize with them? If a character is comic, do you laugh with or at the character?
8. Do you think the characters are adequately motivated?
9. Is a given character so meditative that you feel he or she is engaged less in a dialogue with others than in a dialogue with the self? If so, do you feel that this character is in large degree a spokesperson for the author, commenting not only on the world of the play but also on the outside world?

TRAGEDY

1. What causes the tragedy? A flaw in the central character? A mistake (not the same thing as a flaw) made by this character? An outside force, such as another character or fate?
2. Is the tragic character defined partly by other characters, for instance, by characters who help us to sense what the character might have done, or who in some other way reveal the strengths or weaknesses of the protagonist?
3. Does a viewer know more than the tragic figure knows? More than most or all of the characters know?
4. Does the tragic character achieve any sort of wisdom at the end of the play?
5. To what degree do you sympathize with the tragic character?
6. Is the play depressing? If not, why not?
COMEDY

1. Do the comic complications arise chiefly out of the personalities of the characters (for instance, pretentiousness or amorousness) or out of the situations (for instance, mistaken identity)?
2. What are the chief goals of the figures? Do we sympathize with these goals, or do we laugh at persons who pursue them? If we laugh, why do we laugh?
3. What are the personalities of those who oppose the central characters? Do we laugh at them, or do we sympathize with them?
4. What is funny about the play? Is the comedy high (including verbal comedy) or chiefly situational and physical?
5. Is the play predominantly genial, or is there a strong satiric tone?
6. Does the comedy have any potentially tragic elements in it? Might the plot be slightly rewritten so that it would become a tragedy?
7. What, if anything, do the characters learn by the end of the play?

NONVERBAL LANGUAGE

1. If the playwright does not provide full stage directions, try to imagine for at least one scene what gestures and tones might accompany each speech. (The first scene is usually a good one to try your hand at.)
2. What do you make of the setting? Does it help to reveal character? Do changes of scene strike you as symbolic? If so, symbolic of what?
3. Do certain costumes (dark suits, flowery shawls, stiff collars, etc.) or certain properties (books, pictures, toys, candlesticks, etc.) strike you as symbolic? If so, symbolic of what?

THE PLAY IN PERFORMANCE

Often we can gain a special pleasure from, or insight into, a dramatic work when we actually see it produced onstage or made into a film. This gives us an opportunity to think about the choices that the director has made, and, even more, it may prompt us to imagine and ponder how we would direct the play for the theater or make a film version of it ourselves.

1. If you have seen the play in the theater or in a film version, what has been added? What has been omitted? Why?
2. In the case of a film, has the film medium been used to advantage—for example, in focusing attention through close-ups or reaction shots (shots showing not the speaker but a person reacting to the speaker)?
3. Do certain plays seem to be especially suited—maybe only suited—to the stage? Would they not work effectively as films? Is the reverse true: Are some plays best presented, and best understood, when they are done as films?
4. Critics have sometimes said about this or that play that it cannot really be staged successfully or presented well on film—that the best way to appreciate and understand it is as something to be read, like a poem or novel. Are there plays you have studied for which this observation appears to hold true? Which features of the work—its characters, settings, dialogue, central themes—might make it difficult to transfer the play from the page to the stage or to the movie screen?
5. Imagine that you are directing the play. What important decisions would you have to make about character, setting, and pacing of the action? Would you be inclined to omit certain scenes? To add new scenes that are not in the work itself? What kinds of advice would you give to the performers about their roles?

A FILMED VERSION OF A PLAY

Although one might at first think that a film version of a play is pretty much the play caught on film, as soon as one realizes that movies use such techniques as close-ups and high and low angle shots (the action is seen from above or below), one realizes that the filmed version of a play can be very different from the version on the stage, even though in both forms a story is told by means of actors. In Laurence Olivier's Hamlet (1944), dreamlike dissolves (the shot fades while a new shot appears to emerge from beneath it) suggest the prince's irresoluteness. Or consider the use of black-and-white versus color film; Olivier made Shakespeare's Henry V (1944) in color but Hamlet in black and white because, in Olivier's view, color conveyed a splendor appropriate to England's heroic history, whereas black-and-white seemed more suited to somber tragedy.

Filmmakers customarily "open out" plays, giving us scenes of skies, beaches, city streets, and so forth. In Olivier's Hamlet we get shots of the sea and the sky. The camera descends from a great height just before Hamlet delivers his first soliloquy, and when the Ghost leaves at 1.5.96 the camera soars into the air as though with the Ghost, and then, from above, the camera shows Hamlet fainting at the battlements. Even when the camera shows us scenes within the palace it in effect opens the play by panning and traveling through long empty corridors and over staircases, suggesting Hamlet's irresolute mind. (Kenneth Branagh's film version of Hamlet [1996], however, is very different.)

Getting Ready to Write

Writing an essay about a new film—one not yet available for study on DVD—presents difficulties not encountered in writing about stories, plays, or poems. Because we experience film in a darkened room, we cannot easily take notes, and because the film may be shown only once, we cannot always take another look at passages that puzzle us. But some brief notes can be taken even in the dark; it is best to amplify them as soon as light is available, while you still know what the scrawls mean. If you can see the film more than once, do so, and, of course, if the script has been published, study it. Draft your paper as soon as possible after your first viewing, and then see the film again. You can sometimes check hazy memories of certain scenes and techniques with fellow viewers. But even with multiple viewings and the aid of friends, it is almost impossible to get all of the details right; it is best for the writer to be humble and for the reader to be tolerant.

For a sample essay by a student, see the review of Kenneth Branagh's Hamlet, which begins on page 1366.
CHECKLIST: Writing about a Filmed Play

Preliminaries

❖ Is the title of the film the same as the title of the play? If not, what is implied?

Dramatic Adaptations

❖ Does the film closely follow its original and neglect the potentialities of the camera? Or does it so revel in cinematic devices that it distorts the original?

❖ Does the film do violence to the theme of the original? Is the film better than its source? Are the additions or omissions due to the medium or to a crude or faulty interpretation of the original?

Plot and Character

❖ Can film deal as effectively with inner action—mental processes—as with external, physical action? In a given film, how is the inner action conveyed? Olivier uses voice-over for parts of Hamlet’s soliloquies—that is, we hear Hamlet’s voice but his lips do not move.

❖ Are shots and sequences adequately developed, or do they seem jerky? (A shot may be jerky by being extremely brief or at an odd angle; a sequence may be jerky by using discontinuous images or fast cuts. Sometimes, of course, jerkiness may be desirable.) If such cinematic techniques as wipes, dissolves, and slow motion are used, are they meaningful and effective?

❖ Are the characters believable?

❖ Are the actors appropriately cast?

Sound Track

❖ Does the sound track offer more than realistic dialogue? Is the music appropriate and functional? (Music may, among other things, imitate natural sounds, give a sense of locale or of ethnic group, suggest states of mind, provide ironic commentary, or—by repeated melodies—help establish connections.) Are volume, tempo, and pitch—whether of music or of such sounds as the wind blowing or cars moving—used to stimulate emotions?

FIVE ESSAYS BY STUDENTS

The college essays you write about plays will be similar in many respects to analytic essays about fiction. Unless you are writing a review of a performance, you probably won’t try to write about all aspects of a play. Rather, you’ll choose one significant aspect as your topic. For instance, if you are writing about Tennessee Williams’s The Glass Menagerie, you might compare the aspirations of Jim O’Connor and Tom Wingfield, or you might compare Tom’s illusions with those of his sister, Laura, and his mother, Amanda. Or you might examine the symbolism, perhaps limiting your essay topic to the glass animals, perhaps extending it to include other symbols such as the fire escape, the lighting, and the Victrola. Similarly, if you are writing an analysis, you might decide to study the construction of one scene of a play or (if the play does not have a great many scenes) even the construction of the entire play.

The first essay following discusses the structure of The Glass Menagerie. It mentions various characters, but since its concern is with the arrangement of scenes, it does not examine any of the characters in detail. An essay might well be devoted to examining Williams's assertion that "There is much to admire in Amanda, and as much to love and pity as there is to laugh at," but an essay on the structure of the play is probably not the place to talk about Williams's characterization of Amanda.

An Essay on Plot: Joel Shapiro's "The Solid Structure of The Glass Menagerie"

Preliminary Notes

After deciding to write on the structure of the play, with an eye toward seeing the overall pattern that the parts form, Joel Shapiro reread The Glass Menagerie (page 963), jotted down some notes briefly summarizing each of the seven scenes, with an occasional comment, and then typed them. On rereading the typed notes, he added a few observations in handwriting.

1. begins with Tom talking to audience; says he is a magician.
   - America, in 1930s
   - “shouting and confusion”
   - Father deserted
   - Amanda nagging; is she a bit cracked?
   - Tom: bored, angry
   - Laura: embarrassed, depressed
2. Laura: quit business school; sad, but Jim’s name is mentioned, so, lighter tone introduced
3. Tom and Amanda argue
   - Tom almost destroys glass menagerie
   - Rage: Can things get any worse?
4. T and A reconciled
   - T to try to get a “gentleman caller”
5. T tells A that Jim will visit
   - things are looking up
6. Jim arrives; L terrified still, A thinks things can work out
7. Lights go out (foreshadowing dark ending?) Jim a jerk, clumsy; breaks unicorn, but L doesn’t seem to mind. Maybe he is the right guy to draw her into normal world. Jim reveals he is engaged:
   - “Desolation.”
   - Tom escapes into merchant marine, but can’t escape memories. Speaks to audience. L. blows out candles (does this mean he forgets her? No, because he is remembering her right now. I don’t get it, if the candles are supposed to be symbolic.)
These notes enabled Shapiro to prepare a rough draft, which he then submitted to some classmates for peer review.

Notice that the final version of the essay is not merely a summary (a brief retelling of the plot). Although it does indeed include summary, it is devoted to showing how the scenes are related.

The Solid Structure of The Glass Menagerie

In the "Production Notes" Tennessee Williams calls The Glass Menagerie a "memory play," a term that the narrator in the play also uses. Memories often consist of fragments of episodes that are so loosely connected that they seem chaotic, and therefore we might think that The Glass Menagerie will consist of very loosely related episodes. However, the play covers only one episode, and though it gives the illusion of random talk, it really has a firm structure and moves steadily toward a foregone conclusion.

Tennessee Williams divides the play into seven scenes. The first scene begins with a sort of prologue, and the last scene concludes with a sort of epilogue that is related to the prologue. In the prologue Tom addresses the audience and comments on the 1930s as a time when America was "blind" and was a place of "shouting and confusion." Tom also mentions that our lives consist of expectations, and though he does not say that our expectations are unfulfilled, near the end of the prologue he quotes a postcard that his father wrote to the family he deserted: "Hello--Goodbye!" In the epilogue Tom tells us that he followed his "father's footsteps," deserting the family. And just before the epilogue, near the end of Scene VII, we see what can be considered another desertion: Jim explains to Tom's sister, Laura, that he is engaged and therefore cannot visit Laura again. Thus the end is closely related to the beginning, and the play is the steady development of the initial implications.

The first three scenes show things going from bad to worse. Amanda is a nagging mother who finds her only relief in talking about the past to her crippled daughter, Laura, and her frustrated son, Tom. When she was young she was beautiful and was eagerly courted by rich young men, but now the family is poor and this harping on the past can only bore or infuriate Tom and embarrass or depress Laura, who have no happy past to look back to, who see no happy future, and who can only be upset by Amanda's insistence that they should behave as she behaved long ago. The second scene deepens the despair: Amanda learns that the timorous Laura has not been attending a business school but has retreated in terror from this confrontation with the contemporary world. Laura's helplessness is made clear to the audience, and so is Amanda's lack of understanding. Near the end of the second scene, however, Jim's name is introduced; he is a boy Laura had a crush on in high school, and so the audience gets a glimpse of a happier Laura and a sense that possibly Laura's world is wider than the stifling tenement in which she and her mother and brother live. But in the third scene things get worse, when Tom and Amanda have so violent an argument that they are no longer on speaking terms. Tom is so angry with his mother that he almost by accident destroys his sister's treasured collection of glass animals, the fragile, lifeless world that is her refuge. The apartment is literally full of the "shouting and confusion" that Tom spoke of in his prologue.

The first three scenes have revealed a progressive worsening of relations; the next three scenes reveal a progressive improvement in relations. In Scene IV Tom and his mother are reconciled, and Tom reluctantly--apparently in an effort to make up with his mother--agrees to try to get a friend to come to dinner so that Laura will have "a gentleman caller." In Scene V Tom tells his mother that Jim will come to dinner on the next night, and Amanda brightens, because she sees a possibility of security for Laura at last. In Scene VI Jim arrives, and despite Laura's initial terror, there seems, at least in Amanda's mind, to be the possibility that things will go well.

The seventh scene, by far the longest, at first seems to be fulfilling Amanda's hopes. Despite the ominous fact that the lights go out because Tom has not paid the electric bill, Jim is at ease. He is an insensitive oaf, but that doesn't seem to bother Amanda, and almost miraculously he manages to draw Laura somewhat out of her sheltered world. Even when Jim in his clumsiness breaks the horn off Laura's treasured glass unicorn, she is not upset. In fact, she is almost relieved because the loss of the horn makes the animal less "freakish" and he "will feel more at home with the other horses." In a way, of course, the unicorn symbolizes the crippled Laura, who at least for the moment feels less freakish and isolated now that she is somewhat reunited with society through Jim. But this is a play about life in a blind and confused world, and though in a previous age the father escaped, there can be no escape now. Jim reveals that he is engaged, Laura relapses into "desolation," Amanda relapses into rage and bitterness, and Tom relapses into dreams of escape. In a limited sense Tom does escape. He leaves the family and joins the merchant marine, but his last speech or epilogue tells us that he cannot escape the memory of his sister: "Oh, Laura, Laura, I tried to leave you behind me, but I am more faithful than I intended to be!" And so the end of the last scene brings us back again to the beginning of the first scene: we are still in a world of "the blind" and of "confusion." But now at the end of the play the darkness is deeper, the characters are lost forever in their unhappiness as Laura "blows the candles out," the darkness being literal but also symbolic of their extinguished hopes.

An Essay on Setting: Margaret Hammer’s “What the Kitchen in Trifles Tells Us”

One of our students, Margaret Hammer, wrote a short essay on setting in Susan Glaspell’s Trifles. (The play appears beginning on page 953.)

What the Kitchen in Trifles Tells Us

Susan Glaspell’s Trifles is a one-act play with only one setting. It cannot show us, therefore, a strong contrast such as we might see in the first two scenes of Hamlet, where at the start we encounter soldiers on guard during a cold night, and then, in the second scene, we are taken into the king's splendid court. Nevertheless, as we read Trifles we do become aware of a contrast: We see an untidy kitchen, with “dirty towels” (955), bread left unbaked, a cupboard closet with a "mess" of preserves (955), and a table "one half of which is clean, the other half messy" (957), but we hear about a pleasant woman who in happier days sang in the church choir, and who was an excellent quilter. The reader, or the spectator at the play, inevitably concludes that the gloomy and messy kitchen is not typical of the woman who worked in it. But what is it typical of?

In the first stage direction of the play Glaspell tells us what the spectator sees: "The kitchen in the now abandoned farmhouse of John Wright, a gloomy kitchen, and left without having been put in order . . ." (949). Later we hear that we are near Omaha (953), but nothing much is made of the particular part of the United States where the play is set. What much is made of is the fact that the kitchen is cold, that "it never seemed a very cheerful place" (956), and--here we get something crucial--that no "place'd be any cheerfuller for John Wright's being in it" (956). In short, the cold, cheerless, gloomy place is almost a symbol of the farmer, John Wright, and (perhaps surprisingly) the kitchen does not represent the woman who doubtless spent much of her time in it.

As the play progresses, we hear that the Wright house, "down in a hollow," is "a lonesome place" (959), but the central fact--the point repeatedly made in play--is how cold the kitchen is, and the reader/viewer comes to identify the setting with John Wright himself, a man who was "like a raw wind that gets to the bone" (959).

The mess in the kitchen provides Mrs. Hale and Mrs. Peters with information as to what drove Mrs. Wright to murder her husband, but the "gloomy" kitchen itself provides information about Mr. Wright, and about the miserable life that he forced his wife to live.

The Analysis Analyzed

We think Margaret Hammer has done a very good job explaining the role of the setting in Trifles. What are some of the things that, in our view, make the essay effective?

- The title is engaging and hints at the thesis (that the setting is important).
- The first paragraph makes a relevant comparison with another work that the student has studied. The comparison is not window-dressing; it makes the important point that a single setting can convey a good deal.
- The second paragraph focuses on the point that the kitchen is cold and cheerless—and that in these respects it is very like the farmer, John Wright, and not like the woman who worked there.
- The third paragraph pretty much makes the same point as the second, and in fact we would have combined the second and third paragraphs. If each of these paragraphs had been long—say, eight or ten sentences apiece—we might have kept them as two paragraphs, but given their relative brevity, we think a reader can take both at one gulp.
- The final paragraph briefly and emphatically drives the thesis home.

An Essay on Character and Theme: Carla Alonso’s “Fairy Mischief and Morality in A Midsummer Night’s Dream”

The student Carla Alonso told us privately that when she began work on her paper, she was planning to write on the irrationality of the fairies in A Midsummer Night’s Dream as a sort of mirror of the irrationality of the young lovers, but when she searched the play for supporting detail she found, to her surprise, that she had to revise her thesis.

Her earliest jottings—a sort of preliminary outline and guide to rereading the play—looked like this:

- fairies—like lovers, irrational?
  - Puck
    - mischievous
  - Titania and Oberon
    - equally quarrelsome
    - quarrel disturbs human world
    - Titania wants Indian boy
    - isn’t she right?
    - if so, she’s not irrational
  - Oberon
    - jealous
    - cruel to Titania?
    - unfaithful?
- Other fairies
  - do they do anything?
  - T’s different from O’s?
In rereading the play and in jotting down notes, she came to see that the supernatural characters were not as malicious and irrational as she had thought, and so she changed the focus of her thesis.

Fairy Mischief and Morality in A Midsummer Night's Dream

If we read A Midsummer Night's Dream casually, or come away from a delightful performance, we may have the vague impression that the fairies are wild, mischievous, willful creatures who perhaps represent the irrational qualities of mankind. But in fact the text lends only a little support to this view. The irrationality of mankind is really represented chiefly by the human beings in the play--we are told in the first scene, for example, that Demetrius used to love Helena but now loves Hermia--and the fairies are largely responsible for the happy ending finally achieved.

It is, of course, easy to see why we may think of the fairies as wild and mischievous. Titania and Oberon have quarreled over a little Indian boy, and their quarrel has led to fogs, floods, and other disorders in nature. Moreover, Titania accuses Oberon of infidelity, and Oberon returns the charge:

How canst thou thus for shame,
Titania
Glance at my credit with Hippolyta,
Knowing I know thy love to Theseus?

(2.1.74–76)
Titania rejects this countercharge, saying "These are the forgeries of jealousy" (2.1.81), but we are not convinced of her innocence. It would be easy to give additional examples of speeches in which the king and queen of fairyland present unflattering pictures of each other, but probably one of the strongest pieces of evidence of their alleged irrationality is the fact the Oberon causes Titania to fall in love with the asinine Bottom. We should not forget, however, that later Oberon will take pity on her: "Her dotage now I do begin to pity" (4.1.45).

In fact, it is largely through Oberon's sense of pity--this time for the quarreling young lovers in the forest--that the lovers finally are successfully paired off. And we should remember, too, before we claim that the fairies are consistently quarrelsome and mischievous, that at the very end of the play Oberon and Titania join in a song and dance blessing the newlyweds and promising healthy offspring. The fairies, though quarrelsome, are fundamentally benevolent spirits.

But what of Robin Goodfellow, the Puck of the play? Is he not mischievous? One of the fairies says Robin is a "shrewd and knavish sprite" (2.1.33) who frightens maids and plays tricks on housewives; Robin admits the charge, saying "Thou speakest aright" (2.1.42), and two lines later he says, "I jest to Oberon, and make him smile," and then he goes on to describe some of his practical jokes, including his fondness for neighing to tease a horse and pulling a stool from under an old lady. But this is not quite the whole story. The fact is, despite this speech, that we do not see Robin engage in any mischievous pranks. After all, he does not deliberately anoint the eyes of the wrong Athenian lover. Oberon tells Robin that he will recognize the young man by his Athenian clothing, and when Puck encounters a young man in Athenian clothing he anoints the youth's eyes. The fault is really Oberon's, though of course Oberon meant well when he instructed Robin:

A sweet Athenian lady is in love
With a disdainful youth. Anoint his eyes;
But do it when the next thing he espies
May be the lady.

(2.1.260–63)

So Robin's error is innocent. He is speaking honestly when he says, "Believe me, king of shadows, I mistook" (3.2.348). Of course he does enjoy the confusion he mistakenly causes, but we can hardly blame him severely for that. After all, we enjoy it, too.

The fairies, by their very nature, suggest a mysterious, irrational world, but--even though, as we have just seen, Oberon is called the "king of shadows"--they are not to be confused with "ghosts, wand'ring here and there," "damned spirits" who "willfully themselves exile from light/And must for aye consort with black-browed night" (3.2.382–88). Oberon explicitly says, after this speech, "But we are spirits of another sort," and his speech is filled with references not to darkness but to light: "morning," "eastern gate," "blessed beams."
The closer we observe them in the play, then, the closer their behavior is to that of normal, decent human beings. There is plenty of irrationality in the play, but it is found for the most part in the human beings, not in the fairies.

Notice that this first-rate essay:

- Has a thesis, an argument.
- Develops the thesis effectively.

Notice also that:

- The title gives the reader some idea of what is coming.
- The first paragraph clearly sets forth the thesis.
- The essay next takes up the evidence that might seem to contradict the thesis—Oberon and Titania, and Robin Goodfellow—and it shows that this evidence is not decisive.
- The essay continues to move the thesis forward, substantiating it, especially with well-chosen quotations.
- The last paragraph slightly restates the thesis in light of what the essay has demonstrated.

A Review of a Film Version of a Play: Will Saretta on Branagh’s Film of Hamlet

What follows is an undergraduate’s review of Kenneth Branagh’s film version of Hamlet (1996). In the margin we call attention to the reviewer’s rhetorical strategies.
Kenneth Branagh’s film of Hamlet opened last night at the Harmor Auditorium and will be shown again on Wednesday and Thursday at 7:30 p.m. According to the clock the evening will be long—the film runs for four hours, and in addition there is one ten-minute intermission—but you will enjoy every minute of it.

Well, almost every minute. Curiously, the film begins and ends relatively weakly, but most of what occurs between is good, and much of it is wonderful. The beginning is weak because it is too strong; Bernardo, the sentinel, offstage says “Who’s there?” but before he gets a reply he crashes onto the screen and knocks Francisco down. The two soldiers grapple, swords flash in the darkness, and finally Francisco says, “Nay, answer me. Stand and unfold yourself.” Presumably Branagh wanted to begin with a bang, but here, as often, more is less. A quieter, less physical opening in which Bernardo, coming on duty, hears a noise and demands that the maker of the noise identify himself, and Francisco, the sentinel on duty, rightly demands that the newcomer identify himself, would catch the uneasiness and the mystery that pervades the play much better than does Branagh’s showy beginning.

Similarly, at the end of the film, we get too much. For one thing, shots of Fortinbras’s army invading Elsinore alternate with shots of the duel between Hamlet and King Claudius’s
The third paragraph uses a clear transition (“Similarly”) and makes its points in an orderly fashion, using effective repetition (“Second,” “Hamlet is not a play about,” “or about,” “Hamlet is not about,” “It is about . . .”).

Having discussed the weaknesses, Saretta now turns to “what . . . is good about the film.” Several points are made, in a reasonable sequence.

paw, Laertes, and they merely distract us from what really counts in this scene, the duel itself, which will result in Hamlet’s death but also in Hamlet’s successful completion of his mission to avenge his father. Second, at the very end we get shots of Fortinbras’s men pulling down a massive statue of Hamlet Senior, probably influenced by television and newspaper shots of statues of Lenin being pulled down when the Soviet Union was dissolved a few years before the film was made. This is ridiculous; Hamlet is not a play about the fall of Communism, or about the one form of tyranny replacing another. Shakespeare’s Hamlet is not about the triumph of Fortinbras. It is about Hamlet’s brave and ultimately successful efforts to do what is right, against overwhelming odds, and to offer us the consolation that in a world where death always triumphs there nevertheless is something that can be called nobility.

What, then, is good about the film? First, the film gives us the whole play, whereas almost all productions, whether on the stage or in the movie house, give us drastically abbreviated versions. Although less is often more, when it comes to the text of Hamlet, more is better, and we should be grateful to Branagh for letting us hear all of the lines. Second, it is very well performed, with only a few exceptions. Jack Lemmon as Marcellus is pretty bad, but fortunately the part is small. Other big-name actors in small parts—Charlton Heston as the Player King, Robin Williams as Osric, and Billy Crystal as the First Gravedigger—are admirable. But of course the success or failure of any production of Hamlet will depend chiefly on the actor who plays.
Hamlet, and to a considerable degree on the actors who play Claudius, Gertrude, Polonius, Ophelia, Laertes, and Horatio. There isn't space here to comment on all of these roles, but let it be said that Branagh's Prince Hamlet is indeed princely, a man who strikes us as having the ability to become a king, not a wimpy whining figure. When at the end Fortinbras says that if Hamlet had lived to become the king, he would "have proved most royal," we believe him. And his adversary, King Claudius, though morally despicable, is a man of great charm and great ability. The two men are indeed "mighty opposites," to use Hamlet's own words.

Branagh's decision to set the play in the late nineteenth century rather than in the Elizabethan period of Shakespeare's day and rather than in our own day contributes to this sense of powerful forces at work. If the play were set in Shakespeare's day, the men would wear tights, and if it were set in our day they would wear suits or trousers and sports jackets and sweaters, but in the film all of the men wear military costumes (black for Hamlet, scarlet for Claudius, white for Laertes) and the women wear ball gowns of the Victorian period. Branagh gives us a world that is closer to our own than would Elizabethan costumes, but yet it is, visually at least, also distant enough to convey a sense of grandeur, which modern dress cannot suggest. Of course Hamlet can be done in modern dress, just as Romeo and Juliet was done, successfully, in the recent film starring Claire Danes and Leonardo DiCaprio, set in a world that seemed to be Miami Beach, but Romeo and Juliet is less concerned with heroism and grandeur than Hamlet is, so Branagh probably did well to avoid contemporary costumes.

Although Branagh is faithful to the text, in that he gives us the entire text, he knows that a good film cannot be made merely by recording on film a stage production, and so he gives us handsome shots of landscape and of rich interiors—for instance, a great mirrored hall—that would be beyond the resources of any theatrical production. I have already said that at the end, when Fortinbras’s army swarms over the countryside and then invades the castle we get material that is distracting, indeed irrelevant, but there are also a few other distractions. It is all very well to let us see the content of long narrative speeches (for instance, when the Player King talks of the fall of Troy and the death of King Priam and the lament of Queen Hecuba, Branagh shows us these things, with John Gielgud as Priam and Judi Dench as Hecuba performing in pantomime), but there surely is no need for us to see a naked Hamlet and a naked Ophelia in bed, when Polonius is warning Ophelia that Hamlet’s talk of love cannot be trusted. Polonius’s warning is not so long or so undramatic that we need to be entertained visually with an invention that finds not a word of support in the text. On the contrary, all of Ophelia’s lines suggest that she would not be other than a dutiful young woman, obedient to the morals of the time and to her father’s authority. Yet another of Branagh’s unfortunate inventions is the prostitute who appears in Polonius’s bedroom during Polonius’s interview with Reynaldo. A final example of unnecessary spectacle is Hamlet’s killing
Having offered some negative comments, Saretta reminds the reader that he thinks the film is very good.

The “postscript” is tacked on, but reviews often have a relatively informal touch.

Having offered some negative comments, Saretta reminds the reader that he thinks the film is very good.

But it is wrong to end this review by pointing out faults in Branagh’s film of Hamlet. There is so much in this film that is exciting, so much that is moving, so much that is . . . well, so much that is Hamlet (which is to say that is a great experience), that the film must be recommended without reservation. Go to see it. The four hours will fly.

A postscript: It is good to see that Branagh uses color-blind casting. Volternard, Fortinbras’s Captain, and the messenger who announces Laertes’s return are all blacks—the messenger is a black woman—although of course medieval Denmark and Elizabethan England, and, for that matter, Victorian England, would not have routinely included blacks. These performers are effective, and it is appropriate that actors of color take their place in the world’s greatest play.

A Sample Student Essay, Using Sources: Ruth Katz’s “The Women in Death of a Salesman”

In Appendix A we discuss manuscript form and documentation (page 1559). Here we give a student’s documented paper on Arthur Miller’s Death of a Salesman. (The play appears in this book beginning on page 1384.) Ruth Katz had taken notes on index cards, both from the play and from secondary sources, and she had arranged and rearranged the notes as her topic and thesis became clearer to her. We preface the final version of Katz’s essay with the rough outline that she prepared before she wrote her first draft.

Willy Loman’s Women

Here is the final version of Katz’s essay.
The Women in Death of a Salesman

Death of a Salesman is of course about a salesman, but it is also about the American dream of success. Somewhere in between the narrowest topic, the death of a salesman, and the largest topic, the examination of American values, is Miller's picture of the American family. This paper will chiefly study one member of the family, Willy's wife, Linda Loman, but before examining Miller's depiction of her, it will look at Miller's depiction of other women in the play in order to make clear Linda's distinctive traits. We will see that although her role in society is extremely limited, she is an admirable figure, fulfilling the roles of wife and mother with remarkable intelligence.

Linda is the only woman who is on stage much of the time, but there are several other women in the play: "the Woman" (the unnamed woman in Willy's hotel room), Miss Forsythe and her friend Letta (the two women who join the brothers in the restaurant), Jenny (Charley's secretary), the various women whom the brothers talk about, and the voices of Howard's daughter and wife. We also hear a little about Willy's mother.

We will look first at the least important (but not utterly unimportant) of these, the voices of Howard's daughter and wife on the wire recorder. Of Howard's seven-year-old daughter we know only that she can whistle "Roll Out the Barrel" and that according to Howard she "is crazy about me." The other woman in Howard's life is equally under his thumb. Here is the dialogue that tells us about her—and her relation to her husband.
Katz 2

HOWARD'S VOICE. "Go on, say something." (Pause.) "Well, you gonna talk?"

HIS WIFE. "I can't think of anything."
HOWARD'S VOICE. "Well, talk--it's turning."

HIS WIFE (shyly, beaten). "Hello."
(Silence.) "Oh, Howard, I can't talk into this . . . ."
HOWARD (snapping the machine off).

That was my wife. (1419)

There is, in fact, a third woman in Howard's life, the maid. Howard says that if he can't be at home when the Jack Benny program comes on, he uses the wire recorder. He tells "the maid to turn the radio on when Jack Benny comes on, and this automatically goes on with the radio . . . ."
(1419). In short, the women in Howard's world exist to serve (and to worship) him.

Another woman who seems to have existed only to serve men is Willy Loman's mother. On one occasion, in speaking with Ben, Willy remembers being on her lap, and Ben, on learning that his mother is dead, utters a platitudinous description of her, "Fine specimen of a lady, Mother" (1404), but that's as much as we learn of her. Willy is chiefly interested in learning about his father, who left the family and went to Alaska. Ben characterizes the father as "a very great and a very wild-hearted man" (1405), but the fact that the father left his family and apparently had no further communication with his wife

Ruth Katz's Essay on Death of a Salesman 1373 and children seems to mean nothing to Ben. Presumably the mother struggled alone to bring up the boys, but her efforts are unmentioned. Curiously, some writers defend the father's desertion of his family. Lois Gordon says, "The first generation (Willy's father) has been forced, in order to make a living, to break up the family" (278), but nothing in the play supports this assertion that the father was "forced" to break up the family.

Willy, like Ben, assumes that men are heroic and women are nothing except servants and sex machines. For instance, Willy says to Ben, "Please tell about Dad. I want my boys to hear. I want them to know the kind of stock they spring from" (1405). As Kay Stanton, a feminist critic says, Willy's words imply "an Edenic birth myth," a world "with all the Loman men springing directly from their father's side, with no commingling with a female" (69).

Another woman who, like Howard's maid and Willy's mother, apparently exists only to serve is Jenny, Charley's secretary. She is courteous, and she is treated courteously by Charley and by Charley's son, Bernard, but she has no identity other than that of a secretary. And, as a secretary--that is, as a nonentity in the eyes of at least some men--she can be addressed insensitively. Willy Loman makes off-color remarks to her:

WILLY. . . . Jenny, Jenny, good to see you. How're ya? Workin'? Or still honest?
JENNY. Fine. How've you been feeling?
WILLY. Not much any more, Jenny. Ha, ha!
(1426)
The first of these comments seems to suggest that a working woman is not honest—that is, is a prostitute or is engaged in some other sort of hanky-panky, as is the Woman who in exchange for silk stockings and sex sends Willy directly into the buyer's office. The second of Willy's jokes, with its remark about not feeling much, also refers to sex. In short, though readers or viewers of the play see Jenny as a thoroughly respectable woman, they see her not so much as an individual but as a person engaged in routine work and as a person to whom Willy can speak crudely.

It is a little harder to be certain about the characters of Miss Forsythe and Letta, the two women in the scene in Stanley's restaurant. For Happy, Miss Forsythe is "strudel," an object for a man to consume, and for Stanley she and her friend Letta are "chippies," that is, prostitutes. But is it clear that they are prostitutes? When Happy tells Miss Forsythe that he is in the business of selling, he makes a dirty joke, saying, "You don't happen to sell, do you?" (1431). She replies, "No, I don't sell," and if we take this seriously and if we believe her, we can say that she is respectable and is rightly putting Happy in his place. Further, her friend Letta says, "I gotta get up very early tomorrow. I got jury duty" (1438), which implies that she is a responsible citizen. Still, the girls do not seem especially thoughtful. When Biff introduces Willy to the girls, Letta says, "Isn't he cute? Sit down with us, Pop" (1438), and when Willy breaks down in the restaurant, Miss Forsythe says, "Say, I don't like that temper of his" (1438). Perhaps we can say this: It is going too far—on the basis of what we see—to agree with Stanley that the women are "chippies," or with Happy, who assumes that every woman is available for sex, but Miss Forsythe and Letta do not seem to be especially responsible or even interesting people. That is, as Miller presents them, they are of little substance, simply figures introduced into the play in order to show how badly Happy and Biff behave.

The most important woman in the play, other than Linda, is "the Woman," who for money or stockings and perhaps for pleasure has sex with Willy, and who will use her influence as a receptionist or secretary in the office to send Willy directly on to the buyer, without his having to wait at the desk. But even though the Woman gets something out of the relationship, she knows that she is being used. When Biff appears in the hotel room, she asks him, "Are you football or baseball?" Biff replies, "Football," and the Woman, "angry, humiliated," says, "That's me too" (1441). We can admire her vigorous response, but, again, like the other women whom we have discussed, she is not really an impressive figure. We can say that, at best, in a society that assumes women are to be exploited by men, she holds her own.

So far, then—though we have not yet talked about Linda—the world of Death of a Salesman is not notable for its pictures of impressive women. True, most of the males in the play—Willy, Biff, Happy, Ben, and such lesser characters as Stanley and Howard—are themselves pretty sorry specimens, but Bernard and Charley are exceptionally decent and successful people, people who can well serve as role models. Can any female character in the play serve as a role model?
Linda has evoked strongly contrasting reactions from the critics. Some of them judge her very severely. For instance, Lois Gordon says that Linda "encourages Willy's dream, yet she will not let him leave her for the New Continent, the only realm where the dream can be fulfilled" (280). True, Linda urges Willy not to follow Ben's advice of going to Alaska, but surely the spectator of the play cannot believe that Willy is the sort of man who can follow in Ben's footsteps and violently make a fortune. And, in fact, Ben is so vile a person (as when he trips Biff, threatens Biff's eye with the point of his umbrella, and says, "Never fight fair with a stranger, boy" [1406]) that we would not want Willy to take Ben's advice.

A second example of a harsh view of Linda is Brian Parker's comment on "the essential stupidity of Linda's behavior. Surely it is both stupid and immoral to encourage the man you love in self-deceit and lies" (54). Parker also says that Linda's speech at the end, when she says she cannot understand why Willy killed himself, "is not only pathetic, it is also an explanation of the loneliness of Willy Loman which threw him into other women's arms" (54). Nothing in the play suggests that Linda was anything other than a highly supportive wife. If Willy turned to other women, surely it was not because Linda did not understand him. Finally, one last example of the Linda-bashing school of commentary: Guerin Bliquez speaks of "Linda's facility for prodding Willy to his doom" (383).

Very briefly, the arguments against Linda are that (1) she selfishly prevents Willy from going to Alaska, (2) she stupidly encourages him in his self-deceptions, and (3) she is materialistic, so that even at the end, in the Requiem, when she says she has made the last payment on the house, she is talking about money. But if we study the play we will see that all three of these charges are false. First, although Linda does indeed discourage Willy from taking Ben's advice and going to Alaska, she points out that there is no need for "everybody [to] conquer the world" and that Willy has "a beautiful job here" (1423), a job with excellent prospects. She may be mistaken in thinking that Willy has a good job--he may have misled her--but, given what seems to be the situation, her comment is entirely reasonable.

So far as the second charge goes, that she encourages him in self-deception, there are two answers. First, on some matters she does not know that Willy has lied to her, and so her encouragement is reasonable and right. Second, on other matters she does know that Willy is not telling the truth, but she rightly thinks it is best not to let him know that she knows, since such a revelation would crush what little self-respect remains in him. Consider, for example, this portion of dialogue, early in the play, when Willy, deeply agitated about his failure to drive and about Biff, has returned from what started out as a trip to Boston. Linda, trying to take his mind off his problems, urges him to go downstairs to the kitchen to try a new kind of cheese:

LINDA. Go down, try it. And be quiet.
WILLY (turning to Linda, guiltily).
You're not worried about me, are you, sweetheart?

.................
LINDA. You've got too much on the ball to worry about.
WILLY. You're my foundation and my support, Linda.
LINDA. Just try to relax, dear. You make mountains out of molehills.
WILLY. I won't fight with him any more. If he wants to go back to Texas, let him go.
LINDA. He'll find his way. (1389)

Of course she does not really think he has a great deal on the ball, and she probably is not confident that Biff will "find his way," but surely she is doing the best thing possible-- calming Willy, partly by using soothing words and partly by doing what she can to get Biff out of the house, since she knows that Biff and Willy can't live under the same roof.

The third charge, that she is materialistic, is ridiculous. She has to count the pennies because someone has to see that the bills are paid, and Willy is obviously unable to do so.
Here is an example of her supposed preoccupation with money:

LINDA. Well, there's nine-sixty for the washing machine. And for the vacuum cleaner there's three and a half due on the fifteenth. Then the roof, you got twenty-one dollars remaining.
WILLY. It don't leak, does it?
LINDA. No, they did a wonderful job.

Then you owe Frank for the carburetor.
WILLY. I'm not going to pay that man!
That goddam Chevrolet, they ought to prohibit the manufacture of that car!
LINDA. Well, you owe him three and a half. And odds and ends, comes to around a hundred and twenty dollars by the fifteenth. (1398–99)

It might be nice if Linda spent her time taking courses at an adult education center and thinking high thoughts, but it's obvious that someone in the Loman family (as in all families) has to keep track of the bills.

The worst that can be said of Linda is that she subscribes to three American ideas of the time—that the man is the breadwinner, that the relationship between a father and his sons is far more important than the relationship between a mother and her sons, and that a woman's sole job is to care for the house and to produce sons for her husband. She is the maidservant to her husband and to her sons, but in this she is like the vast majority of women of her time, and she should not be criticized for not being an innovator. Compared to her husband and her sons, Linda (though of course not perfect) is a tower of common sense, virtue, and strength. In fact, far from causing Willy's failure, she does what she can to give him strength to face the facts, for instance when she encourages him to talk to Howard about a job in New York: "Why don't you go down to the place tomorrow and tell Howard you've simply got to work in New York? You're too accommodating, dear" (1388). Notice, too, her speech in which she agrees with Biff's decision that it is best for Biff to leave for good: she goes to Willy and says, "I think that's the best way, dear. 'Cause there's no use drawing it out, you'll just never get along" (1446). Linda is not the most forceful person alive, or the brightest, but she is decent and she sees more clearly than do any of the other Lomans.

There is nothing in the play to suggest that Arthur Miller was a feminist or was ahead of his time in his view of the role of women. On the contrary, the play seems to give a pre-feminist view, with women playing subordinate roles to men. The images of success of the best sort—not of Ben's ruthless sort—are Charley and Bernard, two males. Probably Miller, writing in the 1940s, could hardly conceive of a successful woman other than as a wife or mother. Notice, by the way, that Bernard—probably the most admirable male in the play—is not only an important lawyer but the father of two sons, apparently a sign of his complete success as a man. Still, Miller's picture of Linda is by no means condescending. Linda may not be a genius, but she is the brightest and the most realistic of the Lomans.

Things turn out badly, but not because of Linda. The viewer leaves the theater with profound respect for her patience, her strength, her sense of decency, and, yes, her intelligence and her competence in dealing with incompetent men.

In the first act of Arthur Miller’s play Death of a Salesman (1947), Willy Loman (the leading character) tells his sons:

The man who makes an appearance in the business world, the man who creates personal interest, is the man who gets ahead. Be liked and you will never want.

Against Willy’s earnest remark we can juxtapose a cynical remark made more than half a century earlier by Mark Twain:

All you need in this life is ignorance and confidence, then success is sure.

The dream of success, the American Dream—in one form or another—has motivated millions, and it has generated countless pithy remarks. Here are a few observations about America that you may want to recall as you read and reflect on the plays in this chapter.

America means opportunity, freedom, power.
—Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882), 1864

America has been another name for opportunity.
—Frederick Jackson Turner (1861–1932), historian, 1893

What I do object to about America is the herd thinking. There is no room for individuals in your country—and yet you are dedicated to saving the world for individualism.
—Bertrand Russell (1872–1970), British philosopher, 1964

The genius of America is that out of the many, we become one.
—Jesse Jackson (b. 1941), speech at the Democratic National Convention, Atlanta, Georgia, July 1988
If you work hard and play by the rules in this great country, you can get ahead.

—Richard A. Gephardt (b. 1941), Missouri congressman, 1995

America must be described in romantic terms. . . . America is a romance in which we all partake.

—Newt Gingrich (b. 1943), Georgia congressman, in To Renew America, 1995

People in America, of course, live in all sorts of fashions, because they are foreigners, or unlucky, or depraved, or without ambition; people live like that, but Americans live in white detached houses with green shutters. Rigidly, blindly, the dream takes precedence.

—Margaret Mead (1901–1978), anthropologist, 1949

In poetry, prose, and drama, American writers have explored the meanings of the American Dream, even as they have also described the challenges that members of certain social classes and groups and racial and ethnic minorities have faced in gaining access to the Dream. In a sense, there is perhaps only one American Dream, and it involves self-reliance, success, and independence. But in life and literature, there are many different American dreamers, who from their own backgrounds and experiences have expressed their hopes and fears about the possibilities for fulfillment that America offers, as the plays in this chapter attest.

ARTHUR MILLER

Arthur Miller (1915–2005) was born in New York. In 1938 he graduated from the University of Michigan, where he won several prizes for drama. Six years later he had his first Broadway production, The Man Who Had All the Luck, but the play was unlucky and closed after four days. By the time of his first commercial success, All My Sons (1947), he had already written several plays. In 1949 he won a Pulitzer Prize with Death of a Salesman and achieved an international reputation. Among his other works are an adaptation (1950) of Ibsen’s Enemy of the People and a play about the Salem witch trials, The Crucible (1953), both containing political implications, and The Misfits (1961, a screenplay), After the Fall (1964), and Incident at Vichy (1965).

Death of a Salesman

Certain Private Conversations in Two Acts and a Requiem

LIST OF CHARACTERS

WILLY LOMAN
LINDA
SCENE: The action takes place in Willy Loman's house and yard and in various places be visits in the New York and Boston of today.

Act 1

SCENE: A melody is heard, played upon a flute. It is small and fine, telling of grass and trees and the horizon. The curtain rises.

Before us is the Salesman's house. We are aware of towering, angular shapes behind it, surrounding it on all sides. Only the blue light of the sky falls upon the house and forestage; the surrounding area shows an angry glow of orange. As more light appears, we see a solid vault of apartment houses around the small, fragile-seeming home. An air of the dream clings to the place, a dream rising out of reality. The kitchen at center seems actual enough, for there is a kitchen table with three chairs, and a refrigerator. But no other fixtures are seen. At the back of the kitchen there is a draped entrance, which leads to the living room. To the right of the kitchen, on a level raised two feet, is a bedroom furnished only with a brass bedstead and a straight chair. On a shelf over the bed a silver athletic trophy stands. A window opens onto the apartment house at the side.

Behind the kitchen, on a level raised six and a half feet, is the boys' bedroom, at present barely visible. Two beds are dimly seen, and at the back of the room a dormer window. (This bedroom is above the unseen living room.) At the left a stairway curves up to it from the kitchen.

The entire setting is wholly or, in some places, partially transparent. The roof-line of the house is one-dimensional; under and over it we see the apartment buildings. Before the house lies an apron, curving beyond the forestage into the orchestra. This forward area serves as the back yard as well as the locale of all Willy's imaginings and of his city scenes. Whenever the action is in the present the actors observe the imaginary wall-lines, entering the house only through its door at the left. But in the scenes of the past these boundaries are broken, and characters enter or leave a room by stepping "through" a wall onto the forestage.

From the right, Willy Loman, the Salesman, enters, carrying two large sample cases. The flute plays on. He bears but is not aware of it. He is past sixty years of age, dressed quietly. Even as he crosses the stage to the doorway of the house, his exhaustion is apparent. He unlocks the door; comes into the kitchen, and thankfully lets his burden down, feeling the soreness of his palms. A word-sigh escapes his lips—it might be "Oh, boy, oh, boy." He closes the door; then carries his cases out into the living room, through the draped kitchen doorway.
Lee J. Cobb as Willy Loman in the 1949 original Broadway production of Death of a Salesman.

Dustin Hoffman as Willy Loman, and John Malkovich as Biff, in the 1984 production.
LINDA, his wife, has stirred in her bed at the right. She gets out and puts on a robe, listening. Most often jovial, she has developed an iron repression of her exceptions to WILLY’s behavior—she more than loves him, she admires him, as though his mercurial nature, his temper, his massive dreams and little cruelties, served her only as sharp reminders of the turbulent longings within him, longings which she shares but lacks the temperament to utter and follow to their end.

LINDA (bearing WILLY outside the bedroom, calls with some trepidation).

Willy!

WILLY. It’s all right. I came back.

LINDA. Why? What happened? (Slight pause.) Did something happen, Willy?

WILLY. No, nothing happened.

LINDA. You didn’t smash the car, did you?

WILLY (with casual irritation). I said nothing happened. Didn’t you hear me?

LINDA. Don’t you feel well?

WILLY. I’m tired to the death. (The flute has faded away. He sits on the bed beside her; a little numb.) I couldn’t make it. I just couldn’t make it, Linda.

LINDA (very carefully, delicately). Where were you all day? You look terrible.

WILLY. I got as far as a little above Yonkers. I stopped for a cup of coffee. Maybe it was the coffee.

LINDA. What?

WILLY (after a pause). I suddenly couldn’t drive any more. The car kept going off onto the shoulder, y’know?

LINDA (helpfully). Oh. Maybe it was the steering again. I don’t think Angelo knows the Studebaker.

WILLY. No, it’s me, it’s me. Suddenly I realize I’m goin’ sixty miles an hour and I don’t remember the last five minutes. I’m—I can’t seem to—keep my mind to it.

LINDA. Maybe it’s your glasses. You never went for your new glasses.

WILLY. No, I see everything. I came back ten miles an hour. It took me nearly four hours from Yonkers.

LINDA (resigned). Well, you’ll just have to take a rest, Willy, you can’t continue this way.

WILLY. I just got back from Florida.

LINDA. But you didn’t rest your mind. Your mind is overactive, and the mind is what counts, dear.

WILLY. I’ll start out in the morning. Maybe I’ll feel better in the morning. (She is taking off his shoes.) These goddam arch supports are killing me.

LINDA. Take an aspirin. Should I get you an aspirin? It’ll soothe you.

WILLY (with wonder). I was driving along, you understand? And I was fine. I was even observing the scenery. You can imagine, me looking at scenery, on the road every week of my life. But it’s so beautiful up there, Linda, the trees are so thick, and the sun is warm. I opened the windshield and just let the warm air bathe over me. And then all of a sudden I’m goin’ off the road! I’m tellin’ ya, I absolutely forgot I was driving. If I’d’ve gone the other way over the white line I might’ve killed somebody. So I went on again—and five minutes later I’m dreamin’ again, and I nearly... (He presses two fingers against his eyes.) I have such thoughts, I have such strange thoughts.
LINDA. Willy, dear. Talk to them again. There's no reason why you can't work in New York.

WILLY. They don't need me in New York. I'm the New England man. I'm vital in New England.

LINDA. But you're sixty years old. They can't expect you to keep traveling every week.

WILLY. I'll have to send a wire to Portland. I'm supposed to see Brown and Morrison tomorrow morning at ten o'clock to show the line. God-dammit, I could sell them! (He starts putting on his jacket.)

LINDA (taking the jacket from him). Why don't you go down to the place tomorrow and tell Howard you've simply got to work in New York? You're too accommodating, dear.

WILLY. If old man Wagner was alive I'd a been in charge of New York now! That man was a prince, he was a masterful man. But that boy of his, that Howard, he don't appreciate. When I went north the first time, the Wagner Company didn't know where New England was!

LINDA. Why don't you tell those things to Howard, dear?

WILLY (encouraged). I will, I definitely will. Is there any cheese?

LINDA. I'll make you a sandwich.

WILLY. No, go to sleep. I'll take some milk. I'll be up right away. The boys in?

LINDA. They're sleeping. Happy took Biff on a date tonight.

WILLY (interested). That so?

LINDA. It was so nice to see them shaving together, one behind the other, in the bathroom. And going out together. You notice? The whole house smells of shaving lotion.

WILLY. Figure it out. Work a lifetime to pay off a house. You finally own it, and there's nobody to live in it.

LINDA. Well, dear, life is a casting off. It's always that way.

WILLY. No, no, some people—some people accomplish something. Did Biff say anything after I went this morning?

LINDA. You shouldn't have criticized him, Willy, especially after he just got off the train. You mustn't lose your temper with him.

WILLY. When the hell did I lose my temper? I simply asked him if he was making any money. Is that a criticism?

LINDA. But, dear, how could he make any money?

WILLY (worried and angered). There's such an undercurrent in him. He became a moody man. Did he apologize when I left this morning?

LINDA. He was crestfallen, Willy. You know how he admires you. I think if he finds himself, then you'll both be happier and not fight any more.

WILLY. How can he find himself on a farm? Is that a life? A farm hand? In the beginning, when he was young, I thought, well, a young man, it's good for him to tramp around, take a lot of different jobs. But it's more than ten years now and he has yet to make thirty-five dollars a week!

LINDA. He's finding himself, Willy.

WILLY. Not finding yourself at the age of thirty-four is a disgrace!

LINDA. Shh!

WILLY. The trouble is he's lazy; goddammit!

LINDA. Willy, please!

WILLY. Biff is a lazy bum!

LINDA. They're sleeping. Get something to eat. Go on down.

WILLY. Why did he come home? I would like to know what brought him home.
LINDA. I don’t know. I think he’s still lost, Willy. I think he’s very lost.

WILLY. Biff Loman is lost. In the greatest country in the world a young man with such—personal attractiveness, gets lost. And such a hard worker. There’s one thing about Biff—he’s not lazy.

LINDA. Never.

WILLY (with pity and resolve). I’ll see him in the morning; I’ll have a nice talk with him. I’ll get him a job selling. He could be big in no time. My God! Remember how they used to follow him around in high school? When he smiled at one of them their faces lit up. When he walked down the street . . . (He loses himself in reminiscences.)

LINDA (trying to bring him out of it). Willy, dear, I got a new kind of American-type cheese today. It’s whipped.

WILLY. Why do you get American when I like Swiss?

LINDA. I just thought you’d like a change . . .

WILLY. I don’t want a change! I want Swiss cheese. Why am I always being contradicted?

LINDA (with a covering laugh). I thought it would be a surprise.

WILLY. Why don’t you open a window in here, for God’s sake?

LINDA (with infinite patience). They’re all open, dear.

WILLY. The way they boxed us in here. Bricks and windows, windows and bricks.

LINDA. We should’ve bought the land next door.

WILLY. The street is lined with cars. There’s not a breath of fresh air in the neighborhood. The grass don’t grow any more, you can’t raise a carrot in the back yard. They should’ve had a law against apartment houses. Remember those two beautiful elm trees out there? When I and Biff hung the swing between them?

LINDA. Yeah, like being a million miles from the city.

WILLY. They should’ve arrested the builder for cutting those down. They massacred the neighborhood. (Lost.) More and more I think of those days, Linda. This time of year it was lilac and wisteria. And then the peonies would come out, and the daffodils. What fragrance in this room!

LINDA. Well, after all, people had to move somewhere.

WILLY. No, there’s more people now.

LINDA. I don’t think there’s more people. I think . . .

WILLY. There’s more people! That’s what’s ruining this country! Population is getting out of control. The competition is maddening! Smell the stink from that apartment house! And another one on the other side . . . How can they whip cheese?

On Willy’s last line, Biff and Happy raise themselves up in their beds, listening.

LINDA. Go down, try it. And be quiet.

WILLY (turning to Linda, guiltily). You’re not worried about me, are you, sweetheart?

Biff. What’s the matter?

HAPPY. Listen!

LINDA. You’ve got too much on the ball to worry about.

WILLY. You’re my foundation and my support, Linda.

LINDA. Just try to relax, dear. You make mountains out of molehills.

WILLY. I won’t fight with him any more. If he wants to go back to Texas, let him go.
LINDA. He'll find his way.
WILLY. Sure. Certain men just don’t get started till later in life. Like Thomas Edison, I think. Or B. F. Goodrich. One of them was deaf. (He starts for the bedroom doorway.) I’ll put my money on Biff.
LINDA. And Willy—if it’s warm Sunday we’ll drive in the country. And we’ll open the windscreen, and take lunch.
WILLY. No, the windshields don’t open on the new cars.
LINDA. But you opened it today.
WILLY. Me? I didn’t. (He stops.) Now isn’t that peculiar! Isn’t that a remarkable . . . (He breaks off in amazement and fright as the flute is heard distantly.)
LINDA. What, darling?
WILLY. That is the most remarkable thing.
LINDA. What, dear?
WILLY. I was thinking of the Chevvy. (Slight pause.) Nineteen twenty-eight . . . when I had that red Chevvy . . . (Breaks off) That funny? I coulda sworn I was driving that Chevvy today.
LINDA. Well, that’s nothing. Something must’ve reminded you.
WILLY. Remarkable. Ts. Remember those days? The way Biff used to simonize that car? The dealer refused to believe there was eighty thousand miles on it. (He shakes his head. Heh! (To Linda.) Close your eyes, I’ll be right up. (He walks out of the bedroom.)
HAPPY (to BIFF). Jesus, maybe he smashed up the car again!
LINDA (calling after WILLY). Be careful on the stairs, dear! The cheese is on the middle shelf. (She turns, goes over to the bed, takes his jacket, and goes out of the bedroom.)

Light has risen on the boys’ room. Unseen, WILLY is heard talking to himself; “Eighty thousand miles, and a little laugh. BIFF gets out of bed, comes downstage a bit, and stands attentively. BIFF is two years older than his brother HAPPY, well built, but in these days bears a worn air and seems less self-assured. He has succeeded less, and his dreams are stronger and less acceptable than HAPPY’s. HAPPY is tall, powerfully made. Sexuality is like a visible color on him, or a scent that many women have discovered. He, like his brother, is lost, but in a different way; for he has never allowed himself to turn his face toward defeat and is thus more confused and hard-skinned, although seemingly more content.

HAPPY (getting out of bed). He’s going to get his license taken away if he keeps that up. I’m getting nervous about him, y’know, Biff?
BIFF. His eyes are going.
HAPPY. No, I’ve driven with him. He sees all right. He just doesn’t keep his mind on it. I drove into the city with him last week. He stops at a green light and then it turns red and he goes. (He laughs.)
BIFF. Maybe he’s color-blind.
HAPPY. Pop? Why he’s got the finest eye for color in the business. You know that.
BIFF (sitting down on his bed). I’m going to sleep.
HAPPY. You’re not still sour on Dad, are you, Biff?
BIFF. He’s all right, I guess.
WILLY (underneath them, in the living room). Yes, sir, eighty thousand miles—eighty-two thousand!
BIFF. You smoking?

HAPPY (holding out a pack of cigarettes). Want one?

BIFF (taking a cigarette). I can never sleep when I smell it.

WILLY. What a simonizing job, heh!

HAPPY (with deep sentiment). Funny, Biff, y’know? Us sleeping in here again? The old beds. (He pats his bed affectionately.) All the talk that went across those beds, huh? Our whole lives.

BIFF. Yeah. Lotta dreams and plans.

HAPPY (with a deep and masculine laugh). About five hundred women would like to know what was said in this room. (They share a soft laugh.)

BIFF. Remember that big Betsy something—what the hell was her name—over on Bushwick Avenue?

HAPPY (combing his hair). With the collie dog!

BIFF. That’s the one. I got you in there, remember?

HAPPY. Yeah, that was my first time—I think. Boy, there was a pig. (They laugh, almost crudely.) You taught me everything I know about women. Don’t forget that.

BIFF. I bet you forgot how bashful you used to be. Especially with girls.

HAPPY. Oh, I still am, Biff.

BIFF. Oh, go on.

HAPPY. I just control it, that’s all. I think I got less bashful and you got more so. What happened, Biff? Where’s the old humor, the old confidence? (He shakes Biff’s knee. Biff gets up and moves restlessly about the room.) What’s the matter?

BIFF. Why does Dad mock me all the time?

HAPPY. He’s not mocking you, he . . .

BIFF. Everything I say there’s a twist of mockery on his face. I can’t get near him.

HAPPY. He just wants you to make good, that’s all. I wanted to talk to you about Dad for a long time, Biff. Something’s—happening to him. He—talks to himself.

BIFF. I noticed that this morning. But he always mumbled.

HAPPY. But not so noticeable. It got so embarrassing I sent him to Florida. And you know something? Most of the time he’s talking to you.

BIFF. What’s he say about me?

HAPPY. I can’t make it out.

BIFF. What’s he say about me?

HAPPY. I think the fact that you’re not settled, that you’re still kind of up in the air . . .

BIFF. There’s one or two other things depressing him, Happy.

HAPPY. What do you mean?

BIFF. Never mind. Just don’t lay it all to me.

HAPPY. But I think if you just got started—I mean—is there any future for you out there?

BIFF. I tell ya, Hap, I don’t know what the future is. I don’t know—what I’m supposed to want.

HAPPY. What do you mean?

BIFF. Well, I spent six or seven years after high school trying to work myself up. Shipping clerk, salesman, business of one kind or another. And it’s a measly manner of existence. To get on that subway on the hot mornings in summer. To devote your whole life to keeping stock, or making phone calls, or selling or buying. To suffer fifty weeks of the year for the sake of a two-week vacation, when all you really desire is to be outdoors, with your shirt off. And always to have to get ahead of the next fella. And still—that’s how you build a future.

HAPPY. Well, you really enjoy it on a farm? Are you content out there?

Biff (with rising agitation). Hap, I’ve had twenty or thirty different kinds of jobs since I left home before the war, and it always turns out the same. I just realized it lately. In Nebraska when I herded cattle, and the Dakotas, and Arizona, and now in Texas. It’s why I came home now, I guess, because I realized it. This farm I work on, it’s spring there now, see? And they’ve got about fifteen new colts. There’s nothing more inspiring or—beautiful than the sight of a mare and a new colt. And it’s cool there now, see? Texas is cool now, and it’s spring. And whenever spring comes to where I am, I suddenly get the feeling, my God, I’m not gettin’ anywhere! What the hell am I doing, playing around with horses, twenty-eight dollars a week! I’m thirty-four years old, I oughta be makin’ my future. That’s when I come running home. And now, I get here, and I don’t know what to do with myself. (After a pause.) I’ve always made a point of not wasting my life, and everytime I come back here I know that all I’ve done is to waste my life.

HAPPY. You’re a poet, you know that, Biff? You’re a—you’re an idealist!

Biff. No, I’m mixed up very bad. Maybe I oughta get married. Maybe I oughta get stuck into something. Maybe that’s my trouble. I’m like a boy. I’m not married, I’m not in business, I just—I’m like a boy. Are you content, Hap? You’re a success, aren’t you? Are you content?

HAPPY. Hell, no!

Biff. Why? You’re making money, aren’t you?

HAPPY (moving about with energy, expressiveness). All I can do now is wait for the merchandise manager to die. And suppose I get to be merchandise manager? He’s a good friend of mine, and he just built a terrific estate on Long Island. And he lived there about two months and sold it, and now he’s building another one. He can’t enjoy it once it’s finished. And I know that’s just what I would do. I don’t know what the hell I’m workin’ for. Sometimes I sit in my apartment—all alone. And I think of the rent I’m paying. And it’s crazy. But then, it’s what I always wanted. My own apartment, a car, and plenty of women. And still, goddammit, I’m lonely.

Biff (with enthusiasm). Listen, why don’t you come out West with me?

HAPPY. You and I, heh?

Biff. Sure, maybe we could buy a ranch. Raise cattle, use our muscles. Men built like we are should be working out in the open.

HAPPY (avidly). The Loman Brothers, heh?

Biff (with vast affection). Sure, we’d be known all over the counties!

HAPPY (entranced). That’s what I dream about, Biff. Sometimes I want to just rip my clothes off in the middle of the store and outbox that goddam merchandise manager. I mean I can outbox, outrun, and outlift anybody in that store, and I have to take orders from those common, petty sons-of-bitches till I can’t stand it any more.

Biff. I’m tellin’ you, kid, if you were with me I’d be happy out there.

HAPPY (enthusiased). See, Biff, everybody around me is so false that I’m constantly lowering my ideals...
Happy. If I were around you . . .

Biff. Hap, the trouble is we weren’t brought up to grub for money. I don’t know how to do it.

Happy. Neither can I!

Biff. Then let’s go!

Happy. The only thing is—what can you make out there?

Biff. But look at your friend. Builds an estate and then hasn’t the peace of mind to live in it.

Happy. Yeah, but when he walks into the store the waves part in front of him. That’s fifty-two thousand dollars a year coming through the revolving door, and I got more in my pinky finger than he’s got in his head.

Biff. Yeah, but you just said . . .

Happy. I gotta show some of those pompous, self-important executives over there that Hap Loman can make the grade. I want to walk into the store the way he walks in. Then I’ll go with you, Biff. We’ll be together yet, I swear. But take those two we had tonight. Now weren’t they gorgeous creatures?

Biff. Yeah, yeah, most gorgeous I’ve had in years.

Happy. I get that any time I want, Biff. Whenever I feel disgusted. The only trouble is, it gets like bowling or something. I just keep knockin’ them over and it doesn’t mean anything. You still run around a lot?

Biff. Naa. I’d like to find a girl—steady, somebody with substance.

Happy. That’s what I long for.

Biff. Go on! You’d never come home.

Happy. I would! Somebody with character, with resistance! Like Mom, y’know? You’re gonna call me a bastard when I tell you this. That girl Charlotte I was with tonight is engaged to be married in five weeks. (He tries on his new hat.)

Biff. No kiddin’!

Happy. I get that any time I want, Biff. Whenever I feel disgusted. The only trouble is, it gets like bowling or something. I just keep knockin’ them over and it doesn’t mean anything. You still run around a lot?

Biff. Naa. I’d like to find a girl—steady, somebody with substance.

Happy. That’s what I long for.

Biff. Go on! You’d never come home.

Happy. I would! Somebody with character, with resistance! Like Mom, y’know? You’re gonna call me a bastard when I tell you this. That girl Charlotte I was with tonight is engaged to be married in five weeks. (He tries on his new hat.)

Biff. No kiddin’!

Happy. Sure, the guy’s in line for the vice-presidency of the store. I don’t know what gets into me, maybe I just have an over-developed sense of competition or something, but I went and ruined her, and furthermore I can’t get rid of her. And he’s the third executive I’ve done that to. Isn’t that a crummy characteristic? And to top it all, I go to their weddings! (Indignantly, but laughing.) Like I’m not supposed to take bribes. Manufacturers offer me a hundred-dollar bill now and then to throw an order their way. You know how honest I am, but it’s like this girl, see. I hate myself for it. Because I don’t want the girl, and, still, I take it and—I love it!

Biff. Let’s go to sleep.

Happy. I guess we didn’t settle anything, heh?

Biff. I just got one idea that I think I’m going to try.

Happy. What’s that?

Biff. Remember Bill Oliver?

Happy. Sure, Oliver is very big now. You want to work for him again?

Biff. No, but when I quit he said something to me. He put his arm on my shoulder, and he said, “Biff, if you ever need anything, come to me.”

Happy. I remember that. That sounds good.

Biff. I think I’ll go to see him. If I could get ten thousand or even seven or eight thousand dollars I could buy a beautiful ranch.
HAPPY. I bet he'd back you. 'Cause he thought highly of you, Biff. I mean, they all do. You're well liked, Biff. That's why I say to come back here, and we both have the apartment. And I'm tellin' you, Biff, any babe you want ...

BIFF. No, with a ranch I could do the work I like and still be something. I just wonder though. I wonder if Oliver still thinks I stole that carton of basketballs.

HAPPY. Oh, he probably forgot that long ago. It's almost ten years. You're too sensitive. Anyway, he didn't really fire you.

BIFF. Well, I think he was going to. I think that's why I quit. I was never sure whether he knew or not. I know he thought the world of me, though. I was the only one he'd let lock up the place.

WILLY (below). You gonna wash the engine, Biff?

HAPPY. Shh!

BIFF looks at HAPPY, who is gazing down, listening. WILLY is mumbling in the parlor:

They listen. WILLY laughs warmly.

BIFF (growing angry). Doesn't he know Mom can hear that?

WILLY. Don't get your sweater dirty, Biff!

A look of pain crosses BIFF's face.

HAPPY. Isn't that terrible? Don't leave again, will you? You'll find a job here. You gotta stick around. I don't know what to do about him, it's getting embarrassing.

WILLY. What a simonizing job!

BIFF. Mom's hearing that!

WILLY. No kiddin', Biff, you got a date? Wonderful!

HAPPY. Go on to sleep. But talk to him in the morning, will you?

BIFF (reluctantly getting into bed). With her in the house. Brother!

HAPPY (getting into bed). I wish you'd have a good talk with him.

The light on their room begins to fade.

BIFF (to himself in bed). That selfish, stupid ...

HAPPY. Sh ... Sleep, Biff.

Their light is out. Well before they have finished speaking, WILLY'S form is dimly seen below in the darkened kitchen. He opens the refrigerator, searches in there, and takes out a bottle of milk. The apartment houses are fading out, and the entire house and surroundings become covered with leaves. Music insinuates itself as the leaves appear.

WILLY. Just wanna be careful with those girls, Biff, that's all. Don't make any promises. No promises of any kind. Because a girl, y'know, they always believe what you tell 'em, and you're very young, Biff, you're too young to be talking seriously to girls.

Light rises on the kitchen. WILLY, talking, shuts the refrigerator door and comes downstage to the kitchen table. He pours milk into a glass. He is totally immersed in himself, smiling faintly.
Willy. Too young entirely, Biff. You want to watch your schooling first. Then when you're all set, there'll be plenty of girls for a boy like you. (He smiles broadly at a kitchen chair.) That so? The girls pay for you? (He laughs.) Boy, you must really be makin’ a hit.

Willy is gradually addressing—physically—a point offstage, speaking through the wall of the kitchen, and his voice has been rising in volume to that of a normal conversation.

Willy. I been wondering why you polish the car so careful. Ha! Don’t leave the hubcaps, boys. Get the chamois to the hubcaps. Happy, use newspaper on the windows, it’s the easiest thing. Show him how to do it, Biff! You see, Happy? Pad it up, use it like a pad. That’s it, that’s it, good work. You’re doin’ all right, Hap. (He pauses, then nods in approbation for a few seconds, then looks upward.) Biff, first thing we gotta do when we get time is clip that big branch over the house. Afraid it’s gonna fall in a storm and hit the roof. Tell you what. We get a rope and sling her around, and then we climb up there with a couple of saws and take her down. Soon as you finish the car, boys, I wanna see ya. I got a surprise for you, boys.

Biff (offstage). Whatta ya got, Dad?

Willy. No, you finish first. Never leave a job till you’re finished—remember that. (Looking toward the “big trees.”) Biff, up in Albany I saw a beautiful hammock. I think I'll buy it next trip, and we’ll hang it right between those two elms. Wouldn’t that be something? Just swingin’ there under those branches. Boy, that would be . . .

Young Biff and Young Happy appear from the direction Willy was addressing. Happy carries rags and a pail of water. Biff, wearing a sweater with a block “S,” carries a football.

Biff (pointing in the direction of the car offstage). How’s that, Pop, professional?

Happy. Where’s the surprise, Pop?

Willy. In the back seat of the car.

Happy. Boy! (He runs off.)

Biff. What is it, Dad? Tell me, what’d you buy?

Willy (laughing, cuffs him). Never mind, something I want you to have.

Biff (turns and starts off). What is it, Hap?

Happy (offstage). It’s a punching bag!

Biff. Oh, Pop!

Willy. It’s got Gene Tunney’s signature on it!

Happy runs onstage with a punching bag.

Biff. Gee, how’d you know we wanted a punching bag?

Willy. Well, it’s the finest thing for the timing.

Happy (lies down on his back and pedals with his feet). I’m losing weight, you notice, Pop?

Willy (to Happy). Jumping rope is good too.

Biff. Did you see the new football I got?

Willy (examining the ball). Where’d you get a new ball?

Biff. The coach told me to practice my passing.

Willy. That so? And he gave you the ball, heh?
BIFF. Well, I borrowed it from the locker room. (He laughs confidentially.)

WILLY (laughing with him at the theft). I want you to return that.

HAPPY. I told you he wouldn’t like it!

BIFF (angrily). Well, I’m bringing it back!

WILLY (stopping the incipient argument, to HAPPY). Sure, he’s gotta practice with a regulation ball, doesn’t he? (To BIFF.) Coach’ll probably congratulate you on your initiative!

BIFF. Oh, he keeps congratulating my initiative all the time, Pop.

WILLY. That’s because he likes you. If somebody else took that ball there’d be an uproar. So what’s the report, boys, what’s the report?

BIFF. Where’d you go this time, Dad? Gee we were lonesome for you.

WILLY (pleased, puts an arm around each boy and they come down to the apron). Lonesome, heh?

BIFF. Missed you every minute.

WILLY. Don’t say? Tell you a secret, boys. Don’t breathe it to a soul. Someday I’ll have my own business, and I’ll never have to leave home any more.

HAPPY. Like Uncle Charley, heh?

WILLY. Bigger than Uncle Charley! Because Charley is not—liked. He’s liked, but he’s not—well liked.

BIFF. Where’d you go this time, Dad?

WILLY. Well, I got on the road, and I went north to Providence. Met the Mayor.

BIFF. The Mayor of Providence!

WILLY. He was sitting in the hotel lobby.

BIFF. What’d he say?

WILLY. He said, “Morning!” And I said, “Morning!” And I said, “You got a fine city here, Mayor.” And then he had coffee with me. And then I went to Waterbury. Waterbury is a fine city. Big clock city; the famous Waterbury clock. Sold a nice bill there. And then Boston—Boston is the cradle of the Revolution. A fine city. And a couple of other towns in Mass., and on to Portland and Bangor and straight home!

BIFF. Gee, I’d love to go with you sometime, Dad.

WILLY. Soon as summer comes.

HAPPY. Promise?

WILLY. You and Hap and I, and I’ll show you all the towns. America is full of beautiful towns and fine, upstanding people. And they know me, boys, they know me up and down New England. The finest people. And when I bring you fellas up, there’ll be open sesame for all of us, ’cause one thing, boys: I have friends. I can park my car in any street in New England, and the cops protect it like their own. This summer, heh?

BIFF AND HAPPY (together). Yeah! You bet!

WILLY. We’ll take our bathing suits.

HAPPY. We’ll carry your bags, Pop!

WILLY. Oh, won’t that be something! Me comin’ into the Boston stores with you boys carryin’ my bags. What a sensation!

BIFF is prancing around, practicing passing the ball.

WILLY. You nervous, Biff, about the game?

BIFF. Not if you’re gonna be there.

WILLY. What do they say about you in school, now that they made you captain?
HAPPY. There’s a crowd of girls behind him everytime the classes change.

BIFF (taking WILLY’S hand). This Saturday, Pop, this Saturday—just for you, I’m going to break through for a touchdown.

HAPPY. You’re supposed to pass.

BIFF. I’m takin’ one play for Pop. You watch me, Pop, and when I take off my helmet, that means I’m breakin’ out. Then you watch me crash through that line!

WILLY (kisses BIFF). Oh, wait’ll I tell this in Boston!

BERNARD enters in knickers. He is younger than BIFF, earnest and loyal, a worried boy.

BERNARD. Biff, where are you? You’re supposed to study with me today.

WILLY. Hey, looka Bernard. What’re you lookin’ so anemic about, Bernard?

BERNARD. He’s gotta study, Uncle Willy. He’s got Regents next week.

HAPPY (tauntingly, spinning BERNARD around). Let’s box, Bernard!

BERNARD. Biff! (He gets away from HAPPY.) Listen, Biff, I heard Mr. Birnbaum say that if you don’t start studyin’ math he’s gonna flunk you, and you won’t graduate. I heard him!

WILLY. You better study with him, Biff. Go ahead now.

BERNARD. I heard him!

BIFF. Oh, Pop, you didn’t see my sneakers! (He holds up a foot for WILLY to look at.)

WILLY. Hey, that’s a beautiful job of printing!

BERNARD (wiping his glasses). Just because he printed University of Virginia on his sneakers doesn’t mean they’ve got to graduate him, Uncle Willy!

WILLY (angrily). What’re you talking about? With scholarships to three universities they’re gonna flunk him?

BERNARD. But I heard Mr. Birnbaum say . . .

WILLY. Don’t be a pest, Bernard! (To his boys.) What an anemic!

BERNARD. Okay, I’m waiting for you in my house, Biff.

BERNARD goes off. The LOMANS laugh.

WILLY. Bernard is not well liked, is he?

BIFF. He’s liked, but he’s not well liked.

HAPPY. That’s right, Pop.

WILLY. That’s just what I mean. Bernard can get the best marks in school, y’understand, but when he gets out in the business world, y’understand, you are going to be five times ahead of him. That’s why I thank Almighty God you’re both built like Adonises. Because the man who makes an appearance in the business world, the man who creates personal interest, is the man who gets ahead. Be liked and you will never want. You take me, for instance. I never have to wait in line to see a buyer. “Willy Loman is here!” That’s all they have to know, and I go right through.

BIFF. Did you knock them dead, Pop?

WILLY. Knocked ’em cold in Providence, slaughtered ’em in Boston.

HAPPY (on bis back, pedaling again). I’m losing weight, you notice, Pop?

LINDA enters as of old, a ribbon in her hair, carrying a basket of washing.

LINDA (with youthful energy). Hello, dear!

WILLY. Sweetheart!
LINDA. How'd the Chevvy run?
WILLY. Chevrolet, Linda, is the greatest car ever built. \textit{(To the boys.)} Since when do you let your mother carry wash up the stairs?
BIFF. Grab hold there, boy!
HAPPY. Where to, Mom?
LINDA. Hang them up on the line. And you better go down to your friends, Biff. The cellar is full of boys. They don't know what to do with themselves.
BIFF. Ah, when Pop comes home they can wait!
WILLY \textit{(laughs appreciatively).} You better go down and tell them what to do, Biff.
BIFF. I think I'll have them sweep out the furnace room.
WILLY. Good work, Biff.
BIFF \textit{(goes through wall-line of kitchen to doorway at back and calls down).} Fellas! Everybody sweep out the furnace room! I'll be right down!
VOICES. All right! Okay, Biff.
BIFF. George and Sam and Frank, come out back! We're hangin' up the wash! Come on, Hap, on the double! \textit{(He and HAPPY carry out the basket.)}
LINDA. The way they obey him!
WILLY. Well, that's training, the training. I'm tellin' you, I was sellin' thousands and thousands, but I had to come home.
LINDA. Oh, the whole block'll be at that game. Did you sell anything?
WILLY. I did five hundred gross in Providence and seven hundred gross in Boston.
LINDA. No! Wait a minute. I've got a pencil. \textit{(She pulls pencil and paper out of her apron pocket.)} That makes your commission . . . Two hundred—my God! Two hundred and twelve dollars!
WILLY. Well, I didn't figure it yet, but . . .
LINDA. How much did you do?
WILLY. Well, I—I did—about a hundred and eighty gross in Providence. Well, no—it came to—roughly two hundred gross on the whole trip.
LINDA \textit{(without hesitation).} Two hundred gross. That's . . . \textit{(She figures.)}
WILLY. The trouble was that three of the stores were half-closed for inventory in Boston. Otherwise I woulda broke records.
LINDA. Well, it makes seventy dollars and some pennies. That's very good.
WILLY. What do we owe?
LINDA. Well, on the first there's sixteen dollars on the refrigerator . . .
WILLY. Why sixteen?
LINDA. Well, the fan belt broke, so it was a dollar eighty.
WILLY. But it's brand new.
LINDA. Well, the man said that's the way it is. Till they work themselves in, y'know.
They move through the wall-line into the kitchen.
WILLY. I hope we didn't get stuck on that machine.
LINDA. They got the biggest ads of any of them!
WILLY. I know, it's a fine machine. What else?
LINDA. Well, there's nine-sixty for the washing machine. And for the vacuum cleaner there's three and a half due on the fifteenth. Then the roof, you got twenty-one dollars remaining.
WILLY. It don't leak, does it?
LINDA. No, they did a wonderful job. Then you owe Frank for the carburetor.
WILLY. I'm not going to pay that man! That goddam Chevrolet, they ought to prohibit the manufacture of that car!
LINDA. Well, you owe him three and a half. And odds and ends, comes to around a hundred and twenty dollars by the fifteenth.
WILLY. A hundred and twenty dollars! My God, if business don't pick up I don't know what I'm gonna do!
LINDA. Well, next week you'll do better.
WILLY. Oh, I'll knock 'em dead next week. I'll go to Hartford. I'm very well liked in Hartford. You know, the trouble is, Linda, people don't seem to take to me.

They move onto the forestage.

LINDA. Oh, don't be foolish.
WILLY. I know it when I walk in. They seem to laugh at me.
LINDA. Why? Why would they laugh at you? Don't talk that way, Willy.

WILLY moves to the edge of the stage. LINDA goes into the kitchen and starts to darn stockings.

WILLY. I don't know the reason for it, but they just pass me by. I'm not noticed.
LINDA. But you're doing wonderful, dear. You're making seventy to a hundred dollars a week.
WILLY. But I gotta be at it ten, twelve hours a day. Other men—I don't know—they do it easier. I don't know why—I can't stop myself—I talk too much. A man oughta come in with a few words. One thing about Charley. He's a man of few words, and they respect him.
LINDA. You don't talk too much, you're just lively.
WILLY (smiling). Well, I figure, what the hell, life is short, a couple of jokes. (To himself:) I joke too much! (The smile goes.)
LINDA. Why? You're . . .
WILLY. I'm fat. I'm very—foolish to look at, Linda. I didn't tell you, but Christmas time I happened to be calling on F. H. Stewarts, and a salesman I know, as I was going in to see the buyer I heard him say something about—walrus. And I—I cracked him right across the face.
I won't take that. I simply will not take that. But they do laugh at me. I know that.
LINDA. Darling . . .
WILLY. Oh, no, Linda.
LINDA. To me you are. (Slight pause.) The handsomest.

From the darkness is heard the laughter of a woman. WILLY doesn't turn to it, but it continues through LINDA's lines.

LINDA. And the boys, Willy. Few men are idolized by their children the way you are.

Music is heard as behind a scrim, to the left of the house; THE WOMAN, dimly seen, is dressing.
WILLY (with great feeling). You’re the best there is. Linda, you’re a pal, you know that? On the road—on the road I want to grab you sometimes and just kiss the life outa you.

The laughter is loud now, and he moves into a brightening area at the left, where THE WOMAN has come from behind the scrim and is standing, putting on her hat, looking into a “mirror” and laughing.

WILLY. ’Cause I get so lonely—especially when business is bad and there’s nobody to talk to. I get the feeling that I’ll never sell anything again, that I won’t make a living for you, or a business, a business for the boys. (He talks through THE WOMAN’s subsiding laughter; THE WOMAN prims at the “mirror”.) There’s so much I want to make for . . .

THE WOMAN. Me? You didn’t make me, Willy. I picked you.

WILLY (pleased). You picked me?

THE WOMAN (who is quite proper-looking, WILLY’s age). I did. I’ve been sitting at that desk watching all the salesmen go by, day in, day out. But you’ve got such a sense of humor, and we do have such a good time together, don’t we?

WILLY. Sure, sure. (He takes her in his arms.) Why do you have to go now?

THE WOMAN. It’s two o’clock . . .

WILLY. No, come on in! (He pulls her.)

THE WOMAN. . . . my sisters’ll be scandalized. When’ll you be back?

WILLY. Oh, two weeks about. Will you come up again?

THE WOMAN. Sure thing. You do make me laugh. It’s good for me. (She squeezes his arm, kisses him.) And I think you’re a wonderful man.

WILLY. You picked me, heh?

THE WOMAN. Sure. Because you’re so sweet. And such a kidder.

WILLY. Well, I’ll see you next time I’m in Boston.

THE WOMAN. I’ll put you right through to the buyers.

WILLY (slapping her bottom). Right. Well, bottoms up!

THE WOMAN (slaps him gently and laughs). You just kill me, Willy. (He suddenly grabs her and kisses her roughly.) You kill me. And thanks for the stockings. I love a lot of stockings. Well, good night.

WILLY. Good night. And keep your pores open!

THE WOMAN. Oh, Willy!

THE WOMAN bursts out laughing, and LINDA’s laughter blends in. THE WOMAN disappears into the dark. Now the area at the kitchen table brightens. LINDA is sitting where she was at the kitchen table, but now is mending a pair of her silk stockings.

LINDA. You are, Willy. The handsomest man. You’ve got no reason to feel that . . .

WILLY (coming out of the WOMAN’s dimming area and going over to LINDA). I’ll make it all up to you, Linda, I’ll . . .

LINDA. There’s nothing to make up, dear. You’re doing fine, better than . . .

WILLY (noticing her mending). What’s that?

LINDA. Just mending my stockings. They’re so expensive . . .

WILLY (angrily, taking them from her). I won’t have you mending stockings in this house! Now throw them out!

LINDA puts the stockings in her pocket.
BERNARD (entering on the run). Where is he? If he doesn’t study!

WILLY (moving to the forestage, with great agitation). You’ll give him the answers!

BERNARD. I do, but I can’t on a Regents! That’s a state exam! They’re liable to arrest me!

WILLY. Where is he? I’ll whip him, I’ll whip him!

LINDA. And he’d better give back that football, Willy, it’s not nice.

WILLY. Biff! Where is he? Why is he taking everything?

LINDA. He’s too rough with the girls, Willy. All the mothers are afraid of him!

WILLY. I’ll whip him!

BERNARD. He’s driving the car without a license!

WILLY. Shut up!

LINDA. All the mothers . . .

WILLY. Shut up!

BERNARD (backing quietly away and out). Mr. Birnbaum says he’s stuck up.

WILLY. Get outa here!

BERNARD. If he doesn’t buckle down he’ll flunk math! (He goes off.)

LINDA. He’s right, Willy, you’ve gotta . . .

WILLY (exploding at her). There’s nothing the matter with him! You want him to be a worm like Bernard? He’s got spirit, personality . . .

As be speaks, LINDA, almost in tears, exits into the living room. Willy is alone in the kitchen, wilting and staring. The leaves are gone. It is night again, and the apartment houses look down from behind.

WILLY. Loaded with it. Loaded! What is he stealing? He’s giving it back, isn’t he? Why is he stealing? What did I tell him? I never in my life told him anything but decent things.

HAPPY in pajamas has come down the stairs; Willy suddenly becomes aware of Happy’s presence.

HAPPY. Let’s go now, come on.

WILLY (sitting down at the kitchen table). Huh! Why did she have to wax the floors herself? Everytime she waxes the floors she keels over. She knows that!

HAPPY. Shh! Take it easy. What brought you back tonight?

WILLY. I got an awful scare. Nearly hit a kid in Yonkers. God! Why didn’t I go to Alaska with my brother Ben that time! Ben! That man was a genius, that man was success incarnate! What a mistake! He begged me to go.

HAPPY. Well, there’s no use in . . .

WILLY. You guys! There was a man started with the clothes on his back and ended up with diamond mines!

HAPPY. Boy, someday I’d like to know how he did it.

WILLY. What’s the mystery? The man knew what he wanted and went out and got it! Walked into a jungle, and comes out, the age of twenty-one, and he’s rich! The world is an oyster, but you don’t crack it open on a mattress!

HAPPY. Pop, I told you I’m gonna retire you for life.

WILLY. You’ll retire me for life on seventy goddam dollars a week? And your women and your car and your apartment, and you’ll retire me for life!
Christ’s sake, I couldn’t get past Yonkers today! Where are you guys, where are you? The woods are burning! I can’t drive a car!

Charley has appeared in the doorway. He is a large man, slow of speech, laconic, immovable. In all he says, despite what he says, there is pity, and, now, trepidation. He has a robe over pajamas, slippers on his feet. He enters the kitchen.

Charley. Everything all right?
Happy. Yeah, Charley, everything’s . . .
Willy. What’s the matter?
Charley. I heard some noise. I thought something happened. Can’t we do something about the walls? You sneeze in here, and in my house hats blow off.
Happy. Let’s go to bed, Dad. Come on.

Charley signals to Happy to go.

Willy. You go ahead, I’m not tired at the moment.
Happy (to Willy). Take it easy; huh? (He exits.)
Willy. What’re you doin’ up?
Charley (sitting down at the kitchen table opposite Willy). Couldn’t sleep good. I had a heartburn.
Willy. Well, you don’t know how to eat.
Charley. I eat with my mouth.
Willy. No, you’re ignorant. You gotta know about vitamins and things like that.
Charley. Come on, let’s shoot. Tire you out a little.
Willy (besitantly). All right. You got cards?
Charley (taking a deck from his pocket). Yeah, I got them. Someplace.

What is it with those vitamins?
Willy (dealing). They build up your bones. Chemistry.
Charley. Yeah, but there’s no bones in a heartburn.
Willy. What are you talkin’ about? Do you know the first thing about it?
Charley. Don’t get insulted.
Willy. Don’t talk about something you don’t know anything about.

They are playing. Pause.

Charley. What’re you doin’ home?
Willy. A little trouble with the car.
Charley. Oh. (Pause.) I’d like to take a trip to California.
Willy. Don’t say.
Charley. You want a job?
Willy. I got a job, I told you that. (After a slight pause.) What the hell are you offering me a job for?
Charley. Don’t get insulted.
Willy. Don’t insult me.
Charley. I don’t see no sense in it. You don’t have to go on this way.
Willy. I got a good job. (Slight pause.) What do you keep comin’ in here for?
Charley. You want me to go?
Willy (after a pause, withering). I can’t understand it. He’s going back to Texas again. What the hell is that?
Charley. Let him go.
WILLY. I got nothin’ to give him, Charley. I’m clean, I’m clean.

CHARLEY. He won’t starve. None a them starve. Forget about him.

WILLY. Then what have I got to remember?

CHARLEY. You take it too hard. To hell with it. When a deposit bottle is broken you don’t get your nickel back.

WILLY. That’s easy enough for you to say.

CHARLEY. That ain’t easy for me to say.

WILLY. Did you see the ceiling I put up in the living room?

CHARLEY. Yeah, that’s a piece of work. To put up a ceiling is a mystery to me. How do you do it?

WILLY. What’s the difference?

CHARLEY. Well, talk about it.

WILLY. You gonna put up a ceiling?

CHARLEY. How could I put up a ceiling?

WILLY. Then what the hell are you bothering me for?

CHARLEY. You’re insulted again.

WILLY. A man who can’t handle tools is not a man. You’re disgusting.

CHARLEY. Don’t call me disgusting, Willy.

UNCLE BEN, carrying a valise and an umbrella, enters the forestage from around the right corner of the house. He is a stolid man, in his sixties, with a mustache and an authoritative air. He is utterly certain of his destiny, and there is an aura of far places about him. He enters exactly as Willy speaks.

WILLY. I’m getting awfully tired, Ben.

BEN’S music is heard. Ben looks around at everything.

CHARLEY. Good, keep playing; you’ll sleep better. Did you call me Ben?

BEN looks at his watch.

WILLY. That’s funny. For a second there you reminded me of my brother Ben.

BEN. I only have a few minutes. (He strolls, inspecting the place. Willy and Charley continue playing.)

CHARLEY. You never heard from him again, heh? Since that time?

WILLY. Didn’t Linda tell you? Couple of weeks ago we got a letter from his wife in Africa. He died.

CHARLEY. That so.

BEN. (chuckling). So this is Brooklyn, eh?

CHARLEY. Maybe you’re in for some of his money.

WILLY. Naa, he had seven sons. There’s just one opportunity I had with that man . . .

BEN. I must make a train, William. There are several properties I’m looking at in Alaska.

WILLY. Sure, sure! If I’d gone with him to Alaska that time, everything would’ve been totally different.

CHARLEY. Go on, you’d froze to death up there.

WILLY. What’re you talking about?

BEN. Opportunity is tremendous in Alaska, William. Surprised you’re not up there.
WILLY. Sure, tremendous.
CHARLEY. Heh?
WILLY. There was the only man I ever met who knew the answers.
CHARLEY. Who?
BEN. How are you all?
WILLY (taking a pot, smiling). Fine, fine.
CHARLEY. Pretty sharp tonight.
BEN. Is Mother living with you?
WILLY. No, she died a long time ago.
CHARLEY. Who?
BEN. That’s too bad. Fine specimen of a lady, Mother.
WILLY (to CHARLEY). Heh?
BEN. I’d hoped to see the old girl.
CHARLEY. Who died?
BEN. Heard anything from Father, have you?
WILLY (unnerved). What do you mean, who died?
CHARLEY (taking a pot). What’re you talkin’ about?
BEN (looking at his watch). William, it’s half-past eight!
WILLY (as though to dispel his confusion he angrily stops CHARLEY’S hand).
That’s my build!
CHARLEY. I put the ace . . .
WILLY. If you don’t know how to play the game I’m not gonna throw my money away on you!
CHARLEY (rising). It was my ace, for God’s sake!
WILLY. I’m through, I’m through!
BEN. When did Mother die?
WILLY. Long ago. Since the beginning you never knew how to play cards.
CHARLEY (picks up the cards and goes to the door). All right! Next time I’ll bring a deck with five aces.
WILLY. I don’t play that kind of game!
CHARLEY (turning to him). You ought to be ashamed of yourself!
WILLY. Yeah?
CHARLEY. Yeah! (He goes out.)
WILLY (slamming the door after him). Ignoramus!
BEN (as WILLY comes toward him through the wall-line of the kitchen). So you’re William.
WILLY (shaking BEN’S hand). Ben! I’ve been waiting for you so long! What’s the answer? How did you do it?
BEN. Oh, there’s a story in that.

LINDA enters the forestage, as of old, carrying the wash basket.

LINDA. Is this Ben?
BEN (gallantly). How do you do, my dear.
LINDA. Where’ve you been all these years? Willy’s always wondered why you . . .
WILLY (pulling BEN away from her impatiently). Where is Dad? Didn’t you follow him? How did you get started?
BEN. Well, I don’t know how much you remember.
WILLY. Well, I was just a baby, of course, only three or four years old. . .
BEN. Three years and eleven months.
WILLY. What a memory, Ben!
BEN. I have many enterprises, William, and I have never kept books.
WILLY. I remember I was sitting under the wagon in—was it Nebraska?
BEN. It was South Dakota, and I gave you a bunch of wild flowers.
WILLY. I remember you walking away down some open road.
BEN (laughing). I was going to find Father in Alaska.
WILLY. Where is he?
BEN. At that age I had a very faulty view of geography, William. I discovered after a few days that I was heading due south, so instead of Alaska, I ended up in Africa.
LINDA. Africa!
WILLY. The Gold Coast!
BEN. Principally diamond mines.
LINDA. Diamond mines!
BEN. Yes, my dear. But I've only a few minutes . . .
WILLY. No! Boys! Boys! (Young BIFF and HAPPY appear.) Listen to this. This is your Uncle Ben, a great man! Tell my boys, Ben!
BEN. Why, boys, when I was seventeen I walked into the jungle, and when I was twenty-one I walked out. (He laughs.) And by God I was rich.
WILLY (to the boys). You see what I been talking about? The greatest things can happen!
BEN (glancing at his watch). I have an appointment in Ketchikan Tuesday week.
WILLY. No, Ben! Please tell about Dad. I want my boys to hear. I want them to know the kind of stock they spring from. All I remember is a man with a big beard, and I was in Mamma's lap, sitting around a fire, and some kind of high music.
BEN. His flute. He played the flute.
WILLY. Sure, the flute, that's right!

New music is beard, a bigb, rollicking tune.

BEN. Father was a very great and a very wild-hearted man. We would start in Boston, and he'd toss the whole family into the wagon, and then he'd drive the team right across the country; through Ohio, and Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and all the Western states. And we'd stop in the towns and sell the flutes that he'd made on the way. Great inventor, Father. With one gadget he made more in a week than a man like you could make in a lifetime.
WILLY. That's just the way I'm bringing them up, Ben—rugged, well liked, all-around.
BEN. Yeah? (To BIFF.) Hit that, boy—hard as you can. (He pounds bis stomach.)
BIFF. Oh, no, sir!
BEN (taking boxing stance). Come on, get to me! (He laughs.)
WILLY. Go to it. Biff! Go ahead, show him!
BIFF. Okay! (He cocks bis fists and starts in.)
LINDA (to WILLY). Why must he fight, dear?
BEN (sparring with BIFF). Good boy! Good boy!
WILLY. How's that, Ben, heh?
HAPPY. Give him the left, Biff!
LINDA. Why are you fighting?
BEN. Good boy! (Suddenly comes in, trips BIFF, and stands over him, the point of bis umbrella poised over BIFF's eye.)
LINDA. Look out, Biff!

BIFF. Gee!

BEN (patting Biff’s knee). Never fight fair with a stranger, boy. You’ll never get out of the jungle that way. (Taking LINDA’s band and bowing.) It was an honor and a pleasure to meet you, Linda.

LINDA (withdrawing her band coldly, frightened). Have a nice—trip.

BEN (to WILLY). And good luck with your—what do you do?

WILLY. Selling.

BEN. Yes. Well . . . (He raises his band in farewell to all.)

WILLY. No, Ben, I don’t want you to think . . . (He takes BEN’s arm to show him.) It’s Brooklyn, I know, but we hunt too.

BEN. Really, now.

WILLY. Oh, sure, there’s snakes and rabbits and—that’s why I moved out here. Why, Biff can fell any one of these trees in no time! Boys! Go right over to where they’re building the apartment house and get some sand. We’re gonna rebuild the entire front stoop right now! Watch this, Ben!

BIFF. Yes, sir! On the double, Hap!

HAPPY (as he and BIFF run off). I lost weight, Pop, you notice?

CHARLEY enters in knickers, even before the boys are gone.

CHARLEY. Listen, if they steal any more from that building the watchman’ll put the cops on them!

LINDA (to WILLY). Don’t let Biff . . .

BEN laughs lustily:

WILLY. You shoulda seen the lumber they brought home last week. At least a dozen six-by-tens worth all kinds a money.

CHARLEY. Listen, if that watchman . . .

WILLY. I gave them hell, understand. But I got a couple of fearless characters there.

CHARLEY. Willy, the jails are full of fearless characters.

BEN (clapping WILLY on the back, with a laugh at CHARLEY). And the stock exchange, friend!

WILLY (joining in BEN’s laughter). Where are the rest of your pants?

CHARLEY. My wife bought them.

WILLY. Now all you need is a golf club and you can go upstairs and go to sleep. (To BEN.) Great athlete! Between him and his son Bernard they can’t hammer a nail!

BERNARD (rushing in). The watchman’s chasing Biff!

WILLY (angrily). Shut up! He’s not stealing anything!

LINDA (alarmed, burrying off left). Where is he? Biff, dear! (She exits.)

WILLY (moving toward the left, away from BEN). There’s nothing wrong. What’s the matter with you?

BEN. Nervy boy. Good!

WILLY (laughing). Oh, nerves of iron, that Biff!

CHARLEY. Don’t know what it is. My New England man comes back and he’s bleedin’, they murdered him up there.

WILLY. It’s contacts, Charley, I got important contacts!

CHARLEY (sarcastically). Glad to hear it, Willy. Come in later, we’ll shoot a little casino. I’ll take some of your Portland money. (He laughs at WILLY and exits.)
Willy (turning to Ben). Business is bad, it's murderous. But not for me, of course.

Ben. I'll stop by on my way back to Africa.

Willy (longingly). Can't you stay a few days? You're just what I need, Ben, because I—I have a fine position here, but I—well, Dad left when I was such a baby and I never had a chance to talk to him and I still feel—kind of temporary about myself.

Ben. I'll be late for my train.

They are at opposite ends of the stage.

Willy. Ben, my boys—can't we talk? They'd go into the jaws of hell for me, see, but I . . .

Ben. William, you're being first-rate with your boys. Outstanding, manly chaps!

Willy (hanging on to his words). Oh, Ben, that's good to hear! Because sometimes I'm afraid that I'm not teaching them the right kind of—Ben, how should I teach them?

Ben (giving great weight to each word, and with a certain vicious audacity). William, when I walked into the jungle, I was seventeen. When I walked out I was twenty-one. And, by God, I was rich! (He goes off into darkness around the right corner of the house.)

Willy. . . . was rich! That's just the spirit I want to imbue them with! To walk into a jungle! I was right! I was right! I was right!

Ben is gone, but Willy is still speaking to him as Linda, in nightgown and robe, enters the kitchen, glances around for Willy, then goes to the door of the house, looks out and sees him. Comes down to bis left. He looks at her.

Linda. Willy, dear? Willy?

Willy. I was right!

Linda. Did you have some cheese? (He can't answer.) It's very late, darling. Come to bed, heh?

Willy (looking straight up). Gotta break your neck to see a star in this yard.

Linda. You coming in?

Willy. Whatever happened to that diamond watch fob? Remember? When Ben came from Africa that time? Didn't he give me a watch fob with a diamond in it?

Linda. You pawned it, dear. Twelve, thirteen years ago. For Biff's radio correspondence course.

Willy. Gee, that was a beautiful thing. I'll take a walk.

Linda. But you're in your slippers.

Willy (starting to go around the house at the left). I was right! I was! (Half to Linda, as he goes, shaking his head.) What a man! There was a man worth talking to. I was right!

Linda (calling after Willy). But in your slippers, Willy!

Willy is almost gone when Biff, in bis pajamas, comes down the stairs and enters the kitchen.

Biff. What is he doing out there?

Linda. Sh!

Biff. God Almighty, Mom, how long has he been doing this?

Linda. Don't, he'll hear you.
BIFF. What the hell is the matter with him?
LINDA. It'll pass by morning.
BIFF. Shouldn't we do anything?
LINDA. Oh, my dear, you should do a lot of things, but there's nothing to do, so go to sleep.

HAPPY comes down the stairs and sits on the steps.

HAPPY. I never heard him so loud, Mom.
LINDA. Well, come around more often; you'll hear him. (She sits down at the table and mends the lining of Willy's jacket.)

BIFF. Why didn't you ever write me about this, Mom?
LINDA. How would I write to you? For over three months you had no address.

BIFF. I was on the move. But you know I thought of you all the time. You know that, don't you, pal?
LINDA. I know, dear, I know. But he likes to have a letter. Just to know that there's still a possibility for better things.

BIFF. He's not like this all the time, is he?
LINDA. It's when you come home he's always the worst.

BIFF. When I come home?
LINDA. When you write you're coming, he's all smiles, and talks about the future, and—he's just wonderful. And then the closer you seem to come, the more shaky he gets, and then, by the time you get here, he's arguing, and he seems angry at you. I think it's just that maybe he can't bring himself to—to open up to you. Why are you so hateful to each other? Why is that?

BIFF (evasively). I'm not hateful, Mom.
LINDA. But you no sooner come in the door than you're fighting!

BIFF. I don't know why. I mean to change. I'm tryin', Mom, you understand?
LINDA. Are you home to stay now?

BIFF. I don't know. I want to look around, see what's doin'.
LINDA. Biff, you can't look around all your life, can you?

BIFF. I just can't take hold, Mom. I can't take hold of some kind of a life.
LINDA. Biff, a man is not a bird, to come and go with the spring time.

BIFF. Your hair... (He touches her hair.) Your hair got so gray.
LINDA. Oh, it's been gray since you were in high school. I just stopped dyeing it, that's all.

BIFF. Dye it again, will ya? I don't want my pal looking old. (He smiles.)

LINDA. You're such a boy! You think you can go away for a year and... You've got to get it into your head now that one day you'll knock on this door and there'll be strange people here...

BIFF. What are you talking about? You're not even sixty, Mom.

LINDA. But what about your father?

BIFF (lamely). Well, I meant him too.

HAPPY. He admires Pop.

LINDA. Biff, dear, if you don't have any feeling for him, then you can't have any feeling for me.

BIFF. Sure I can, Mom.

LINDA. No. You can't just come to see me, because I love him. (With a threat, but only a threat, of tears.) He's the dearest man in the world to me, and I won’t have anyone making him feel unwanted and low and blue.
You’ve got to make up your mind now, darling, there’s no leeway any more. Either he’s your father and you pay him that respect, or else you’re not to come here. I know he’s not easy to get along with—obody knows that better than me—but . . .

WILLY (from the left, with a laugh). Hey, hey, Biffo!

BIFF (starting to go out after willy). What the hell is the matter with him?

HAPPY (stops him).

LINDA. Don’t—don’t go near him!

BIFF. Stop making excuses for him! He always, always wiped the floor with you. Never had an ounce of respect for you.

HAPPY. He’s always had respect for . . .

BIFF. What the hell do you know about it?

HAPPY (surlily). Just don’t call him crazy!

BIFF. He’s got no character—Charley wouldn’t do this. Not in his own house—spewing out that vomit from his mind.

HAPPY. Charley never had to cope with what he’s got to.

BIFF. People are worse off than Willy Loman. Believe me, I’ve seen them!

LINDA. Then make Charley your father, Biff. You can’t do that, can you? I don’t say he’s a great man. Willy Loman never made a lot of money. His name was never in the paper. He’s not the finest character that ever lived. But he’s a human being, and a terrible thing is happening to him. So attention must be paid. He’s not to be allowed to fall into his grave like an old dog.
Attention, attention must be finally paid to such a person. You called him crazy . . .

BIFF. I didn’t mean . . .

LINDA. No, a lot of people think he’s lost his—balance. But you don’t have to be very smart to know what his trouble is. The man is exhausted.

HAPPY. Sure!

LINDA. A small man can be just as exhausted as a great man. He works for a company thirty-six years this March, opens up unheard-of territories to their trademark, and now in his old age they take his salary away.

HAPPY (indignantly). I didn’t know that, Mom.

LINDA. You never asked, my dear! Now that you get your spending money someplace else you don’t trouble your mind with him.

HAPPY. But I gave you money last . . .

LINDA. Christmas time, fifty dollars! To fix the hot water it cost ninety-seven fifty! For five weeks he’s been on straight commission, like a beginner, an unknown!

BIFF. Those ungrateful bastards!

LINDA. Are they any worse than his sons? When he brought them business, when he was young, they were glad to see him. But now his old friends, the old buyers that loved him so and always found some order to hand him in a pinch—they’re all dead, retired. He used to be able to make six, seven calls a day in Boston. Now he takes his valises out of the car and puts them back and takes them out again and he’s exhausted. Instead of walking he talks now. He drives seven hundred miles, and when he gets there no one knows him any more, no one welcomes him. And what goes through a man’s mind, driving seven hundred miles home without having earned a cent? Why shouldn’t he talk to himself? Why? When he has to go to Charley and borrow fifty dollars a week and pretend to me that it’s his pay? How long can that go on? How long? You see what I’m sitting here and waiting for? And you tell me he has no character? The man who never worked a day but for your benefit? When does he get the medal for that? Is this his reward—to turn around at the age of sixty-three and find his sons, who he loved better than his life, one a philandering bum . . .

HAPPY. Mom!

LINDA. That’s all you are, my baby! (To BIFF.) And you! What happened to the love you had for him? You were such pals! How you used to talk to him on the phone every night! How lonely he was till he could come home to you!

BIFF. All right, Mom. I’ll live here in my room, and I’ll get a job. I’ll keep away from him, that’s all.

LINDA. No, Biff. You can’t stay here and fight all the time.

BIFF. He threw me out of this house, remember that.

LINDA. Why did he do that? I never knew why.

BIFF. Because I know he’s a fake and he doesn’t like anybody around who knows!

LINDA. Why a fake? In what way? What do you mean?

BIFF. Just don’t lay it all at my feet. It’s between me and him—that’s all I have to say. I’ll chip in from now on. He’ll settle for half my paycheck. He’ll be all right. I’m going to bed. (He starts for the stairs.)

LINDA. He won’t be all right.

BIFF (turning on the stairs, furiously). I hate this city and I’ll stay here. Now what do you want?

LINDA. He’s dying, Biff.

HAPPY turns quickly to her, shocked.

BIFF (after a pause). Why is he dying?

LINDA. He’s been trying to kill himself.

BIFF (with great horror). How?

LINDA. I live from day to day.

BIFF. What’re you talking about?

LINDA. Remember I wrote you that he smashed up the car again? In February?

BIFF. Well?

LINDA. The insurance inspector came. He said that they have evidence. That all these accidents in the last year—weren’t—weren’t—accidents.

HAPPY. How can they tell that? That’s a lie.

LINDA. It seems there’s a woman . . . (She takes a breath as:)

BIFF (sharply but contained). What woman?

LINDA (simultaneously). . . . and this woman . . .

LINDA. What?

BIFF. Nothing. Go ahead.

LINDA. What did you say?

BIFF. Nothing. I just said what woman?

HAPPY. What about her?

LINDA. Well, it seems she was walking down the road and saw his car. She says that he wasn’t driving fast at all, and that he didn’t skid. She says he came to that little bridge, and then deliberately smashed into the railing, and it was only the shallowness of the water that saved him.
BIFF. Oh, no, he probably just fell asleep again.

LINDA. I don’t think he fell asleep.

BIFF. Why not?

LINDA. Last month . . . (With great difficulty.) Oh, boys, it’s so hard to say a thing like this! He’s just a big stupid man to you, but I tell you there’s more good in him than in many other people. (She chokes, wipes her eyes.) I was looking for a fuse. The lights blew out, and I went down the cellar. And behind the fuse box—it happened to fall out—was a length of rubber pipe—just short.

HAPPY. No kidding!

LINDA. There’s a little attachment on the end of it. I knew right away. And sure enough, on the bottom of the water heater there’s a new little nipple on the gas pipe.

HAPPY (angrily). That—jerk.

BIFF. Did you have it taken off?

LINDA. I’m—I’m ashamed to. How can I mention it to him? Every day I go down and take away that little rubber pipe. But, when he comes home, I put it back where it was. How can I insult him that way? I don’t know what to do. I live from day to day, boys. I tell you, I know every thought in his mind. It sounds so old-fashioned and silly, but I tell you he put his whole life into you and you’ve turned your backs on him. (She is bent over in the chair, weeping, her face in her hands.) Biff, I swear to God! Biff, his life is in your hands!

HAPPY (to BIFF). How do you like that damned fool!

BIFF (kissing her). All right, pal, all right. It’s all settled now. I’ve been remiss. I know that, Mom. But now I’ll stay, and I swear to you, I’ll apply myself. (Kneeling in front of her, in a fever of self-reproach.) It’s just—you see, Mom, I don’t fit in business. Not that I won’t try. I’ll try, and I’ll make good.

HAPPY. Sure you will. The trouble with you in business was you never tried to please people.

BIFF. I know, I . . .

HAPPY. Like when you worked for Harrison’s. Bob Harrison said you were tops, and then you go and do some damn fool thing like whistling whole songs in the elevator like a comedian.

BIFF (against HAPPY). So what? I like to whistle sometimes.

HAPPY. You don’t raise a guy to a responsible job who whistles in the elevator!

LINDA. Well, don’t argue about it now.

HAPPY. Like when you’d go off and swim in the middle of the day instead of taking the line around.

BIFF (his resentment rising). Well, don’t you run off? You take off sometimes, don’t you? On a nice summer day?

HAPPY. Yeah, but I cover myself!

LINDA. Boys!

HAPPY. If I’m going to take a fade the boss can call any number where I’m supposed to be and they’ll swear to him that I just left. I’ll tell you something that I hate to say, Biff, but in the business world some of them think you’re crazy.

BIFF (angered). Screw the business world!

HAPPY. All right, screw it! Great, but cover yourself!
LINDA. Hap, Hap!

BIFF. I don’t care what they think! They’ve laughed at Dad for years, and you know why? Because we don’t belong in this nuthouse of a city! We should be mixing cement on some open plain or—or carpenters. A carpenter is allowed to whistle!

WILLY walks in from the entrance of the house, at left.

WILLY. Even your grandfather was better than a carpenter. (Pause. They watch bim.) You never grew up. Bernard does not whistle in the elevator, I assure you.

BIFF (as though to laugh WILLY out of it). Yeah, but you do, Pop.

WILLY. I never in my life whistled in an elevator! And who in the business world thinks I’m crazy?

BIFF. I didn’t mean it like that, Pop. Now don’t make a whole thing out of it, will ya?

WILLY. Go back to the West! Be a carpenter, a cowboy, enjoy yourself!

LINDA. Willy, he was just saying . . .

WILLY. I heard what he said!

HAPPY (trying to quiet WILLY). Hey, Pop, come on now . . .

WILLY (continuing over HAPPY’s line). They laugh at me, heh? Go to Filene’s, go to the Hub, go to Slattery’s, Boston. Call out the name Willy Loman and see what happens! Big shot!

BIFF. All right, Pop.

WILLY. Big!

BIFF. All right!

WILLY. Why do you always insult me?

BIFF. I didn’t say a word. (To LINDA.) Did I say a word?

LINDA. He didn’t say anything, Willy.

WILLY (going to the doorway of the living room). All right, good night, good night.

LINDA. Willy, dear, he just decided . . .

WILLY (to BIFF). If you get tired hanging around tomorrow, paint the ceiling I put up in the living room.

BIFF. I’m leaving early tomorrow.

HAPPY. He’s going to see Bill Oliver, Pop.

WILLY (interestedly). Oliver? For what?

BIFF (with reserve, but trying; trying). He always said he’d stake me. I’d like to go into business, so maybe I can take him up on it.

LINDA. Isn’t that wonderful?

WILLY. Don’t interrupt. What’s wonderful about it? There’s fifty men in the City of New York who’d stake him. (To BIFF.) Sporting goods?

BIFF. I guess so. I know something about it and . . .

WILLY. He knows something about it! You know sporting goods better than Spalding, for God’s sake! How much is he giving you?

BIFF. I don’t know, I didn’t even see him yet, but . . .

WILLY. Then what’re you talkin’ about?

BIFF (getting angry). Well, all I said was I’m gonna see him, that’s all!

WILLY (turning away). Ah, you’re counting your chickens again.

BIFF (starting left for the stairs). Oh, Jesus, I’m going to sleep!

WILLY (calling after bim). Don’t curse in this house!

BIFF (turning). Since when did you get so clean?
HAPPY (trying to stop them). Wait a . . .

WILLY. Don’t use that language to me! I won’t have it!

HAPPY (grabbing BIFF, shouts). Wait a minute! I got an idea. I got a feasible idea. Come here, Biff, let’s talk this over now, let’s talk some sense here. When I was down in Florida last time, I thought of a great idea to sell sporting goods. It just came back to me. You and I, Biff—we have a line, the Loman Line. We train a couple of weeks, and put on a couple of exhibitions, see?

WILLY. That’s an idea!

HAPPY. Wait! We form two basketball teams, see? Two water-polo teams. We play each other. It’s a million dollars’ worth of publicity. Two brothers, see? The Loman Brothers. Displays in the Royal Palms—all the hotels. And banners over the ring and the basketball court: “Loman Brothers.” Baby, we could sell sporting goods!

WILLY. That is a one-million-dollar idea!

LINDA. Marvelous!

BIFF. I’m in great shape as far as that’s concerned.

HAPPY. And the beauty of it is, Biff, it wouldn’t be like a business. We’d be out playin’ ball again.

BIFF (enthused). Yeah, that’s . . .

WILLY. Million-dollar . . .

HAPPY. And you wouldn’t get fed up with it, Biff. It’d be the family again. There’d be the old honor, and comradeship, and if you wanted to go off for a swim or somethin’—well, you’d do it! Without some smart cooky gettin’ up ahead of you!

WILLY. Lick the world! You guys together could absolutely lick the civilized world.

BIFF. I’ll see Oliver tomorrow. Hap, if we could work that out . . .

LINDA. Maybe things are beginning to . . .

WILLY (wildly enthused, to LINDA). Stop interrupting! (To BIFF.) But don’t wear sport jacket and slacks when you see Oliver.

BIFF. No, I’ll . . .

WILLY. A business suit, and talk as little as possible, and don’t crack any jokes.

BIFF. He did like me. Always liked me.

LINDA. He loved you!

WILLY (to LINDA). Will you stop! (To BIFF.) Walk in very serious. You are not applying for a boy’s job. Money is to pass. Be quiet, fine, and serious. Everybody likes a kidder, but nobody lends him money.

HAPPY. I’ll try to get some myself, Biff. I’m sure I can.

WILLY. I see great things for you kids, I think your troubles are over. But remember, start big and you’ll end big. Ask for fifteen. How much you gonna ask for?

BIFF. Gee, I don’t know . . .

WILLY. And don’t say “Gee.” “Gee” is a boy’s word. A man walking in for fifteen thousand dollars does not say “Gee!”

BIFF. Ten, I think, would be top though.

WILLY. Don’t be so modest. You always started too low. Walk in with a big laugh. Don’t look worried. Start off with a couple of your good stories to lighten things up. It’s not what you say, it’s how you say it—because personality always wins the day.

LINDA. Oliver always thought the highest of him . . .
WILLY. Will you let me talk?

BIFF. Don't yell at her, Pop, will ya?

WILLY (angrily). I was talking, wasn’t I?

BIFF. I don’t like you yelling at her all the time, and I’m tellin’ you, that’s all.

WILLY. What’re you, takin’ over this house?

LINDA. Willy . . .

WILLY (turning to her). Don’t take his side all the time, goddammit!

BIFF (furiously). Stop yelling at her!

WILLY (suddenly pulling on his cheek, beaten down, guilt ridden). Give my best to Bill Oliver—he may remember me. (He exits through the living room doorway.)

LINDA (her voice subdued). What’d you have to start that for? (BIFF turns away.) You see how sweet he was as soon as you talked hopefully? (She goes over to BIFF.) Come up and say good night to him. Don’t let him go to bed that way.

HAPPY. Come on, Biff, let’s buck him up.

LINDA. Please, dear. Just say good night. It takes so little to make him happy. Come. (She goes through the living room doorway, calling upstairs from within the living room.) Your pajamas are hanging in the bathroom, Willy!

HAPPY (looking toward where LINDA went out). What a woman! They broke the mold when they made her. You know that, Biff.

BIFF. He’s off salary. My God, working on commission!

HAPPY. Well, let’s face it: he’s no hot-shot selling man. Except that sometimes, you have to admit, he’s a sweet personality.

BIFF (deciding). Lend me ten bucks, will ya? I want to buy some new ties.

HAPPY. She got gray. Mom got awful old. Gee, I’m gonna go in to Oliver tomorrow and knock him for a . . .

HAPPY. Come on up. Tell that to Dad. Let’s give him a whirl. Come on.

BIFF (steamed up). You know, with ten thousand bucks, boy!

HAPPY (as they go into the living room). That’s the talk, Biff, that’s the first time I’ve heard the old confidence out of you! (From within the living room, fading off) You’re gonna live with me, kid, and any babe you want just say the word . . . (The last lines are hardly heard.) They are mounting the stairs to their parents’ bedroom.

LINDA (entering her bedroom and addressing WILLY, who is in the bathroom. She is straightening the bed for him). Can you do anything about the shower? It drips.

WILLY (from the bathroom). All of a sudden everything falls to pieces. God-dam plumbing, oughta be sued, those people. I hardly finished putting it in and the thing . . . (His words rumble off.)

LINDA. I’m just wondering if Oliver will remember him. You think he might?

WILLY (coming out of the bathroom in his pajamas). Remember him?

What’s the matter with you, you crazy? If he’d’ve stayed with Oliver he’d be on top by now! Wait’ll Oliver gets a look at him. You don’t know the average caliber any more. The average young man today—is getting into bed—is got a caliber of zero. Greatest thing in the world for him was to bum around.

BIFF and HAPPY enter the bedroom. Slight pause.
WILLY (stops short, looking at BIFF). Glad to hear it, boy.

HAPPY. He wanted to say good night to you, sport.

WILLY (to BIFF). Yeah. Knock him dead, boy. What’d you want to tell me?

BIFF. Just take it easy, Pop. Good night. (He turns to go.)

WILLY (unable to resist). And if anything falls off the desk while you’re talking to him—like a package or something—don’t you pick it up. They have office boys for that.

LINDA. I’ll make a big breakfast . . .

WILLY. Will you let me finish? (To BIFF.) Tell him you were in the business in the West. Not farm work.

BIFF. All right, Dad.

LINDA. I think everything . . .

WILLY (going right through her speech). And don’t undersell yourself. No less than fifteen thousand dollars.

BIFF (unable to bear him). Okay. Good night, Mom. (He starts moving.)

WILLY. Because you got a greatness in you, Biff, remember that. You got all kinds of greatness . . . (He lies back, exhausted. BIFF walks out.)

LINDA (calling after BIFF). Sleep well, darling!

HAPPY. I’m gonna get married, Mom. I wanted to tell you.

LINDA. Go to sleep, dear.

HAPPY (going). I just wanted to tell you.

WILLY. Keep up the good work. (HAPPY exits.) God . . . remember that Ebbets Field game? The championship of the city?

LINDA. Just rest. Should I sing to you?

WILLY. Yeah. Sing to me. (LINDA hums a soft lullaby.) When that team came out—he was the tallest, remember?

LINDA. Oh, yes. And in gold.

BIFF enters the darkened kitchen, takes a cigarette, and leaves the house. He comes downstage into a golden pool of light. He smokes, staring at the night.

WILLY. Like a young god. Hercules—something like that. And the sun, the sun all around him. Remember how he waved to me? Right up from the field, with the representatives of three colleges standing by? And the buyers I brought, and the cheers when he came out—Loman, Loman, Loman! God Almighty, he’ll be great yet. A star like that, magnificent, can never really fade away!

The light on WILLY is fading. The gas heater begins to glow through the kitchen wall, near the stairs, a blue flame beneath red coils.

LINDA (timidly). Willy dear, what has he got against you?

WILLY. I’m so tired. Don’t talk any more.

BIFF slowly returns to the kitchen. He stops, stares toward the heater.

LINDA. Will you ask Howard to let you work in New York?

WILLY. First thing in the morning. Everything’ll be all right.

BIFF reaches behind the heater and draws out a length of rubber tubing. He is horrified and turns his head toward WILLY’s room, still dimly lit, from which the strains of LINDA’s desperate but monotonous humming rise.
Willy (staring through the window into the moonlight). Gee, look at the moon moving between the buildings!

Biff wraps the tubing around his band and quickly goes up the stairs.

Act 2

SCENE: Music is heard, gay and bright. The curtain rises as the music fades away. Willy, in shirt sleeves, is sitting at the kitchen table, sipping coffee, bis bat in bis lap. Linda is filling bis cup when she can.

Willy. Wonderful coffee. Meal in itself.
Linda. Can I make you some eggs?
Willy. No. Take a breath.
Linda. You look so rested, dear.
Willy. I slept like a dead one. First time in months. Imagine, sleeping till ten on a Tuesday morning. Boys left nice and early, heh?
Linda. They were out of here by eight o'clock.
Willy. Good work!
Linda. It was so thrilling to see them leaving together. I can’t get over the shaving lotion in this house!
Willy (smiling). Mmm . . .
Linda. Biff was very changed this morning. His whole attitude seemed to be hopeful. He couldn’t wait to get downtown to see Oliver.
Willy. He’s heading for a change. There’s no question, there simply are certain men that take longer to get—solidified. How did he dress?
Linda. His blue suit. He’s so handsome in that suit. He could be a—anything in that suit!

Willy gets up from the table. Linda holds bis jacket for him.

Willy. There’s no question, no question at all. Gee, on the way home tonight I’d like to buy some seeds.
Linda (laughing). That’d be wonderful. But not enough sun gets back there. Nothing’ll grow any more.
Willy. You wait, kid, before it’s all over we’re gonna get a little place out in the country, and I’ll raise some vegetables, a couple of chickens . . .
Linda. You’ll do it yet, dear.

Willy walks out of bis jacket. Linda follows him.

Willy. And they’ll get married, and come for a weekend. I’d build a little guest house. ’Cause I got so many fine tools, all I’d need would be a little lumber and some peace of mind.
Linda (joyfully). I sewed the lining . . .
Willy. I could build two guest houses, so they’d both come. Did he decide how much he’s going to ask Oliver for?
Linda (getting him into the jacket). He didn’t mention it, but I imagine ten or fifteen thousand. You going to talk to Howard today?
Willy. Yeah. I’ll put it to him straight and simple. He’ll just have to take me off the road.
Linda. And Willy, don’t forget to ask for a little advance, because we’ve got the insurance premium. It’s the grace period now.
Willy. That’s a hundred . . . ?
LINDA. A hundred and eight, sixty-eight. Because we’re a little short again.

WILLY. Why are we short?

LINDA. Well, you had the motor job on the car . . .

WILLY. That goddam Studebaker!

LINDA. And you got one more payment on the refrigerator . . .

WILLY. But it just broke again!

LINDA. Well, it’s old, dear.

WILLY. I told you we should’ve bought a well-advertised machine. Charley bought a General Electric and it’s twenty years old and it’s still good, that son-of-a-bitch.

LINDA. But, Willy . . .

WILLY. Whoever heard of a Hastings refrigerator? Once in my life I would like to own something outright before it’s broken! I’m always in a race with the junkyard! I just finished paying for the car and it’s on its last legs. The refrigerator consumes belts like a goddam maniac. They time those things. They time them so when you finally paid for them, they’re used up.

LINDA. All told, about two hundred dollars would carry us, dear. But that includes the last payment on the mortgage. After this payment, Willy, the house belongs to us.

WILLY. It’s twenty-five years!

LINDA. Biff was nine years old when we bought it.

WILLY. Well, that’s a great thing. To weather a twenty-five year mortgage is . . .

LINDA. It’s an accomplishment.

WILLY. All the cement, the lumber, the reconstruction I put in this house!

LINDA. Well, it served its purpose.

WILLY. What purpose? Some stranger’ll come along, move in, and that’s that. If only Biff would take this house, and raise a family . . . (He starts to go.) Good-by, I’m late.

LINDA. (suddenly remembering). Oh, I forgot! You’re supposed to meet them for dinner.

WILLY. Me?

LINDA. At Frank’s Chop House on Forty-eighth near Sixth Avenue.

WILLY. Is that so! How about you?

LINDA. No, just the three of you. They’re gonna blow you to a big meal!

WILLY. Don’t say! Who thought of that?

LINDA. Biff came to me this morning, Willy, and he said, “Tell Dad, we want to blow him to a big meal.” Be there six o’clock. You and your two boys are going to have dinner.

WILLY. Gee whiz! That’s really somethin’. I’m gonna knock Howard for a loop, kid. I’ll get an advance, and I’ll come home with a New York job. Goddammit, now I’m gonna do it!

LINDA. Oh, that’s the spirit, Willy!

WILLY. I will never get behind a wheel the rest of my life!

LINDA. It’s changing, Willy, I can feel it changing!

WILLY. Beyond a question. G’by, I’m late. (He starts to go again.)

LINDA. (calling after him as he runs to the kitchen table for a handkerchief). You got your glasses?

WILLY. (feels for them, then comes back in). Yeah, yeah, got my glasses.

LINDA. (giving him the handkerchief). And a handkerchief.
Willy. Yeah, handkerchief.

Linda. And your saccharine?

Willy. Yeah, my saccharine.

Linda. Be careful on the subway stairs.

She kisses him, and a silk stocking is seen hanging from her hand. Willy notices it.

Willy. Will you stop mending stockings? At least while I'm in the house. It gets me nervous. I can't tell you. Please.

Linda hides the stocking in her hand as she follows Willy across the forestage in front of the house.

Linda. Remember, Frank's Chop House.

Willy (passing the apron). Maybe beets would grow out there.

Linda (laughing). But you tried so many times.

Willy. Yeah. Well, don't work hard today. (He disappears around the right corner of the house.)

Linda. Be careful!

As Willy vanishes, Linda waves to him. Suddenly the phone rings. She runs across the stage and into the kitchen and lifts it.

Linda. Hello? Oh, Biff! I'm so glad you called, I just . . . Yes, sure, I just told him. Yes, he'll be there for dinner at six o'clock, I didn't forget. Listen, I was just dying to tell you. You know that little rubber pipe I told you about? That he connected to the gas heater? I finally decided to go down the cellar this morning and take it away and destroy it. But it's gone! Imagine? He took it away himself, it isn't there! (She listens.) When? Oh, then you took it. Oh—nothing, it's just that I'd hoped he'd taken it away himself. Oh, I'm not worried, darling, because this morning he left in such high spirits, it was like the old days! I'm not afraid any more. Did Mr. Oliver see you? . . . Well, you wait there then. And make a nice impression on him, darling. Just don't perspire too much before you see him. And have a nice time with Dad. He may have big news too! . . That's right, a New York job. And be sweet to him tonight, dear. Be loving to him. Because he's only a little boat looking for a harbor. (She is trembling with sorrow and joy.) Oh, that's wonderful, Biff, you'll save his life. Thanks, darling. Just put your arm around him when he comes into the restaurant. Give him a smile. That's the boy . . . Good-by, dear . . . You got your comb? . . . That's fine. Good-by, Biff dear.

In the middle of her speech, Howard Wagner, thirty-six, wheels in a small typewriter table on which is a wire-recording machine and proceeds to plug it in. This is on the left forestage. Light slowly fades on Linda as it rises on Howard. Howard is intent on threading the machine and only glances over his shoulder as Willy appears.

Willy. Pst! Pst!

Howard. Hello, Willy, come in.

Willy. Like to have a little talk with you, Howard.

Howard. Sorry to keep you waiting. I'll be with you in a minute.

Willy. What's that, Howard?

Howard. Didn't you ever see one of these? Wire recorder.
WILLY. Oh. Can we talk a minute?

HOWARD. Records things. Just got delivery yesterday. Been driving me crazy, the most terrific machine I ever saw in my life. I was up all night with it.

WILLY. What do you do with it?

HOWARD. I bought it for dictation, but you can do anything with it. Listen to this. I had it home last night. Listen to what I picked up. The first one is my daughter. Get this. (He flicks the switch and “Roll out the Barrel” is heard being whistled.) Listen to that kid whistle.

WILLY. That is lifelike, isn’t it?

HOWARD. Seven years old. Get that tone.

WILLY. Ts, ts. Like to ask a little favor if you . . .

The whistling breaks off, and the voice of HOWARD’S daughter is heard.

HIS DAUGHTER. “Now you, Daddy.”

HOWARD. She’s crazy for me! (Again the same song is whistled.) That’s me! Ha! (He winks.)

WILLY. You’re very good!

The whistling breaks off again. The machine runs silent for a moment.

HOWARD. Sh! Get this now, this is my son.

HIS SON. “The capital of Alabama is Montgomery; the capital of Arizona is Phoenix; the capital of Arkansas is Little Rock; the capital of California is Sacramento . . . (and on, and on.)

HOWARD (bolding up five fingers). Five years old, Willy!

WILLY. He’ll make an announcer some day!

HIS SON (continuing). “the capital . . . ”

HOWARD. Get that—alphabetical order! (The machine breaks off suddenly.)

Wait a minute. The maid kicked the plug out.

WILLY. It certainly is a . . .

HOWARD. Sh, for God’s sake!

HIS SON. “It’s nine o’clock, Bulova watch time. So I have to go to sleep.”

WILLY. That really is . . .

HOWARD. Wait a minute! The next is my wife.

T hey wait.

HOWARD’S VOICE. “Go on, say something.” (Pause.) “Well, you gonna talk?”

HIS WIFE. “I can’t think of anything.”

HOWARD’S VOICE. “Well, talk—it’s turning.”

HIS WIFE (shyly, beaten). “Hello.” (Silence.) “Oh, Howard, I can’t talk into this . . . ”

HOWARD (snapping the machine off). That was my wife.

WILLY. That is a wonderful machine. Can we . . .

HOWARD. I tell you, Willy, I’m gonna take my camera, and my bandsaw, and all my hobbies, and out they go. This is the most fascinating relaxation I ever found.

WILLY. I think I’ll get one myself.

HOWARD. Sure, they’re only a hundred and a half. You can’t do without it. Supposing you wanna hear Jack Benny, see? But you can’t be at home at that hour. So you tell the maid to turn the radio on when Jack Benny comes on, and this automatically goes on with the radio . . .
Willy. And when you come home you . . .

Howard. You can come home twelve o’clock, one o’clock, any time you like, and you get yourself a Coke and sit yourself down, throw the switch, and there’s Jack Benny’s program in the middle of the night!

Willy. I’m definitely going to get one. Because lots of times I’m on the road, and I think to myself, what I must be missing on the radio!

Howard. Don’t you have a radio in the car?

Willy. Well, yeah, but who ever thinks of turning it on?

Howard. Say, aren’t you supposed to be in Boston?

Willy. That’s what I want to talk to you about, Howard. You got a minute?

(He draws a chair in from the wing.)

Howard. What happened? What’re you doing here?

Willy. Well . . .

Howard. You didn’t crack up again, did you?

Willy. Oh, no. No . . .

Howard. Geez, you had me worried there for a minute. What’s the trouble?

Willy. Well, tell you the truth, Howard. I’ve come to the decision that I’d rather not travel any more.

Howard. Not travel! Well, what’ll you do?

Willy. Remember, Christmas time, when you had the party here? You said you’d try to think of some spot for me here in town.

Howard. With us?

Willy. Well, sure.

Howard. Oh, yeah, yeah. I remember. Well, I couldn’t think of anything for you, Willy.

Willy. I tell ya, Howard. The kids are all grown up, y’know. I don’t need much any more. If I could take home—well, sixty-five dollars a week, I could swing it.

Howard. Yeah, but Willy, see I . . .

Willy. I tell ya why, Howard. Speaking frankly and between the two of us, y’know—I’m just a little tired.

Howard. Oh, I could understand that, Willy. But you’re a road man, Willy, and we do a road business. We’ve only got a half-dozen salesmen on the floor here.

Willy. God knows, Howard. I never asked a favor of any man. But I was with the firm when your father used to carry you in here in his arms.

Howard. I know that, Willy, but . . .

Willy. Your father came to me the day you were born and asked me what I thought of the name Howard, may he rest in peace.

Howard. I appreciate that, Willy, but there just is no spot here for you. If I had a spot I’d slam you right in, but I just don’t have a single solitary spot.

He looks for his lighter.

Willy has picked it up and gives it to him. Pause.

Willy (with increasing anger). Howard, all I need to set my table is fifty dollars a week.

Howard. But where am I going to put you, kid?

Willy. Look, it isn’t a question of whether I can sell merchandise, is it?

Howard. No, but it’s business, kid, and everybody’s gotta pull his own weight.
Willy (desperately). Just let me tell you a story, Howard . . .

Howard. 'Cause you gotta admit, business is business.

Willy (angrily). Business is definitely business, but just listen for a minute. You don’t understand this. When I was a boy—eighteen, nineteen—I was already on the road. And there was a question in my mind as to whether selling had a future for me. Because in those days I had a yearning to go to Alaska. See, there were three gold strikes in one month in Alaska, and I felt like going out. Just for the ride, you might say.

Howard (barely interested). Don't say.

Willy. Oh, yeah, my father lived many years in Alaska. He was an adventurous man. We’ve got quite a little streak of self-reliance in our family. I thought I’d go out with my older brother and try to locate him, and maybe settle in the North with the old man. And I was almost decided to go, when I met a salesman in the Parker House. His name was Dave Singleman. And he was eighty-four years old, and he'd drummed merchandise in thirty-one states. And old Dave, he'd go up to his room, y’understand, put on his green velvet slippers—I'll never forget—and pick up his phone and call the buyers, and without ever leaving his room, at the age of eighty-four, he made his living. And when I saw that, I realized that selling was the greatest career a man could want. 'Cause what could be more satisfying than to be able to go, at the age of eighty-four, into twenty or thirty different cities, and pick up a phone, and be remembered and loved and helped by so many different people? Do you know? when he died—and by the way he died the death of a salesman, in his green velvet slippers in the smoker of the New York, New Haven and Hartford, going into Boston—when he died, hundreds of salesmen and buyers were at his funeral. Things were sad on a lotta trains for months after that. (He stands up, Howard has not looked at him.) In those days there was personality in it, Howard. There was respect, and comradeship, and gratitude in it. Today, it's all cut and dried, and there's no chance for bringing friendship to bear—or personality. You see what I mean? They don't know me any more.

Howard (moving away, to the right). That's just the thing, Willy.

Willy. If I had forty dollars a week—that’s all I’d need. Forty dollars, Howard.

Howard. Kid, I can’t take blood from a stone, I . . .

Willy (desperation is on him now). Howard, the year Al Smith was nominated, your father came to me and . . .

Howard (starting to go off). I've got to see some people, kid.

Willy (stopping him). I'm talking about your father! There were promises made across this desk! You mustn't tell me you've got people to see—I put thirty-four years into this firm, Howard, and now I can't pay my insurance! You can't eat the orange and throw the peel away—a man is not a piece of fruit! (After a pause.) Now pay attention. Your father—in 1928 I had a big year. I averaged a hundred and seventy dollars a week in commissions.

Howard (impatiently). Now, Willy, you never averaged . . .

Willy (hanging his head on the desk). I averaged a hundred and seventy dollars a week in the year of 1928! And your father came to me—or rather, I was in the office here—it was right over this desk—and he put his hand on my shoulder . . .
HOWARD (getting up). You'll have to excuse me, Willy, I gotta see some people. Pull yourself together (Going out.) I'll be back in a little while.

On HOWARD'S exit, the light on his chair grows very bright and strange.

WILLY. Pull myself together! What the hell did I say to him? My God, I was yelling at him! How could I? (WILLY breaks off, staring at the light, which occupies the chair, animating it. He approaches this chair, standing across the desk from it.) Frank, Frank, don't you remember what you told me that time? How you put your hand on my shoulder, and Frank . . . (He leans on the desk and as he speaks the dead man's name be accidentally switches on the recorder; and instantly)

HOWARD'S son. "... New York is Albany. The capital of Ohio is Cincinnati, the capital of Rhode Island is . . . " (The recitation continues.)

WILLY (leaping away with fright, shouting). Ha! Howard! Howard! Howard!

HOWARD (rushing in). What happened?

WILLY (pointing at the machine, which continues nasally, childishly, with the capital cities). Shut it off! Shut it off!

HOWARD (pulling the plug out). Look, Willy . . .

WILLY (pressing his hands to his eyes). I gotta get myself some coffee. I'll get some coffee . . .

WILLY starts to walk out. HOWARD stops him.

HOWARD (rolling up the cord). Willy, look . . .

WILLY. I'll go to Boston.

HOWARD. Willy, you can't go to Boston for us.

WILLY. Why can't I go?

HOWARD. I don't want you to represent us. I've been meaning to tell you for a long time now:

WILLY. Howard, are you firing me?

HOWARD. I think you need a good long rest, Willy.

WILLY. Howard . . .

HOWARD. And when you feel better, come back, and we'll see if we can work something out.

WILLY. But I gotta earn money, Howard. I'm in no position to . . .

HOWARD. Where are your sons? Why don't your sons give you a hand?

WILLY. They're working on a very big deal.

HOWARD. This is no time for false pride, Willy. You go to your sons and you tell them that you're tired. You've got two great boys, haven't you?

WILLY. Oh, no question, no question, but in the meantime . . .

HOWARD. Then that's that, heh?

WILLY. All right, I'll go to Boston tomorrow.

HOWARD. No, no.

WILLY. I can't throw myself on my sons. I'm not a cripple!

HOWARD. Look, kid, I'm busy this morning.

WILLY (grasping HOWARD'S arm). Howard, you've got to let me go to Boston!

HOWARD (hard, keeping himself under control). I've got a line of people to see this morning. Sit down, take five minutes, and pull yourself together, and then go home, will ya? I need the office, Willy. (He starts to go, turns, remembering the recorder; starts to push off the table holding the recorder.) Oh, yeah. Whenever you can this week, stop by and drop off the samples. You'll feel better, Willy, and then come back and we'll talk. Pull yourself together, kid, there's people outside.

Howard exits, pushing the table off left. Willy stares into space, exhausted.

Now the music is heard—Ben's music—first distantly, then closer, closer. As Willy speaks, Ben enters from the right. He carries valise and umbrella.

Willy. Oh, Ben, how did you do it? What is the answer? Did you wind up the Alaska deal already?

Willy. Ben, I've got to talk to you.

Ben (glancing at his watch). Haven't the time, William.

Willy (crossing the apron to Ben). Ben, nothing's working out. I don't know what to do.

Ben. Now, look here, William. I've bought timberland in Alaska and I need a man to look after things for me.

Willy. God, timberland! Me and my boys in those grand outdoors!

Ben. You've a new continent at your doorstep, William. Get out of these cities, they're full of talk and time payments and courts of law. Screw on your fists and you can fight for a fortune up there.

Willy. Yes, yes! Linda, Linda!

Linda enters as of old, with the wash.

Linda. Oh, you're back?

Ben. I haven't much time.

Willy. No, wait! Linda, he's got a proposition for me in Alaska.

Linda. But you've got . . . (To Ben.) He's got a beautiful job here.

Willy. But in Alaska, kid, I could . . .

Linda. You're doing well enough, Willy!

Ben (To Linda). Enough for what, my dear?

Linda (frightened of Ben and angry at him). Don't say those things to him! Enough to be happy right here, right now. (To Willy, while Ben laughs.) Why must everybody conquer the world? You're well liked, and the boys love you, and someday—(To Ben)—why, old man Wagner told him just the other day that if he keeps it up he'll be a member of the firm, didn't he, Willy?

Willy. Sure, sure. I am building something with this firm, Ben, and if a man is building something he must be on the right track, mustn't he?

Ben. What are you building? Lay your hand on it. Where is it?

Willy (hesitantly). That's true, Linda, there's nothing.

Linda. Why? (To Ben.) There's a man eighty-four years old . . .

Willy. That's right, Ben, that's right. When I look at that man I say, what is there to worry about?

Ben. Bah!

Willy. It's true, Ben. All he has to do is go into any city, pick up the phone, and he's making his living and you know why?

Ben (picking up his valise). I've got to go.

Willy (holding Ben back). Look at this boy!

Biff, in his high school sweater, enters carrying suitcase. Happy carries Biff's shoulder guards, gold helmet, and football pants.

Willy. Without a penny to his name, three great universities are begging for him, and from there the sky's the limit, because it's not what you do, Ben.
It's who you know and the smile on your face! It's contacts, Ben, contacts! The whole wealth of Alaska passes over the lunch table at the Commodore Hotel, and that's the wonder, the wonder of this country, that a man can end with diamonds here on the basis of being liked! (He turns to Biff.) And that's why when you get out on that field today it's important. Because thousands of people will be rooting for you and loving you. (To Ben, who has begun to leave.) And Ben! when he walks into a business office his name will sound out like a bell and all the doors will open to him! I've seen it, Ben, I've seen it a thousand times! You can't feel it with your hand like timber, but it's there!

BEN. Good-by, William.

WILLY. Ben, am I right? Don't you think I'm right? I value your advice.

BEN. There's a new continent at your doorstep, William. You could walk out rich! (He is gone.)

WILLY. We'll do it here, Ben! You hear me? We're gonna do it here!

Young Bernard rushes in. The gay music of the Boys is heard.

BERNARD. Oh, gee, I was afraid you left already!

WILLY. Why? What time is it?

BERNARD. It's half-past one!

WILLY. Well, come on, everybody! Ebbets Field next stop! Where's the pennants? (He rushes through the wall-line of the kitchen and out into the living room.)

LINDA (to Biff). Did you pack fresh underwear?

Biff (who has been limbering up). I want to go!

BERNARD. Biff, I'm carrying your helmet, ain't I?

HAPPY. No, I'm carrying the helmet.

BERNARD. Oh, Biff, you promised me.

HAPPY. I'm carrying the helmet.

BERNARD. How am I going to get in the locker room?

LINDA. Let him carry the shoulder guards. (She puts ber coat and bat on in the kitchen.)

BERNARD. Can I, Biff? 'Cause I told everybody I'm going to be in the locker room.

HAPPY. In Ebbets Field it's the clubhouse.

BERNARD. I meant the clubhouse. Biff!

HAPPY. Biff!

Biff (grandly, after a slight pause). Let him carry the shoulder guards.

HAPPY (as he gives Bernard the shoulder guards). Stay close to us now.

WILLY rushes in with the pennants.

WILLY (banding them out). Everybody wave when Biff comes out on the field. (Happy and Bernard run off) You set now, boy?

The music has died away.

Biff. Ready to go, Pop. Every muscle is ready.

WILLY (at the edge of the apron). You realize what this means?

Biff. That's right, Pop.

WILLY (feeling Biff's muscles). You're comin' home this afternoon captain of the All-Scholastic Championship Team of the City of New York.
BIFF. I got it, Pop. And remember, pal, when I take off my helmet, that touchdown is for you.

WILLY. Let’s go! (He is starting out, with his arm around BIFF, when CHARLEY enters, as of old, in knickers.) I got no room for you, Charley.

CHARLEY. Room? For what?

WILLY. In the car.

CHARLEY. You goin’ for a ride? I wanted to shoot some casino.

WILLY (furiously). Casino! (Incredulously.) Don’t you realize what today is?

LINDA. Oh, he knows, Willy. He’s just kidding you.

WILLY. That’s nothing to kid about!

CHARLEY. No, Linda, what’s goin’ on?

LINDA. He’s playing in Ebbets Field.

CHARLEY. Baseball in this weather?

WILLY. Don’t talk to him. Come on, come on! (He is pushing them out.)

CHARLEY. Wait a minute, didn’t you hear the news?

WILLY. What?

CHARLEY. Don’t you listen to the radio? Ebbets Field just blew up.

WILLY. You go to hell! (CHARLEY laughs. Pushing them out.) Come on, come on! We’re late.

CHARLEY (as they go). Knock a homer, Biff, knock a homer!

WILLY (the last to leave, turning to CHARLEY). I don’t think that was funny, Charley. This is the greatest day of his life.

CHARLEY. Willy, when are you going to grow up?

WILLY. Yeah, heh? When this game is over, Charley, you’ll be laughing out of the other side of your face. They’ll be calling him another Red Grange. Twenty-five thousand a year.

CHARLEY (kidding). Is that so?

WILLY. Yeah, that’s so.

CHARLEY. Well, then, I’m sorry, Willy. But tell me something.

WILLY. What?

CHARLEY. Who is Red Grange?

WILLY. Put up your hands. Goddam you, put up your hands!

CHARLEY, chuckling, shakes his head and walks away, around the left corner of the stage. WILLY follows him. The music rises to a mocking frenzy.

WILLY. Who the hell do you think you are, better than everybody else? You don’t know everything, you big, ignorant, stupid . . . Put up your hands!

Light rises, on the right side of the forestage, on a small table in the reception room of CHARLEY’s office. Traffic sounds heard. BERNARD, now mature, sits whistling to himself. A pair of tennis rackets and an old overnight bag are on the floor beside him.

WILLY (offstage). What are you walking away for? Don’t walk away! If you’re going to say something say it to my face! I know you laugh at me behind my back. You’ll laugh out of the other side of your goddam face after this game. Touchdown! Touchdown! Eighty thousand people! Touchdown! Right between the goal posts.

(BERNARD is a quiet, earnest, but self-assured young man. WILLY’s voice is coming from right upstage now. BERNARD lowers his feet off the table and listens. JENNY, his father’s secretary, enters.)
Jenny (distressed). Say, Bernard, will you go out in the hall?

Bernard. What is that noise? Who is it?

Jenny. Mr. Loman. He just got off the elevator.

Bernard (getting up). Who’s he arguing with?

Jenny. Nobody. There’s nobody with him. I can’t deal with him any more, and your father gets all upset every time he comes. I’ve got a lot of typing to do, and your father’s waiting to sign it. Will you see him?

Willy (entering). Touchdown! Touch—(He sees Jenny.) Jenny, Jenny; good to see you. How’re ya? Workin’? Or still honest?

Jenny. Fine. How’ve you been feeling?

Willy. Not much any more, Jenny. Ha, ha! (He is surprised to see the rackets.)

Bernard. Hello, Uncle Willy.

Willy (almost shocked). Bernard! Well, look who’s here! (He comes quickly, guiltily, to Bernard and warmly shakes his hand.)

Bernard. How are you? Good to see you.

Willy. What are you doing here?

Bernard. Oh, just stopped by to see Pop. Get off my feet till my train leaves. I’m going to Washington in a few minutes.

Willy. Is he in?

Bernard. Yes, he’s in his office with the accountant. Sit down.

Willy (sitting down). What’re you going to do in Washington?

Bernard. Oh, just a case I’ve got there, Willy.

Willy. That so? (Indicating the rackets.) You going to play tennis there?

Bernard. I’m staying with a friend who’s got a court.

Willy. Don’t say. His own tennis court. Must be fine people, I bet.

Bernard. They are, very nice. Dad tells me Biff’s in town.

Willy (with a big smile). Yeah, Biff’s in. Working on a very big deal, Bernard.

Bernard. What’s Biff doing?

Willy. Well, he’s been doing very big things in the West. But he decided to establish himself here. Very big. We’re having dinner. Did I hear your wife had a boy?

Bernard. That’s right. Our second.

Willy. Two boys! What do you know!

Bernard. What kind of a deal has Biff got?

Willy. Well, Bill Oliver—very big sporting-goods man—he wants Biff very badly. Called him in from the West. Long distance, carte blanche, special deliveries. Your friends have their own private tennis court?

Bernard. You still with the old firm, Willy?

Willy (after a pause). I’m—I’m overjoyed to see how you made the grade, Bernard, overjoyed. It’s an encouraging thing to see a young man really—really . . . Looks very good for Biff—very . . . (He breaks off, then.) Bernard . . . (He is so full of emotion, he breaks off again.)

Bernard. What is it, Willy?

Willy (small and alone). What—what’s the secret?

Bernard. What secret?

Willy. How—how did you? Why didn’t he ever catch on?

Bernard. I wouldn’t know that, Willy.

Willy (confidentially, desperately). You were his friend, his boyhood friend. There’s something I don’t understand about it. His life ended after that Ebbets Field game. From the age of seventeen nothing good ever happened to him.

BERNARD. He never trained himself for anything.

WILLY. But he did, he did. After high school he took so many correspondence courses. Radio mechanics; television; God knows what, and never made the slightest mark.

BERNARD (taking off his glasses). Willy, do you want to talk candidly?

WILLY (rising, faces BERNARD). I regard you as a very brilliant man, Bernard. I value your advice.

BERNARD. Oh, the hell with the advice, Willy. I couldn’t advise you. There’s just one thing I’ve always wanted to ask you. When he was supposed to graduate, and the math teacher flunked him . . .

WILLY. Oh, that son-of-a-bitch ruined his life.

BERNARD. Yeah, but, Willy, all he had to do was go to summer school and make up that subject.

WILLY. That’s right, that’s right.

BERNARD. Did you tell him not to go to summer school?

WILLY. Me? I begged him to go. I ordered him to go!

BERNARD. Then why wouldn’t he go?

WILLY. Why? Why? Bernard, that question has been trailing me like a ghost for the last fifteen years. He flunked the subject, and laid down and died like a hammer hit him!

BERNARD. Take it easy, kid.

WILLY. Let me talk to you—I got nobody to talk to. Bernard, Bernard, was it my fault? Y’see? It keeps going around in my mind, maybe I did something to him. I got nothing to give him.

BERNARD. Don’t take it so hard.

WILLY. Why did he lay down? What is the story there? You were his friend!

BERNARD. Willy, I remember, it was June, and our grades came out. And he’d flunked math.

WILLY. That son-of-a-bitch!

BERNARD. No, it wasn’t right then. Biff just got very angry, I remember, and he was ready to enroll in summer school.

WILLY (surprised). He was?

BERNARD. He wasn’t beaten by it at all. But then, Willy, he disappeared from the block for almost a month. And I got the idea that he’d gone up to New England to see you. Did he have a talk with you then?

WILLY stares in silence.

BERNARD. Willy?

WILLY (with a strong edge of resentment in his voice). Yeah, he came to Boston. What about it?

BERNARD. Well, just that when he came back—I’ll never forget this, it always mystifies me. Because I’d thought so well of Biff, even though he’d always taken advantage of me. I loved him, Willy, y’know? And he came back after that month and took his sneakers—remember those sneakers with “University of Virginia” printed on them? He was so proud of those, wore them every day. And he took them down in the cellar, and burned them up in the furnace. We had a fist fight. It lasted at least half an hour. Just the two of us, punching each other down the cellar, and crying.
right through it. I’ve often thought of how strange it was that I knew he’d given up his life. What happened in Boston, Willy?

Willy looks at him as at an intruder.

Bernard. I just bring it up because you asked me.

Willy (angrily). Nothing. What do you mean, “What happened?” What’s that got to do with anything?

Bernard. Well, don’t get sore.

Willy. What are you trying to do, blame it on me? If a boy lays down is that my fault?

Bernard. Now, Willy, don’t get . . .

Willy. Well, don’t—don’t talk to me that way! What does that mean, “What happened?”

Charley enters. He is in his vest, and he carries a bottle of bourbon.

Charley. Hey, you’re going to miss that train. (He waves the bottle.)

Bernard. Yeah, I’m going. (He takes the bottle. Thanks, Pop. (He picks up bis rackets and bag.) Good-by, Willy, and don’t worry about it. You know, “If at first you don’t succeed . . . ”

Willy. Yes, I believe in that.

Bernard. But sometimes, Willy, it’s better for a man just to walk away.

Willy. Walk away?

Bernard (after a slight pause). I guess that’s when it’s tough. (Extending bis band.) Good-by, Willy.

Willy (shaking Bernard’s hand). Good-by, boy.

Charley (an arm on Bernard’s shoulder). How do you like this kid? Gonna argue a case in front of the Supreme Court.

Bernard (protesting). Pop!

Willy (genuinely shocked, pained, and happy). No! The Supreme Court!

Bernard. I gotta run. ’By, Dad!

Charley. Knock ’em dead, Bernard!

Bernard goes off.

Willy (as Charley takes out bis wallet). The Supreme Court! And he didn’t even mention it!

Charley (counting out money on the desk). He don’t have to—he’s gonna do it.

Willy. And you never told him what to do, did you? You never took any interest in him.

Charley. My salvation is that I never took any interest in anything. There’s some money—fifty dollars. I got an accountant inside.

Willy. Charley, look . . . (with difficulty.) I got my insurance to pay. If you can manage it—I need a hundred and ten dollars.

Charley doesn’t reply for a moment; merely stops moving.

Willy. I’d draw it from my bank but Linda would know, and I . . .

Charley. Sit down, Willy.
Willy (moving toward the chair). I’m keeping an account of everything, remember. I’ll pay every penny back. (He sits.)

Charley. Now listen to me, Willy.

Willy. I want you to know I appreciate . . .

Charley (sitting down on the table). Willy, what’re you doin’? What the hell is going on in your head?

Willy. Why? I’m simply . . .

Charley. I offered you a job. You make fifty dollars a week. And I won’t send you on the road.

Willy. I’ve got a job.

Charley. Without pay? What kind of a job is a job without pay? (He rises.)

Now, look, kid, enough is enough. I’m no genius but I know when I’m being insulted.

Willy. Insulted!

Charley. Why don’t you want to work for me?

Willy. What’s the matter with you? I’ve got a job.

Charley. Then what’re you walkin’ in here every week for?

Willy (getting up). Well, if you don’t want me to walk in here . . .

Charley. I’m offering you a job.

Willy. I don’t want your goddam job!

Charley. When the hell are you going to grow up?

Willy (furiously). You big ignoramus, if you say that to me again I’ll rap you one! I don’t care how big you are! (He’s ready to fight.)

Pause.

Charley (kindly, going to him). How much do you need, Willy?

Willy. Charley, I’m strapped. I’m strapped. I don’t know what to do. I was just fired.

Charley. Howard fired you?

Charley. Willy, when’re you gonna realize that them things don’t mean anything? You named him Howard, but you can’t sell that. The only thing you got in this world is what you can sell. And the funny thing is that you’re a salesman, and you don’t know that.

Willy. I’ve always tried to think otherwise, I guess. I always felt that if a man was impressive, and well liked, that nothing . . .

Charley. Why must everybody like you? Who liked J. P. Morgan? Was he impressive? In a Turkish bath he’d look like a butcher. But with his pockets on he was very well liked. Now listen, Willy, I know you don’t like me, and nobody can say I’m in love with you, but I’ll give you a job because—just for the hell of it, put it that way. Now what do you say?

Willy. I—I just can’t work for you, Charley.

Charley. What’re you, jealous of me?

Willy. I can’t work for you, that’s all, don’t ask me why.

Charley (angered, takes out more bills). You been jealous of me all your life, you damned fool! Here, pay your insurance. (He puts the money in Willy’s band.)

Willy. I’m keeping strict accounts.

Charley. I’ve got some work to do. Take care of yourself. And pay your insurance.
Willy (moving to the right). Funny, y’know? After all the highways, and the trains, and the appointments, and the years, you end up worth more dead than alive.

Charley. Willy, nobody’s worth nothin’ dead. (After a slight pause.) Did you hear what I said?

Willy stands still, dreaming.

Charley. Willy!

Willy. Apologize to Bernard for me when you see him. I didn’t mean to argue with him. He’s a fine boy. They’re all fine boys, and they’ll end up big—all of them. Someday they’ll all play tennis together. Wish me luck, Charley. He saw Bill Oliver today.

Charley. Good luck.

Willy (on the verge of tears). Charley, you’re the only friend I got. Isn’t that a remarkable thing? (He goes out.)

Charley. Jesus!

Charley stares after him a moment and follows. All light blacks out. Suddenly raucous music is heard, and a red glow rises behind the screen at right. Stanley, a young waiter, appears, carrying a table, followed by Happy, who is carrying two chairs.

Stanley (putting the table down). That’s all right, Mr. Loman, I can handle it myself. (He turns and takes the chairs from Happy and places them at the table.)

Happy (glancing around). Oh, this is better.

Stanley. Sure, in the front there you’re in the middle of all kinds of noise. Whenever you got a party, Mr. Loman, you just tell me and I’ll put you back here. Y’know, there’s a lotta people they don’t like it private, because when they go out they like to see a lotta action around them because they’re sick and tired to stay in the house by theirself. But I know you, you ain’t from Hackensack. You know what I mean?

Happy (sitting down). So how’s it coming, Stanley?

Stanley. Ah, it’s a dog life. I only wish during the war they’d a took me in the Army. I coulda been dead by now.

Happy. My brother’s back, Stanley.

Stanley. Oh, he come back, heh? From the Far West.

Happy. Yeah, big cattle man, my brother, so treat him right. And my father’s coming too.

Stanley. Oh, your father too!

Happy. You got a couple of nice lobsters?

Stanley. Hundred percent, big.

Happy. I want them with the claws.

Stanley. Don’t worry, I don’t give you no mice. (Happy laughs.) How about some wine? It’ll put a head on the meal.

Happy. No. You remember, Stanley, that recipe I brought you from overseas?

With the champagne in it?

Stanley. Oh, yeah, sure. I still got it tacked up yet in the kitchen. But that’ll have to cost a buck apiece anyways.

Happy. That’s all right.

Stanley. What’d you, hit a number or somethin’?
HAPPY. No, it's a little celebration. My brother is—I think he pulled off a big deal today. I think we're going into business together.

STANLEY. Great! That's the best for you. Because a family business, you know what I mean—that's the best.

HAPPY. That's what I think.

STANLEY. 'Cause what's the difference? Somebody steals? It's in the family. Know what I mean? (Sotto voce.) Like this bartender here. The boss is goin' crazy what kinda leak he's got in the cash register. You put it in but it don't come out.

HAPPY (raising his beard). Sh!

STANLEY. What?

HAPPY. You notice I wasn't lookin' right or left, was I?

STANLEY. No.

HAPPY. And my eyes are closed.

STANLEY. So what's the . . . ?

HAPPY. Strudel's comin'.

STANLEY (catching on, looks around). Ah, no, there's no . . .

He breaks off as a furred, lavishly dressed girl enters and sits at the next table. Both follow her with their eyes.

STANLEY. Geez, how'd ya know?

HAPPY. I got radar or something. (Staring directly at her profile.) Ooo0ooooo . . . Stanley.

STANLEY. I think that's for you, Mr. Loman.

HAPPY. Look at that mouth. Oh, God. And the binoculars.

STANLEY. Geez, you got a life, Mr. Loman.

HAPPY. Wait on her.

STANLEY (going to the girl's table). Would you like a menu, ma'am?

GIRL. I'm expecting someone, but I'd like a . . .

HAPPY. Why don't you bring her—excuse me, miss, do you mind? I sell champagne, and I'd like you to try my brand. Bring her a champagne, Stanley.

GIRL. That's awfully nice of you.

HAPPY. Don't mention it. It's all company money. (He laughs.)

GIRL. That's a charming product to be selling, isn't it?

HAPPY. Oh, gets to be like everything else. Selling is selling, y'know.

GIRL. I suppose.

HAPPY. You don't happen to sell, do you?

GIRL. No, I don't sell.

HAPPY. Would you object to a compliment from a stranger? You ought to be on a magazine cover.

GIRL (looking at him a little archly). I have been.

STANLEY comes in with a glass of champagne.

HAPPY. What'd I say before, Stanley? You see? She's a cover girl.

STANLEY. Oh, I could see, I could see.

HAPPY (to the girl). What magazine?

GIRL. Oh, a lot of them. (She takes the drink.) Thank you.

HAPPY. You know what they say in France, don't you? “Champagne is the drink of the complexion”—Hya, Biff!

BIFF has entered and sits with HAPPY.
BIFF. Hello, kid. Sorry I’m late.
HAPPY. I just got here. Uh, Miss . . . ?
GIRL. Forsythe.
HAPPY. Miss Forsythe, this is my brother.
BIFF. Is Dad here?
HAPPY. His name is Biff. You might’ve heard of him. Great football player.
GIRL. Really? What team?
HAPPY. Are you familiar with football?
GIRL. No, I’m afraid I’m not.
HAPPY. Biff is quarterback with the New York Giants.
GIRL. Well, that is nice, isn’t it? (She drinks.)
HAPPY. Good health.
GIRL. I’m happy to meet you.
HAPPY. That’s my name. Hap. It’s really Harold, but at West Point they called me Happy.
GIRL (now really impressed). Oh, I see. How do you do? (She turns her profile.)
BIFF. Isn’t Dad coming?
HAPPY. You want her?
BIFF. Oh, I could never make that.
HAPPY. I remember the time that idea would never come into your head.
Where’s the old confidence, Biff?
BIFF. I just saw Oliver . . .
HAPPY. Wait a minute. I’ve got to see that old confidence again. Do you want her? She’s on call.
BIFF. Oh, no. (He turns to look at the GIRL.)
HAPPY. I’m telling you. Watch this. (Turning to the GIRL.) Honey? (She turns to him.) Are you busy?
GIRL. Well, I am . . . but I could make a phone call.
HAPPY. Do that, will you, honey? And see if you can get a friend. We’ll be here for a while. Biff is one of the greatest football players in the country.
GIRL (standing up). Well, I’m certainly happy to meet you.
HAPPY. Come back soon.
GIRL. I’ll try.
HAPPY. Don’t try, honey, try hard.

The GIRL exits. STANLEY follows, shaking his head in bewildered admiration.

HAPPY. Isn’t that a shame now? A beautiful girl like that? That’s why I can’t get married. There’s not a good woman in a thousand. New York is loaded with them, kid!
BIFF. Hap, look . . .
HAPPY. I told you she was on call!
BIFF (strangely unnerved). Cut it out, will ya? I want to say something to you.
HAPPY. Did you see Oliver?
BIFF. I saw him all right. Now look, I want to tell Dad a couple of things and I want you to help me.
HAPPY. What? Is he going to back you?
BIFF. Are you crazy? You’re out of your goddam head, you know that?
HAPPY. Why? What happened?
BIFF (breathlessly). I did a terrible thing today, Hap. It’s been the strangest day I ever went through. I’m all numb, I swear.

HAPPY. You mean he wouldn’t see you?

BIFF. Well, I waited six hours for him, see? All day. Kept sending my name in. Even tried to date his secretary so she’d get me to him, but no soap.

HAPPY. Because you’re not showin’ the old confidence, Biff. He remembered you, didn’t he?

BIFF (stopping HAPPY with a gesture). Finally, about five o’clock, he comes out. Didn’t remember who I was or anything. I felt like such an idiot, Hap.

HAPPY. Did you tell him my Florida idea?

BIFF. He walked away. I saw him for one minute. I got so mad I could’ve torn the walls down! How the hell did I ever get the idea I was a salesman there? I even believed myself that I’d been a salesman for him! And then he gave me one look and—I realized what a ridiculous lie my whole life has been! We’ve been talking in a dream for fifteen years. I was a shipping clerk.

HAPPY. What’d you do?

BIFF (with great tension and wonder). Well, he left, see. And the secretary went out. I was all alone in the waiting room. I don’t know what came over me, Hap. The next thing I know I’m in his office—paneled walls, everything. I can’t explain it. I—Hap. I took his fountain pen.

HAPPY. Geez, did he catch you?

BIFF. I ran out. I ran down all eleven flights. I ran and ran and ran.

HAPPY. That was an awful dumb—what’d you do that for?

BIFF (agonized). I don’t know, I just—wanted to take something, I don’t know. You gotta help me, Hap. I’m gonna tell Pop.

HAPPY. You crazy? What for?

BIFF. Hap, he’s got to understand that I’m not the man somebody lends that kind of money to. He thinks I’ve been spiting him all these years and it’s eating him up.

HAPPY. That’s just it. You tell him something nice.

BIFF. I can’t.

HAPPY. Say you got a lunch date with Oliver tomorrow.

BIFF. So what do I do tomorrow?

HAPPY. You leave the house tomorrow and come back at night and say Oliver is thinking it over. And he thinks it over for a couple of weeks, and gradually it fades away and nobody’s the worse.

BIFF. But it’ll go on forever!

HAPPY. Dad is never so happy as when he’s looking forward to something!

WILLY enters.

HAPPY. Hello, scout!

WILLY. Gee, I haven’t been here in years!

STANLEY has followed WILLY in and sets a chair for him. STANLEY starts off but HAPPY stops him.

HAPPY. Stanley!

STANLEY stands by, waiting for an order.
(going to willy with guilt, as to an invalid). Sit down, Pop. You want a drink?

Willy. Sure, I don’t mind.

Biff. Let’s get a load on.

Willy. You look worried.

Biff. N-no. (To Stanley.) Scotch all around. Make it doubles.

Stanley. Doubles, right. (He goes.)

Willy. You had a couple already, didn’t you?

Biff. Just a couple, yeah.

Willy. Well, what happened, boy? (Nodding affirmatively, with a smile.) Everything go all right?

Biff. (takes a breath, then reaches out and grasps willy’s hand). Pal . . . (He is smiling bravely, and willy is smiling too.) I had an experience today.

Happy. Terrific, Pop.

Willy. That so? What happened?

Biff. (high, slightly alcoholic, above the earth). I’m going to tell you everything from first to last. It’s been a strange day. (Silence. He looks around, composes himself as best he can, but his breath keeps breaking the rhythm of his voice.) I had to wait quite a while for him, and . . .

Willy. Oliver?

Biff. Yeah, Oliver. All day, as a matter of cold fact. And a lot of—instances—facts, Pop, facts about my life came back to me. Who was it, Pop? Who ever said I was a salesman with Oliver?

Willy. Well, you were.

Biff. No, Dad, I was a shipping clerk.

Willy. But you were practically . . .

Biff. (with determination). Dad, I don’t know who said it first, but I was never a salesman for Bill Oliver.

Willy. What’re you talking about?

Biff. Let’s hold on to the facts tonight, Pop. We’re not going to get anywhere bullin’ around. I was a shipping clerk.

Willy (angrily). All right, now listen to me . . .

Biff. Why don’t you let me finish?

Willy. I’m not interested in stories about the past or any crap of that kind because the woods are burning, boys, you understand? There’s a big blaze going on all around. I was fired today.

Biff (shocked). How could you be?

Willy. I was fired, and I’m looking for a little good news to tell your mother, because the woman has waited and the woman has suffered. The gist of it is that I haven’t got a story left in my head, Biff. So don’t give me a lecture about facts and aspects. I am not interested. Now what’ve you got to say to me?

Stanley enters with three drinks. They wait until be leaves.

Willy. Did you see Oliver?

Biff. Jesus, Dad!

Willy. You mean you didn’t go up there?

Happy. Sure he went up there.

Biff. I did. I—saw him. How could they fire you?

Willy (on the edge of his chair). What kind of a welcome did he give you?

Biff. He won’t even let you work on commission?
WILLY. I’m out! (Driving.) So tell me, he gave you a warm welcome?

HAPPY. Sure, Pop, sure!

BIFF (driven). Well, it was kind of . . .

WILLY. I was wondering if he’d remember you. (To HAPPY.) Imagine, man doesn’t see him for ten, twelve years and gives him that kind of a welcome!

HAPPY. Damn right!

BIFF (trying to return to the offensive). Pop, look . . .

WILLY. You know why he remembered you, don’t you? Because you impressed him in those days.

BIFF. Let’s talk quietly and get this down to the facts, huh?

WILLY (as though BIFF had been interrupting). Well, what happened? It’s great news, Biff. Did he take you into his office or’d you talk in the waiting room?

BIFF. Well, he came in, see, and . . .

WILLY (with a big smile). What’d he say? Betcha he threw his arm around you.

BIFF. Well, he kinda . . .

WILLY. He’s a fine man. (To HAPPY.) Very hard man to see, y’know.

HAPPY (agreeing). Oh, I know.

WILLY (to BIFF). Is that where you had the drinks?

BIFF. Yeah, he gave me a couple of—no, no!

HAPPY (cutting in). He told him my Florida idea.

WILLY. Don’t interrupt. (To BIFF.) How’d he react to the Florida idea?

BIFF. Dad, will you give me a minute to explain?

WILLY. I’ve been waiting for you to explain since I sat down here! What happened? He took you into his office and what?

BIFF. Well—I talked. And—and he listened, see.

WILLY. Famous for the way he listens, y’know. What was his answer?

BIFF. His answer was—(He breaks off, suddenly angry.) Dad, you’re not letting me tell you what I want to tell you!

WILLY (accusing, angered). You didn’t see him, did you?

BIFF. I did see him!

WILLY. What’d you insult him or something? You insulted him, didn’t you?

BIFF. Listen, will you let me out of it, will you just let me out of it!

HAPPY. What the hell!

WILLY. Tell me what happened!

BIFF (to HAPPY). I can’t talk to him!

A single trumpet note jars the ear. The light of green leaves stains the house, which holds the air of night and a dream. YOUNG BERNARD enters and knocks on the door of the house.

YOUNG BERNARD (frantically). Mrs. Loman, Mrs. Loman!

HAPPY. Tell him what happened!

BIFF (to HAPPY.) Shut up and leave me alone!

WILLY. No, no! You had to go and flunk math!

BIFF. What math? What’re you talking about?

YOUNG BERNARD. Mrs. Loman, Mrs. Loman!

LINDA appears in the house, as of old.

WILLY (wildly). Math, math, math!
BIFF. Take it easy, Pop!

YOUNG BERNARD. Mrs. Loman!

WILLY (furiously). If you hadn’t flunked you’d’ve been set by now!

BIFF. Now, look, I’m gonna tell you what happened, and you’re going to listen to me.

YOUNG BERNARD. Mrs. Loman!

BIFF. I waited six hours . . .

HAPPY. What the hell are you saying?

BIFF. I kept sending in my name but he wouldn’t see me. So finally he . . . (He continues unheard as light fades low on the restaurant.)

YOUNG BERNARD. Biff flunked math!

LINDA. No!

YOUNG BERNARD. Birnbaum flunked him! They won’t graduate him!

LINDA. But they have to. He’s gotta go to the university. Where is he? Biff! Biff!

YOUNG BERNARD. No, he left. He went to Grand Central.

LINDA. Grand—You mean he went to Boston!

YOUNG BERNARD. Is Uncle Willy in Boston?

LINDA. Oh, maybe Willy can talk to the teacher. Oh, the poor, poor boy!

Light on house area snaps out.

BIFF (at the table, now audible, holding up a gold fountain pen). . . so I’m washed up with Oliver, you understand? Are you listening to me?

WILLY (at a loss). Yeah, sure. If you hadn’t flunked . . .

BIFF. Flunked what? What’re you talking about?

WILLY. Don’t blame everything on me! I didn’t flunk math—you did! What pen?

HAPPY. That was awful dumb, Biff, a pen like that is worth—

WILLY (seeing the pen for the first time). You took Oliver’s pen?

BIFF (weakening). Dad, I just explained it to you.

WILLY. You stole Bill Oliver’s fountain pen!

BIFF. I didn’t exactly steal it! That’s just what I’ve been explaining to you!

HAPPY. He had it in his hand and just then Oliver walked in, so he got nervous and stuck it in his pocket!

WILLY. My God, Biff!

BIFF. I never intended to do it, Dad!

OPERATOR’S VOICE. Standish Arms, good evening!

WILLY (shouting). I’m not in my room!

BIFF (frightened). Dad, what’s the matter? (He and HAPPY stand up.)

OPERATOR. Ringing Mr. Loman for you!

WILLY. I’m not there, stop it!

BIFF (barricaded, gets down on one knee before WILLY). Dad, I’ll make good, I’ll make good. (WILLY tries to get to his feet. BIFF holds him down.) Sit down now.

WILLY. No, you’re no good, you’re no good for anything.

BIFF. I am, Dad, I’ll find something else, you understand? Now don’t worry about anything. (He holds up WILLY’s face.) Talk to me, Dad.

OPERATOR. Mr. Loman does not answer. Shall I page him?

WILLY (attempting to stand, as though to rush and silence the OPERATOR). No, no, no!

HAPPY. He’ll strike something, Pop.
WILLY. No, no . . .

BIFF (desperately, standing over WILLY). Pop, listen! Listen to me! I’m telling you something good. Oliver talked to his partner about the Florida idea. You listening? He—he talked to his partner, and he came to me . . . I’m going to be all right, you hear? Dad, listen to me, he said it was just a question of the amount!

WILLY. Then you . . . got it?

HAPPY. He’s gonna be terrific, Pop!

WILLY (trying to stand). Then you got it, haven’t you? You got it! You got it! BIFF (agonized, holds WILLY down). No, no. Look, Pop. I’m supposed to have lunch with them tomorrow. I’m just telling you this so you’ll know that I can still make an impression, Pop. And I’ll make good somewhere, but I can’t go tomorrow, see.

WILLY. Why not? You simply . . .

BIFF. But the pen, Pop!

WILLY. You give it to him and tell him it was an oversight!

HAPPY. Sure, have lunch tomorrow!

BIFF. I can’t say that . . .

WILLY. You were doing a crossword puzzle and accidentally used his pen!

BIFF. Listen, kid, I took those balls years ago, now I walk in with his fountain pen? That clinches it, don’t you see? I can’t face him like that! I’ll try elsewhere.

PAGE’S VOICE. Paging Mr. Loman!

WILLY. Don’t you want to be anything?

BIFF. Pop, how can I go back?

WILLY. You don’t want to be anything, is that what’s behind it?

BIFF (now angry at WILLY for not crediting his sympathy). Don’t take it that way! You think it was easy walking into that office after what I’d done to him? A team of horses couldn’t have dragged me back to Bill Oliver!

WILLY. Then why’d you go?

BIFF. Why did I go? Why did I go! Look at you! Look at what’s become of you!

Off left, THE WOMAN laughs.

WILLY. Biff, you’re going to go to that lunch tomorrow, or . . .

BIFF. I can’t go. I’ve got no appointment!

HAPPY. Biff, for . . . !

WILLY. Are you spiting me?

BIFF. Don’t take it that way! Goddammit!

WILLY (strikes BIFF and falters away from the table). You rotten little louse! Are you spiting me?

THE WOMAN. Someone’s at the door, Willy!

BIFF. I’m no good, can’t you see what I am?

HAPPY (separating them). Hey, you’re in a restaurant! Now cut it out, both of you! (The girls enter) Hello, girls, sit down.

THE WOMAN laughs, off left.

MISS FORSYTHE. I guess we might as well. This is Letta.

THE WOMAN. Willy, are you going to wake up?

BIFF (ignoring WILLY). How’re ya, miss, sit down. What do you drink?

MISS FORSYTHE. Letta might not be able to stay long.
LETTA. I gotta get up very early tomorrow. I got jury duty. I’m so excited!
Were you fellows ever on a jury?
BIFF. No, but I been in front of them! (The girls laugh.) This is my father.
LETTA. Isn’t he cute? Sit down with us, Pop.
HAPPY. Sit him down, Biff!
BIFF (going to him). Come on, slugger, drink us under the table. To hell with it! Come on, sit down, pal.

_On Biff’s last insistence, Willy is about to sit._

THE WOMAN (now urgently). Willy, are you going to answer the door!

THE WOMAN’s call pulls Willy back. He starts right, befuddled.

BIFF. Hey, where are you going?
WILLY. Open the door.
BIFF. The door?
WILLY. The washroom . . . the door . . . where’s the door?
BIFF (leading Willy to the left). Just go straight down.

Willy moves left.

THE WOMAN. Willy, Willy, are you going to get up, get up, get up, get up?
Willy exits left.

LETTA. I think it’s sweet you bring your daddy along.
MISS FORSYTHE. Oh, he isn’t really your father!
BIFF (at left, turning to her resentfully). Miss Forsythe, you’ve just seen a prince walk by. A fine, troubled prince. A hardworking, unappreciated prince. A pal, you understand? A good companion. Always for his boys.
LETTA. That’s so sweet.
HAPPY. Well, girls, what’s the program? We’re wasting time. Come on, Biff. Gather round. Where would you like to go?
BIFF. Why don’t you do something for him?
HAPPY. Me!
BIFF. Don’t you give a damn for him, Hap?
HAPPY. What’re you talking about? I’m the one who . . .
BIFF. I sense it, you don’t give a good goddam about him. (He takes the rolled-up hose from his pocket and puts it on the table in front of Happy.) Look what I found in the cellar, for Christ’s sake. How can you bear to let it go on?
HAPPY. Me? Who goes away? Who runs off and . . .
BIFF. Yeah, but he doesn’t mean anything to you. You could help him—I can’t! Don’t you understand what I’m talking about? He’s going to kill himself, don’t you know that?
HAPPY. Don’t I know it! Me!
BIFF. Hap, help him! Jesus . . . help him . . . Help me, help me, I can’t bear to look at his face! (Ready to weep, he hurries out, up right.)
HAPPY (starting after him). Where are you going?
MISS FORSYTHE. What’s he so mad about?
HAPPY. Come on, girls, we’ll catch up with him.
MISS FORSYTHE (as Happy pushes her out). Say, I don’t like that temper of his!
HAPPY. He’s just a little overstrung, he’ll be all right!
WILLY (off left, as the Woman laughs). Don’t answer! Don’t answer!
LETTA. Don't you want to tell your father . . .
HAPPY. No, that's not my father. He's just a guy. Come on, we'll catch Biff, and, honey, we're going to paint this town! Stanley, where's the check! Hey, Stanley!

They exit. STANLEY looks toward left.

STANLEY (calling to HAPPY indignantly). Mr. Loman! Mr. Loman!

STANLEY picks up a chair and follows them off. Knocking is heard off left.

THE WOMAN enters, laughing. WILLY follows her. She is in a black slip; he is buttoning his shirt. Raw; sensuous music accompanies their speech.

WILLY. Will you stop laughing? Will you stop?

THE WOMAN. Aren't you going to answer the door? He'll wake the whole hotel.

WILLY. I'm not expecting anybody.

THE WOMAN. Why don't you have another drink, honey, and stop being so damn self-centered?

WILLY. I'm so lonely.

THE WOMAN. You know you ruined me, Willy? From now on, whenever you come to the office, I'll see that you go right through to the buyers. No waiting at my desk anymore, Willy. You ruined me.

WILLY. That's nice of you to say that.

THE WOMAN. Gee, you are self-centered! Why so sad? You are the saddest, self-centeredest soul I ever did see-saw. (She laughs. He kisses her.) Come on inside, drummer boy. It's silly to be dressing in the middle of the night. (As knocking is heard.) Aren't you going to answer the door?

WILLY. They're knocking on the wrong door.

THE WOMAN. But I felt the knocking. And he heard us talking in here. Maybe the hotel's on fire!

WILLY (his terror rising). It's a mistake.

THE WOMAN. Then tell him to go away!

WILLY. There's nobody there.

THE WOMAN. It's getting on my nerves, Willy. There's somebody standing out there and it's getting on my nerves!

WILLY (pushing her away from him). All right, stay in the bathroom here, and don't come out. I think there's a law in Massachusetts about it, so don't come out. It may be that new room clerk. He looked very mean. So don't come out. It's a mistake, there's no fire.

The knocking is heard again. He takes a few steps away from her, and she vanishes into the wing. The light follows him, and now he is facing YOUNG BIFF, who carries a suitcase. BIFF steps toward him. The music is gone.

BIFF. Why didn't you answer?

WILLY. Biff! What are you doing in Boston?

BIFF. Why didn't you answer? I've been knocking for five minutes, I called you on the phone . . .

WILLY. I just heard you. I was in the bathroom and had the door shut. Did anything happen home?

BIFF. Dad—I let you down.

WILLY. What do you mean?
BIFF. Dad . . .
WILLY. Biffo, what's this about? (Putting his arm around BIFF.) Come on, let's go downstairs and get you a malted.

BIFF. Dad, I flunked math.
WILLY. Not for the term?
BIFF. The term. I haven't got enough credits to graduate.
WILLY. You mean to say Bernard wouldn't give you the answers?
BIFF. He did, he tried, but I only got a sixty-one.
WILLY. And they wouldn't give you four points?
BIFF. Birnbaum refused absolutely. I begged him, Pop, but he won't give me those points. You gotta talk to him before they close the school. Because if he saw the kind of man you are, and you just talked to him in your way, I'm sure he'd come through for me. The class came right before practice, see, and I didn't go enough. Would you talk to him? He'd like you, Pop. You know the way you could talk.

WILLY. You're on. We'll drive right back.
BIFF. Oh, Dad, good work! I'm sure he'll change it for you!
WILLY. Go downstairs and tell the clerk I'm checkin' out. Go right down.

BIFF. Somebody in there?
WILLY. No, that was next door.

THE WOMAN laughs offstage.

BIFF. Somebody got in your bathroom!
WILLY. No, it's the next room, there's a party . . .

THE WOMAN (enters, laughing; she lisps this). Can I come in? There's something in the bathtub, Willy, and it's moving!

WILLY looks at BIFF, who is staring open-mouthed and horrified at THE WOMAN.

WILLY. Ah—you better go back to your room. They must be finished painting by now. They're painting her room so I let her take a shower here. Go back, go back . . . (He pushes her)

THE WOMAN (resisting). But I've got to get dressed, Willy, I can't . . .
WILLY. Get out of here! Go back, go back . . . (Suddenly striving for the ordinary.) This is Miss Francis, Biff, she's a buyer. They're painting her room. Go back, Miss Francis, go back . . .

THE WOMAN. But my clothes, I can't go out naked in the hall!
WILLY (pushing her offstage). Get outa here! Go back, go back!

(BIFF slowly sits down on his suitcase as the argument continues offstage.)
THE WOMAN. Where's my stockings? You promised me stockings, Willy!
WILLY. I have no stockings here!
THE WOMAN. You had two boxes of size nine sheers for me, and I want them!
WILLY. Here, for God's sake, will you get outa here!
THE WOMAN (enters holding a box of stockings). I just hope there's nobody in the hall. That's all I hope. (To BIFF.) Are you football or baseball?
BIFF. Football.
THE WOMAN (angry, humiliated). That's me too. G'night. (She snatches her clothes from WILLY, and walks out.)
WILLY (after a pause). Well, better get going. I want to get to the school first thing in the morning. Get my suits out of the closet. I'll get my valise.
(BIFF doesn't move.) What's the matter? (BIFF remains motionless, tears falling.) She's a buyer. Buys for J. H. Simmons. She lives down the hall—they're painting. You don't imagine—(He breaks off. After a pause.) Now listen, pal, she's just a buyer. She sees merchandise in her room and they have to keep it looking just so . . . (Pause. Assuming command.) All right, get my suits. (BIFF doesn't move.) Now stop crying and do as I say. I gave you an order. Biff, I gave you an order! Is that what you do when I give you an order? How dare you cry! (Putting his arm around BIFF.) Now look, Biff, when you grow up you'll understand about these things. You mustn't—you mustn't overemphasize a thing like this. I'll see Birnbaum first thing in the morning.
BIFF. Never mind.
WILLY (getting down beside BIFF). Never mind! He's going to give you those points. I'll see to it.
BIFF. He wouldn't listen to you.
WILLY. He certainly will listen to me. You need those points for the U. of Virginia.
BIFF. I'm not going there.
WILLY. Heh? If I can't get him to change that mark you'll make it up in summer school. You've got all summer to . . .
BIFF (bis weeping breaking from him). Dad . . .
WILLY (infected by it). Oh, my boy . . .
BIFF. Dad . . .
WILLY. She's nothing to me, Biff. I was lonely, I was terribly lonely.
BIFF. You—you gave her Mama's stockings! (His tears break through and he rises to go.)
WILLY (grabbing for BIFF). I gave you an order!
BIFF. Don't touch me, you—liar!
WILLY. Apologize for that!
BIFF. You fake! You phony little fake! You fake! (Overcome, be turns quickly and weeping fully goes out with bis suitcase. WILLY is left on the floor on bis knees.)
WILLY. I gave you an order! Biff, come back here or I'll beat you! Come back here! I'll whip you!
STANLEY comes quickly in from the right and stands in front of WILLY.
WILLY (shouts at STANLEY). I gave you an order . . .
STANLEY. Hey, let's pick it up, pick it up, Mr. Loman. (He helps WILLY to bis feet.) Your boys left with the chippies. They said they'll see you home.
A second waiter watches some distance away.

WILLY. But we were supposed to have dinner together.

Music is heard, WILLY’s theme.

STANLEY. Can you make it?

WILLY. I’ll—sure, I can make it. (Suddenly concerned about his clothes.) Do I—I look all right?

STANLEY. Sure, you look all right. (He flicks a speck off WILLY’s lapel.)

WILLY. Here—here’s a dollar.

STANLEY. Oh, your son paid me. It’s all right.

WILLY (putting it in STANLEY’s hand). No, take it. You’re a good boy.

STANLEY. Oh, no, you don’t have to . . .

WILLY. Here—here’s some more, I don’t need it any more. (After a slight pause.) Tell me—is there a seed store in the neighborhood?

STANLEY. Seeds? You mean like to plant?

As WILLY turns, STANLEY slips the money back into his jacket pocket.

WILLY. Yes. Carrots, peas . . .

STANLEY. Well, there’s hardware stores on Sixth Avenue, but it may be too late now.

WILLY (anxiously). Oh, I’d better hurry. I’ve got to get some seeds. (He starts off to the right.) I’ve got to get some seeds, right away. Nothing’s planted. I don’t have a thing in the ground.

WILLY hurries out as the light goes down. STANLEY moves over to the right after him, watches him off. The other waiter has been staring at WILLY.

STANLEY (to the waiter). Well, whatta you looking at?

The waiter picks up the chairs and moves off right. STANLEY takes the table and follows him. The light fades on this area. There is a long pause, the sound of the flute coming over. The light gradually rises on the kitchen, which is empty. HAPPY appears at the door of the house, followed by BIFF. HAPPY is carrying a large bunch of long-stemmed roses. He enters the kitchen, looks around for LINDA. Not seeing her, he turns to BIFF, who is just outside the house door, and makes a gesture with his hands, indicating “Not here, I guess.” He looks into the living room and freezes. Inside, LINDA, unseen, is seated, WILLY’s coat on her lap. She rises ominously and quietly and moves toward HAPPY, who backs up into the kitchen, afraid.

HAPPY. Hey, what’re you doing up? (LINDA says nothing but moves toward him implacably.) Where’s Pop? (He keeps backing to the right, and now LINDA is in full view in the doorway to the living room.) Is he sleeping?

LINDA. Where were you?

HAPPY (trying to laugh it off). We met two girls, Mom, very fine types. Here, we brought you some flowers. (Offering them to her.) Put them in your room, Ma.

She knocks them to the floor at BIFF’s feet. He has now come inside and closed the door behind him. She stares at BIFF, silent.
HAPPY. Now what’d you do that for? Mom, I want you to have some flowers . . .

LINDA (cutting HAPPY off, violently to BIFF). Don’t you care whether he lives or dies?

HAPPY (going to the stairs). Come upstairs, Biff.

BIFF (with a flare of disgust, to HAPPY). Go away from me! (To LINDA.) What do you mean, lives or dies? Nobody’s dying around here, pal.

LINDA. Get out of my sight! Get out of here!

BIFF. I wanna see the boss.

LINDA. You’re not going near him!

BIFF. Where is he? (He moves into the living room and LINDA follows.)

LINDA (shouting after BIFF). You invite him for dinner. He looks forward to it all day—(Biff appears in his parents’ bedroom, looks around, and exits)—and then you desert him there. There’s no stranger you’d do that to!

HAPPY. Why? He had a swell time with us. Listen, when I—(LINDA comes back into the kitchen)—desert him I hope I don’t outlive the day!

LINDA. Get out of here!

HAPPY. Now look, Mom . . .

LINDA. Did you have to go to women tonight? You and your lousy rotten whores!

BIFF re-enters the kitchen.

HAPPY. Mom, all we did was follow Biff around trying to cheer him up! (To BIFF.) Boy, what a night you gave me!

LINDA. Get out of here, both of you, and don’t come back! I don’t want you tormenting him any more. Go on now, get your things together! (To BIFF.) You can sleep in his apartment. (She starts to pick up the flowers and stops herself.) Pick up this stuff, I’m not your maid any more. Pick it up, you bum, you!

HAPPY turns his back to her in refusal. BIFF slowly moves over and gets down on his knees, picking up the flowers.

LINDA. You’re a pair of animals! Not one, not another living soul would have had the cruelty to walk out on that man in a restaurant!

BIFF (not looking at her). Is that what he said?

LINDA. He didn’t have to say anything. He was so humiliated he nearly limped when he came in.

HAPPY. But, Mom, he had a great time with us . . .

BIFF (cutting him off violently). Shut up!

Without another word, HAPPY goes upstairs.

LINDA. You! You didn’t even go in to see if he was all right!

BIFF (still on the floor in front of LINDA, the flowers in his hand; with self-loathing). No. Didn’t. Didn’t do a damned thing. How do you like that, heh? Left him babbling in a toilet.

LINDA. You louse. You . . .

BIFF. Now you hit it on the nose! (He gets up, throws the flowers in the wastebasket.) The scum of the earth, and you’re looking at him!

LINDA. Get out of here!
BIFF. I gotta talk to the boss, Mom. Where is he?
LINDA. You’re not going near him. Get out of this house!
BIFF (with absolute assurance, determination). No. We’re gonna have an abrupt conversation, him and me.
LINDA. You’re not talking to him.

Hammering is heard from outside the house, off right. BIFF turns toward the noise.

LINDA (suddenly pleading). Will you please leave him alone?
BIFF. What’s he doing out there?
LINDA. He’s planting the garden!
BIFF (quietly). Now? Oh, my God!

BIFF moves outside, LINDA following. The light dies down on them and comes up on the center of the apron as WILLY walks into it. He is carrying a flashlight, a hoe, and a handful of seed packets. He raps the top of the hoe sharply to fix it firmly, and then moves to the left, measuring off the distance with his foot. He holds the flashlight to look at the seed packets, reading off the instructions. He is in the blue of night.

WILLY. Carrots . . . quarter-inch apart. Rows . . . one-foot rows. (He measures it off.) One foot. (He puts down a package and measures off.) Beets. (He puts down another package and measures again.) Lettuce. (He reads the package, puts it down.) One foot—(He breaks off as BEN appears at the right and moves slowly down to him.) What a proposition, ts, ts. Terrific, terrific. ’Cause she’s suffered, Ben, the woman has suffered. You understand me? A man can’t go out the way he came in, Ben, a man has got to add up to something. You can’t, you can’t—(BEN moves toward him as though to interrupt.) You gotta consider now. Don’t answer so quick. Remember, it’s a guaranteed twenty-thousand-dollar proposition. Now look, Ben, I want you to go through the ins and outs of this thing with me. I’ve got nobody to talk to, Ben, and the woman has suffered, you hear me?
BEN (standing still, considering). What’s the proposition?
WILLY. It’s twenty thousand dollars on the barrelhead. Guaranteed, gilt-edged, you understand?
BEN. You don’t want to make a fool of yourself. They might not honor the policy.
WILLY. How can they dare refuse? Didn’t I work like a coolie to meet every premium on the nose? And now they don’t pay off? Impossible!
BEN. It’s called a cowardly thing, William.
WILLY. Why? Does it take more guts to stand here the rest of my life ringing up a zero?
BEN (yielding). That’s a point, William. (He moves, thinking, turns.) And twenty thousand—that is something one can feel with the hand, it is there.
WILLY (now assured, with rising power). Oh, Ben, that’s the whole beauty of it! I see it like a diamond, shining in the dark, hard and rough, that I can pick up and touch in my hand. Not like—like an appointment! This would not be another damned-fool appointment, Ben, and it changes all the aspects. Because he thinks I’m nothing, see, and so he spites me.
But the funeral . . . (Straightening up.) Ben, that funeral will be massive! They’ll come from Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire! All the old-timers with the strange license plates—that boy will be thunderstruck, Ben, because he never realized—I am known! Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey—I am known, Ben, and he’ll see it with his eyes once and for all. He’ll see what I am, Ben! He’s in for a shock, that boy!

BEN (coming down to the edge of the garden). He’ll call you a coward.

WILLY (suddenly fearful). No, that would be terrible.

BEN. Yes. And a damned fool.

WILLY. No, no, he mustn’t, I won’t have that! (He is broken and desperate.)

BEN. He’ll hate you, William.

The gay music of the Boys is heard.

WILLY. Oh, Ben, how do we get back to all the great times? Used to be so full of light, and comradeship, the sleigh-riding in winter, and the ruddiness on his cheeks. And always some kind of good news coming up, always something nice coming up ahead. And never even let me carry the valises in the house, and simonizing, simonizing that little red car! Why, why can’t I give him something and not have him hate me?

BEN. Let me think about it. (He glances at his watch.) I still have a little time. Remarkable proposition, but you’ve got to be sure you’re not making a fool of yourself.

BEN drifts off upstage and goes out of sight. BIFF comes down from the left.

WILLY (suddenly conscious of BIFF, turns and looks up at him, then begins picking up the packages of seeds in confusion). Where the hell is that seed? (Indignantly.) You can’t see nothing out here! They boxed in the whole goddam neighborhood!

BIFF. There are people all around here. Don’t you realize that?

WILLY. I’m busy. Don’t bother me.

BIFF (taking the hoe from WILLY). I’m saying good-by to you, Pop. (WILLY looks at him, silent, unable to move.) I’m not coming back any more.

WILLY. You’re not going to see Oliver tomorrow?

BIFF. I’ve got no appointment, Dad.

WILLY. He put his arm around you, and you’ve got no appointment?

BIFF. Pop, get this now, will you? Everyday I’ve left it’s been a—fight that sent me out of here. Today I realized something about myself and I tried to explain it to you and I—I think I’m just not smart enough to make any sense out of it for you. To hell with whose fault it is or anything like that. (He takes WILLY’ s arm.) Let’s just wrap it up, heh? Come on in, we’ll tell Mom. (He gently tries to pull WILLY to left.)

WILLY (frozen, immobile, with guilt in his voice). No, I don’t want to see her.

BIFF. Come on! (He pulls again, and WILLY tries to pull away.)

WILLY (highly nervous). No, no, I don’t want to see her.

BIFF (tries to look into WILLY’s face, as if to find the answer there). Why don’t you want to see her?

WILLY (more bardsly now). Don’t bother me, will you?
Biff. What do you mean, you don’t want to see her? You don’t want them calling you yellow, do you? This isn’t your fault; it’s me, I’m a bum. Now come inside! (Willy strains to get away.) Did you hear what I said to you?

Willy pulls away and quickly goes by himself into the house. Biff follows.

Linda (to Willy). Did you plant, dear?

Biff (at the door; to Linda). All right, we had it out. I’m going and I’m not writing any more.

Linda (going to Willy in the kitchen). I think that’s the best way, dear. ’Cause there’s no use drawing it out, you’ll just never get along.

Willy doesn’t respond.

Biff. People ask where I am and what I’m doing, you don’t know, and you don’t care. That way it’ll be off your mind and you can start brightening up again. All right? That clears it, doesn’t it? (Willy is silent, and Biff goes to him.) You gonna wish me luck, scout? (He extends his hand.) What do you say?

Linda. Shake his hand, Willy.

Willy (turning to her; seething with hurt). There’s no necessity—to mention the pen at all, y’know.

Biff (gently). I’ve got no appointment, Dad.

Willy (erupting fiercely). He put his arm around . . .?

Biff. Dad, you’re never going to see what I am, so what’s the use of arguing? If I strike oil I’ll send you a check. Meantime forget I’m alive.

Linda (to Linda). Spite, see?

Biff. Shake hands, Dad.

Willy. Not my hand.

Biff. I was hoping not to go this way.

Willy. Well, this is the way you’re going. Good-by.

Biff looks at him a moment, then turns sharply and goes to the stairs.

Willy (stops him with). May you rot in hell if you leave this house!

Biff (turning). Exactly what is it that you want from me?

Willy. I want you to know, on the train, in the mountains, in the valleys, wherever you go, that you cut down your life for spite!

Biff. No, no.

Willy. Spite, spite, is the word of your undoing! And when you’re down and out, remember what did it. When you’re rotting somewhere beside the railroad tracks, remember, and don’t you dare blame it on me!

Biff. I’m not blaming it on you!

Willy. I won’t take the rap for this, you hear?

Happy comes down the stairs and stands on the bottom step, watching.

Biff. That’s just what I’m telling you!

Willy (sinking into a chair at a table, with full accusation). You’re trying to put a knife in me—don’t think I don’t know what you’re doing!

Biff. All right, phony! Then let’s lay it on the line. (He whips the rubber tube out of his pocket and puts it on the table.)

Happy. You crazy . . .
LINDA. Biff! (She moves to grab the hose, but Biff holds it down with his hand.)

BIFF. Leave it there! Don’t move it!

WILLY (not looking at it). What is that?

BIFF. You know goddam well what that is.

WILLY (caged, wanting to escape). I never saw that.

BIFF. You saw it. The mice didn’t bring it into the cellar! What is this supposed to do, make a hero out of you? This supposed to make me sorry for you?

WILLY. Never heard of it.

BIFF. There’ll be no pity for you, you hear it? No pity!

WILLY (to LINDA). You hear the spite!

BIFF. No, you’re going to hear the truth—what you are and what I am!

LINDA. Stop it!

WILLY. Spite!

HAPPY (coming down toward Biff). You cut it now!

BIFF (to Happy). The man don’t know who we are! The man is gonna know!

(To WILLY.) We never told the truth for ten minutes in this house!

HAPPY. We always told the truth!

BIFF (turning on him). You big blow, are you the assistant buyer? You’re one of the two assistants to the assistant, aren’t you?

HAPPY. You’re practically full of it! We all are! and I’m through with it. (To WILLY.) Now hear this, Willy, this is me.

WILLY. I know you!

BIFF. You know why I had no address for three months? I stole a suit in Kansas City and I was in jail. (To LINDA, who is sobbing.) Stop crying. I’m through with it.

LINDA turns away from them, her hands covering her face.

WILLY. I suppose that’s my fault!

BIFF. I stole myself out of every good job since high school!

WILLY. And whose fault is that?

BIFF. And I never got anywhere because you blew me so full of hot air I could never stand taking orders from anybody! That’s whose fault it is!

WILLY. I hear that!

LINDA. Don’t, Biff!

BIFF. It’s goddam time you heard that! I had to be boss big shot in two weeks, and I’m through with it!

WILLY. Then hang yourself! For spite, hang yourself!

BIFF. No! Nobody’s hanging himself, Willy! I ran down eleven flights with a pen in my hand today. And suddenly I stopped, you hear me? And in the middle of that office building, do you hear this? I stopped in the middle of that building and I saw—the sky. I saw the things that I love in this world. The work and the food and time to sit and smoke. And I looked at the pen and said to myself, what the hell am I grabbing this for? Why am I trying to become what I don’t want to be? What am I doing in an office, making a contemptuous, begging fool of myself, when all I want is out there, waiting for me the minute I say I know who I am? Why can’t I say that, Willy? (He tries to make Willy face him, but Willy pulls away and moves to the left.)
Willy (with hatred, threateningly). The door of your life is wide open!
Biff. Pop! I’m a dime a dozen, and so are you!
Willy (turning on him now in an uncontrolled outburst). I am not a dime a dozen! I am Willy Loman, and you are Biff Loman!

Biff starts for Willy, but is blocked by Happy. In his fury, Biff seems on the verge of attacking his father.

Biff. I am not a leader of men, Willy, and neither are you. You were never anything but a hard-working drummer who landed in the ash can like all the rest of them! I’m one dollar an hour, Willy! I tried seven states and couldn’t raise it. A buck an hour! Do you gather my meaning? I’m not bringing home any prizes any more, and you’re going to stop waiting for me to bring them home!

Willy (directly to Biff). You vengeful, spiteful mutt!

Biff breaks from Happy. Willy, in fright, starts up the stairs. Biff grabs him.

Biff (at the peak of his fury). Pop! I’m nothing! I’m nothing, Pop. Can’t you understand that? There’s no spite in it any more. I’m just what I am, that’s all.

Biff’s fury has spent itself and he breaks down, sobbing, holding on to Willy; who dumbly fumbles for Biff’s face.

Willy (astonished). What’re you doing? What’re you doing? (To Linda.) Why is he crying?

Biff (crying, broken). Will you let me go, for Christ’s sake? Will you take that phony dream and burn it before something happens? (Struggling to contain himself he pulls away and moves to the stairs.) I’ll go in the morning. Put him—put him to bed. (Exhausted, Biff moves up the stairs to his room.)

Willy (after a long pause, astonished, elevated). Isn’t that—isn’t that remarkable? Biff—he likes me!

Linda. He loves you, Willy!

Happy (deeply moved). Always did, Pop.

Willy. Oh, Biff! (Staring wildly.) He cried! Cried to me. (He is choking with his love, and now cries out his promise.) That boy—that boy is going to be magnificent!

Ben appears in the light just outside the kitchen.

Ben. Yes, outstanding, with twenty thousand behind him.

Linda (sensing the racing of his mind, fearfully, carefully.) Now come to bed, Willy. It’s all settled now.

Willy (finding it difficult not to rush out of the house). Yes, we’ll sleep. Come on. Go to sleep, Hap.

Ben. And it does take a great kind of a man to crack the jungle.

In accents of dread, Ben’s idyllic music starts up.

Happy (his arm around Linda). I’m getting married, Pop, don’t forget it. I’m changing everything. I’m gonna run that department before the year is up. You’ll see, Mom. (He kisses her.)

Ben. The jungle is dark but full of diamonds, Willy.
WILLY turns, moves, listening to BEN.

LINDA. Be good. You’re both good boys, just act that way, that’s all.

HAPPY. ’Night, Pop. (He goes upstairs.)

LINDA (to WILLY). Come, dear. BEN (with greater force). One must go in to fetch a diamond out.

WILLY (to LINDA, as he moves slowly along the edge of the kitchen, toward the door). I just want to get settled down, Linda. Let me sit alone for a little.

LINDA (almost uttering her fear). I want you upstairs.

WILLY (taking her in his arms). In a few minutes, Linda. I couldn’t sleep right now. Go on, you look awful tired. (He kisses her.)

BEN. Not like an appointment at all. A diamond is rough and hard to the touch.

WILLY. Go on now. I’ll be right up.

LINDA. I think this is the only way, Willy.

WILLY. Sure, it’s the best thing.

BEN. Best thing!

WILLY. The only way. Everything is gonna be—go on, kid, get to bed. You look so tired.

LINDA. Come right up.

WILLY. Two minutes.

LINDA goes into the living room, then reappears in her bedroom. WILLY moves just outside the kitchen door.

WILLY. Loves me. (Wonderingly.) Always loved me. Isn’t that a remarkable thing? Ben, he’ll worship me for it!

BEN (with promise). It’s dark there, but full of diamonds.

WILLY. Can you imagine that magnificence with twenty thousand dollars in his pocket?

LINDA (calling from her room). Willy! Come up!

WILLY (calling into the kitchen). Yes! Yes. Coming! It’s very smart, you realize that, don’t you, sweetheart? Even Ben sees it. I gotta go, baby. ’By! ’By! (Going over to BEN, almost dancing.) Imagine? When the mail comes he’ll be ahead of Bernard again!

BEN. A perfect proposition all around.

WILLY. Did you see how he cried to me? Oh, if I could kiss him, Ben!

BEN. Time, William, time!

WILLY. Oh, Ben, I always knew one way or another we were gonna make it, Biff and I.

BEN (looking at his watch). The boat. We’ll be late. (He moves slowly off into the darkness.)

WILLY (elegiacally, turning to the house). Now when you kick off, boy, I want a seventy-yard boot, and get right down the field under the ball, and when you hit, hit low and hit hard, because it’s important, boy. (He swings around and faces the audience.) There’s all kinds of important people in the stands, and the first thing you know . . . (Suddenly realizing he is alone.) Ben! Ben, where do I . . . ? (He makes a sudden movement of search.) Ben, how do I . . . ?

LINDA (calling). Willy, you coming up?

WILLY (uttering a gasp of fear, whirling about as if to quiet her). Sh! (He turns around as if to find his way; sounds, faces, voices, seem to be swarming in upon him and he flicks at them, crying.) Sh! Sh!
(Suddenly music, faint and high, stops him. It rises in intensity, almost to an unbearable scream. He goes up and down on his toes, and rushes off around the house.) Shhh!

LINDA. Willy?

There is no answer. LINDA waits. BIFF gets up off his bed. He is still in his clothes. HAPPY sits up. BIFF stands listening.

LINDA (with real fear). Willy, answer me! Willy!

There is the sound of a car starting and moving away at full speed.

LINDA. No!

BIFF (rushing down the stairs). Pop!

As the car speeds off the music crashes down in a frenzy of sound, which becomes the soft pulsation of a single cello string. BIFF slowly returns to his bedroom. He and HAPPY gravely don their jackets. LINDA slowly walks out of her room. The music has developed into a dead march. The leaves of day are appearing over everything. CHARLEY and BERNARD, somberly dressed, appear and knock on the kitchen door. BIFF and HAPPY slowly descend the stairs to the kitchen as CHARLEY and BERNARD enter. All stop a moment when LINDA, in clothes of mourning, bearing a little bunch of roses, comes through the draped doorway into the kitchen. She goes to CHARLEY and takes his arm. Now all move toward the audience, through the wall-line of the kitchen. At the limit of the apron, LINDA lays down the flowers, kneels, and sits back on her heels. All stare down at the grave.

Requiem

CHARLEY. It’s getting dark, Linda.

LINDA doesn’t react. She stares at the grave.

BIFF. How about it, Mom? Better get some rest, eh? They’ll be closing the gate soon.

LINDA makes no move. Pause.

HAPPY (deeply angered). He had no right to do that. There was no necessity for it. We would’ve helped him.

CHARLEY (grunting). Hmmm.

BIFF. Come along, Mom.

LINDA. Why didn’t anybody come?

CHARLEY. It was a very nice funeral.

LINDA. But where are all the people he knew? Maybe they blame him.

CHARLEY. Naa. It’s a rough world, Linda. They wouldn’t blame him.

LINDA. I can’t understand it. At this time especially. First time in thirty-five years we were just about free and clear. He only needed a little salary. He was even finished with the dentist.
CHARLEY. No man only needs a little salary.
LINDA. I can't understand it.
BIFF. There were a lot of nice days. When he'd come home from a trip; or on Sundays, making the stoop; finishing the cellar; putting on the new porch; when he built the extra bathroom; and put up the garage. You know something, Charley, there's more of him in that front stoop than in all the sales he ever made.
CHARLEY. Yeah. He was a happy man with a batch of cement.
LINDA. He was so wonderful with his hands.
BIFF. He had the wrong dreams. All, all, wrong.
HAPPY (almost ready to fight BIFF). Don't say that!
BIFF. He never knew who he was.
CHARLEY (stopping HAPPY’s movement and reply; to BIFF). Nobody dast blame this man. You don't understand: Willy was a salesman. And for a salesman, there is no rock bottom to the life. He don't put a bolt to a nut, he don't tell you the law or give you medicine. He's a man way out there in the blue, riding on a smile and a shoeshine. And when they start not smiling back—that's an earthquake. And then you get yourself a couple of spots on your hat, and you're finished. Nobody dast blame this man. A salesman is got to dream, boy. It comes with the territory.
BIFF. Charley, the man didn't know who he was.
HAPPY (infuriated). Don't say that!
BIFF. Why don't you come with me, Happy?
HAPPY. I'm not licked that easily. I'm staying right in this city, and I'm gonna beat this racket! (He looks at BIFF, his chin set.) The Loman Brothers!
BIFF. I know who I am, kid.
HAPPY. All right, boy. I'm gonna show you and everybody else that Willy Loman did not die in vain. He had a good dream. It's the only dream you can have—to come out number-one man. He fought it out here, and this is where I'm gonna win it for him.
BIFF (with a hopeless glance at HAPPY, bends toward his mother). Let's go, Mom.
LINDA. I'll be with you in a minute. Go on, Charley. (He hesitates.) I want to, just for a minute. I never had a chance to say good-by.

CHARLEY moves away, followed by HAPPY. BIFF remains a slight distance up and left of LINDA. She sits there, summoning herself. The flute begins, not far away, playing behind her speech.

LINDA. Forgive me, dear. I can't cry. I don’t know what it is, but I can’t cry. I don't understand it. Why did you ever do that? Help me, Willy. I can’t cry. It seems to me that you're just on another trip. I keep expecting you. Willy, dear, I can't cry. Why did you do it? I search and search and I search, and I can't understand it, Willy. I made the last payment on the house today. Today, dear. And there'll be nobody home. (A sob rises in her throat.) We're free and clear. (Sobbing mournfully, released.) We are free. (BIFF comes slowly toward her.) We're free. . . We're free. . .

BIFF lifts her to her feet and moves out up right with her in his arms.
LINDA sobs quietly. BERNARD and CHARLEY come together and follow them, followed by HAPPY. Only the music of the flute is left on the darkening stage as over the house the hard towers of the apartment buildings rise into sharp focus and the curtain falls.
TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. Miller said in the New York Times (February 27, 1949, Sec. II, p. 1) that tragedy shows man's struggle to secure "his sense of personal dignity" and that "his destruction in the attempt posits a wrong or an evil in his environment." Does this make sense when applied to some earlier tragedy (for example, Oedipus Rex or Hamlet), and does it apply convincingly to Death of a Salesman? Is this the tragedy of an individual's own making? Or is society at fault for corrupting and exploiting Willy? Or both?

2. Is Willy pathetic rather than tragic? If pathetic, does this imply that the play is less worthy than if he is tragic?

3. Do you feel that Miller is straining too hard to turn a play about a little man into a big, impressive play? For example, do the musical themes, the unrealistic setting, the appearances of Ben, and the speech at the grave seem out of keeping in a play about the death of a salesman?

4. We don't know what Willy sells, and we don't know whether or not the insurance will be paid after his death. Do you consider these uncertainties to be faults in the play?

5. Is Howard a villain?

6. Characterize Linda.

The Play on the Stage

7. It is sometimes said that in this realistic play that includes symbolic and expressionistic elements, Biff and Happy can be seen as two aspects of Willy. In this view, Biff more or less represents Willy's spiritual needs, and Happy represents his materialism and his sexuality. If you were directing the play, would you adopt this point of view? Whatever your interpretation, how would you costume the brothers?

8. Although Miller envisioned Willy as a small man (literally small), the role was first performed by Lee J. Cobb, a large man. If you were casting the play, what actor would you select? Why? Whom would you choose for Linda, Biff, Happy, Bernard, and Charley?

9. Select roughly thirty lines of dialogue, and discuss the movements (gestures and blocking) that as a director you would suggest to the performers.

A CONTEXT FOR DEATH OF A SALESMAN

ARTHUR MILLER

The following essay appeared in the New York Times in 1949, while Death of a Salesman was running on Broadway.

Tragedy and the Common Man [1949]

In this age few tragedies are written. It has often been held that the lack is due to a paucity of heroes among us, or else that modern man has had the blood drawn out of his organs of belief by the skepticism of science, and the heroic attack on life cannot feed on an attitude of reserve and circumspection. For one reason or another, we are often held to be below tragedy—or tragedy above us. The inevitable conclusion is, of course, that the tragic mode is archaic, fit only for the very highly placed, the kings or the kingly, and where this admission is not made in so many words it is most often implied.

I believe that the common man is as apt a subject for tragedy in its highest sense as kings were. On the face of it this ought to be obvious in the light of modern psychiatry, which bases its analysis upon classic formulations, such as the Oedipus and Orestes complexes, for instances, which were enacted by royal beings, but which apply to everyone in similar emotional situations.

More simply, when the question of tragedy in art is not at issue, we never hesitate to attribute to the well-placed and the exalted the very same mental processes as the lowly. And finally, if the exaltation of tragic action were truly a property of the high-bred character alone, it is inconceivable that the mass of mankind should cherish tragedy above all other forms, let alone be capable of understanding it.

As a general rule, to which there may be exceptions unknown to me, I think the tragic feeling is evoked in us when we are in the presence of a character who is ready to lay down his life, if need be, to secure one thing—his sense of personal dignity. From Orestes to Hamlet, Medea to Macbeth, the underlying struggle is that of the individual attempting to gain his “rightful” position in his society.

Sometimes he is one who has been displaced from it, sometimes one who seeks to attain it for the first time, but the fateful wound from which the inevitable events spiral is the wound of indignity, and its dominant force is indignation. Tragedy, then, is the consequence of a man’s total compulsion to evaluate himself justly.

In the sense of having been initiated by the hero himself, the tale always reveals what has been called his “tragic flaw,” a failing that is not peculiar to grand or elevated characters. Nor is it necessarily a weakness. The flaw, or ack in the character, is really nothing—and need be nothing, but his inherent unwillingness to remain passive in the face of what he conceives to be a challenge to his dignity, his image of his rightful status. Only the passive, only those who accept their lot without active retaliation, are “flawless.” Most of us are in that category.

But there are among us today, as there always have been, those who act against the scheme of things that degrades them, and in the process of action everything we have accepted out of fear or insensitivity or ignorance is shaken before us and examined, and from this total onslaught by an individual against the seemingly stable cosmos surrounding us—from this total examination of the “unchangeable” environment—comes the terror and the fear that is classically associated with tragedy.

More important, from this total questioning of what has previously been unquestioned, we learn. And such a process is not beyond the common man.
In revolutions around the world, these past thirty years, he has demonstrated again and again this inner dynamic of all tragedy.

Insistence upon the rank of the tragic hero, or the so-called nobility of his character, is really but a clinging to the outward forms of tragedy. If rank or nobility of character was indispensable, then it would follow that the problems of those with rank were the particular problems of tragedy. But surely the right of one monarch to capture the domain from another no longer raises our passions, nor are our concepts of justice what they were to the mind of an Elizabethan king.

The quality in such plays that does shake us, however, derives from the underlying fear of being displaced, the disaster inherent in being torn away from our chosen image of what and who we are in this world. Among us today this fear is as strong, and perhaps stronger, than it ever was. In fact, it is the common man who knows this fear best.

Now, if it is true that tragedy is the consequence of a man’s total compulsion to evaluate himself justly, his destruction in the attempt posits a wrong or an evil in his environment. And this is precisely the morality of tragedy and its lesson. The discovery of the moral law, which is what the enlightenment of tragedy consists of, is not the discovery of some abstract or metaphysical quantity.

The tragic right is a condition of life, a condition in which the human personality is able to flower and realize itself. The wrong is the condition which suppresses man, perverts the flowing out of his love and creative instinct. Tragedy enlightens—and it must, in that it points the heroic finger at the enemy of man’s freedom. The thrust for freedom is the quality in tragedy which exalts. The revolutionary questioning of the stable environment is what terrifies. In no way is the common man debarred from such thoughts or such actions.

Seen in this light, our lack of tragedy may be partially accounted for by the turn which modern literature has taken toward the purely psychiatric view of life, or the purely sociological. If all our miseries, our indignities, are born and bred within our minds, then all action, let alone the heroic action, is obviously impossible.

And if society alone is responsible for the cramping of our lives, then the protagonist must needs be so pure and faultless as to force us to deny his validity as a character. From neither of these views can tragedy derive, simply because neither represents a balanced concept of life. Above all else, tragedy requires the finest appreciation by the writer of cause and effect.

No tragedy can therefore come about when its author fears to question absolutely everything, when he regards any institution, habit or custom as being either everlasting, immutable or inevitable. In the tragic view the need of man to wholly realize himself is the only fixed star, and whatever it is that hedges his nature and lowers it is ripe for attack and examination. Which is not to say that tragedy must preach revolution.

The Greeks could probe the very heavenly origin of their ways and return to confirm the rightness of laws. And Job could face God in anger, demanding his right and end in submission. But for a moment everything is in suspension, nothing is accepted, and in this stretching and tearing apart of the cosmos, in the very action of so doing, the character gains “size,” the tragic stature which is spuriously attached to the royal or the highborn in our minds. The commonest of men may take on that stature to the extent of his willingness to throw all he has into the contest, the battle to secure his rightful place in his world.

There is a misconception of tragedy with which I have been struck in review after review, and in many conversations with writers and readers alike. It is the idea that tragedy is of necessity allied to pessimism. Even the dictionary says nothing more about the word than that it means a story with a sad or unhappy ending. This impression is so firmly fixed that I almost hesitate to claim that in truth tragedy implies more optimism in its author than does comedy, and that its final result ought to be the reinforcement of the onlooker's brightest opinions of the human animal.

For, if it is true to say that in essence the tragic hero is intent upon claiming his whole due as a personality, and if this struggle must be total and without reservation, then it automatically demonstrates the indestructible will of man to achieve his humanity.

The possibility of victory must be there in tragedy. Where pathos rules, where pathos is finally derived, a character has fought a battle he could not possibly have won. The pathetic is achieved when the protagonist is, by virtue of his witlessness, his insensitivity or the very air he gives off, incapable of grappling with a much superior force.

Pathos truly is the mode for the pessimist. But tragedy requires a nicer balance between what is possible and what is impossible. And it is curious, although edifying, that the plays we revere, century after century, are the tragedies. In them, and in them alone, lies the belief—optimistic, if you will—in the perfectibility of man.

It is time, I think, that we who are without kings, took up this bright thread of our history and followed it to the only place it can possibly lead in our time—the heart and spirit of the average man.

LUIS VALDEZ

Luis Valdez was born into a family of migrant farm workers in Delano, California, in 1940. After completing high school he entered San Jose State College on a scholarship. He wrote his first plays while still an undergraduate, and after receiving his degree (in English and drama) from San Jose in 1964 he joined the San Francisco Mime Troupe, a left-wing group that performed in parks and streets. Revolutionary in technique as well as in political content, the Mime Troupe rejected the traditional forms of drama and instead drew on the traditions of the circus and the carnival.

In 1965 Valdez returned to Delano, California, where Cesar Chavez had organized a strike of farm workers and a boycott against grape growers. It was here, under the wing of the United Farm Workers, that he established El Teatro Campesino (the Farm Workers’ Theater), which at first specialized in doing short, improvised, satirical skits called actos. When the teatro moved to Del Rey, California, it expanded its repertoire beyond farm issues, and it became part of a cultural center that gave workshops (in English and Spanish) in such subjects as history, drama, and politics.

The actos, performed by amateurs on college campuses and on flatbed trucks and at the edges of vineyards, were highly political. Making use of stereotypes (the boss, the scab), the actos sought not to present the individual thoughts of a gifted playwright but to present the social vision of ordinary people—the pueblo—though it was acknowledged that in an oppressive society the playwright might have to help guide the people to see their own best interests.

Valdez moved from actos to mitos (myths)—plays that drew on Aztec mythology, Mexican folklore, and Christianity—and then to Zoot Suit, a play that ran for many months in California and that became the first Mexican-American play to be produced on Broadway. More recently he wrote and directed a hit movie, La Bamba, and in 1991 received an award from the A.T.&T. Foundation for his musical, Bandido, presented by El Teatro Campesino.

Los Vendidos was written in 1967, when Ronald Reagan was governor of California.

LIST OF CHARACTERS
HONEST SANCHO
SECRETARY
FARM WORKER
JOHNNY
REVOLUCIONARIO
MEXICAN-AMERICAN

Scene: HONEST SANCHO’S Used Mexican Lot and Mexican Curio Shop. Three models are on display in HONEST SANCHO’s shop: to the right, there is a REVOLUCIONARIO, complete with sombrero, carrilleras\(^1\) and carabina 30-30. At center, on the floor, there is the FARM WORKER, under a broad straw sombrero. At stage left is the PACBUCO\(^2\), filero\(^3\) in band.

\(^1\)Los Vendidos the sellouts. \(^2\)carrilleras cartridge belts. \(^3\)Pacbuco an urban tough guy. \(^4\)filero blade.
SANCHO. Bueno, bueno, mis monos, vamos a ver a quien vendemos ahora, ¿no? (To audience.) ¡Quihubo! I’m Honest Sancho and this is my shop. Antes fui contratista pero ahora logré tener mi negocio. All I need now is a customer. (A bell rings offstage.) Ay, a customer!

SECRETARY (Entering). Good morning, I’m Miss Jiménez from—

SANCHO. ¡Ah, una chicana! Welcome, welcome Señorita Jiménez.

SECRETARY (Anglo pronunciation). JIM-enez.

SANCHO. ¿Qué?

SECRETARY. My name is Miss JIM-enez. Don’t you speak English? What’s wrong with you?

SANCHO. Oh, nothing, Señorita JIM-enez. I’m here to help you.

SECRETARY. That’s better. As I was starting to say, I’m a secretary from Governor Reagan’s office, and we’re looking for a Mexican type for the administration.

SANCHO. Well, you come to the right place, lady. This is Honest Sancho’s Used Mexican lot, and we got all types here. Any particular type you want?

SECRETARY. Yes, we were looking for somebody suave—

SANCHO. Suave.

SECRETARY. Debonair.

SANCHO. De buen aire.

SECRETARY. Dark.

SANCHO. Prieto.

SECRETARY. But of course not too dark.

SANCHO. No muy prieto.

SECRETARY. Perhaps, beige.

SANCHO. Beige, just the tone. Así como cafecito con leche, ¿no?

SECRETARY. One more thing. He must be hard-working.

SANCHO. That could only be one model. Step right over here to the center of the shop, lady. (They cross to the farm worker.) This is our standard farm worker model. As you can see, in the words of our beloved Senator George Murphy, he is “built close to the ground.” Also take special notice of his four-ply Goodyear huaraches, made from the rain tire. This wide-brimmed sombrero is an extra added feature—keeps off the sun, rain, and dust.

SECRETARY. Yes, it does look durable.

SANCHO. And our farm worker model is friendly. Muy amable. Watch. (Snaps bis fingers.)

FARM WORKER (Lifts up head). Buenos días, señorita. (His bead drops.)

SECRETARY. My, he’s friendly.

SANCHO. Didn’t I tell you? Loves his patrones! But his most attractive feature is that he’s hard working. Let me show you. (Snaps fingers. Farm worker stands.)

FARM WORKER. ¡El jale! (He begins to work.)

SANCHO. As you can see, he is cutting grapes.

4Bueno . . . no? Well, well, darlings, let’s see who we can sell now, O.K.?

5Antes . . . negociito I used to be a contractor, but now I’ve succeeded in having my little business 6Asi . . . leche like coffee with milk. Muy amable very friendly. El jale the job.

SECRETARY. Oh, I wouldn't know.
SANCHO. He also picks cotton. (Snap. FARM WORKER begins to pick cotton.)
SECRETARY. Versatile isn't he?
SANCHO. He also picks melons. (Snap. FARM WORKER picks melons.) That's his slow speed for late in the season. Here's his fast speed. (Snap. FARM WORKER picks faster)
SECRETARY. ¡Chihuahua! . . . I mean, goodness, he sure is a hard worker.
SANCHO (Pulls the FARM WORKER to his feet). And that isn't the half of it. Do you see these little holes on his arms that appear to be pores? During those hot sluggish days in the field, when the vines or the branches get so entangled, it's almost impossible to move; these holes emit a certain grease that allow our model to slip and slide right through the crop with no trouble at all.
SECRETARY. Wonderful. But is he economical?
SANCHO. Economical? Señorita, you are looking at the Volkswagen of Mexicans. Pennies a day is all it takes. One plate of beans and tortillas will keep him going all day. That, and chile. Plenty of chile. Chile jalapeños, chile verde, chile colorado. But, of course, if you do give him chile (Snap. FARM WORKER turns left face. Snap. FARM WORKER bends over) then you have to change his oil filter once a week.
SECRETARY. What about storage?
SANCHO. No problem. You know these new farm labor camps our Honorable Governor Reagan has built out by Parlier or Raisin City? They were designed with our model in mind. Five, six, seven, even ten in one of those shacks will give you no trouble at all. You can also put him in old barns, old cars, river banks. You can even leave him out in the field overnight with no worry!
SECRETARY. Remarkable.
SANCHO. And here's an added feature: Every year at the end of the season, this model goes back to Mexico and doesn't return, automatically, until next Spring.
SECRETARY. How about that. But tell me: does he speak English?
SANCHO. Another outstanding feature is that last year this model was programmed to go out on STRIKE! (Snap.)
FARM WORKER. ¡HUELGA! ¡HUELGA! Hermanos, sálganse de esos files.9 (Snap. He stops.)
SECRETARY. No! Oh no, we can't strike in the State Capitol.
SANCHO. Well, he also scabs. (Snap.)
FARM WORKER. Me vendo barato, ¿y qué?10 (Snap.)
SECRETARY. That's much better, but you didn't answer my question. Does he speak English?
SANCHO. Bueno . . . no, pero11 he has other—
SECRETARY. No.
SANCHO. Other features.
SECRETARY. NO! He just won't do!
SANCHO. Okay, okay pues. We have other models.
SECRETARY. I hope so. What we need is something a little more sophisticated.

---

9'Huelga . . . files Strike! Strike! Brothers, leave those rows. 10'Me . . . qué? I come cheap. So what? 11'Bueno . . . no, pero Well, no, but.
SANCHO. Sophisti—¿qué?
SECRETARY. An urban model.
SANCHO. Ah, from the city! Step right back. Over here in this corner of the shop is exactly what you’re looking for. Introducing our new 1969 JOHNNY PACURO model! This is our fast-back model. Streamlined. Built for speed, low-riding, city life. Take a look at some of these features. Mag shoes, dual exhausts, green chartreuse paint-job, dark-tint windshield, a little poof on top. Let me just turn him on. (Snap. JOHNNY walks to stage center with a pacufo bounce.)

SECRETARY. What was that?
SANCHO. That, señorita, was the Chicano shuffle.
SECRETARY. Okay, what does he do?
SANCHO. Anything and everything necessary for city life. For instance, survival: He knife fights. (Snap. JOHNNY pulls out switchblade and swings at SECRETARY.)

(SERETARY screams.)
SANCHO. He dances. (Snap.)
JOHNNY (Singing). “Angel Baby, my Angel Baby ...” (Snap.)
SANCHO. And here’s a feature no city model can be without. He gets arrested, but not without resisting, of course. (Snap.)
JOHNNY. ¡En la madre, la placa!12 I didn’t do it! I didn’t do it! (JOHNNY turns and stands up against an imaginary wall, legs spread out, arms behind his back.)
SECRETARY. Oh no, we can’t have arrests! We must maintain law and order.
SANCHO. But he’s bilingual!
SECRETARY. Bilingual?
SANCHO. Simón que yes.13 He speaks English! Johnny, give us some English. (Snap.)
JOHNNY (Comes downstage). Fuck-you!
SECRETARY (Gasps). Oh! I’ve never been so insulted in my whole life!
SANCHO. Well, he learned it in your school.
SECRETARY. I don’t care where he learned it.
SANCHO. But he’s economical!
SECRETARY. Economical?
SANCHO. Nickels and dimes. You can keep Johnny running on hamburgers, Taco Bell tacos, Lucky Lager beer, Thunderbird wine, yesca—
SECRETARY. Yesca?
SANCHO. Mota.
SECRETARY. Mota?
SANCHO. Leños14 . . . Marijuana. (Snap; JOHNNY inbales on an imaginary joint.)
SECRETARY. That’s against the law!
JOHNNY (Big smile, holding his breath). Yeah.
SANCHO. He also sniffs glue. (Snap; JOHNNY inbales glue, big smile.)
JOHNNY. That’s too much man, ése.15
SECRETARY. No, Mr. Sancho, I don’t think this—

---

12¡En... la placa! Wow, the cops! 13Simón que yes Yea, sure. 14Leños joints (marijuana). 15Ése fellow.
SANCHO. Wait a minute, he has other qualities I know you’ll love. For example, an inferiority complex. (Snap.)

JOHNNY (To SANCHO). You think you’re better than me, huh ése? (Swings switchblade.)

SANCHO. He can also be beaten and he bruises, cut him and he bleeds; kick him and he—(He beats, bruises and kicks PACHUCO.) would you like to try it?

SECRETARY. Oh, I couldn’t.

SANCHO. Be my guest. He’s a great scapegoat.

SECRETARY. No, really.

SANCHO. Please.

SECRETARY. Well, all right. Just once. (She kicks PACHUCO.) Oh, he’s so soft.

SANCHO. Wasn’t that good? Try again.

SECRETARY (Kicks PACHUCO). Oh, he’s so wonderful! (She kicks him again. She kicks him again.)

SANCHO. Okay, that’s enough, lady. You ruin the merchandise. Yes, our Johnny Pachuco model can give you many hours of pleasure. Why, the L.A.P.D. just bought twenty of these to train their rookie cops on. And talk about maintenance. Señorita, you are looking at an entirely self-supporting machine. You’re never going to find our Johnny Pachuco model on the relief rolls. No, sir, this model knows how to liberate.

SECRETARY. Liberate?

SANCHO. He steals. (Snap. JOHNNY rushes the SECRETARY and steals her purse.)

JOHNNY. ¡Dame esa bolsa, vieja! 16 (He grabs the purse and runs. Snap by SANCHO. He stops.)

(Secretary runs after JOHNNY and grabs purse away from him, kicking him as she goes.)

SECRETARY. No, no, no! We can’t have any more thieves in the State Administration. Put him back.

SANCHO. Okay, we still got other models. Come on, Johnny, we’ll sell you to some old lady. (SANCHO takes JOHNNY back to his place.)

SECRETARY. Mr. Sancho, I don’t think you quite understand what we need. What we need is something that will attract the women voters. Something more traditional, more romantic.

SANCHO. Ah, a lover. (He smiles meaningfully.) Step right over here, señorita. Introducing our standard Revolucionario and/or Early California Bandit type. As you can see he is well-built, sturdy, durable. This is the International Harvester of Mexicans.

SECRETARY. What does he do?

SANCHO. You name it, he does it. He rides horses, stays in the mountains, crosses deserts, plains, rivers, leads revolutions, follows revolutions, kills, can be killed, serves as a martyr, hero, movie star—did I say movie star? Did you ever see Viva Zapata? Viva Villa? Villa Rides? Pancho Villa Returns? Pancho Villa Goes Back? Pancho Villa Meets Abbott and Costello—

SECRETARY. I’ve never seen any of those.

SANCHO. Well, he was in all of them. Listen to this. (Snap.)

REVOLUCIONARIO (Scream). ¡VIVA VILLAAAAA!

SECRETARY. That’s awfully loud.

16 ¡Dame . . . vieja! Give me that bag, old lady!
SANCHO. He has a volume control. (He adjusts volume. Snap.)
REVOLUCIONARIO (Mousey voice) ¡Viva Villa!
SECRETARY. That’s better.
SANCHO. And even if you didn’t see him in the movies, perhaps you saw him on TV. He makes commercials. (Snap.)
REVOLUCIONARIO. Is there a Frito Bandito in your house?
SECRETARY. Oh yes, I’ve seen that one!
SANCHO. Another feature about this one is that he is economical. He runs on raw horsemeat and tequila!
SECRETARY. Isn’t that rather savage?
SANCHO. Al contrario, it makes him a lover. (Snap.)
REVOLUCIONARIO (To SECRETARY) ¡Ay, mamasota, cochota, ven pa’ca! (He grabs SECRETARY and folds her back—Latin-Lover style.)
SANCHO (Snap. REVOLUCIONARIO goes back upright) Now wasn’t that nice?
SECRETARY. Well, it was rather nice.
SANCHO. And finally, there is one outstanding feature about this model I KNOW the ladies are going to love: He’s a GENUINE antique! He was made in Mexico in 1910!
SECRETARY. Made in Mexico?
SANCHO. That’s right. Once in Tijuana, twice in Guadalajara, three times in Cuernavaca.
SECRETARY. Mr. Sancho, I thought he was an American product.
SANCHO. No, but—
SECRETARY. No, I’m sorry. We can’t buy anything but American-made products. He just won’t do.
SANCHO. But he’s an antique!
SECRETARY. I don’t care. You still don’t understand what we need. It’s true we need Mexican models such as these, but it’s more important that he be American.
SANCHO. American?
SECRETARY. That’s right, and judging from what you’ve shown me, I don’t think you have what we want. Well, my lunch hour’s almost over: I better—SANCHO. Wait a minute! Mexican but American?
SECRETARY. That’s correct.
SANCHO. Mexican but . . . (A sudden flash. AMERICAN! Yeah, I think we’ve got exactly what you want. He just came in today! Give me a minute. (He exits. Talks from backstage.) Here he is in the shop. Let me just get some papers off. There: Introducing our new 1970 Mexican-American! Ta-ra-ra-ra-ra-RA-RAAA!

(SANCHO brings out the MEXICAN-AMERICAN model, a clean-shaven middle-class type in a business suit, with glasses.)

SECRETARY (Impressed). Where have you been hiding this one?
SANCHO. He just came in this morning. Ain’t he a beauty? Feast your eyes on him! Sturdy US STEEL frame, streamlined, modern. As a matter of fact, he is built exactly like our Anglo models except that he comes in a variety of darker shades: naugahyde, leather, or leatherette.

17 Al contrario on the contrary. 18 Ay . . . pa’ca! get over here!
SECRETARY. Naugahyde.

SANCHO. Well, we'll just write that down. Yes, señorita, this model represents the apex of American engineering! He is bilingual, college educated, ambitious! Say the word “acculturate” and he accelerates. He is intelligent, well-mannered, clean—did I say clean? (Snap. MEXICAN-AMERICAN raises his arm.) Smell.

SECRETARY (Smells). Old Sobaco, my favorite.

SANCHO (Snap. MEXICAN-AMERICAN turns toward SANCHO). Eric! (To SECRETARY.) We call him Eric Garcia. (To ERIC.) I want you to meet Miss JIM-enez, Eric.

MEXICAN-AMERICAN. Miss JIM-enez, I am delighted to make your acquaintance. (He kisses her hand.)

SECRETARY. Oh, my, how charming!

SANCHO. Did you feel the suction? He has seven especially engineered suction cups right behind his lips. He’s a charmer all right!

SECRETARY. How about boards? Does he function on boards?

SANCHO. You name them, he is on them. Parole boards, draft boards, school boards, taco quality control boards, surf boards, two-by-fours.

SECRETARY. Does he function in politics?

SANCHO. Señorita, you are looking at a political MACHINE. Have you ever heard of the OEO, EOC, COD, WAR ON POVERTY? That’s our model! Not only that, he makes political speeches.

SECRETARY. May I hear one?

SANCHO. With pleasure. (Snap.) Eric, give us a speech.

MEXICAN-AMERICAN. Mr. Congressman, Mr. Chairman, members of the board, honored guests, ladies and gentlemen. (SANCHO and SECRETARY applaud.) Please, please. I come before you as a Mexican-American to tell you about the problems of the Mexican. The problems of the Mexican stem from one thing and one thing alone: He’s stupid. He’s uneducated. He needs to stay in school. He needs to be ambitious, forward-looking, harder-working. He needs to think American, American, American, AMERICAN, AMERICAN, AMERICAN! GOD BLESS AMERICA! GOD BLESS AMERICA! GOD BLESS AMERICA!! (He goes out of control.)

(SANCHO snaps frantically and the MEXICAN-AMERICAN finally slumps forward, bending at the waist.)

SECRETARY. Oh my, he’s patriotic too!

SANCHO. Sí, señorita, he loves his country. Let me just make a little adjustment here. (Stands MEXICAN-AMERICAN up.)

SECRETARY. What about upkeep? Is he economical?

SANCHO. Well, no, I won’t lie to you. The Mexican-American costs a little bit more, but you get what you pay for. He’s worth every extra cent. You can keep him running on dry Martinis, Langendorf bread.

SECRETARY. Apple pie?

SANCHO. Only Mom’s. Of course, he’s also programmed to eat Mexican food on ceremonial functions, but I must warn you: an overdose of beans will plug up his exhaust.

SECRETARY. Fine! There’s just one more question: HOW MUCH DO YOU WANT FOR HIM?

SANCHO. Well, I tell you what I’m gonna do. Today and today only, because you’ve been so sweet, I’m gonna let you steal this model from me! I’m gonna let you drive him off the lot for the simple price of—let’s see taxes and license included—$15,000.

SECRETARY. Fifteen thousand DOLLARS? For a MEXICAN!

SANCHO. Mexican? What are you talking, lady? This is a Mexican-AMERICAN! We had to melt down two pachucos, a farm worker and three gabachos19 to make this model! You want quality, but you gotta pay for it! This is no cheap run-about. He’s got class!

SECRETARY. Okay, I’ll take him.

SANCHO. You will?

SECRETARY. Here’s your money.

SANCHO. You mind if I count it?

SECRETARY. Go right ahead.

SANCHO. Well, you’ll get your pink slip in the mail. Oh, do you want me to wrap him up for you? We have a box in the back.

SECRETARY. No, thank you. The Governor is having a luncheon this afternoon, and we need a brown face in the crowd. How do I drive him?

SANCHO. Just snap your fingers. He’ll do anything you want.

(Secretary snaps. Mexican-American steps forward.)

MEXICAN-AMERICAN. RAZA QUERIDA, ¡VAMOS LEVANTANDO ARMAS PARA LIBERARNOS DE ESTOS DESGRACIADOS GABACHOS QUE NOS EXPLOTAN! VAMOS.20

SECRETARY. What did he say?

SANCHO. Something about lifting arms, killing white people, etc.

SECRETARY. But he’s not supposed to say that!

SANCHO. Look, lady, don’t blame me for bugs from the factory. He’s your Mexican-American; you bought him, now drive him off the lot!

SECRETARY. But he’s broken!

SANCHO. Try snapping another finger.

(Secretary snaps. Mexican-American comes to life again.)

(The Mexican-American turns toward the Secretary, who gasps and backs up. He keeps turning toward the PACHUCO, FARM WORKER, and REVOLUCIONARIO, snapping his fingers and turning each of them on, one by one.)

PACHUCO (Snap. To Secretary). I’m going to get you, baby! ¡Viva La Raza!

FARM WORKER (Snap. To Secretary). ¡Viva la huelga! ¡Viva la Huelga! ¡VIVA LA HUELGA!

REVOLUCIONARIO (Snap. To Secretary). ¡Viva la revolución! ¡VIVA LA REVOLUCIÓN!

19gabachos whites. 20Raza . . . Vamos Beloved Raza [persons of Mexican descent], let’s take up arms to liberate ourselves from those damned whites who exploit us. Let’s get going.

21¿Esta . . . Estudiantes! This great mass of humanity has said enough! And it has begun to march. Enough! Enough! Long live La Raza! Long live the Cause! Long live the strike! Long live the Brown Berets! Long live the students!
The three models join together and advance toward the secretary who backs up and runs out of the shop screaming. Sancho is at the other end of the shop bolding bis money in bis band. All freeze. After a few seconds of silence, the pachuco moves and stretches, shaking bis arms and loosening up. The farm worker and revolucionario do the same. Sancho stays where he is, frozen to bis spot.

Johnny. Man, that was a long one, ése.22 (Others agree with him.)

Farm worker. How did we do?

Johnny. Perty good, look at all that lana.23 man! (He goes over to sancho and removes the money from bis band. Sancho stays where he is.)

Revolucionario. En la madre, look at all the money.

Johnny. We keep this up, we’re going to be rich.

Farm worker. They think we’re machines.

Revolucionario. Burros.

Johnny. Puppets.

Mexican-American. The only thing I don’t like is—how come I always got to play the goddamn Mexican-American?

Johnny. That’s what you get for finishing high school.

Farm worker. How about our wages, ése?

Johnny. Here it comes right now. $3,000 for you, $3,000 for you, $3,000 for you, and $3,000 for me. The rest we put back into the business.

Mexican-American. Too much, man. Heh, where you vatos going tonight?

Farm worker. I’m going over to Concha’s. There’s a party.

Johnny. Wait a minute, vatos. What about our salesman? I think he needs an oil job.

Revolucionario. Leave him to me.

(The pachuco, farm worker, and mexican-American exit, talking loudly about their plans for the night. The revolucionario goes over to sancho, removes bis derby hat and cigar; lifts him up and throws him over bis shoulder. Sancho bangs loose, lifeless.)

Revolucionario (To audience). He’s the best model we got! ¡Ajua!25

(Exit.)

THE END

22ése man. 23lana money. 24vatos guys. 25¡Ajua! Wow!

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. If you are an Anglo (shorthand for a Caucasian with traditional Northern European values), do you find the play deeply offensive? Why, or why not? If you are a Mexican-American, do you find the play entertaining or do you find parts of it offensive? What might Anglos enjoy in the play, and what might Mexican-Americans find offensive?
2. What stereotypes of Mexican-Americans are presented here? At the end of the play, what image of the Mexican-American is presented? How does it compare with the stereotypes?

3. Putting aside the politics of the play (and your own politics), what do you think are the strengths of Los Vendidos? What do you think are the weaknesses?

4. The play was written in 1967. Putting aside a few specific references—for instance, to Governor Reagan—do you find it dated? If not, why not?

5. In his short essay “The Actos,” Valdez says that actos achieve the following: “Inspire the audience to social action. Illuminate specific points about social problems. Satirize the opposition. Show or hint at a solution. Express what people are feeling.” How much of this do you think Los Vendidos does?

6. Many people assume that politics gets in the way of serious art. That is, they assume that artists ought to be concerned with issues that transcend politics. Does this point make any sense to you? Why or why not?

The Play on the Stage

7. In 1971 when Los Vendidos was produced by El Teatro de la Esperanza, the group altered the ending by having the men decide to use the money to build a community center. Evaluate this ending.

8. Jorge Huerta, who directed the 1971 El Teatro de la Esperanza production of Los Vendidos, suggests that it was a mistake for Jane Fonda to be cast as Miss Jimenes in the videotape of the play. “Something is lost,” he says, “in the realization that this woman is not pretending to be white. . . .” Do you agree? Explain.

9. When the play was videotaped by KNBC in Los Angeles for broadcast in 1973, Valdez changed the ending. In the revised version we discover that a scientist (played by Valdez) masterminds the operation, placing Mexican-American models wherever there are persons of Mexican descent. These models soon will become Chicanos (as opposed to persons with Anglo values) and will aid rather than work against their fellows. Evaluate this ending.

A CONTEXT FOR LOS VENDIDOS

LUIS VALDEZ

The Actos

[1970]

Nothing represents the work of El Teatro Campesino (and other teatros Chicano) better than the acto. In a sense, the acto is Chicano theatre, though we are now moving into a new, more mystical dramatic form we have begun to call the mito. The two forms are, in fact, cuates¹ that complement and ¹cuates twins.

balance each other as day goes into night, el sol la sombra, la vida la muerte, el pájaro la serpiente. Our rejection of white western European (gabacho) proscenium theatre makes the birth of new Chicano forms necessary, thus, los actos y los mitos; one through the eyes of man, the other through the eyes of God.

The actos were born quite matter of factly in Delano. Nacieron hambrientos de la realidad. Anything and everything that pertained to the daily life, la vida cotidiana, of the huelguistas became food for thought, material for actos. The reality of campesinos on strike had become dramatic (and theatrical as reflected by newspapers, TV newscasts, films, etc.), and so the actos merely reflected the reality. Huelguistas portrayed huelguistas, drawing their improvised dialogue from real words they exchanged with the esquiroles (scabs) in the fields every day.

“Hermanos, compañeros, sálganse de esos files. ”
“Tenemos comida y trabajo para ustedes afuera de la huelga.”
“Esquirol, ten vergüenza.”
“Unidos venceremos.”
“¡Sal de ahí barrigón!”

The first huelguista to portray an esquirol in the teatro did it to settle a score with a particularly stubborn scab he had talked with in the fields that day. Satire became a weapon that was soon aimed at known and despised contractors, growers and mayordomos. The effect of those early actos on the huelguistas de Delano packed into Filipino Hall was immediate, intense and cathartic. The actos rang true to the reality of the huelga.

Looking back at those early, crude, vital, beautiful, powerful actos of 1965, certain things have now become clear about the dramatic form we were just beginning to develop. There was, of course, no conscious deliberate plan to develop the acto as such. Even the name we gave our small presentations reflects the hard pressing expediency under which we worked from day to day. We could have called them “skits,” but we lived and talked in San Joaquin Valley Spanish (with a strong Tejano influence), so we needed a name that made sense to the raza. Cuadros, pasquines, autos, entremites all seemed too highly intellectualized. We began to call them actos for lack of a better word, lack of time and lack of interest in trying to sound like classical Spanish scholars. De todos modos éramos raza, ¿quién se iba a fijar?

The acto, however, developed its own structure through five years of experimentation. It evolved into a short dramatic form now used primarily by los teatros de Aztlán, but utilized to some extent by other non-Chicano 3huelguistas strikers. The following five lines of dialogue can be translated thus: Brothers, friends, leave those rows. We have food and work for you outside of the strike. Scab, you ought to be ashamed. United we will conquer. Get out of here, fatso!

5Cuadros . . . entremites various Spanish words for short plays.
6De todos . . . fijar? In all ways we are the Race (i.e., indigenous Americans mixed with European and African blood); who was going to pay attention?
guerrilla theatre companies throughout the U.S., including the San Francisco Mime Troupe and the Bread and Puppet Theatre. (Considerable creative crossfeeding has occurred on other levels, I might add, between the Mime Troupe, the Bread and Puppet, and the Campesino.) Each of these groups may have their own definition of the acto, but the following are some of the guidelines we have established for ourselves over the years:

Actos: Inspire the audience to social action. Illuminate specific points about social problems. Satirize the opposition. Show or hint at a solution. Express what people are feeling.

So what’s new, right? Plays have been doing that for thousands of years. True, except that the major emphasis in the acto is the social vision, as opposed to the individual artist or playwright’s vision. Actos are not written; they are created collectively, through improvisation by a group. The reality reflected in an acto is thus a social reality, whether it pertains to campesinos or to batos locos, not psychologically deranged self-projections, but rather, group archetypes. Don Sotaco, Don Coyote, Johnny Pachuco, Juan Raza, Jorge el Chingón, la Chicana, are all group archetypes that have appeared in actos.

The usefulness of the acto extended well beyond the huelga into the Chicano movement, because Chicanos in general want to identify themselves as a group. The teatro archetypes symbolize the desire for unity and group identity through Chicano heroes and heroines. One character can thus represent the entire Raza, and the Chicano audience will gladly respond to his triumphs or defeats. What to a non-Chicano audience may seem like oversimplification in an acto, is to the Chicano a true expression of his social state and therefore reality.

JANE MARTIN

Jane Martin has never given an interview and has never been photographed. The name presumably is the pseudonym of a writer who works with the Actors Theatre of Louisville, Kentucky. Rodeo is one of a collection of monologues, Talking With . . ., first presented at the Actors Theatre during the 1981 Humana Festival of New American Plays. Jane Martin has also written full-length plays.

Rodeo [1981]

A young woman in her late twenties sits working on a piece of tack.* Beside her is a Lone Star beer in the can. As the lights come up we hear the last verse of a Tanya Tucker song or some other female country-western vocalist. She is wearing old worn jeans and boots plus a long-sleeved workshirt with the sleeves rolled up. She works until the song is over and then speaks.

* tack harness for a horse, including the bridle and saddle.
BIG EIGHT. Shoot—Rodeo’s just goin’ to hell in a handbasket. Rodeo used to be somethin’. I loved it. I did. Once Daddy an’ a bunch of ‘em was foolin’ around with some old bronc over to our place and this ol’ red nose named Cinch got bucked off and my Daddy hooted and said he had him a nine-year-old girl, namely me, wouldn’t have no damn trouble cow- boyn’ that horse. Well, he put me on up there, stuck that ridin’ rein in my hand, gimme a kiss, and said, “Now there’s only one thing I remember Honey Love, if ya fall off you jest don’t come home.” Well I stayed up. You gotta stay on a bronc eight seconds. Otherwise the ride don’t count. So from that day on my daddy called me Big Eight. Heck! That’s all the name I got anymore . . . Big Eight.

Used to be fer cowboys, the rodeo did. Do it in some open field, folks would pull their cars and pick-ups round it, sit on the hoods, some ranch hand’d bulldog him some rank steer and everybody’d wave their hats and call him by name. Ride us some buckin’ stock, rope a few calves, git threwed off a bull, and then we’d jest git us to a bar and tell each other lies about how good we were.

Used to be a family thing. Wooly Billy Tilson and Tammy Lee had them five kids on the circuit. Three boys, two girls and Wooly and Tammy. Wasn’t no two-beer rodeo in Oklahoma didn’t have a Tilson entered. Used to call the oldest girl Tits. Tits Tilson. Never seen a girl that top-heavy could ride so well. Said she only fell off when the gravity got her. Cowboys used to say if she landed face down you could plant two young trees in the holes she’d leave. Ha! Tits Tilson.
Used to be people came to a rodeo had a horse of their own back home. Farm people, ranch people—lord, they knew what they were lookin’ at. Knew a good ride from a bad ride, knew hard from easy. You broke some bones or spent the day eatin’ dirt, at least ya got appreciated.

Now they bought the rodeo. Them. Coca-Cola, Pepsi Cola, Marlboro damn cigarettes. You know the ones I mean. Them. Hire some New York faggot t’ sit on some ol’ stuffed horse in front of a sagebrush photo n’ smoke that junk. Hell, tobacco wasn’t made to smoke, honey, it was made to chew. Lord wanted ya filled up with smoke he would’ve set ya on fire. Damn it gets me!

There’s some guy in a banker’s suit runs the rodeo now. Got him a pinky ring and a digital watch, honey. Told us we oughta have a watchamacallit, choreographus or somethin’, some ol’ ballbuster used to be with the Ice damn Capades. Wants us to ride around dressed up like Mickey Mouse, Pluto, crap like that. Told me I had to haul my butt through the barrel race done up like Minnie damn Mouse in a tu-tu. Huh uh, honey! Them people is so screwed-up they probably eat what they run over in the road.

Listen, they got the clowns wearin’ Astronaut suits! I ain’t lyin’. You know what a rodeo clown does! You go down, fall off whatever—the clown runs in front of the bull so’s ya don’t git stomped. Pinstripes, he got ’em in space suits tellin’ jokes on a microphone. First horse see ’em, done up like the Star Wars went crazy. Best buckin’ horse on the circuit, name of Piss ‘N’ Vinegar, took one look at them clowns, had him a heart attack and died. Cowboy was ridin’ him got hisself squashed. Twelve hundred pounds of coronary arrest jes fell right through ’em. Blam! Vio con dios. Crowd thought that was funnier than the astronauts. I swear it won’t be long before they’re strappin’ ice-skates on the ponies. Big crowds now. Ain’t hardly no ranch people, no farm people, nobody I know. Buncha disco babies and dee-vorce lawyers—designer jeans and day-glo Stetsons. Hell, the whole bunch of ’em wears French perfume. Oh it smells like money now! Got it on the cable T and V—heh, you know what, when ya rodeo yer just bound to kick yerself up some dust—well now, seems like that fogs up the ol’ TV camera, so they told us a while back that from now on we was gonna ride on some new stuff called Astro-dirt. Dust free. Artificial damn dirt, honey. Lord have mercy.

Banker Suit called me in the other day said “Lurlene . . .” “Hold it,” I said. “Who’s this Lurlene? Round here they call me Big Eight.” “Well, Big Eight,” he said, “my name’s Wallace.” “Well that’s a read surprise t’ me,” I said, “cause aroun’ here everybody jes calls you Dumb-ass.” My, he laughed real big, slapped his big ol’ desk, an’ then he said I wasn’t suitable for the rodeo no more. Said they was lookin’ fer another type, somethin’ a little more in the showgirl line, like the Dallas Cowgirls maybe. Said the ridin’ and ropin’ wasn’t the thing no more. Talked on about floats, costumes, dancin’ choreog-aphy. If I was a man I woulda pissed on his shoe. Said he’d give me a lifetime pass though. Said I could come to his rodeo any time I wanted.

Rodeo used to be people ridin’ horses for the pleasure of people who rode horses—made you feel good about what you could do. Rodeo wasn’t worth no money to nobody. Money didn’t have nothing to do with it! Used to be seven Tilsons riding in the rodeo. Wouldn’t none of ‘em dress up like Donald damn Duck so they quit. That there’s the law of gravity!

There’s a bunch of assholes in this country sneak around until they see ya havin’ fun and then they buy the fun and start in sellin’ it. See, they figure if ya love it, they can sell it. Well you look out, honey! They want to make them a dollar out of what you love. Dress you up like Minnie Mouse. Sell your rodeo. Turn yer pleasure into Ice damn Capades. You hear what I’m sayin’? You’re jus’ merchandise to them, sweetie. You’re jus’ merchandise to them.

BLACKOUT.

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. Try to recall your response to the title and the first paragraph or two of the play. Did Big Eight fit your view (perhaps a stereotypical view) of what a cowgirl might sound like?
2. Reread Rodeo, this time paying attention not only to what Big Eight says but also to your responses to her. By the end of the play has she become a somewhat more complicated figure than she seems to be after the first paragraph, or does she pretty much seem the same? Do you find that you become increasingly sympathetic? Increasingly unsympathetic? Or does your opinion not change?
3. If you have ever seen a rodeo, do you think Big Eight’s characterization is on the mark? Or is she simply bitter because she has been fired?
4. If a local theater group were staging Rodeo, presumably with some other short plays, would you go to see it? Why, or why not?

The Play on the Stage

5. If you were directing a production of Rodeo, would you keep the actor seated, or would you have her get up, move around the stage, perhaps hang up one piece of tack and take down another? Why?
6. If you were directing Rodeo, would you tell Big Eight that her speech is essentially an interior monologue—a soliloquy—or would you tell her that she is speaking directly to the audience—i.e., that the audience is, collectively, a character in the play?
7. The play ends with a stage direction, “Blackout”; that is, the stage suddenly darkens. One director of a recent production, however, chose to end with a “fade out”; the illumination decreased slowly by means of dimmers (mechanical devices that regulate the intensity of a lighting unit). If you were directing a production, what sort of lighting would you use at the end? Why?
AUGUST WILSON

August Wilson was born in Pittsburgh in 1945, the son of a black woman and a white man. After dropping out of school at the age of 15, Wilson took various odd jobs, such as stock clerk and short-order cook, in his spare time educating himself in the public library, chiefly by reading works by such black writers as Richard Wright, Ralph Ellison, Langston Hughes, and Amiri Baraka (LeRoi Jones). In 1978 the director of a black theater in St. Paul, Minnesota, who had known Wilson in Pittsburgh, invited him to write a play for the theater. Six months later Wilson moved permanently to St. Paul.

The winner of the Pulitzer Prize for drama in 1987, Wilson's Fences was first presented as a staged reading in 1983 and was later performed in Chicago, Seattle, Rochester (New York), and New Haven (Connecticut) before reaching New York City in 1987. An earlier play, Ma Rainey's Black Bottom, was voted Best Play of the Year 1984–1985 by the New York Drama Critics’ Circle. In 1981 when Ma Rainey was first read at the O’Neill Center in Waterford, Connecticut, Wilson met Lloyd Richards, an African-American director with whom he has continued to work closely. The Piano Lesson, directed by Richards, won Wilson a second Pulitzer Prize in 1990. Wilson died in 2005.

LIST OF CHARACTERS

TROY MAXSON
JIM BONO, Troy's friend
ROSE, Troy's wife
LYONS, Troy's oldest son by previous marriage
GABRIEL, Troy's brother
CORY, Troy and Rose's son
RAYNELL, Troy's daughter

SETTING: The setting is the yard which fronts the only entrance to the Maxson household, an ancient two-story brick house set back off a small alley in a big-city neighborhood. The entrance to the house is gained by two or three steps leading to a wooden porch badly in need of paint.

A relatively recent addition to the house and running its full width, the porch lacks congruence. It is a sturdy porch with a flat roof. One or two chairs of dubious value sit at one end where the kitchen window opens onto the porch. An old-fashioned icebox stands silent guard at the opposite end.

The yard is a small dirt yard, partially fenced, except for the last scene, with a wooden saw borse, a pile of lumber, and other fence-building equipment set off to the side. Opposite is a tree from which hangs a ball made of rags. A baseball bat leans against the tree. Two oil drums serve as garbage receptacles and sit near the house at right to complete the setting.

THE PLAY: Near the turn of the century, the destitute of Europe sprang on the city with tenacious claws and an honest and solid dream. The city devoured them. They swelled its belly until it burst into a thousand furnaces and sewing machines, a thousand butcher shops and bakers’ ovens, a thousand churches and hospitals and funeral parlors and money-lenders. The city grew. It nourished itself and offered each man a partnership limited only by his talent, his guile, and his willingness and capacity for hard work. For the immigrants of Europe, a dream dared and won true.
The descendants of African slaves were offered no such welcome or participation. They came from places called the Carolinas and the Virginias, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee. They came strong, eager, searching. The city rejected them and they fled and settled along the riverbanks and under bridges in shallow, ramshackle houses made of sticks and tarpaper. They collected rags and wood. They sold the use of their muscles and their bodies. They cleaned houses and washed clothes, they shined shoes, and in quiet desperation and vengeful pride, they stole, and lived in pursuit of their own dream. That they could breathe free, finally, and stand to meet life with the force of dignity and whatever eloquence the heart could call upon.

By 1957, the hard-won victories of the European immigrants had solidified the industrial might of America. War had been confronted and won with new energies that used loyalty and patriotism as its fuel. Life was rich, full, and flourishing. The Milwaukee Braves won the World Series, and the hot winds of change that would make the sixties a turbulent, racing, dangerous, and provocative decade had not yet begun to blow full.

Scene 1

It is 1957. TROY and BONO enter the yard, engaged in conversation. TROY is fifty-three years old, a large man with thick, heavy hands; it is this largeness that he strives to fill out and make an accommodation with. Together with his blackness, his largeness informs his sensibilities and the choices he has made in his life.

Of the two men, BONO is obviously the follower. His commitment to their friendship of thirty-odd years is rooted in his admiration of TROY's honesty, capacity for hard work, and his strength, which BONO seeks to emulate.

It is Friday night, payday, and the one night of the week the two men engage in a ritual of talk and drink. TROY is usually the most talkative and at times he can be crude and almost vulgar, though he is capable of rising to profound heights of expression. The men carry lunch buckets and wear or carry burlap aprons and are dressed in clothes suitable to their jobs as garbage collectors.

BONO. Troy, you ought to stop that lying!
TROY. I ain't lying! The nigger had a watermelon this big. (He indicates with his hands.) Talking about . . . “What watermelon, Mr. Rand?” I liked to fell out! “What watermelon, Mr. Rand?” . . . And it sitting there big as life.

BONO. What did Mr. Rand say?
TROY. Ain't said nothing. Figure if the nigger too dumb to know he carrying a watermelon, he wasn't gonna get much sense out of him. Trying to hide that great big old watermelon under his coat. Afraid to let the white man see him carry it home.

BONO. I'm like you . . . I ain't got no time for them kind of people.
TROY. Now what he look like getting mad cause he see the man from the union talking to Mr. Rand?
BONO. He come to me talking about . . . "Maxson gonna get us fired." I told him to get away from me with that. He walked away from me calling you a troublemaker. What Mr. Rand say?

TROY. Ain’t said nothing. He told me to go down the Commissioner’s office next Friday. They called me down there to see them.

BONO. Well, as long as you got your complaint filed, they can’t fire you. That’s what one of them white fellows tell me.

TROY. I ain’t worried about them firing me. They gonna fire me cause I asked a question? That’s all I did. I went to Mr. Rand and asked him, “Why? Why you got the white mens driving and the colored lifting?” Told him, “what’s the matter, don’t I count? You think only white fellows got sense enough to drive a truck. That ain’t no paper job! Hell, anybody can drive a truck. How come you got all whites driving and the colored lifting?” He told me “take it to the union.” Well, hell, that’s what I done! Now they wanna come up with this pack of lies.

BONO. I told Brownie if the man come and ask him any questions . . . just tell the truth! It ain’t nothing but something they done trumped up on you cause you filed a complaint on them.

TROY. Brownie don’t understand nothing. All I want them to do is change the job description. Give everybody a chance to drive the truck. Brownie can’t see that. He ain’t got that much sense.

BONO. How you figure he be making out with that gal be up at Taylor’s all the time . . . that Alberta gal?

TROY. Same as you and me. Getting just as much as we is. Which is to say nothing.

BONO. It is, huh? I figure you doing a little better than me . . . and I ain’t saying what I’m doing.

TROY. Aw, nigger, look here . . . I know you. If you had got anywhere near that gal, twenty minutes later you be looking to tell somebody. And the first one you gonna tell . . . that you gonna want to brag to . . . is me.

BONO. I ain’t saying that. I see where you be eyeing her.

TROY. I eye all the women. I don’t miss nothing. Don’t never let nobody tell you Troy Maxson don’t eye the women.

BONO. You been doing more than eyeing her. You done bought her a drink or two.

TROY. Hell yeah, I bought her a drink! What that mean? I bought you one, too. What that mean cause I buy her a drink? I’m just being polite.

BONO. It’s all right to buy her one drink. That’s what you call being polite. But when you wanna be buying two or three . . . that’s what you call eyeing her.

TROY. Look here, as long as you known me . . . you ever known me to chase after women?

BONO. Hell yeah! Long as I done known you. You forgetting I knew you when.

TROY. Naw, I’m talking about since I been married to Rose?

BONO. Oh, not since you been married to Rose. Now, that’s the truth, there. I can say that.

TROY. All right then! Case closed.

BONO. I see you be walking up around Alberta’s house. You supposed to be at Taylors and you be walking up around there.

TROY. What you watching where I’m walking for? I ain’t watching after you.

BONO. I seen you walking around there more than once.
TROY. Hell, you liable to see me walking anywhere! That don’t mean nothing cause you see me walking around there.

BONO. Where she come from anyway? She just kinda showed up one day.

TROY. Tallahassee. You can look at her and tell she one of them Florida gals. They got some big healthy women down there. Grow them right up out the ground. Got a little bit of Indian in her. Most of them niggers down in Florida got some Indian in them.

BONO. I don’t know about that Indian part. But she damn sure big and healthy. Woman wear some big stockings. Got them great big old legs and hips as wide as the Mississippi River.

TROY. Legs don’t mean nothing. You don’t do nothing but push them out of the way. But them hips cushion the ride!

BONO. Troy, you ain’t got no sense.

TROY. It’s the truth! Like you riding on Goodyears!

ROSE enters from the house. She is ten years younger than Troy, her devotion to him stems from her recognition of the possibilities of her life without him: a succession of abusive men and their babies, a life of partying and running the streets, the Church, or aloneness with its attendant pain and frustration. She recognizes Troy’s spirit as a fine and illuminating one and she either ignores or forgives his faults, only some of which she recognizes. Though she doesn’t drink, her presence is an integral part of the Friday night rituals. She alternates between the porch and the kitchen, where supper preparations are under way.

ROSE. What you all out here getting into?

TROY. What you worried about what we getting into for? This is men talk, woman.

ROSE. What I care what you all talking about? Bono, you gonna stay for supper?

BONO. No, I thank you, Rose. But Lucille say she cooking up a pot of pigfeet.

TROY. Pigfeet! Hell, I’m going home with you! Might even stay the night if you got some pigfeet. You got something in there to top them pigfeet, Rose?

ROSE. I’m cooking up some chicken. I got some chicken and collard greens.

TROY. Well, go on back in the house and let me and Bono finish what we was talking about. This is men talk. I got some talk for you later. You know what kind of talk I mean. You go on and powder it up.

ROSE. Troy Maxson, don’t you start that now!

TROY (puts his arm around her). Aw, woman . . . come here. Look here, Bono . . . when I met this woman . . . I got out that place, say, “Hitch up my pony, saddle up my mare . . . there’s a woman out there for me somewhere. I looked here. Looked there. Saw Rose and latched on to her.” I latched on to her and told her—I’m gonna tell you the truth—I told her, “Baby, I don’t wanna marry, I just wanna be your man.” Rose told me . . . tell him what you told me, Rose.

ROSE. I told him if he wasn’t the marrying kind, then move out the way so the marrying kind could find me.

TROY. That’s what she told me. “Nigger, you in my way. You blocking the view! Move out the way so I can find me a husband.” I thought it over two or three days. Come back—

ROSE. Ain’t no two or three days nothing. You was back the same night.
TROY. Come back, told her . . . “Okay, baby . . . but I'm gonna buy me a banty rooster and put him out there in the backyard . . . and when he see a stranger come, he'll flap his wings and crow . . .” Look here, Bono, I could watch the front door by myself . . . it was that back door I was worried about.

ROSE. Troy, you ought not talk like that. Troy ain't doing nothing but telling a lie.

TROY. Only thing is . . . when we first got married . . . forget the rooster . . . we ain't had no yard!

BONO. I hear you tell it. Me and Lucille was staying down there on Logan Street. Had two rooms with the outhouse in the back. I ain't mind the outhouse none. But when that goddamn wind blow through there in the winter . . . that's what I'm talking about! To this day I wonder why in the hell I ever stayed down there for six long years. But see, I didn't know I could do no better. I thought only white folks had inside toilets and things.

ROSE. There's a lot of people don't know they can do no better than they doing now. That's just something you got to learn. A lot of folks still shop at Bella's.

TROY. Ain't nothing wrong with shopping at Bella's. She got fresh food.

ROSE. I ain't said nothing about if she got fresh food. I'm talking about what she charge. She charge ten cents more than the A&P.

TROY. The A&P ain't never done nothing for me. I spend my money where I'm treated right. I go down to Bella, say, “I need a loaf of bread, I'll pay you Friday.” She give it to me. What sense that make when I got money to go and spend it somewhere else and ignore the person who done right by me? That ain't in the Bible.

ROSE. We ain't talking about what's in the Bible. What sense it make to shop there when she overcharge?

TROY. You shop where you want to. I'll do my shopping where the people been good to me.

ROSE. Well, I don't think it's right for her to overcharge. That's all I was saying.

BONO. Look here . . . I got to get on. Lucille going be raising all kind of hell.

TROY. Where you going, nigger? We ain't finished this pint. Come here, finish this pint.

BONO. Well, hell, I am . . . if you ever turn the bottle loose.

TROY (hands him the bottle). The only thing I say about the A&P is I'm glad Cory got that job down there. Help him take care of his school clothes and things. Gabe done moved out and things getting tight around here. He got that job . . . He can start to look out for himself.

ROSE. Cory done went and got recruited by a college football team.

TROY. I told that boy about that football stuff. The white man ain't gonna let him get nowhere with that football. I told him when he first come to me with it. Now you come telling me he done went and got more tied up in it. He ought to go and get recruited in how to fix cars or something where he can make a living.

ROSE. He ain't talking about making no living playing football. It's just something the boys in school do. They gonna send a recruiter by to talk to you. He'll tell you he ain't talking about making no living playing football. It's a honor to be recruited.
TROY. It ain’t gonna get him nowhere. Bono’ll tell you that.

BONO. If he be like you in the sports . . . he’s gonna be all right. Ain’t but two men ever played baseball as good as you. That’s Babe Ruth and Josh Gibson.¹ Them’s the only two men ever hit more home runs than you.

TROY. What it ever get me? Ain’t got a pot to piss in or a window to throw it out of.

ROSE. Times have changed since you was playing baseball, Troy. That was before the war. Times have changed a lot since then.

TROY. How in hell they done changed?

ROSE. They got lots of colored boys playing ball now. Baseball and football.

BONO. You right about that, Rose. Times have changed, Troy. You just come along too early.

TROY. There ought not never have been no time called too early! Now you take that fellow . . . what’s that fellow they had playing right field for the Yankees back then? You know who I’m talking about, Bono. Used to play right field for the Yankees.

ROSE. Selkirk?

TROY. Selkirk! That’s it! Man batting .269, understand? .269. What kind of sense that make? I was hitting .432 with thirty-seven home runs! Man batting .269 and playing right field for the Yankees! I saw Josh Gibson’s daughter yesterday. She walking around with raggedy shoes on her feet. Now I bet you Selkirk’s daughter ain’t walking around with raggedy shoes on her feet! I bet you that!

ROSE. They got a lot of colored baseball players now. Jackie Robinson² was the first. Folks had to wait for Jackie Robinson.

TROY. I done seen a hundred niggers play baseball better than Jackie Robinson. Hell, I know some teams Jackie Robinson couldn’t even make! What you talking about Jackie Robinson. Jackie Robinson wasn’t nobody. I’m talking about if you could play ball then they ought to have let you play. Don’t care what color you were. Come telling me I come along too early. If you could play . . . then they ought to have let you play.

TROY takes a long drink from the bottle.

ROSE. You gonna drink yourself to death. You don’t need to be drinking like that.

TROY. Death ain’t nothing. I done seen him. Done wrestled with him. You can’t tell me nothing about death. Death ain’t nothing but a fastball on the outside corner. And you know what I’ll do to that! Lookee here, Bono . . . am I lying? You get one of them fastballs, about waist high, over the outside corner of the plate where you can get the meat of the bat on it . . . and good god! You can kiss it goodbye. Now, am I lying?

BONO. Naw, you telling the truth there. I seen you do it.

TROY. If I’m lying . . . that 450 feet worth of lying! (Pause.) That’s all death is to me. A fastball on the outside corner.

ROSE. I don’t know why you want to get on talking about death.

¹Josh Gibson African-American ballplayer (1911–1947), known as the Babe Ruth of the Negro Leagues. ²Jackie Robinson In 1947 Robinson (1919–1972) became the first African-American to play baseball in the major leagues.
TROY. Ain’t nothing wrong with talking about death. That’s part of life. Everybody gonna die. You gonna die, I’m gonna die. Bono’s gonna die. Hell, we all gonna die.

ROSE. But you ain’t got to talk about it. I don’t like to talk about it.

TROY. You the one brought it up. Me and Bono was talking about baseball . . . you tell me I’m gonna drink myself to death. Ain’t that right, Bono? You know I don’t drink this but one night out of the week. That’s Friday night. I’m gonna drink just enough to where I can handle it. Then I cuts it loose. I leave it alone. So don’t you worry about me drinking myself to death. ‘Cause I ain’t worried about Death. I done seen him. I done wrestled with him.

Look here, Bono . . . I looked up one day and Death was marching straight at me. Like Soldiers on Parade! The Army of Death was marching straight at me. The middle of July, 1941. It got real cold just like it be winter. It seem like Death himself reached out and touched me on the shoulder. He touch me just like I touch you. I got cold as ice and Death standing there grinning at me.

ROSE. Troy, why don’t you hush that talk.

TROY. I say . . . what you want, Mr. Death? You be wanting me? You done brought your army to be getting me? I looked him dead in the eye. I wasn’t fearing nothing. I was ready to tangle. Just like I’m ready to tangle now. The Bible say be ever vigilant. That’s why I don’t get but so drunk. I got to keep watch.

ROSE. Troy was right down there in Mercy Hospital. You remember he had pneumonia? Laying there with a fever talking plumb out of his head.

TROY. Death standing there staring at me . . . carrying that sickle in his hand. Finally he say, “You want bound over for another year?” See, just like that . . . “You want bound over for another year?” I told him, “Bound over hell! Let’s settle this now!”

It seem like he kinda fell back when I said that, and all the cold went out of me. I reached down and grabbed that sickle and threw it just as far as I could throw it . . . and me and him commenced to wrestling.

We wrestled for three days and three nights. I can’t say where I found the strength from. Everytime it seemed like he was gonna get the best of me, I’d reach way down deep inside myself and find the strength to do him one better.

ROSE. Everytime Troy tell that story he find different ways to tell it. Different things to make up about it.

TROY. I ain’t making up nothing. I’m telling you the facts of what happened. I wrestled with Death for three days and three nights and I’m standing here to tell you about it. (Pause.) All right. At the end of the third night we done weakened each other to where we can’t hardly move. Death stood up, throwed on his robe . . . had him a white robe with a hood on it. He throwed on that robe and went off to look for his sickle. Say, “I’ll be back.” Just like that. “I’ll be back,” I told him, say, “Yeah, but . . . you gonna have to find me!” I wasn’t no fool. I wasn’t going looking for him. Death ain’t nothing to play with. And I know he’s gonna get me. I know I got to join his army . . . his camp followers. But as long as I keep my strength and see him coming . . . as long as I keep up my vigilance . . . he’s gonna have to fight to get me. I ain’t going easy.

BONO. Well, look here, since you got to keep up your vigilance . . . let me have the bottle.
TROY. Aw hell, I shouldn’t have told you that part. I should have left out that part.

ROSE. Troy be talking that stuff and half the time don’t even know what he be talking about.

TROY. Bono know me better than that.

BONO. That’s right. I know you. I know you got some Uncle Remus in your blood. You got more stories than the devil got sinners.

TROY. Aw hell, I done seen him too! Done talked with the devil.

ROSE. Troy, don’t nobody wanna be hearing all that stuff.

LYONS enters the yard from the street. Thirty-four years old, TROY’s son by a previous marriage, he sports a neatly trimmed goatee, sport coat, white shirt, tieless and buttoned at the collar. Though he fancies himself a musician, he is more caught up in the rituals and “idea” of being a musician than in the actual practice of the music. He has come to borrow money from TROY, and while he knows he will be successful, he is uncertain as to what extent his lifestyle will be held up to scrutiny and ridicule.

LYONS. Hey, Pop.

TROY. What you come “Hey, Popping” me for?

LYONS. How you doing, Rose? (He kisses her. He kisses her.) Mr. Bono. How you doing?

BONO. Hey, Lyons . . . how you been?

TROY. He must have been doing all right. I ain’t seen him around here last week.

ROSE. Troy, leave your boy alone. He come by to see you and you wanna start all that nonsense.

TROY. I ain’t bothering Lyons. (Offers him the bottle.) Here . . . get you a drink. We got an understanding. I know why he come by to see me and he know I know.

LYONS. Come on, Pop . . . I just stopped by to say hi . . . see how you was doing.

TROY. You ain’t stopped by yesterday.

ROSE. You gonna stay for supper, Lyons? I got some chicken cooking in the oven.

LYONS. No, Rose . . . thanks. I was just in the neighborhood and thought I’d stop by for a minute.

TROY. You was in the neighborhood all right, nigger. You telling the truth there. You was in the neighborhood cause it’s my payday.

LYONS. Well, hell, since you mentioned it . . . let me have ten dollars.

TROY. I’ll be damned! I’ll die and go to hell and play blackjack with the devil before I give you ten dollars.

BONO. That’s what I wanna know about . . . that devil you done seen.

LYONS. What . . . Pop done seen the devil? You too much, Pops.

TROY. Yeah, I done seen him. Talked to him too!

ROSE. You ain’t seen no devil. I done told you that man ain’t had nothing to do with the devil. Anything you can’t understand, you want to call it the devil.

TROY. Look here, Bono . . . I went down to see Hertzberger about some furniture. Got three rooms for two-ninety-eight. That what it say on the —Uncle Remus narrator of traditional black tales in a book by Joel Chandler Harris.

radio. "Three rooms . . . two-ninety-eight." Even made up a little song about it. Go down there . . . man tell me I can't get no credit. I'm working every day and can't get no credit. What to do? I got an empty house with some raggedy furniture in it. Cory ain't got no bed. He's sleeping on a pile of rags on the floor. Working every day and can't get no credit. Come back here—Rose'll tell you—madder than hell. Sit down . . . try to figure what I'm gonna do. Come a knock on the door. Ain't been living here but three days. Who know I'm here? Open the door . . . devil standing there bigger than life. White fellow . . . white fellow . . . got on good clothes and everything. Standing there with a clipboard in his hand. I ain't had to say nothing. First words come out of his mouth was . . . "I understand you need some furniture and can't get no credit." I liked to fell over. He say, "I'll give you all the credit you want, but you got to pay the interest on it." I told him, "Give me three rooms worth and charge whatever you want." Next day a truck pulled up here and two men unloaded them three rooms. Man what drove the truck give me a book. Say send ten dollars, first of every month to the address in the book and every thing will be all right. Say if I miss a payment the devil was coming back and it'll be hell to pay. That was fifteen years ago. To this day . . . the first of the month I send my ten dollars, Rose'll tell you.

ROSE. Troy lying.

TROY. I ain't never seen that man since. Now you tell me who else that could have been but the devil? I ain't sold my soul or nothing like that, you understand. Naw, I wouldn't have truck with the devil about nothing like that. I got my furniture and pays my ten dollars the first of the month just like clockwork.

BONO. How long you say you been paying this ten dollars a month?

TROY. Fifteen years!

BONO. Hell, ain't you finished paying for it yet? How much the man done charged you?

TROY. Ah hell, I done paid for it. I done paid for it ten times over! The fact is I'm scared to stop paying it.

ROSE. Troy lying. We got that furniture from Mr. Glickman. He ain't paying no ten dollars a month to nobody.

TROY. Aw hell, woman. Bono know I ain't that big a fool.

LYONS. I was just getting ready to say . . . I know where there's a bridge for sale.

TROY. Look here, I'll tell you this . . . it don't matter to me if he was the devil. It don't matter if the devil give credit. Somebody has got to give it.

ROSE. It ought to matter. You going around talking about having truck with the devil . . . God's the one you gonna have to answer to. He's the one gonna be at the Judgment.

LYONS. Yeah, well, look here, Pop . . . Let me have that ten dollars. I'll give it back to you. Bonnie got a job working at the hospital.

TROY. What I tell you, Bono? The only time I see this nigger is when he wants something. That's the only time I see him.

LYONS. Come on, Pop, Mr. Bono don't want to hear all that. Let me have the ten dollars. I told you Bonnie working.

TROY. What that mean to me? "Bonnie working." I don't care if she working. Go ask her for the ten dollars if she working. Talking about "Bonnie working." Why ain't you working?
LYONS. Aw, Pop, you know I can’t find no decent job. Where am I gonna get a job at? You know I can’t get no job.

TROY. I told you I know some people down there. I can get you on the rubbish if you want to work. I told you that the last time you came by here asking me for something.

LYONS. Naw, Pop . . . thanks. That ain’t for me. I don’t wanna be carrying nobody’s rubbish. I don’t wanna be punching nobody’s time clock.

TROY. What’s the matter, you too good to carry people’s rubbish? Where you think that ten dollars you talking about come from? I’m just supposed to haul people’s rubbish and give my money to you cause you too lazy to work. You too lazy to work and wanna know why you ain’t got what I got.

ROSE. What hospital Bonnie working at? Mercy?

LYONS. She’s down at Passavant working in the laundry.

TROY. I ain’t got nothing as it is. I give you that ten dollars and I got to eat beans the rest of the week. Naw . . . you ain’t getting no ten dollars here.

LYONS. You ain’t got to be eating no beans. I don’t know why you wanna say that.

TROY. I ain’t got no extra money. Gabe done moved over to Miss Pearl’s paying her the rent and things done got tight around here. I can’t afford to be giving you every payday.

LYONS. I ain’t asked you to give me nothing. I asked you to loan me ten dollars. I know you got ten dollars.

TROY. Yeah, I got it. You know why I got it? Cause I don’t throw my money away out there in the streets. You living the fast life . . . wanna be a musician . . . running around in them clubs and things . . . then, you learn to take care of yourself. You ain’t gonna find me going and asking nobody for nothing. I done spent too many years without.

LYONS. You and me is two different people, Pop.

TROY. I done learned my mistake and learned to do what’s right by it. You still trying to get something for nothing. Life don’t owe you nothing. You owe it to yourself. Ask Bono. He’ll tell you I’m right.

LYONS. You got your way of dealing with the world . . . I got mine. The only thing that matters to me is the music.

TROY. Yeah, I can see that! It don’t matter how you gonna eat . . . where your next dollar is coming from. You telling the truth there.

LYONS. I know I got to eat. But I got to live too. I need something that gonna help me to get out of the bed in the morning. Make me feel like I belong in the world. I don’t bother nobody. I just stay with the music cause that’s the only way I can find to live in the world. Otherwise there ain’t no telling what I might do. Now I don’t come criticizing you and how you live. I just come by to ask you for ten dollars. I don’t wanna hear all that about how I was raised.

TROY. Boy, your mamma did a hell of a job raising you.

LYONS. You can’t change me, Pop. I’m thirty-four years old. If you wanted to change me, you should have been there when I was growing up. I come by to see you . . . ask for ten dollars and you want to talk about how I was raised. You don’t know nothing about how I was raised.

ROSE. Let the boy have ten dollars, Troy.

TROY (to Lyons). What the hell you looking at me for? I ain’t got no ten dollars. You know what I do with my money. (To Rose.) Give him ten dollars if you want him to have it.
ROSE. I will. Just as soon as you turn it loose.
TROY (handing ROSE the money). There it is. Seventy-six dollars and forty-two cents. You see this, Bono? Now, I ain’t gonna get but six of that back.
ROSE. You ought to stop telling that lie. Here, Lyons. (She hands him the money.)
LYONS. Thanks, Rose. Look . . . I got to run . . . I’ll see you later.
TROY. Wait a minute. You gonna say, “thanks, Rose” and ain’t gonna look to see where she got that ten dollars from? See how they do me, Bono?
LYONS. I know she got it from you, Pop. Thanks. I’ll give it back to you.
TROY. There he go telling another lie. Time I see that ten dollars . . . he’ll be owing me thirty more.
LYONS. See you, Mr. Bono.
BONO. Take care, Lyons!
LYONS. Thanks, Pop. I’ll see you again.
LYONS exits the yard.
TROY. I don’t know why he don’t go and get him a decent job and take care of that woman he got.
BONO. He’ll be all right, Troy. The boy is still young.
TROY. The boy is thirty-four years old.
ROSE. Let’s not get off into all that.
BONO. Look here . . . I got to be going. I got to be getting on. Lucille gonna be waiting.
TROY (puts his arm around ROSE). See this woman, Bono? I love this woman. I love this woman so much it hurts. I love her so much . . . I done run out of ways of loving her. So I got to go back to basics. Don’t you come by my house Monday morning talking about time to go to work . . . ‘cause I’m still gonna be stroking!
ROSE. Troy! Stop it now!
BONO. I ain’t paying him no mind, Rose. That ain’t nothing but gin-talk. Go on, Troy. I’ll see you Monday.
TROY. Don’t you come by my house, nigger! I done told you what I’m gonna be doing.

The lights go down to black.

Scene 2

The lights come up on ROSE hanging up clothes. She hums and sings softly to herself. It is the following morning.

ROSE (sings).
Jesus, be a fence all around me every day
Jesus, I want you to protect me as I travel on my way.
Jesus, be a fence all around me every day.

TROY enters from the house.

Jesus, I want you to protect me
As I travel on my way.
(To TROY.) ’Morning. You ready for breakfast? I can fix it soon as I finish hanging up these clothes.

TROY. I got the coffee on. That’ll be all right. I’ll just drink some of that this morning.
ROSE. That 651 hit yesterday. That's the second time this month. Miss Pearl hit for a dollar . . . seem like those that need the least always get lucky. Poor folks can't get nothing.

TROY. Them numbers don't know nobody. I don't know why you fool with them. You and Lyons both.

ROSE. It's something to do.

TROY. You ain't doing nothing but throwing your money away.

ROSE. Troy, you know I don't play foolishly. I just play a nickel here and a nickel there.

TROY. That's two nickels you done thrown away.

ROSE. Now I hit sometimes . . . that makes up for it. It always comes in handy when I do hit. I don't hear you complaining then.

TROY. I ain't complaining now. I just say it's foolish. Trying to guess out of six hundred ways which way the number gonna come. If I had all the money niggers, these Negroes, throw away on numbers for one week—just one week—I'd be a rich man.

ROSE. Well, you wishing and calling it foolish ain't gonna stop folks from playing numbers. That's one thing for sure. Besides . . . some good things come from playing numbers. Look where Pope done bought him that restaurant off of numbers.

TROY. I can't stand niggers like that. Man ain't had two dimes to rub together. He walking around with his shoes all run over bumming money for cigarettes. All right. Got lucky there and hit the numbers . . .

ROSE. Troy, I know all about it.

TROY. Had good sense, I'll say that for him. He ain't threw his money away. I seen niggers hit the numbers and go through two thousand dollars in four days. Man bought him that restaurant down there . . . fixed it up real nice . . . and then didn't want nobody to come in it! A Negro go in there and can't get no kind of service. I seen a white fellow come in there and order a bowl of stew. Pope picked all the meat out of the pot for him. Man ain't had nothing but a bowl of meat! Negro come behind him and ain't got nothing but the potatoes and carrots. Talking about what numbers do for people, you picked a wrong example. Ain't done nothing but make a worse fool out of him than he was before.

ROSE. Troy, you ought to stop worrying about what happened at work yesterday.

TROY. I ain't worried. Just told me to be down there at the Commissioner's office on Friday. Everybody think they gonna fire me. I ain't worried about them firing me. You ain't got to worry about that. (Pause.) Where's Cory? Cory in the house? (Calls.) Cory?

ROSE. He gone out.

TROY. Out, huh? He gone out 'cause he know I want him to help me with this fence. I know how he is. That boy scared of work.

GABRIEL enters. He comes halfway down the alley and, bearing TROY'S voice, stops.

TROY (continues). He ain't done a lick of work in his life.

ROSE. He had to go to football practice. Coach wanted them to get in a little extra practice before the season start.

TROY. I got his practice . . . running out of here before he get his chores done.
ROSE. Troy, what is wrong with you this morning? Don’t nothing set right with you. Go on back in there and go to bed . . . get up on the other side.

TROY. Why something got to be wrong with me? I ain’t said nothing wrong with me.

ROSE. You got something to say about everything. First it’s the numbers . . . then it’s the way the man runs his restaurant . . . then you done got on Cory. What’s it gonna be next? Take a look up there and see if the weather suits you . . . or is it gonna be how you gonna put up the fence with the clothes hanging in the yard?

TROY. You hit the nail on the head then.

ROSE. I know you like I know the back of my hand. Go on in there and get you some coffee . . . see if that straighten you up. ’Cause you ain’t right this morning.

TROY starts into the house and sees GABRIEL. GABRIEL starts singing.

TROY’s brother, he is seven years younger than TROY. Injured in World War II, he has a metal plate in his head. He carries an old trumpet tied around his waist and believes with every fiber of his being that he is the Archangel Gabriel. He carries a chipped basket with an assortment of discarded fruits and vegetables he has picked up in the strip district and which he attempts to sell.

GABRIEL (singing).

Yes, ma’am I got plums
You ask me how I sell them
Oh ten cents apiece
Three for a quarter
Come and buy now
’Cause I’m here today
And tomorrow I’ll be gone

GABRIEL enters.

Hey, Rose!

ROSE. How you doing, Gabe?

GABRIEL. There’s Troy . . . Hey, Troy!

TROY. Hey, Gabe.

Exit into kitchen.

ROSE (to GABRIEL). What you got there?

GABRIEL. You know what I got, Rose. I got fruits and vegetables.

ROSE (looking in basket). Where’s all these plums you talking about?

GABRIEL. I ain’t got no plums today, Rose. I was just singing that. Have some tomorrow. Put me in a big order for plums. Have enough plums tomorrow for St. Peter and everybody.

TROY reenters from kitchen, crosses to steps.

(To ROSE.) Troy’s mad at me.

TROY. I ain’t mad at you. What I got to be mad at you about? You ain’t done nothing to me.

GABRIEL. I just moved over to Miss Pearl’s to keep out from in your way. I ain’t mean no harm by it.

TROY. Who said anything about that? I ain’t said anything about that.
GABRIEL. You ain’t mad at me, is you?

TROY. Naw . . . I ain’t mad at you, Gabe. If I was mad at you I’d tell you about it.

GABRIEL. Got me two rooms. In the basement. Got my own door too. Wanna see my key? (He holds up a key.) That’s my own key! My two rooms!

TROY. Well, that’s good, Gabe. You got your own key . . . that’s good.

ROSE. You hungry, Gabe? I was just fixing to cook Troy his breakfast.

GABRIEL. I’ll take some biscuits. You got some biscuits? Did you know when I was in heaven . . . every morning me and St. Peter would sit down by the gate and eat some big fat biscuits? Oh, yeah! We had us a good time. We’d sit there and eat us them biscuits and then St. Peter would go off to sleep and tell me to wake him up when it’s time to open the gates for the judgment.

ROSE. Well, come on . . . I’ll make up a batch of biscuits.

GABRIEL. Troy . . . St. Peter got your name in the book. I seen it. It say . . . Troy Maxson. I say . . . I know him! He got the same name like what I got. That’s my brother!

TROY. How many times you gonna tell me that, Gabe?

GABRIEL. Ain’t got my name in the book. Don’t have to have my name. I done died and went to heaven. He got your name though. One morning St. Peter was looking at his book . . . marking it up for the judgment . . . and he let me see your name. Got it in there under M. Got Rose’s name . . . I ain’t seen it like I seen yours . . . but I know it’s in there. He got a great big book. Got everybody’s name what was ever been born. That’s what he told me. But I seen your name. Seen it with my own eyes.

TROY. Go on in the house there. Rose going to fix you something to eat.

GABRIEL. Oh, I ain’t hungry. I done had breakfast with Aunt Jemimah. She come by and cooked me up a whole mess of flapjacks. Remember how we used to eat them flapjacks?

TROY. Go on in the house and get you something to eat now.

GABRIEL. I got to sell my plums. I done sold some tomatoes. Got me two quarters. Wanna see? (He shows Troy bis quarters.) I’m gonna save them and buy me a new horn so St. Peter can hear me when it’s time to open the gates. (GABRIEL stops suddenly. Listens.) Hear that? That’s the hellhounds. I got to chase them out of here. Go on get out of here! Get out!

GABRIEL exits singing.

Better get ready for the judgment
Better get ready for the judgment
My Lord is coming down

ROSE enters from the house.

TROY. He’s gone off somewhere.

GABRIEL (offstage).

Better get ready for the judgment
Better get ready for the judgment morning
Better get ready for the judgment
My God is coming down

ROSE. He ain’t eating right. Miss Pearl say she can’t get him to eat nothing.
TROY. What you want me to do about it, Rose? I done did everything I can for the man. I can’t make him get well. Man got half his head blown away . . . what you expect?

ROSE. Seem like something ought to be done to help him.

TROY. Man don’t bother nobody. He just mixed up from that metal plate he got in his head. Ain’t no sense for him to go back into the hospital.

ROSE. Least he be eating right. They can help him take care of himself.

TROY. Don’t nobody wanna be locked up, Rose. What you wanna lock him up for? Man go over there and fight the war . . . messin’ around with them Japs, get half his head blown off . . . and they give him a lousy three thousand dollars. And I had to swoop down on that.

ROSE. Is you fixing to go into that again?

TROY. That’s the only way I got a roof over my head . . . cause of that metal plate.

ROSE. Ain’t no sense you blaming yourself for nothing. Gabe wasn’t in no condition to manage that money. You done what was right by him. Can’t nobody say you ain’t done what was right by him. Look how long you took care of him . . . till he wanted to have his own place and moved over there with Miss Pearl.

TROY. That ain’t what I’m saying, woman! I’m just stating the facts. If my brother didn’t have that metal plate in his head . . . I wouldn’t have a pot to piss in or a window to throw it out of. And I’m fifty-three years old. Now see if you can understand that!

TROY gets up from the porch and starts to exit the yard.

ROSE. Where you going off to? You been running out of here every Saturday for weeks. I thought you was gonna work on this fence.

TROY. I’m gonna walk down to Taylors’. Listen to the ball game. I’ll be back in a bit. I’ll work on it when I get back.

He exits the yard. The lights go to black.

---

Scene 3

The lights come up on the yard. It is four hours later. Rose is taking down the clothes from the line. Cory enters carrying his football equipment.

ROSE. Your daddy like to had a fit with you running out of here this morning without doing your chores.

CORY. I told you I had to go to practice.

ROSE. He say you were supposed to help him with this fence.

CORY. He been saying that the last four or five Saturdays, and then he don’t never do nothing, but go down to Taylors’. Did you tell him about the recruiter?

ROSE. Yeah, I told him.

CORY. What he say?

ROSE. He ain’t said nothing too much. You get in there and get started on your chores before he gets back. Go on and scrub down them steps before he gets back here hollering and carrying on.

CORY. I’m hungry. What you got to eat, Mama?

ROSE. Go on and get started on your chores. I got some meat loaf in there. Go on and make you a sandwich . . . and don’t leave no mess in there.
CORY exits into the house. ROSE continues to take down the clothes. TROY enters the yard and sneaks up and grabs her from behind.

Troy! Go on, now. You liked to scared me to death. What was the score of the game? Lucille had me on the phone and I couldn’t keep up with it.

TROY. What I care about the game? Come here, woman. (He tries to kiss her)

ROSE. I thought you went down Taylors’ to listen to the game. Go on, Troy! You supposed to be putting up this fence.

TROY (attempting to kiss her again). I'll put it up when I finish with what is at hand.

ROSE. Go on, Troy. I ain’t studying you.

TROY (chasing after her). I’m studying you . . . fixing to do my homework!

ROSE. Troy, you better leave me alone.

TROY (calling). Cory! Get your butt out here, boy!

ROSE exits into the house with the laundry. TROY goes over to the pile of wood, picks up a board, and starts sawing. CORY enters from the house.

TROY. You just now coming in here from leaving this morning?

CORY. Yeah, I had to go to football practice.

TROY. Yeah, what?

CORY. Yessir.

TROY. I ain’t but two seconds off you noway. The garbage sitting in there overflowing . . . you ain’t done none of your chores . . . and you come in here talking about “Yeah.”

CORY. I was just getting ready to do my chores now, Pop . . .

TROY. Your first chore is to help me with this fence on Saturday. Everything else come after that. Now get that saw and cut them boards.

CORY takes the saw and begins cutting the boards. TROY continues working. There is a long pause.

CORY. Hey, Pop . . . why don’t you buy a TV?

TROY. What I want with a TV? What I want one of them for?

CORY. Everybody got one. Earl, Ba Bra . . . Jesse!

TROY. I ain’t asked you who had one. I say what I want with one?

CORY. So you can watch it. They got lots of things on TV. Baseball games and everything. We could watch the World Series.

TROY. Yeah . . . and how much this TV cost?

CORY. I don’t know. They got them on sale for around two hundred dollars.

TROY. Two hundred dollars, huh?

CORY. That ain’t that much, Pop.

TROY. Naw, it’s just two hundred dollars. See that roof you got over your head at night? Let me tell you something about that roof. It’s been over ten years since that roof was last tarred. See now . . . the snow come this winter and sit up there on that roof like it is . . . and it’s gonna seep inside. It’s just gonna be a little bit . . . ain’t gonna hardly notice it. Then the next thing you know, it’s gonna be leaking all over the house. Then the wood rot from all that water and you gonna need a whole new roof. Now, how much you think it cost to get that roof tarred?

CORY. I don’t know.
TROY. Two hundred and sixty-four dollars . . . cash money. While you thinking about a TV, I got to be thinking about the roof . . . and whatever else go wrong here. Now if you had two hundred dollars, what would you do . . . fix the roof or buy a TV?

CORY. I'd buy a TV. Then when the roof started to leak . . . when it needed fixing . . . I'd fix it.

TROY. Where you gonna get the money from? You done spent it for a TV. You gonna sit up and watch the water run all over your brand new TV.

CORY. Aw, Pop. You got money. I know you do.

TROY. Where I got it at, huh?

CORY. You got it in the bank.

TROY. You wanna see my bankbook? You wanna see that seventy-three dollars and twenty-two cents I got sitting up in there?

CORY. You ain't got to pay for it all at one time. You can put a down payment on it and carry it on home with you.

TROY. Not me. I ain't gonna owe nobody nothing if I can help it. Miss a payment and they come and snatch it right out of your house. Then what you got? Now, soon as I get two hundred dollars clear, then I'll buy a TV. Right now, as soon as I get two hundred and sixty-four dollars, I'm gonna have this roof tarred.

CORY. Aw . . . Pop!

TROY. You go on and get you two hundred dollars and buy one if ya want it. I got better things to do with my money.

CORY. I can't get no two hundred dollars. I ain't never seen two hundred dollars.

TROY. I'll tell you what . . . you get you a hundred dollars and I'll put the other hundred with it.

CORY. All right, I'm gonna show you.

TROY. You gonna show me how you can cut them boards right now.

CORY. The Pirates won today. That makes five in a row.

TROY. I ain't thinking about the Pirates. Got an all-white team. Got that boy . . . that Puerto Rican boy . . . Clemente. Don't even half-play him. That boy could be something if they give him a chance. Play him one day and sit him on the bench the next.

CORY. He gets a lot of chances to play.

TROY. I'm talking about playing regular. Playing every day so you can get your timing. That's what I'm talking about.

CORY. They got some white guys on the team that don't play every day. You can't play everybody at the same time.

TROY. If they got a white fellow sitting on the bench . . . you can bet your last dollar he can't play! The colored guy got to be twice as good before he get on the team. That's why I don't want you to get all tied up in them sports. Man on the team and what it get him? They got colored on the team and don't use them. Same as not having them. All them teams the same.

CORY. The Braves got Hank Aaron and Wes Covington. Hank Aaron hit two home runs today. That makes forty-three.

TROY. Hank Aaron ain't nobody. That what you supposed to do. That's how you supposed to play the game. Ain't nothing to it. It's just a matter of timing . . . getting the right follow-through. Hell, I can hit forty-three home runs right now!

CORY. Not off no major-league pitching, you couldn’t.

TROY. We had better pitching in the Negro leagues. I hit seven home runs off of Satchel Paige. You can’t get no better than that!

CORY. Sandy Koufax. He’s leading the league in strikeouts.

TROY. I ain’t thinking of no Sandy Koufax.

CORY. You got Warren Spahn and Lew Burdette. I bet you couldn’t hit no home runs off of Warren Spahn.

TROY. I’m through with it now. You go on and cut them boards. (Pause.)
Your mama tell me you done got recruited by a college football team? Is that right?

CORY. Yeah. Coach Zellman say the recruiter gonna be coming by to talk to you. Get you to sign the permission papers.

TROY. I thought you supposed to be working down there at the A&P. Ain’t you suppose to be working down there after school?

CORY. Mr. Stawicki say he gonna hold my job for me until after the football season. Say starting next week I can work weekends.

TROY. I thought we had an understanding about this football stuff? You suppose to keep up with your chores and hold that job down at the A&P.
Ain’t been around here all day on a Saturday. Ain’t none of your chores done . . . and now you telling me you done quit your job.

CORY. I’m going to be working weekends.

TROY. You damn right you are! And ain’t no need for nobody coming around here to talk to me about signing nothing.

CORY. Hey, Pop . . . you can’t do that. He’s coming all the way from North Carolina.

TROY. I don’t care where he coming from. The white man ain’t gonna let you get nowhere with that football noway. You go on and get your booklearning so you can work yourself up in that A&P or learn how to fix cars or build houses or something, get you a trade. That way you have something can’t nobody take away from you. You go on and learn how to put your hands to some good use. Besides hauling people’s garbage.

CORY. I get good grades, Pop. That’s why the recruiter wants to talk with you. You got to keep up your grades to get recruited. This way I’ll be going to college. I’ll get a chance . . .

TROY. First you gonna get your butt down there to the A&P and get your job back.

CORY. Mr. Stawicki done already hired somebody else ‘cause I told him I was playing football.

TROY. You a bigger fool than I thought . . . to let somebody take away your job so you can play some football. Where you gonna get your money to take out your girlfriend and whatnot? What kind of foolishness is that to let somebody take away your job?

CORY. I’m still gonna be working weekends.

TROY. Naw . . . naw. You getting your butt out of here and finding you another job.

CORY. Come on, Pop! I got to practice. I can’t work after school and play football too. The team needs me. That’s what Coach Zellman say . . .

4Satchel Paige (1906–1982) pitcher in the Negro leagues.
TROY. I don’t care what nobody else say. I’m the boss . . . you understand? I’m the boss around here. I do the only saying what counts.

CORY. Come on, Pop!

TROY. I asked you . . . did you understand?

CORY. Yeah . . .

TROY. What?!

CORY. Yessir.

TROY. You go on down there to that A&P and see if you can get your job back. If you can’t do both . . . then you quit the football team. You’ve got to take the crooked with the straights.

CORY. Yessir. (Pause.) Can I ask you a question?

TROY. What the hell you wanna ask me? Mr. Stawicki the one you got the questions for.

CORY. How come you ain’t never liked me?

TROY. Liked you? Who the hell say I got to like you? What law is there say I got to like you? Wanna stand up in my face and ask a damn foolass question like that. Talking about liking somebody. Come here, boy, when I talk to you.

CORY comes over to where troy is working. He stands slouched over and TROY shoves him on his shoulder.

Straighten up, goddammit! I asked you a question . . . what law is there say I got to like you?

CORY. None.

TROY. Well, all right then! Don’t you eat every day? (Pause.) Answer me when I talk to you! Don’t you eat every day?

CORY. Yeah.

TROY. Nigger, as long as you in my house, you put that sir on the end of it when you talk to me.

CORY. Yes . . . sir.

TROY. You eat every day.

CORY. Yessir!

TROY. Got a roof over your head.

CORY. Yessir!

TROY. Got clothes on your back.

CORY. Yessir.

TROY. Why you think that is?

CORY. Cause of you.

TROY. Ah, hell I know it’s cause of me . . . but why do you think that is?

CORY (hesitant). Cause you like me.

TROY. Like you? I go out of here every morning . . . bust my butt . . . putting up with them crackers every day . . . cause I like you? You are the biggest fool I ever saw. (Pause.) It’s my job. It’s my responsibility! You understand that? A man got to take care of his family. You live in my house . . . sleep you behind on my bedclothes . . . fill you belly up with my food . . . cause you my son. You my flesh and blood. Not cause I like you! Cause it’s my duty to take care of you. I owe a responsibility to you! Let’s get this straight right here . . . before it go along any further . . . I ain’t got to like you. Mr. Rand don’t give me my money come payday cause he likes me. He give me cause he owe me. I done give you everything I had to give you. I gave you your life! Me and your mama worked that out between us. And liking your black ass wasn’t part of the bargain. Don’t you try and go through life worrying about if somebody like you or not. You best be making sure they doing right by you. You understand what I’m saying, boy?

CORY. Yessir.

TROY. Then get the hell out of my face, and get on down to that A&P.

ROSE has been standing behind the screen door for much of the scene. She enters as Cory exits.

ROSE. Why don’t you let the boy go ahead and play football, Troy? Ain’t no harm in that. He’s just trying to be like you with the sports.

TROY. I don’t want him to be like me! I want him to move as far away from my life as he can get. You the only decent thing that ever happened to me. I wish him that. But I don’t wish him a thing else from my life. I decided seventeen years ago that boy wasn’t getting involved in no sports. Not after what they did to me in the sports.

ROSE. Troy, why don’t you admit you was too old to play in the major leagues? For once . . . why don’t you admit that?

TROY. What do you mean too old? Don’t come telling me I was too old. I just wasn’t the right color. Hell, I’m fifty-three years old and can do better than Selkirk’s .269 right now!

ROSE. How’s was you gonna play ball when you were over forty? Sometimes I can’t get no sense out of you.

TROY. I got good sense, woman. I got sense enough not to let my boy get hurt over playing no sports. You been mothering that boy too much. Worried about if people like him.

ROSE. Everything that boy do . . . he do for you. He wants you to say “Good job, son.” That’s all.

TROY. Rose, I ain’t got time for that. He’s alive. He’s healthy. He’s got to make his own way. I made mine. Ain’t nobody gonna hold his hand when he get out there in that world.

ROSE. Times have changed from when you was young, Troy. People change. The world’s changing around you and you can’t even see it.

TROY (slow, methodical). Woman . . . I do the best I can do. I come in here every Friday. I carry a sack of potatoes and a bucket of lard. You all line up at the door with your hands out. I give you the lint from my pockets. I give you my sweat and my blood. I ain’t got no tears. I done spent them. We go upstairs in that room at night . . . and I fall down on you and try to blast a hole into forever. I get up Monday morning . . . find my lunch on the table. I go out. Make my way. Find my strength to carry me through to the next Friday. (Pause.) That’s all I got, Rose. That’s all I got to give. I can’t give nothing else.

TROY exits into the house. The lights go down to black.

Scene 4

It is Friday. Two weeks later. Cory starts out of the house with his football equipment. The phone rings.

CORY (calling). I got it! (He answers the phone and stands in the screen door talking.) Hello? Hey, Jesse. Naw . . . I was just getting ready to leave now.

ROSE (calling). Cory!
CORY. I told you, man, them spikes is all tore up. You can use them if you want, but they ain’t no good. Earl got some spikes.

ROSE (calling). Cory!

CORY (calling to ROSE). Mam? I’m talking to Jesse. (Into phone) When she say that? (Pause) Aw, you lying, man. I’m gonna tell her you said that.

ROSE (calling). Cory, don’t you go nowhere!

CORY. I got to go to the game, Ma! (Into the phone.) Yeah, hey, look, I’ll talk to you later. Yeah, I’ll meet you over Earl’s house. Later. Bye, Ma.

CORY exits the house and starts out the yard.

ROSE. Cory, where you going off to? You got that stuff all pulled out and thrown all over your room.

CORY (in the yard). I was looking for my spikes. Jesse wanted to borrow my spikes.

ROSE. Get up there and get that cleaned up before your daddy get back in here.

CORY. I got to go to the game! I’ll clean it up when I get back.

CORY exits.

ROSE. That’s all he need to do is see that room all messed up.

ROSE exits into the house. TROY and BONO enter the yard. TROY is dressed in clothes other than his work clothes.

BONO. He told him the same thing he told you. Take it to the union.

TROY. Brownie ain’t got that much sense. Man wasn’t thinking about nothing. He wait until I confront them on it . . . then he wanna come crying seniority. (Calls.) Hey, Rose!

BONO. I wish I could have seen Mr. Rand’s face when he told you.

TROY. He couldn’t get it out of his mouth! Liked to bit his tongue! When they called me down there to the Commissioner’s office . . . he thought they was gonna fire me. Like everybody else.

BONO. I didn’t think they was gonna fire you. I thought they was gonna put you on the warning paper.

TROY. Hey, Rose! (To BONO.) Yeah, Mr. Rand like to bit his tongue.

TROY breaks the seal on the bottle, takes a drink, and hands it to BONO.

BONO. I see you run right down to Taylors’ and told that Alberta gal.

TROY (calling). Hey, Rose! (To BONO.) I told everybody. Hey, Rose! I went down there to cash my check.

ROSE (entering from the house). Hush all that hollering, man! I know you out here. What they say down there at the Commissioner’s office?

TROY. You supposed to come when I call you, woman. Bono’ll tell you that. (To BONO.) Don’t Lucille come when you call her?

ROSE. Man, hush your mouth. I ain’t no dog . . . talk about “come when you call me.”

TROY (puts bis arm around ROSE). You hear this, Bono? I had me an old dog used to get uppity like that. You say; “C’mere, Blue!” . . . and he just lay there and look at you. End up getting a stick and chasing him away trying to make him come.

ROSE. I ain’t studying you and your dog. I remember you used to sing that old song.
TROY (be sings).

Hear it ring! Hear it ring! I had a dog his name was Blue.

ROSE. Don’t nobody wanna hear you sing that old song.

TROY (sings).

You know Blue was mighty true.

ROSE. Used to have Cory running around here singing that song.

BONO. Hell, I remember that song myself.

TROY (sings).

You know Blue was a good old dog.

Blue treed a possum in a hollow log.

That was my daddy’s song. My daddy made up that song.

ROSE. I don’t care who made it up. Don’t nobody wanna hear you sing it.

TROY (makes a song like calling a dog). Come here, woman.

ROSE. You come in here carrying on, I reckon they ain’t fired you. What they say down there at the Commissioner’s office?

TROY. Look here, Rose . . . Mr. Rand called me into his office today when I got back from talking to them people down there . . . it come from up top . . . he called me in and told me they was making me a driver.

ROSE. Troy, you kidding!

TROY. No I ain’t. Ask Bono.

ROSE. Well, that’s great, Troy. Now you don’t have to hassle them people no more.

LYONS enters from the street.

TROY. Aw hell, I wasn’t looking to see you today. I thought you was in jail.

Got it all over the front page of the Courier about them raiding Sefus’s place . . . where you be hanging out with all them thugs.

LYONS. Hey, Pop . . . that ain’t got nothing to do with me. I don’t go down there gambling. I go down there to sit in with the band. I ain’t got nothing to do with the gambling part. They got some good music down there.

TROY. They got some rogues . . . is what they got.

LYONS. How you been, Mr. Bono? Hi, Rose.

BONO. I see where you playing down at the Crawford Grill tonight.

ROSE. How come you ain’t brought Bonnie like I told you? You should have brought Bonnie with you, she ain’t been over in a month of Sundays.

LYONS. I was just in the neighborhood . . . thought I’d stop by.

TROY. Here he come . . .

BONO. Your daddy got a promotion on the rubbish. He’s gonna be the first colored driver. Ain’t got to do nothing but sit up there and read the paper like them white fellows.

LYONS. Hey, Pop . . . if you knew how to read you’d be all right.

BONO. Naw . . . naw . . . you mean if the nigger knew how to drive he’d be all right. Been fighting with them people about driving and ain’t even got a license. Mr. Rand know you ain’t got no driver’s license?

TROY. Driving ain’t nothing. All you do is point the truck where you want it to go. Driving ain’t nothing.

BONO. Do Mr. Rand know you ain’t got no driver’s license? That’s what I’m talking about. I ain’t asked if driving was easy. I asked if Mr. Rand know you ain’t got no driver’s license.

TROY. He ain’t got to know. The man ain’t got to know my business. Time he find out, I have two or three driver’s licenses.

LYONS (going into his pocket). Say, look here, Pop . . .
TROY. I knew it was coming. Didn’t I tell you, Bono? I know what kind of “Look here, Pop” that was. The nigger fixing to ask me for some money.
It’s Friday night. It’s my payday. All them rogues down there on the avue . . . the ones that ain’t in jail . . . and Lyons is hopping in his shoes to get down there with them.
LYONS. See, Pop . . . if you give somebody else a chance to talk sometimes, you’d see that I was fixing to pay you back your ten dollars like I told you. Here . . . I told you I’d pay you when Bonnie got paid.
TROY. Naw . . . you go ahead and keep that ten dollars. Put it in the bank.
The next time you feel like you wanna come by here and ask me for something . . . you go on down there and get that.
LYONS. Here’s your ten dollars, Pop. I told you I don’t want you to give me nothing. I just wanted to borrow ten dollars.
TROY. Naw . . . you go on and keep that for the next time you want to ask me.
LYONS. Here you go, Rose. If you don’t take it I’m gonna have to hear about it for the next six months. (He hands her the money.)
ROSE. That’s right nice of you, Gabe.
LYONS. What you been doing, Uncle Gabe?
GABRIEL. Oh, I been chasing hellhounds and waiting on the time to tell St. Peter to open the gates.
LYONS. You been chasing hellhounds, huh? Well . . . you doing the right thing, Uncle Gabe. Somebody got to chase them.
GABRIEL. Oh, yeah . . . I know it. The devil’s strong. The devil ain’t no pushover. Hellhounds snipping at everybody’s heels. But I got my trumpet waiting on the judgment time.
LYONS. Waiting on the Battle of Armageddon, huh?
GABRIEL. Ain’t gonna be too much of a battle when God get to waving that Judgment sword. But the people’s gonna have a hell of a time trying to get into heaven if them gates ain’t open.
LYONS (putting his arm around GABRIEL). You hear this, Pop. Uncle Gabe, you all right!
GABRIEL (laughing with LYONS). Lyons! King of the Jungle.
ROSE. You gonna stay for supper, Gabe? Want me to fix you a plate?
GABRIEL. I’ll take a sandwich, Rose. Don’t want no plate. Just wanna eat with my hands. I’ll take a sandwich.
LYONS. Naw, I won’t eat nothing till after we finished playing. (Pause.) You ought to come down and listen to me play, Pop.
TROY. I don’t like that Chinese music. All that noise.
ROSE. Go on in the house and wash up, Gabe . . . I’ll fix you a sandwich.
GABRIEL (to LYONS, as he exits). Troy’s mad at me.
LYONS. What you mad at Uncle Gabe for, Pop?
ROSE. He thinks Troy’s mad at him cause he moved over to Miss Pearl’s.
TROY. I ain’t mad at the man. He can live where he want to live at.
LYONS. What he move over there for? Miss Pearl don’t like nobody.
ROSE. She don’t mind him none. She treats him real nice. She just don’t allow all that singing.
TROY. She don’t mind that rent he be paying . . . that’s what she don’t mind.
ROSE. Troy, I ain’t going through that with you no more. He’s over there cause he want to have his own place. He can come and go as he please.
TROY. Hell, he could come and go as he please here. I wasn’t stopping him. I ain’t put no rules on him.
ROSE. It ain’t the same thing, Troy. And you know it.

GABRIEL comes to the door:

Now, that’s the last I wanna hear about that. I don’t wanna hear nothing else about Gabe and Miss Pearl. And next week . . .
GABRIEL. I’m ready for my sandwich, Rose.
ROSE. And next week . . . when that recruiter come from that school . . . I want you to sign that paper and go on and let Cory play football. Then that’ll be the last I have to hear about that.
TROY (to ROSE as she exits into the house). I ain’t thinking about Cory nothing.
LYONS. What . . . Cory got recruited? What school he going to?
TROY. That boy walking around here smelling his piss . . . thinking he’s grown. Thinking he’s gonna do what he want, irrespective of what I say. Look here, Bono . . . I left the Commissioner’s office and went down to the A&P . . . that boy ain’t working down there. He lying to me. Telling me he got his job back . . . telling me he working weekends . . . telling me he working after school . . . Mr. Stawicki tell me he ain’t working down there at all!
LYONS. Cory just growing up. He’s just busting at the seams trying to fill out your shoes.
TROY. I don’t care what he’s doing. When he get to the point where he wanna disobey me . . . then it’s time for him to move on. Bono’ll tell you that. I bet he ain’t never disobeyed his daddy without paying the consequences.
BONO. I ain’t never had a chance. My daddy came on through . . . but I ain’t never knew him to see him . . . or what he had on his mind or where he went. Just moving on through. Searching out the New Land. That’s what the old folks used to call it. See a fellow moving around from place to place . . . woman to woman . . . called it searching out the New Land. I can’t say if he ever found it. I come along, didn’t want no kids. Didn’t know if I was gonna be in one place long enough to fix on them right as their daddy. I figured I was going searching too. As it turned out I been hooked up with Lucille near about as long as your daddy been with Rose. Going on sixteen years.
TROY. Sometimes I wish I hadn’t known my daddy. He ain’t cared nothing about no kids. A kid to him wasn’t nothing. All he wanted was for you to learn how to walk so he could start you to working. When it come time for eating . . . he ate first. If there was anything left over, that’s what you got. Man would sit down and eat two chickens and give you the wing.

LYONS. You ought to stop that, Pop. Everybody feed their kids. No matter how hard times is . . . everybody care about their kids. Make sure they have something to eat.

TROY. The only thing my daddy cared about was getting them bales of cotton in to Mr. Lubin. That’s the only thing that mattered to him. Sometimes I used to wonder why he was living. Wonder why the devil hadn’t come and got him. “Get them bales of cotton in to Mr. Lubin” and find out he owe him money . . .

LYONS. He should have just went on and left when he saw he couldn’t get nowhere. That’s what I would have done.

TROY. How he gonna leave with eleven kids? And where he gonna go? He ain’t knew how to do nothing but farm. No, he was trapped and I think he knew it. But I’ll say this for him . . . he felt a responsibility toward us. Maybe he ain’t treated us the way I felt he should have . . . but without that responsibility he could have walked off and left us . . . made his own way.

BONO. A lot of them did. Back in those days what you talking about . . . they walk out their front door and just take on down one road or another and keep on walking.

LYONS. There you go! That’s what I’m talking about.

BONO. Just keep on walking till you come to something else. Ain’t you never heard of nobody having the walking blues? Well, that’s what you call it when you just take off like that.

TROY. My daddy ain’t had them walking blues! What you talking about? He stayed right there with his family. But he was just as evil as he could be.
My mama couldn’t stand him. Couldn’t stand that evilness. She run off when I was about eight. She sneaked off one night after he had gone to sleep. Told me she was coming back for me. I ain’t never seen her no more. All his women run off and left him. He wasn’t good for nobody.

When my turn come to head out, I was fourteen and got to sniffing around Joe Canewell’s daughter. Had us an old mule we called Greyboy.
My daddy sent me out to do some plowing and I tied up Greyboy and went to fooling around with Joe Canewell’s daughter. We done found us a nice little spot, got real cozy with each other. She about thirteen and we done figured we was grown anyway . . . so we down there enjoying ourselves . . . ain’t thinking about nothing. We didn’t know Greyboy had got loose and wandered back to the house and my daddy was looking for me. We down there by the creek enjoying ourselves when my daddy come up on us. Surprised us. He had them leather straps off the mule and commenced to whupping me like there was no tomorrow. I jumped up, mad and embarrassed. I was scared of my daddy. When he comcemmed to whupping on me . . . quite naturally I run to get out of the way. (Pause.) Now I thought he was mad cause I ain’t done my work. But I see where he was chasing me off so he could have the gal for himself.
When I see what the matter of it was, I lost all fear of my daddy. Right there is where I become a man . . . at fourteen years of age. (Pause.)
Now it was my turn to run him off. I picked up them same reins that he had used on me. I picked up them reins and commenced to whupping on him. The gal jumped up and run off . . . and when my daddy turned to face me, I could see why the devil had never come to get him . . . cause he was the devil himself. I don’t know what happened. When I woke up, I was laying right there by the creek, and Blue . . . this old dog we had . . . was licking my face. I thought I was blind. I couldn’t see nothing. Both my eyes were swollen shut. I laid there and cried. I didn’t know what I was gonna do. The only thing I knew was the time had come for me to leave my daddy’s house. And right there the world suddenly got big. And it was a long time before I could cut it down to where I could handle it.

Part of that cutting down was when I got to the place where I could feel him kicking in my blood and knew that the only thing that separated us was the matter of a few years.

GABRIEL enters from the house with a sandwich.

LYONS. What you got there, Uncle Gabe?
GABRIEL. Got me a ham sandwich. Rose gave me a ham sandwich.
TROY. I don’t know what happened to him. I done lost touch with everybody except Gabriel. But I hope he’s dead. I hope he found some peace.
LYONS. That’s a heavy story, Pop. I didn’t know you left home when you was fourteen.
TROY. And didn’t know nothing. The only part of the world I knew was the forty-two acres of Mr. Lubin’s land. That’s all I knew about life.
LYONS. Fourteen’s kinda young to be out on your own. (Phone rings.) I don’t even think I was ready to be out on my own at fourteen. I don’t know what I would have done.
TROY. I got up from the creek and walked on down to Mobile. I was through with farming. Figured I could do better in the city. So I walked the two hundred miles to Mobile.
LYONS. Wait a minute . . . you ain’t walked no two hundred miles, Pop. Ain’t nobody gonna walk no two hundred miles. You talking about some walking there.
BONO. That’s the only way you got anywhere back in them days.
LYONS. Shhh. Damn if I wouldn’t have hitched a ride with somebody!
TROY. Who you gonna hitch it with? They ain’t had no cars and things like they got now. We talking about 1918.
ROSE (entering). What you all out here getting into?
TROY (to ROSE). I’m telling Lyons how good he got it. He don’t know nothing about this I’m talking.
ROSE. Lyons, that was Bonnie on the phone. She say you supposed to pick her up.
LYONS. Yeah, okay, Rose.
TROY. I walked on down to Mobile and hitched up with some of them fellows that was heading this way. Got up here and found out . . . not only couldn’t you get a job . . . you couldn’t find no place to live. I thought I was in freedom. Shhh. Colored folks living down there on the riverbanks in whatever kind of shelter they could find for themselves. Right down there under the Brady Street Bridge. Living in shacks made of sticks and tarpaper. Messed around there and went from bad to worse.
Started stealing. First it was food. Then I figured, hell, if I steal money I can buy me some food. Buy me some shoes too! One thing led to another. Met your mama. I was young and anxious to be a man. Met your mama and had you. What I do that for? Now I got to worry about feeding you and her. Got to steal three times as much. Went out one day looking for somebody to rob . . . that’s what I was, a robber. I’ll tell you the truth. I’m ashamed of it today. But it’s the truth. Went to rob this fellow . . . pulled out my knife . . . and he pulled out a gun. Shot me in the chest. I felt just like somebody had taken a hot branding iron and laid it on me. When he shot me I jumped at him with my knife. They told me I killed him and they put me in the penitentiary and locked me up for fifteen years. That’s where I met Bono. That’s where I learned how to play baseball. Got out that place and your mama had taken you and went on to make life without me. Fifteen years was a long time for her to wait. But that fifteen years cured me of that robbing stuff. Rose’ll tell you. She asked me when I met her if I had gotten all that foolishness out of my system. And I told her, “Baby, it’s you and baseball all what count with me.” You hear me, Bono? I meant it too. She say, “Which one comes first?” I told her, “Baby, ain’t no doubt it’s baseball . . . but you stick and get old with me and we’ll both outlive this baseball.” Am I right, Rose? And it’s true.

ROSE. Man, hush your mouth. You ain’t said no such thing. Talking about, “Baby you know you’ll always be number one with me.” That’s what you was talking.

TROY. You hear that, Bono. That’s why I love her.

BONO. Rose’ll keep you straight. You get off the track, she’ll straighten you up.

ROSE. Lyons, you better get on up and get Bonnie. She waiting on you.

LYONS (gets up to go). Hey, Pop, why don’t you come on down to the Grill and hear me play?

TROY. I ain’t going down there. I’m too old to be sitting around in them clubs.

BONO. You got to be good to play down at the Grill.

LYONS. Come on, Pop . . .

TROY. I got to get up in the morning.

LYONS. You ain’t got to stay long.

TROY. Naw, I’m gonna get my supper and go on to bed.

LYONS. Well, I got to go. I’ll see you again.

TROY. Don’t you come around my house on my payday.

ROSE. Pick up the phone and let somebody know you coming. And bring Bonnie with you. You know I’m always glad to see her.

LYONS. Yeah, I’ll do that, Rose. You take care now. See you, Pop. See you, Mr. Bono. See you, Uncle Gabe.

GABRIEL. Lyons! King of the Jungle!

LYONS exits.

TROY. Is supper ready, woman? Me and you got some business to take care of. I’m gonna tear it up too.

ROSE. Troy, I done told you now!

TROY (puts his arm around BONO). Aw hell, woman . . . this is Bono. Bono like family. I done known this nigger since . . . how long I done know you?

BONO. It’s been a long time.
TROY. I done know this nigger since Skippy was a pup. Me and him done been through some times.

BONO. You sure right about that.

TROY. Hell, I done know him longer than I known you. And we still standing shoulder to shoulder. Hey, look here, Bono . . . a man can’t ask for no more than that. (Drinks to him.) I love you, nigger.

BONO. Hell, I love you too . . . I got to get home see my woman. You got yours in hand. I got to get mine.

BONO starts to exit as Cory enters the yard, dressed in his football uniform. He gives Troy a hard, uncompromising look.

CORY. What you do that for, Pop?

He throws his helmet down in the direction of Troy.

ROSE. What’s the matter? Cory . . . what’s the matter?

CORY. Papa done went up to the school and told Coach Zellman I can’t play football no more. Wouldn’t even let me play the game. Told him to tell the recruiter not to come.

ROSE. Troy . . .

TROY. What you Troying me for? Yeah, I did it. And the boy know why I did it.

CORY. Why you wanna do that to me? That was the one chance I had.

ROSE. Ain’t nothing wrong with Cory playing football, Troy.

TROY. The boy lied to me. I told the nigger if he wanna play football . . . to keep up his chores and hold down that job at the A&P. That was the conditions. Stopped down there to see Mr. Stawicki . . .

CORY. I can’t work after school during the football season, Pop! I tried to tell you that Mr. Stawicki’s holding my job for me. You don’t never want to listen to nobody. And then you wanna go and do this to me!

TROY. I ain’t done nothing to you. You done it to yourself.

CORY. Just cause you didn’t have a chance! You just scared I’m gonna be better than you, that’s all.

TROY. Come here.

ROSE. Troy . . .

CORY reluctantly crosses over to Troy.

TROY. All right! See. You done made a mistake.

CORY. I didn’t even do nothing!

TROY. I’m gonna tell you what your mistake was. See . . . you swung at the ball and didn’t hit it. That’s strike one. See, you in the batter’s box now. You swung and you missed. That’s strike one. Don’t you strike out!

Lights fade to black.

Act 2

Scene 1

The following morning. Cory is at the tree hitting the ball with the bat. He tries to mimic Troy, but his swing is awkward, less sure. Rose enters from the house.
ROSE. Cory, I want you to help me with this cupboard.
CORY. I ain’t quitting the team. I don’t care what Poppa say.
ROSE. I’ll talk to him when he gets back. He had to go see about your Uncle Gabe. The police done arrested him. Say he was disturbing the peace. He’ll be back directly. Come on in here and help me clean out the top of this cupboard.

CORY exits into the house. ROSE sees TROY and BONO coming down the alley.

TROY. Troy . . . what they say down there?
TROY. Ain’t said nothing. I give them fifty dollars and they let him go. I’ll talk to you about it. Where’s Cory?
ROSE. He’s in there helping me clean out these cupboards.
TROY. Tell him to get his butt out here.

TROY and BONO go over to the pile of wood. BONO picks up the saw and begins sawing.

TROY (to BONO). All they want is the money. That makes six or seven times I done went down there and got him. See me coming they stick out their hands.
BONO. Yeah, I know what you mean. That’s all they care about . . . that money. They don’t care about what’s right. (Pause.) Nigger, why you got to go and get some hard wood? You ain’t doing nothing but building a little old fence. Get you some soft pine wood. That’s all you need.
TROY. I know what I’m doing. This is outside wood. You put pine wood inside the house. Pine wood is inside wood. This here is outside wood.
Now you tell me where the fence is gonna be?
BONO. You don’t need this wood. You can put it up with pine wood and it’ll stand as long as you gonna be here looking at it.
TROY. How you know how long I’m gonna be here, nigger? Hell, I might just live forever. Live longer than old man Horsely.
BONO. That’s what Magee used to say.
TROY. Magee’s a damn fool. Now you tell me who you ever heard of gonna pull their own teeth with a pair of rusty pliers.
BONO. The old folks . . . my granddaddy used to pull his teeth with pliers. They ain’t had no dentists for the colored folks back then.
TROY. Get clean pliers! You understand? Clean pliers! Sterilize them! Besides we ain’t living back then. All Magee had to do was walk over to Doc Goldblum’s.
BONO. I see where you and that Tallahassee gal . . . that Alberta . . . I see where you all done got tight.
TROY. What you mean “got tight”?
BONO. I see where you be laughing and joking with her all the time.
TROY. I laughs and jokes with all of them, Bono. You know me.
BONO. That ain’t the kind of laughing and joking I’m talking about.

CORY enters from the house.
CORY. How you doing, Mr. Bono?
TROY. Cory? Get that saw from Bono and cut some wood. He talking about the wood’s too hard to cut. Stand back there, Jim, and let that young boy show you how it’s done.
BONO. He’s sure welcome to it.
CORY takes the saw and begins to cut the wood.

Whew-e-e! Look at that. Big old strong boy. Look like Joe Louis. Hell, must be getting old the way I’m watching that boy whip through that wood.

CORY. I don’t see why Mama want a fence around the yard noways.

TROY. Damn if I know either. What the hell she keeping out with it? She ain’t got nothing nobody want.

BONO. Some people build fences to keep people out . . . and other people build fences to keep people in. Rose wants to hold on to you all. She loves you.

TROY. Hell, nigger, I don’t need nobody to tell me my wife loves me. Cory . . . go on in the house and see if you can find that other saw.

CORY exits into the house.

What’s that supposed to mean? Wanna keep us in?

BONO. Troy . . . I done known you seem like damn near my whole life. You and Rose both. I done know both of you all for a long time. I remember when you met Rose. When you was hitting them baseball out the park. A lot of them old gals was after you then. You had the pick of the litter. When you picked Rose, I was happy for you. That was the first time I knew you had any sense. I said . . . My man Troy knows what he’s doing . . . I’m gonna follow this nigger . . . he might take me somewhere. I been following you too. I done learned a whole heap of things about life watching you. I done learned how to tell where the shit lies. How to tell it from the alfalfa. You done learned me a lot of things. You showed me how to not make the same mistakes . . . to take life as it comes along and keep putting one foot in front of the other. (Pause.) Rose a good woman, Troy.

TROY. Hell, nigger, I know she a good woman. I been married to her for eighteen years. What you got on your mind, Bono?

BONO. I just say she a good woman. Just like I say anything. I ain’t got to have nothing on my mind.

TROY. You just gonna say she a good woman and leave it hanging out there like that? Why you telling me she a good woman?

BONO. She loves you, Troy. Rose loves you.

TROY. You saying I don’t measure up. That’s what you trying to say. I don’t measure up cause I’m seeing this other gal. I know what you trying to say.

BONO. I know what Rose means to you, Troy. I’m just trying to say I don’t want to see you mess up.

TROY. Yeah, I appreciate that, Bono. If you was messing around on Lucille I’d be telling you the same thing.

BONO. Well, that’s all I got to say. I just say that because I love you both.

TROY. Hell, you know me . . . I wasn’t out there looking for nothing. You can’t find a better woman than Rose. I know that. But seems like this woman just stuck onto me where I can’t shake her loose. I done wrestled with it, tried to throw her off me . . . but she just stuck on tighter. Now she’s stuck on for good.

BONO. You’s in control . . . that’s what you tell me all the time. You responsible for what you do.
TROY. I ain’t ducking the responsibility of it. As long as it sets right in my heart . . . then I’m okay. Cause that’s all I listen to. It’ll tell me right from wrong every time. And I ain’t talking about doing Rose no bad turn. I love Rose. She done carried me a long ways and I love and respect her for that.

BONO. I know you do. That’s why I don’t want to see you hurt her. But what you gonna do when she find out? What you got then? If you try and juggle both of them . . . sooner or later you gonna drop one of them. That’s common sense.

TROY. Yeah, I hear what you saying, Bono. I been trying to figure a way to work it out.

BONO. Work it out right, Troy. I don’t want to be getting all up between you and Rose’s business . . . but work it so it come out right.

TROY. Ah hell, I get all up between you and Lucille’s business. When you gonna get that woman that refrigerator she been wanting? Don’t tell me you ain’t got no money now. I know who your banker is. Mellon don’t need that money bad as Lucille want that refrigerator. I’ll tell you that.

BONO. Tell you what I’ll do . . . when you finish building this fence for Rose . . . I’ll buy Lucille that refrigerator.

TROY. You done stuck your foot in your mouth now!

TROY grabs up a board and begins to saw. BONO starts to walk out the yard.

Hey, nigger . . . where you going?

BONO. I’m going home. I know you don’t expect me to help you now. I’m protecting my money. I wanna see you put that fence up by yourself. That’s what I want to see. You’ll be here another six months without me.

TROY. Nigger, you ain’t right.

BONO. When it comes to my money . . . I’m right as fireworks on the Fourth of July.

TROY. All right, we gonna see now. You better get out your bankbook.

BONO exits, and TROY continues to work. ROSE enters from the house.

ROSE. What they say down there? What’s happening with Gabe?

TROY. I went down there and got him out. Cost me fifty dollars. Say he was disturbing the peace. Judge set up a hearing for him in three weeks. Say to show cause why he shouldn’t be recommitted.

ROSE. What was he doing that cause them to arrest him?

TROY. Some kids was teasing him and he run them off home. Say he was howling and carrying on. Some folks seen him and called the police. That’s all it was.

ROSE. Well, what’s you say? What’d you tell the judge?

TROY. Told him I’d look after him. It didn’t make no sense to recommit the man. He stuck out his big greasy palm and told me to give him fifty dollars and take him on home.

ROSE. Where’s he at now? Where’d he go off to?

TROY. He’s gone about his business. He don’t need nobody to hold his hand.

ROSE. Well, I don’t know. Seem like that would be the best place for him if they did put him into the hospital. I know what you’re gonna say. But that’s what I think would be best.

TROY. The man done had his life ruined fighting for what? And they wanna take and lock him up. Let him be free. He don’t bother nobody.
Rose. Well, everybody got their own way of looking at it I guess. Come on and get your lunch. I got a bowl of lima beans and some cornbread in the oven. Come and get something to eat. Ain’t no sense you fretting over Gabe.

Rose turns to go into the house.

Troy. Rose . . . got something to tell you.

Rose. Well, come on . . . wait till I get this food on the table.

Troy. Rose!

Rose stops and turns around.

I don’t know how to say this. (Pause.) I can’t explain it none. It just sort of grows on you till it gets out of hand. It starts out like a little bush . . . and the next thing you know it’s a whole forest.

Rose. Troy . . . what is you talking about?

Troy. I’m talking, woman, let me talk. I’m trying to find a way to tell you . . . I’m gonna be a daddy. I’m gonna be somebody’s daddy.

Rose. Troy . . . you’re not telling me this? You’re gonna be . . . what?

Troy. Rose . . . now . . . see . . .

Rose. You telling me you gonna be somebody’s daddy? You telling your wife this?

Gabriel enters from the street. He carries a rose in his band.

Gabriel. Hey, Troy! Hey, Rose!

Rose. I have to wait eighteen years to hear something like this.

Gabriel. Hey, Rose . . . I got a flower for you. (He hands it to her.) That’s a rose. Same rose like you is.

Rose. Thanks, Gabe.

Gabriel. Troy, you ain’t mad at me is you? Them bad mens come and put me away. You ain’t mad at me is you?

Troy. Naw, Gabe, I ain’t mad at you.

Rose. Eighteen years and you wanna come with this.

Gabriel (takes a quarter out of his pocket). See what I got? Got a brand new quarter.

Troy. Rose . . . it’s just . . .

Rose. Ain’t nothing you can say, Troy. Ain’t no way of explaining that.

Gabriel. Fellow that give me this quarter had a whole mess of them. I’m gonna keep this quarter till it stop shining.

Rose. Gabe, go on in the house there. I got some watermelon in the Frigidaire. Go on and get you a piece.

Gabriel. Say, Rose . . . you know I was chasing hellhounds and them bad mens come and get me and take me away. Troy helped me. He come down there and told them they better let me go before he beat them up. Yeah, he did!

Rose. You go on and get you a piece of watermelon, Gabe. Them bad mens is gone now.

Gabriel. Okay, Rose . . . gonna get me some watermelon. The kind with the stripes on it.

Gabriel exits into the house.
ROSE. Why, Troy? Why? After all these years to come dragging this in to me now. It don’t make no sense at your age. I could have expected this ten or fifteen years ago, but not now.

TROY. Age ain’t got nothing to do with it, Rose.

ROSE. I done tried to be everything a wife should be. Everything a wife could be. Been married eighteen years and I got to live to see the day you tell me you been seeing another woman and done fathered a child by her. And you know I ain’t never wanted no half nothing in my family. My whole family is half. Everybody got different fathers and mothers . . . my two sisters and my brother. Can’t hardly tell who’s who. Can’t never sit down and talk about Papa and Mama. It’s your papa and your mama and my papa and my mama . . .

TROY. Rose . . . stop it now.

ROSE. I ain’t never wanted that for none of my children. And now you wanna drag your behind in here and tell me something like this.

TROY. You ought to know. It’s time for you to know.

ROSE. Well, I don’t want to know, goddamn it!

TROY. I can’t just make it go away. It’s done now. I can’t wish the circumstance of the thing away.

ROSE. And you don’t want to either. Maybe you want to wish me and my boy away. Maybe that’s what you want? Well, you can’t wish us away. I’ve got eighteen years of my life invested in you. You ought to have stayed upstairs in my bed where you belong.

TROY. Rose . . . now listen to me . . . we can get a handle on this thing. We can talk this out . . . come to an understanding.

ROSE. All of a sudden it’s “we.” Where was “we” at when you was down there rolling around with some godforsaken woman? “We” should have come to an understanding before you started making a damn fool of yourself. You’re a day late and a dollar short when it comes to an understanding with me.

TROY. It’s just . . . She gives me a different idea . . . a different understanding about myself. I can step out of this house and get away from the pressures and problems . . . be a different man. I ain’t got to wonder how I’m gonna pay the bills or get the roof fixed. I can just be a part of myself that I ain’t never been.

ROSE. What I want to know . . . is do you plan to continue seeing her. That’s all you can say to me.

TROY. I can sit up in her house and laugh. Do you understand what I’m saying. I can laugh out loud . . . and it feels good. It reaches all the way down to the bottom of my shoes. (Pause) Rose, I can’t give that up.

ROSE. Maybe you ought to go on and stay down there with her . . . if she’s a better woman than me.

TROY. It ain’t about nobody being a better woman or nothing. Rose, you ain’t the blame. A man couldn’t ask for no woman to be a better wife than you’ve been. I’m responsible for it. I done locked myself into a pattern trying to take care of you all that I forgot about myself.

ROSE. What the hell was I there for? That was my job, not somebody else’s.

TROY. Rose, I done tried all my life to live decent . . . to live a clean . . . hard . . . useful life. I tried to be a good husband to you. In every way I knew how. Maybe I come into the world backwards, I don’t know. But . . .
you born with two strikes on you before you come to the plate. You got to guard it closely... always looking for the curve ball on the inside corner. You can't afford to let none get past you. You can't afford a call strike. If you going down... you going down swinging. Everything lined up against you. What you gonna do. I fooled them, Rose. I bunted. When I found you and Cory and a halfway decent job... I was safe. Couldn't nothing touch me. I wasn't gonna strike out no more. I wasn't going back to the penitentiary. I wasn't gonna lay in the streets with a bottle of wine. I was safe. I had me a family. A job. I wasn't gonna get that last strike. I was on first looking for one of them boys to knock me in. To get me home.

ROSE. You should have stayed in my bed, Troy.

TROY. Then when I saw that gal... she firmed up my backbone. And I got to thinking that if I tried... I just might be able to steal second. Do you understand after eighteen years I wanted to steal second.

ROSE. You should have held me tight. You should have grabbed me and held on.

TROY. I stood on first base for eighteen years and I thought... well, god-damn it... go on for it!

ROSE. We're not talking about baseball! We're talking about you going off to lay in bed with another woman... and then bring it home to me. That's what we're talking about. We ain't talking about no baseball.

TROY. Rose, you're not listening to me. I'm trying the best I can to explain it to you. It's not easy for me to admit that I been standing in the same place for eighteen years.

ROSE. I been standing with you! I been right here with you, Troy. I got a life too. I gave eighteen years of my life to stand in the same spot with you. Don't you think I ever wanted other things? Don't you think I had dreams and hopes? What about my life? What about me. Don't you think it ever crossed my mind to want to know other men? That I wanted to lay up somewhere and forget about my responsibilities? That I wanted someone to make me laugh so I could feel good? You not the only one who's got wants and needs. But I held on to you, Troy. I took all my feelings, my wants and needs, my dreams... and I buried them inside you. I planted a seed and watched and prayed over it. I planted myself inside you and waited to bloom. And it didn't take me no eighteen years to find out the soil was hard and rocky and it wasn't never gonna bloom.

But I held on to you, Troy. I held you tighter. You was my husband. I owed you everything I had. Every part of me I could find to give you. And upstairs in that room... with the darkness falling in on me... I gave everything I had to try and erase the doubt that you wasn't the finest man in the world. And wherever you was going... I wanted to be there with you. Cause you was my husband. Cause that's the only way I was gonna survive as your wife. You always talking about what you give... and what you don't have to give. But you take too. You take... and don't even know nobody's giving!

ROSE turns to exit into the house; TROY grabs her arm.

TROY. You say I take and don't give!

ROSE. Troy! You're hurting me!
TROY. You say I take and don’t give!
ROSE. Troy . . . you’re hurting my arm! Let go!
TROY. I done give you everything I got. Don’t you tell that lie on me.
ROSE. Troy! Troy. Don’t you tell that lie on me!

CORY enters from the house.

CORY. Mama!
ROSE. Troy. You’re hurting me.
TROY. Don’t you tell me about no taking and giving.

CORY comes up behind TROY and grabs him. Troy, surprised, is thrown off balance just as Cory throws a glancing blow that catches him on the chest and knocks him down. Troy is stunned, as is Cory.

ROSE. Troy. Troy. No!

TROY gets to his feet and starts at Cory.

Troy . . . no. Please! Troy!
ROSE pulls on Troy to hold him back. Troy stops himself.

TROY (to Cory). All right. That’s strike two. You stay away from around me, boy. Don’t you strike out. You living with a full count. Don’t you strike out.

TROY exits out the yard as the lights go down.

Scene 2

It is six months later, early afternoon. TROY enters from the house and starts to exit the yard. ROSE enters from the house.

ROSE. Troy, I want to talk to you.
TROY. All of a sudden, after all this time, you want to talk to me, huh? You ain’t wanted to talk to me for months. You ain’t wanted to talk to me last night. You ain’t wanted no part of me then. What you wanna talk to me about now?
ROSE. Tomorrow’s Friday.
TROY. I know what day tomorrow is. You think I don’t know tomorrow’s Friday? My whole life I ain’t done nothing but look to see Friday coming and you got to tell me it’s Friday.
ROSE. I want to know if you’re coming home.
TROY. I always come home, Rose. You know that. There ain’t never been a night I ain’t come home.
ROSE. That ain’t what I mean . . . and you know it. I want to know if you’re coming straight home after work.
TROY. I figure I’d cash my check . . . hang out at Taylors’ with the boys . . . maybe play a game of checkers . . .
ROSE. Troy, I can’t live like this. I won’t live like this. You livin’ on borrowed time with me. It’s been going on six months now you ain’t been coming home.
TROY. I be here every night. Every night of the year. That's 365 days.
ROSE. I want you to come home tomorrow after work.
TROY. Rose . . . I don’t mess up my pay. You know that now. I take my pay and I give it to you. I don’t have no money but what you give me back. I just want to have a little time to myself . . . a little time to enjoy life.
ROSE. What about me? When’s my time to enjoy life?
TROY. I don’t know what to tell you, Rose. I’m doing the best I can.
ROSE. You ain’t been home from work but time enough to change your clothes and run out . . . and you wanna call that the best you can do?
TROY. I’m going over to the hospital to see Alberta. She went into the hospital this afternoon. Look like she might have the baby early. I won’t be gone long.
ROSE. Well, you ought to know. They went over to Miss Pearl’s and got Gabe today. She said you told them to go ahead and lock him up.
TROY. I ain’t said no such thing. Whoever told you that is telling a lie. Pearl ain’t doing nothing but telling a big fat lie.
ROSE. She ain’t had to tell me. I read it on the papers.
TROY. I ain’t told them nothing of the kind.
ROSE. I saw it right there on the papers.
TROY. What it say, huh?
ROSE. It said you told them to take him.
TROY. Then they screwed that up, just the way they screw up everything. I ain’t worried about what they got on the paper.
ROSE. Say the government send part of his check to the hospital and the other part to you.
TROY. I ain’t got nothing to do with that if that’s the way it works. I ain’t made up the rules about how it work.
ROSE. You did Gabe just like you did Cory. You wouldn’t sign the paper for Cory . . . but you signed for Gabe. You signed that paper.

The telephome is beard ringing inside the house.

TROY. I told you I ain’t signed nothing, woman! The only thing I signed was the release form. Hell, I can’t read, I don’t know what they had on that paper! I ain’t signed nothing about sending Gabe away.
ROSE. I said send him to the hospital . . . you said let him be free . . . now you done went down there and signed him to the hospital for half his money. You went back on yourself, Troy. You gonna have to answer for that.
TROY. See now . . . you been over there talking to Miss Pearl. She done got mad cause she ain’t getting Gabe’s rent money. That’s all it is. She’s liable to say anything.
ROSE. Troy, I seen where you signed the paper.
TROY. You ain’t seen nothing I signed. What she doing got papers on my brother anyway? Miss Pearl telling a big fat lie. And I’m gonna tell her about it too! You ain’t seen nothing I signed. Say . . . you ain’t seen nothing I signed.

ROSE exits into the house to answer the telephome. Presently she returns.

ROSE. Troy . . . that was the hospital. Alberta had the baby.
TROY. What she have? What is it?
ROSE. It’s a girl.
TROY. I better get on down to the hospital to see her.
ROSE. Troy . . .
TROY. Rose . . . I got to go see her now. That's only right . . . what's the matter . . . the baby's all right, ain't it?
ROSE. Alberta died having the baby.
TROY. Died . . . you say she's dead? Alberta's dead?
ROSE. They said they done all they could. They couldn't do nothing for her.
TROY. The baby? How's the baby?
ROSE. They say it's healthy. I wonder who's gonna bury her.
TROY. She had family, Rose. She wasn't living in the world by herself.
ROSE. I know she wasn't living in the world by herself.
TROY. Next thing you gonna want to know if she had any insurance.
ROSE. Troy, you ain't got to talk like that.
TROY. That's the first thing that jumped out your mouth. "Who's gonna bury her?" Like I'm fixing to take on that task for myself.
ROSE. I am your wife. Don't push me away.
TROY. I ain't pushing nobody away. Just give me some space. That's all. Just give me some room to breathe.

ROSE exits into the house. TROY walks about the yard.

TROY (with a quiet rage that threatens to consume him). All right . . . Mr. Death. See now . . . I'm gonna tell you what I'm gonna do. I'm gonna take and build me a fence around this yard. See? I'm gonna build me a fence around what belongs to me. And then I want you to stay on the other side. See? You stay over there until you're ready for me. Then you come on. Bring your army. Bring your sickle. Bring your wrestling clothes. I ain't gonna fall down on my vigilance this time. You ain't gonna sneak up on me no more. When you ready for me . . . when the top of your list say Troy Maxson . . . that's when you come around here. You come up and knock on the front door. Ain't nobody else got nothing to do with this. This is between you and me. Man to man. You stay on the other side of that fence until you ready for me. Then you come up and knock on the front door. Anytime you want. I'll be ready for you.

The lights go down to black.

Scene 3

The lights come up on the porch. It is late evening three days later. ROSE sits listening to the ball game waiting for TROY. The final out of the game is made and ROSE switches off the radio. TROY enters the yard carrying an infant wrapped in blankets. He stands back from the house and calls.

ROSE enters and stands on the porch. There is a long, awkward silence, the weight of which grows heavier with each passing second.

TROY. Rose . . . I'm standing here with my daughter in my arms. She ain't but a wee bittie little old thing. She don't know nothing about grownups' business. She innocent . . . and she ain't got no mama.
ROSE. What you telling me for, Troy?
She turns and exits into the house.

TROY. Well . . . I guess we’ll just sit out here on the porch.

He sits down on the porch. There is an awkward indelicateness about the way he handles the baby. His largeness engulfs and seems to swallow it. He speaks loud enough for ROSE to hear.

A man’s got to do what’s right for him. I ain’t sorry for nothing I done. It felt right in my heart. (To the baby.) What you smiling at? Your daddy’s a big man. Got these great big old hands. But sometimes he’s scared. And right now your daddy’s scared cause we sitting out here and ain’t got no home. Oh, I been homeless before. I ain’t had no little baby with me. But I been homeless. You just be out on the road by your lonesome and you see one of them trains coming and you just kinda go like this . . .

He sings as a lullaby:

Please, Mr. Engineer let a man ride the line
Please, Mr. Engineer let a man ride the line
I ain’t got no ticket please let me ride the blinds

ROSE enters from the house. TROY, bearing her steps behind him, stands and faces her.

She’s my daughter, Rose. My own flesh and blood. I can’t deny her no more than I can deny them boys. (Pause.) You and them boys is my family. You and them and this child is all I got in the world. So I guess what I’m saying is . . . I’d appreciate it if you’d help me take care of her.

ROSE. Okay, Troy . . . you’re right. I’ll take care of your baby for you . . . cause . . . like you say . . . she’s innocent . . . and you can’t visit the sins of the father upon the child. A motherless child has got a hard time. (She takes the baby from him.) From right now . . . this child got a mother. But you a womanless man.

ROSE turns and exits into the house with the baby. Lights go down to black.

Scene 4

It is two months later. LYONS enters the street. He knocks on the door and calls.

LYONS. Hey, Rose! (Pause.) Rose!

ROSE. (from inside the house). Stop that yelling. You gonna wake up Raynell. I just got her to sleep.

LYONS. I just stopped by to pay Papa this twenty dollars I owe him. Where’s Papa at?

ROSE. He should be here in a minute. I’m getting ready to go down to the church. Sit down and wait on him.

LYONS. I got to go pick up Bonnie over her mother’s house.

ROSE. Well, sit it down there on the table. He’ll get it.

LYONS (enters the house and sets the money on the table). Tell Papa I said thanks. I’ll see you again.

ROSE. All right, Lyons. We’ll see you.
LYONS starts to exit as CORY enters.

CORY. Hey, Lyons.

LYONS. What's happening, Cory? Say man, I'm sorry I missed your graduation. You know I had a gig and couldn't get away. Otherwise, I would have been there, man. So what you doing?

CORY. I'm trying to find a job.

LYONS. Yeah I know how that go, man. It's rough out here. Jobs are scarce.

CORY. Yeah, I know.

LYONS. Look here, I got to run. Talk to Papa... he know some people. He'll be able to help get you a job. Talk to him... see what he say.

CORY. Yeah... all right, Lyons.

LYONS. You take care. I'll talk to you soon. We'll find some time to talk.

LYONS exits the yard. CORY wanders over to the tree, picks up the bat, and assumes a batting stance. He studies an imaginary pitcher and swings. Dissatisfied with the result, he tries again. TROY enters. They eye each other for a beat. CORY puts the bat down and exits the yard.

TROY starts into the house as ROSE exits with RAYNELL. She is carrying a cake.

TROY. I'm coming in and everybody's going out.

ROSE. I'm taking this cake down to the church for the bake sale. Lyons was by to see you. He stopped by to pay you your twenty dollars. It's laying in there on the table.

TROY (going into his pocket). Well... here go this money.

ROSE. Put it in there on the table, Troy. I'll get it.

TROY. What time you coming back?

ROSE. Ain't no use in you studying me. It don't matter what time I come back.

TROY. I just asked you a question, woman. What's the matter... can't I ask you a question?

ROSE. Troy, I don't want to go into it. Your dinner's in there on the stove. All you got to do is heat it up. And don't you be eating the rest of them cakes in there. I'm coming back for them. We having a bake sale at the church tomorrow.

ROSE exits the yard. TROY sits down on the steps, takes a pint bottle from his pocket, opens it, and drinks. He begins to sing.

TROY.

Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

Had an old dog his name was Blue

You know Blue was mighty true

You know Blue as a good old dog

Blue trees a possum in a hollow log

You know from that he was a good old dog

BONO enters the yard.

BONO. Hey, Troy.

TROY. Hey, what's happening, Bono?

BONO. I just thought I'd stop by to see you.
TROY. What you stop by and see me for? You ain’t stopped by in a month of Sundays. Hell, I must owe you money or something.

BONO. Since you got your promotion I can’t keep up with you. Used to see you every day. Now I don’t even know what route you working.

TROY. They keep switching me around. Got me out in Greentree now . . . hauling white folks’ garbage.

BONO. Greentree, huh? You lucky, at least you ain’t got to be lifting them barrels. Damn if they ain’t getting heavier. I’m gonna put in my two years and call it quits.

TROY. I’m thinking about retiring myself.

BONO. You got it easy. You can drive for another five years.

TROY. It ain’t the same, Bono. It ain’t like working the back of the truck. Ain’t got nobody to talk to . . . feel like you working by yourself. Naw, I’m thinking about retiring. How’s Lucille?

BONO. She all right. Her arthritis get to acting up on her sometime. Saw Rose on my way in. She going down to the church, huh?

TROY. Yeah, she took up going down there. All them preachers looking for somebody to fatten their pockets. (Pause.) Got some gin here.

BONO. Naw, thanks. I just stopped by to say hello.

TROY. Hell, nigger . . . you can take a drink. I ain’t never known you to say no to a drink. You ain’t got to work tomorrow.

BONO. I just stopped by. I’m fixing to go over to Skinner’s. We got us a domino game going over his house every Friday.

TROY. Nigger, you can’t play no dominoes. I used to whup you four games out of five.

BONO. Well, that learned me. I’m getting better.

TROY. Yeah? Well, that’s all right.

BONO. Look here . . . I got to be getting on. Stop by sometime, huh?

TROY. Yeah, I’ll do that, Bono. Lucille told Rose you bought her a new refrigerator.

BONO. Yeah, Rose told Lucille you had finally built your fence . . . so I figured we’d call it even.

TROY. I knew you would.

BONO. Yeah . . . okay. I’ll be talking to you.

TROY. Yeah, take care, Bono. Good to see you. I’m gonna stop over.

BONO. Yeah. Okay, Troy.

BONO exits. TROY drinks from the bottle.

TROY.

Old Blue died and I dug his grave
Let him down with a golden chain
Every night when I hear old Blue bark
I know Blue treed a possum in Noah’s Ark.
Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

CORY enters the yard. They eye each other for a beat. TROY is sitting in the middle of the steps. CORY walks over.

CORY. I got to get by.

TROY. Say what? What’s you say?
CORY: You in my way. I got to get by.
TROY: You got to get by where? This is my house. Bought and paid for. In full. Took me fifteen years. And if you wanna go in my house and I’m sitting on the steps . . . you say excuse me. Like your mama taught you.
CORY: Come on, Pop . . . I got to get by.

Cory starts to maneuver his way past Troy. Troy grabs his leg and shoves him back.

TROY: You just gonna walk over top of me?
CORY: I live here too!
TROY (advancing toward him). You just gonna walk over top of me in my own house?
CORY: I ain’t scared of you.
TROY. I ain’t asked if you was scared of me. I asked you if you was fixing to walk over top of me in my own house? That’s the question. You ain’t gonna say excuse me? You just gonna walk over top of me?
CORY: If you wanna put it like that.
TROY: How else am I gonna put it?
CORY: I was walking by you to go into the house cause you sitting on the steps drunk, singing to yourself. You can put it like that.
TROY. Without saying excuse me???
CORY doesn’t respond.

I asked you a question. Without saying excuse me???
CORY: I ain’t got to say excuse me to you. You don’t count around here no more.
TROY. Oh, I see . . . I don’t count around here no more. You ain’t got to say excuse me to your daddy. All of a sudden you done got so grown that your daddy don’t count around here no more . . . Around here in his own house and yard that he done paid for with the sweat of his brow. You done got so grown to where you gonna take over. You gonna take over my house. Is that right? You gonna wear my pants. You gonna go in there and stretch out on my bed. You ain’t got to say excuse me cause I don’t count around here no more. Is that right?
CORY: That’s right. You always talking this dumb stuff. Now, why don’t you just get out my way?
TROY: I guess you got someplace to sleep and something to put in your belly. You got that, huh? You got that? That’s what you need. You got that, huh?
CORY: You don’t know what I got. You ain’t got to worry about what I got.
TROY: You right! You one hundred percent right! I done spent the last seventeen years worrying about what you got. Now it’s your turn, see? I’ll tell you what to do. You grown . . . we done established that. You a man. Now, let’s see you act like one. Turn your behind around and walk out this yard. And when you get out there in the alley . . . you can forget about this house. See? Cause this is my house. You go on and be a man and get your own house. You can forget about this. Cause this is mine. You go on and get yours cause I’m through with doing for you.
CORY: You talking about what you did for me . . . what’d you ever give me?
TROY: Them feet and bones! That pumping heart, nigger! I give you more than anybody else is ever gonna give you.
CORY. You ain’t never gave me nothing! You ain’t never done nothing but hold me back. Afraid I was gonna be better than you. All you ever did was try and make me scared of you. I used to tremble every time you called my name. Every time I heard your footsteps in the house. Wondering all the time... what’s Papa gonna say if I do this?... What’s he gonna say if I do that?... What’s Papa gonna say if I turn on the radio? And Mama, too... she tries... but she’s scared of you.

TROY. You leave your mama out of this. She ain’t got nothing to do with this.

CORY. I don’t know how she stand you... after what you did to her.

TROY. I told you to leave your mama out of this!

He advances toward CORY.

TROY (shoves him on his shoulder). Nigger! That’s what you are. You just another nigger on the street to me!

CORY. You crazy! You know that?

TROY. Go on now! You got the devil in you. Get on away from me!

CORY. You just a crazy old man... talking about I got the devil in me.

TROY. Yeah, I’m crazy! If you don’t get on the other side of that yard... I’m gonna show you how crazy I am! Go on... get the hell out of my yard.

CORY. It ain’t your yard. You took Uncle Gabe’s money he got from the army to buy this house and then you put him out.

TROY (advances on CORY). Get your black ass out of my yard!

CORY. You ain’t going nowhere! Come on... put me out! I ain’t scared of you.

TROY. That’s my bat!

CORY. Come on!

TROY. Put my bat down!

CORY. Come on, put me out.

CORY swings at TROY, who backs across the yard.

What’s the matter? You so bad... put me out!

TROY advances toward CORY.

CORY (backing up). Come on! Come on!

TROY. You’re gonna have to use it! You wanna draw that bat back on me... you’re gonna have to use it.

CORY. Come on!... Come on!

CORY swings the bat at TROY a second time. He misses. TROY continues to advance toward him.

TROY. You’re gonna have to kill me! You wanna draw that bat back on me. You’re gonna have to kill me.

CORY, backed up against the tree, can go no farther. TROY taunts him. He sticks out his beard and offers him a target.
Come on! Come on!

cory is unable to swing the bat. troy grabs it.

troy. then i'll show you.

cory and troy struggle over the bat. the struggle is fierce and fully engaged. troy ultimately is the stronger and takes the bat from cory and stands over him ready to swing. he stops himself.

go on and get away from around my house.

cory, stung by his defeat, picks himself up, walks slowly out of the yard and up the alley.

cory. tell mama i'll be back for my things.

troy. they'll be on the other side of that fence.

cory exits.

troy. i can't taste nothing. helluljah! i can't taste nothing no more. (troy assumes a batting posture and begins to taunt death, the fastball on the outside corner.) come on! it's between you and me now! come on! anytime you want! come on! i be ready for you . . . but i ain't gonna be easy.

the lights go down on the scene.

scene 5

the time is 1965. the lights come up in the yard. it is the morning of troy's funeral. a funeral plaque with a light hangs beside the door. there is a small garden plot off to the side. there is noise and activity in the house as rose, lyons, and bono have gathered. the door opens and raynell, seven years old, enters dressed in a flannel nightgown. she crosses to the garden and pokes around with a stick. rose calls from the house.

rose. raynell!

raynell. mam?

rose. what you doing out there?

raynell. nothing.

rose comes to the door.

rose. girl, get in here and get dressed. what you doing?

raynell. seeing if my garden growed.

rose. i told you it ain't gonna grow overnight. you got to wait.

raynell. it don't look like it never gonna grow. dag!

rose. i told you a watched pot never boils. get in here and get dressed.

raynell. this ain't even no pot, mama.

rose. you just have to give it a chance. it'll grow. now you come on and do what i told you. we got to be getting ready. this ain't no morning to be playing around. you hear me?

raynell. yes, mam.
ROSE exits into the house. RAYNELL continues to poke at her garden with a stick. CORY enters. He is dressed in a Marine corporal's uniform, and carries a duffelbag. His posture is that of a military man, and his speech has a clipped sternness.

CORY (to RAYNELL). Hi. (Pause.) I bet your name is Raynell.
RAYNELL. Uh huh.
CORY. Is your mama home?

RAYNELL runs up on the porch and calls through the screen door.
RAYNELL. Mama . . . there's some man out here. Mama?

ROSE comes to the door.

ROSE. Cory? Lord have mercy! Look here, you all!

ROSE and CORY embrace in a tearful reunion as BONO and LYONS enter from the house dressed in funeral clothes.

BONO. Aw, looka here . . .
ROSE. Done got all grown up!
CORY. Don't cry, Mama. What you crying about?
ROSE. I'm just so glad you made it.
CORY. Hey Lyons. How you doing, Mr. Bono.

LYONS goes to embrace CORY.

LYONS. Look at you, man. Look at you. Don't he look good, Rose. Got them Corporal stripes.
ROSE. What took you so long?
CORY. You know how the Marines are, Mama. They got to get all their paperwork straight before they let you do anything.
ROSE. Well, I'm sure glad you made it. They let Lyons come. Your Uncle Gabe's still in the hospital. They don't know if they gonna let him out or not. I just talked to them a little while ago.
LYONS. A Corporal in the United States Marines.
BONO. Your daddy knew you had it in you. He used to tell me all the time.
LYONS. Don't he look good, Mr. Bono?
BONO. Yeah, he remind me of Troy when I first met him. (Pause.) Say, Rose, Lucille's down at the church with the choir. I'm gonna go down and get the pallbearers lined up. I'll be back to get you all.
ROSE. Thanks, Jim.
CORY. See you, Mr. Bono.

LYONS (with his arm around RAYNELL). Cory . . . look at Raynell. Ain't she precious? She gonna break a whole lot of hearts.
ROSE. Raynell, come and say hello to your brother. This is your brother, Cory. You remember Cory.
RAYNELL. No, Mam.
CORY. She don't remember me, Mama.
ROSE. Well, we talk about you. She heard us talk about you. (To RAYNELL.) This is your brother, Cory. Come on and say hello.
RAYNELL. Hi.
CORY. Hi. So you're Raynell. Mama told me a lot about you.
ROSE. You all come on into the house and let me fix you some breakfast. Keep up your strength.

CORY. I ain’t hungry, Mama.

LYONS. You can fix me something, Rose. I’ll be in there in a minute.

ROSE. Cory, you sure you don’t want nothing? I know they ain’t feeding you right.

CORY. No, Mama . . . thanks. I don’t feel like eating. I’ll get something later.

ROSE. Raynell . . . get on upstairs and get that dress on like I told you.

ROSE and RAYNELL exit into the house.

LYONS. So . . . I hear you thinking about getting married.

CORY. Yeah, I done found the right one, Lyons. It’s about time.

LYONS. Me and Bonnie been split up about four years now. About the time Papa retired. I guess she just got tired of all them changes I was putting her through. (Pause.) I always knew you was gonna make something out yourself. Your head was always in the right direction. So . . . you gonna stay in . . . make it a career . . . put in your twenty years?

CORY. I don’t know. I got six already, I think that’s enough.

LYONS. Stick with Uncle Sam and retire early. Ain’t nothing out here. I guess Rose told you what happened with me. They got me down the workhouse. I thought I was being slick cashing other people’s checks.

CORY. How much time you doing?

LYONS. They give me three years. I got that beat now. I ain’t got but nine more months. It ain’t so bad. You learn to deal with it like anything else. You got to take the crookeds with the straights. That’s what Papa used to say. He used to say that when he struck out. I seen him strike out three times in a row . . . and the next time up he hit the ball over the grandstand. Right out there in Homestead Field. He wasn’t satisfied hitting in the seats . . . he want to hit it over everything! After the game he had two hundred people standing around waiting to shake his hand. You got to take the crookeds with the straights. Yeah, Papa was something else.

CORY. You still playing?

LYONS. Cory . . . you know I’m gonna do that. There’s some fellows down there we got us a band . . . we gonna try and stay together when we get out . . . but yeah, I’m still playing. It still helps me to get out of bed in the morning. As long as it do that I’m gonna be right there playing and trying to make some sense out of it.

ROSE (calling). Lyons, I got these eggs in the pan.

LYONS. Let me go on and get these eggs, man. Get ready to go bury Papa. (Pause.) How you doing? You doing all right?

CORY. I’m doing okay.

LYONS touches him on the shoulder and they share a moment of silent grief. LYONS exits into the house. CORY wanders about the yard. RAYNELL enters.

RAYNELL. Hi.

CORY. Hi.

RAYNELL. Did you used to sleep in my room?

CORY. Yeah . . . that used to be my room.

RAYNELL. That’s what Papa call it. “Cory’s room.” It got your football in the closet.

ROSE comes to the door.
ROSE. Raynell, get in there and get them good shoes on.
RAYNELL. Mama, can’t I wear these? Them other one hurt my feet.
ROSE. Well, they just gonna have to hurt your feet for a while. You ain’t said they hurt your feet when you went down to the store and got them.
RAYNELL. They didn’t hurt then. My feet done got bigger.
ROSE. Don’t you give me no backtalk now. You get in there and get them shoes on.

RAYNELL exits into the house.

Ain’t too much changed. He still got that piece of rag tied to that tree. He was out here swinging that bat. I was just ready to go back in the house. He swung that bat and then he just fell over. Seem like he swung it and stood there with this grin on his face . . . and then he just fell over. They carried him on down to the hospital, but I knew there wasn’t no need . . . why don’t you come on in the house?

CORY. Mama . . . I got something to tell you. I don’t know how to tell you this . . . but I’ve got to tell you . . . I’m not going to Papa’s funeral.
ROSE. Boy, hush your mouth. That’s your daddy you talking about. I don’t want hear that kind of talk this morning. I done raised you to come to this? You standing there all healthy and grown talking about you ain’t going to your daddy’s funeral?
CORY. Mama . . . listen . . .
ROSE. I don’t want to hear it, Cory. You just get that thought out of your head.
CORY. I can’t drag Papa with me everywhere I go. I’ve got to say no to him. One time in my life I’ve got to say no.
ROSE. Don’t nobody have to listen to nothing like that. I know you and your daddy ain’t seen eye to eye, but I ain’t got to listen to that kind of talk this morning. Whatever was between you and your daddy . . . the time has come to put it aside. Just take it and set it over there on the shelf and forget about it. Disrespecting your daddy ain’t gonna make you a man, Cory. You got to find a way to come to that on your own. Not going to your daddy’s funeral ain’t gonna make you a man.
CORY. The whole time I was growing up . . . living in his house . . . Papa was like a shadow that followed you everywhere. It weighed on you and sunk into your flesh. It would wrap around you and lay there until you couldn’t tell which one was you anymore. That shadow digging in your flesh. Trying to crawl in. Trying to live through you. Everywhere I looked, Troy Maxson was staring back at me . . . hiding under the bed . . . in the closet. I’m just saying I’ve got to find a way to get rid of that shadow, Mama.
ROSE. You just like him. You got him in you good.
CORY. Don’t tell me that, Mama.
ROSE. You Troy Maxson all over again.
CORY. I don’t want to be Troy Maxson. I want to be me.
ROSE. You can’t be nobody but who you are, Cory. That shadow wasn’t nothing but you growing into yourself. You either got to grow into it or cut it down to fit you. But that’s all you got to make life with. That’s all you got to measure yourself against that world out there. Your daddy wanted you to be everything he wasn’t . . . and at the same time he tried to make you into everything he was. I don’t know if he was right or wrong . . . but I do know he meant to do more good than he meant to do... harm. He wasn’t always right. Sometimes when he touched he bruised. And sometimes when he took me in his arms he cut.

When I first met your daddy I thought . . . Here is a man I can lay down with and make a baby. That’s the first thing I thought when I seen him. I was thirty years old and had done seen my share of men. But when he walked up to me and said, “I can dance a waltz that’ll make you dizzy,” I thought, Rose Lee, here is a man that you can open yourself up to and be filled to bursting. Here is a man that can fill all them empty spaces you been tipping around the edges of. One of them empty spaces was being somebody’s mother.

I married your daddy and settled down to cooking his supper and keeping clean sheets on the bed. When your daddy walked through the house he was so big he filled it up. That was my first mistake. Not to make him leave some room for me. For my part in the matter. But at that time I wanted that. I wanted a house that I could sing in. And that’s what your daddy gave me. I didn’t know to keep up his strength I had to give up little pieces of mine. I did that. I took on his life as mine and mixed up the pieces so that you couldn’t hardly tell which was which anymore. It was my choice. It was my life and I didn’t have to live it like that. But that’s what life offered me in the way of being a woman and I took it. I grabbed hold of it with both hands.

By the time Raynell came into the house, me and your daddy had done lost touch with one another. I didn’t want to make my blessing off of nobody’s misfortune . . . but I took on to Raynell like she was all them babies I had wanted and never had.

The phone rings.

Like I’d been blessed to relive a part of my life. And if the Lord see fit to keep up my strength . . . I’m gonna do her just like your daddy did you . . . I'm gonna give her the best of what's in me.

RAYNELL (entering, still with her old shoes). Mama . . . Reverend Tollivier on the phone.

ROSE exits into the house.

RAYNELL. Hi.

CORY. Hi.

RAYNELL. You in the Army or the Marines?

CORY. Marines.

RAYNELL. Papa said it was the Army. Did you know Blue?

CORY. Blue? Who’s Blue?

RAYNELL. Papa’s dog what he sing about all the time.

CORY (singing).

Hear it ring! Hear it ring!
I had a dog his name was Blue
You know Blue was mighty true
You know Blue was a good old dog
Blue treed a possum in a hollow log
You know from that he was a good old dog.
Hear it ring! Hear it ring!

RAYNELL joins in singing.
CORY AND RAYNELL.

Blue treed a possum out on a limb
Blue looked at me and I looked at him
Grabbed that possum and put him in a sack
Blue stayed there till I came back
Old Blue's feet was big and round
Never allowed a possum to touch the ground.
Old Blue died and I dug his grave
I dug his grave with a silver spade
Let him down with a golden chain
And every night I call his name
Go on Blue, you good dog you
Go on Blue, you good dog you.

RAYNELL.

Blue laid down and died like a man
Blue laid down and died . . .

BOTH.

Blue laid down and died like a man
Now he's treeing possums in the Promised Land
I'm gonna tell you this to let you know
Blue's gone where the good dogs go
When I hear old Blue bark
When I hear old Blue bark
Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark
Blue treed a possum in Noah's Ark.

ROSE comes to the screen door.

ROSE. Cory, we gonna be ready to go in a minute.
CORY (to RAYNELL). You go on in the house and change them shoes like Mama told you so we can go to Papa's funeral.
RAYNELL. Okay, I'll be back.

RAYNELL exits into the house. CORY gets up and crosses over to the tree. ROSE stands in the screen door watching him. GABRIEL enters from the alley.

GABRIEL (calling). Hey, Rose!
ROSE. Gabe?
GABRIEL. I'm here, Rose. Hey, Rose, I'm here!

ROSE enters from the house.

ROSE. Lord . . . Look here, Lyons!
LYONS. See, I told you, Rose . . . I told you they'd let him come.
CORY. How you doing, Uncle Gabe?
LYONS. How you doing, Uncle Gabe?
GABRIEL. Hey, Rose. It's time. It's time to tell St. Peter to open the gates. Troy, you ready? You ready, Troy. I'm gonna tell St. Peter to open the gates. You get ready now.

GABRIEL, with great fanfare, braces himself to blow. The trumpet is without a mouthpiece. He puts the end of it into his mouth and blows with great force, like a man who has been waiting some twenty-odd years for this single moment. No sound comes out of the trumpet. He braces himself and blows again with the same result. A third time he blows. There is a weight of impossible description that falls away and leaves him bare and exposed to a frightful realization. It is a trauma that a sane and normal mind would be unable to withstand. He begins to dance. A slow, strange dance, eerie and life-giving. A dance of atavistic signature and ritual. Lyons attempts to embrace him. Gabriel pushes Lyons away. He begins to howl in what is an attempt at song, or perhaps a song turning back into itself in an attempt at speech. He finishes his dance and the gates of heaven stand open as wide as God’s closet.

That’s the way that go!

BLACKOUT

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

The Play on the Page

1. What do you think that Bono means when he says, early in Act 2, “Some people build fences to keep people out . . . and some people build fences to keep people in”? Why is the play called Fences? What has fenced Troy in? What is Troy fencing in? (Take account of Troy’s last speech in Act 2, Scene 2, but do not limit your discussion to this speech.)
2. What do you think Troy’s reasons are—conscious and unconscious—for not wanting Cory to play football at college?
3. Compare and contrast Cory and Lyons. Consider, too, in what ways they resemble Troy and in what ways they differ from him.
4. In what ways is Troy like his father, and in what ways unlike him?
5. What do you make out of the prominence given to the song about Blue?
6. There is a good deal of anger in the play, but there is also humor. Which passages do you find humorous, and why?
7. Characterize Rose Maxson.

The Play on the Stage

8. How would Wilson’s remarks in the 1987 interview (see page 1521) help a director in staging Fences? For example, his assertion that every person (except Raynell) is institutionalized at the end of the play might suggest a certain tone or mood for a production.
9. In what ways is the role of Gabriel a challenge for an actor? What advice might you give to the other actors on stage during Gabriel’s appearances?
10. Some scenes begin by specifying that “the lights come up.” Others do not, presumably beginning with an illuminated stage. All scenes except the last one end with the lights going down to blackness. Explain Wilson’s use of lighting.
Talking about Fences

(Part of an interview conducted with David Savran on 13 March 1987.)

In reading Fences, I came to view Troy more and more critically as the play progressed, sharing Rose’s point of view. We see that Troy has been crippled by his father. That’s being replayed in Troy’s relationship with Cory. Do you think there’s a way out of that cycle?

Surely. First of all, we’re all like our parents. The things we are taught early in life, how to respond to the world, our sense of morality—everything, we get from them. Now you can take that legacy and do with it anything you want to do. It’s in your hands. Cory is Troy’s son. How can he be Troy’s son without sharing Troy’s values? I was trying to get at why Troy made the choices he made, how they have influenced his values and how he attempts to pass those along to his son. Each generation gives the succeeding generation what they think they need. One question in the play is, “Are the tools we are given sufficient to compete in a world that is different from the one our parents knew?” I think they are—it’s just that we have to do different things with the tools. That’s all Troy has to give. Troy’s flaw is that he does not recognize that the world was changing. That’s because he spent fifteen years in a penitentiary.

As African-Americans, we should demand to participate in society as Africans. That’s the way out of the vicious cycle of poverty and neglect that exists in 1987 in America, where you have a huge percentage of blacks living in the equivalent of South African townships, in housing projects. No one is inviting these people to participate in society. Look at the poverty levels—$8,500 for a family of four, if you have $8,501 you’re not counted. Those statistics would go up enormously if we had an honest assessment of the cost of living in America. I don’t know how anybody can support a family of four on $8,500. What I’m saying is that 85 or 90 percent of blacks in America are living in abject poverty and, for the most part, are crowded into what amount to concentration camps. The situation for blacks in America is worse than it was forty years ago. Some sociologists will tell you about the tremendous progress we’ve made. They didn’t put me out when I walked in the door. And you can always point to someone who works on Wall Street, or is a doctor. But they don’t count in the larger scheme of things.

Do you have any idea how these political changes could take place?

I’m not sure. I know that blacks must be allowed their cultural differences. I think the process of assimilation to white American society was a big mistake. We don’t want to be like you. Blacks living in housing projects are isolated from the society, for the most part—living as they choose, as Africans. Only they don’t realize the value in what they’re doing because they have accepted their victimization. They’ve marked themselves as victims. Once they recognize that, they can begin to move through society in a different manner, from a stronger position, and claim what is theirs.

A project of yours is to point up what happens when oppression is internalized.

Yes, transfer of aggression to the wrong target. I think it’s interesting that the two roads open to blacks for “full participation” are entertainment and sports, Ma Rainey and Fences, and I didn’t plan it that way. I don’t think that they’re the correct roads. I think Troy’s right. Now with the benefit of historical perspective, I can say that the athletic scholarship was actually a way of exploiting. Now you’ve got two million kids who think they’re going to play in the NBA. In the sixties the universities made a lot of money off of athletics. You had kids playing for free who, by and large, were not getting educated, were taking courses in basketweaving. Some of them could barely read.

Troy may be right about that issue, but it seems that he has passed on certain destructive traits in spite of himself. Take the hostility between father and son.

I think every generation says to the previous generation: you’re in my way. I’ve got to get by. The father–son conflict is actually a normal generational conflict that happens all the time.

So it’s a healthy and a good thing?

Oh, sure. Troy is seeing this boy walk around, smelling his piss. Two men cannot live in the same household. Troy would have been tremendously disappointed if Cory had not challenged him. Troy knows that this boy has to go out and do battle with that world: “So I had best prepare him because I know that’s a harsh, cruel place out there. But that’s going to be easy compared to what he’s getting here. Ain’t nobody gonna whip your ass like I’m gonna whip it.” He has a tremendous love for the kid. But he’s not going to say, “I love you,” he’s going to demonstrate it. He’s carrying garbage for seventeen years just for the kid. The only world Troy knows is the one that he made. Cory’s going to go on to find another one, he’s going to arrive at the same place as Troy. I think one of the most important lines in the play is when Troy is talking about his father: “I got to the place where I could feel him kicking in my blood and knew that the only thing that separated us was the matter of a few years.”

Hopefully, Cory will do things a bit differently with his son. For Troy, sports was not the way to go, the white man wouldn’t let him get away with that. “Get you a job, with your hands, something that nobody can take away from you.” The idea of school—he doesn’t know what that is. That’s for white folks. Very few blacks had paperwork jobs. But if you knew how to fix cars, you could always make some money. That’s what Troy wants for Cory. There aren’t many people who ever jumped up in Troy’s face. So he’s proud of the kid at the same time that he expresses a hurt that all men feel. You got to cut your kid loose at some point. There’s that sense of loss and separation. You find out how Troy left his father’s house and you see how Cory leaves his house. I suspect with Cory it will repeat with some differences and maybe, after five or six generations, they’ll find a different way to do it.
Where Cory ends up is very ambiguous, as a marine in 1965.

Yes. For the average black kid on the street, that was an alternative. You went into the army because you could learn how to do something. I remember my parents talking about the son of some friends: "He’s in the navy. He did something"—as opposed to standing on the street corner, shooting drugs, drinking wine, and robbing stores. Lyons says to Cory, "I always knew you were going to make something out of yourself." It really wounds me. He’s a corporal in the marines. For blacks, that is a sense of accomplishment. Therein lies one of the tragedies of blacks in America. Cory says, "I don’t know. I put in six years. That’s enough." Anyone who goes into the army and makes a career out of it is a loser. They sit there and are nurtured by the army and they don’t have to confront life. Then they get out of the army and find there’s nothing to do. They didn’t learn any skills. And if they did, they can’t find a job. Four months later, they’re shooting dope. In the sixties a whole bunch of blacks went over, fought and died in the Vietnam War. The survivors came back to the same street corners and found out nothing had changed. They still couldn’t get a job.

At the end of Fences every person, with the exception of Raynell, is institutionalized. Rose is in a church. Lyons is in a penitentiary. Gabriel’s in a mental hospital and Cory’s in the marines. The only free person is the girl, Troy’s daughter, the hope for the future. That was conscious on my part because in ’57 that’s what I saw. Blacks have relied on institutions which are really foreign—except for the black church, which has been our saving grace. I have some problems with it but I recognize it as a central social organization and sometimes an economic organization for the black community. I would like to see blacks develop their own institutions that respond to their needs.

DAVID IVES

Sure Thing

[1988]

This play is for Jason Buzas

BETTY, a woman in her late twenties, is reading at a café table. An empty chair is opposite her. BILL, same age, enters.

BILL: Excuse me. Is this chair taken?
BETTY: Excuse me?
BILL: Is this taken?
BETTY: Yes it is.
BILL: Oh. Sorry.
BETTY: Sure thing.

[A bell rings softly.]
BILL: Excuse me. Is this chair taken?
BETTY: Excuse me?
BILL: Is this taken?
BETTY: No, but I'm expecting somebody in a minute.
BILL: Oh. Thanks anyway.
BETTY: Sure thing.

[A bell rings softly:]
BILL: Excuse me. Is this chair taken?
BETTY: No, but I'm expecting somebody very shortly.
BILL: Would you mind if I sit here till he or she or it comes?
BETTY [glances at her watch]: They do seem to be pretty late. . . .
BILL: You never know who you might be turning down.
BETTY: Sorry. Nice try, though.
BILL: Sure thing.

[Bell.]
BILL: Is this seat taken?
BETTY: No it's not.
BILL: Would you mind if I sit here?
BETTY: Yes I would.
BILL: Oh.

[Bell.]
BILL: Is this chair taken?
BETTY: No it's not.
BILL: Would you mind if I sit here?
BETTY: No. Go ahead.
BILL: Thanks. [He sits. She continues reading.] Everyplace else seems to be taken.
BETTY: Mm-hm.
BILL: Great place.
BETTY: Mm-hm.
BILL: What's the book?
BETTY: I just wanted to read in quiet, if you don't mind.
BILL: No. Sure thing.

[Bell.]
BILL: Everyplace else seems to be taken.
BETTY: Mm-hm.
BILL: Great place for reading.
BETTY: Yes, I like it.
BILL: What's the book?
BETTY: The Sound and the Fury.
BILL: Oh. Hemingway.

[Bell.]
BILL: What's the book?
BETTY: The Sound and the Fury.
BILL: Oh. Faulkner.
BETTY: Have you read it?
BILL: Not . . . actually. I've sure read about it, though. It's supposed to be great.
BETTY: It is great.
BILL: I hear it's great. [Small pause.] Waiter?
[Bell.]

What’s the book?

BETTY: The Sound and the Fury.

BILL: Oh. Faulkner.

BETTY: Have you read it?

BILL: I’m a Mets fan, myself.

[Bell.]

BETTY: Have you read it?

BILL: Yeah, I read it in college.

BETTY: Where was college?

BILL: I went to Oral Roberts University.

[Bell.]

BETTY: Where was college?

BILL: I was lying. I never really went to college. I just like to party.

[Bell.]

BETTY: Where was college?

BILL: Harvard.

BETTY: Do you like Faulkner?

BILL: I love Faulkner. I spent a whole winter reading him once.

BETTY: I’ve just started.

BILL: I was so excited after ten pages that I went out and bought everything else he wrote. One of the greatest reading experiences of my life. I mean, all that incredible psychological understanding. Page after page of gorgeous prose. His profound grasp of the mystery of time and human existence. The smells of the earth... What do you think?

BETTY: I think it’s pretty boring.

[Bell.]

BILL: What’s the book?

BETTY: The Sound and the Fury.

BILL: Oh! Faulkner!

BETTY: Do you like Faulkner?

BILL: I love Faulkner.

BETTY: He’s incredible.

BILL: I spent a whole winter reading him once.

BETTY: I was so excited after ten pages that I went out and bought everything else he wrote.

BILL: All that incredible psychological understanding.

BETTY: And the prose is so gorgeous.

BILL: And the way he’s grasped the mystery of time—

BETTY: —and human existence. I can’t believe I’ve waited this long to read him.

BILL: You never know. You might not have liked him before.

BETTY: That’s true.

BILL: You might not have been ready for him. You have to hit these things at the right moment or it’s no good.

BETTY: That’s happened to me.

BILL: It’s all in the timing. [Small pause.] My name’s Bill, by the way.

BETTY: I’m Betty.

BILL: Hi.
BETTY: Hi. [Small pause.]
BILL: Yes I thought reading Faulkner was . . . a great experience.
BETTY: Yes. [Small pause.]
BILL: The Sound and the Fury . . . [Another small pause.]
BETTY: Well. Onwards and upwards. [She goes back to her book.]
BILL: Waiter—?

[Bell.]

You have to hit these things at the right moment or it’s no good.
BETTY: That’s happened to me.
BILL: It’s all in the timing. My name’s Bill, by the way.
BETTY: I’m Betty.
BILL: Hi.
BETTY: Hi.
BILL: Do you come in here a lot?
BETTY: Actually I’m just in town for two days from Pakistan.
BILL: Oh. Pakistan.

[Bell.]

My name’s Bill, by the way.
BETTY: I’m Betty.
BILL: Hi.
BETTY: Hi.
BILL: Do you come in here a lot?
BETTY: Every once in a while. Do you?
BILL: Not so much anymore. Not as much as I used to. Before my nervous breakdown.

[Bell.]

Do you come in here a lot?
BETTY: Why are you asking?
BILL: Just interested.
BETTY: Are you really interested, or do you just want to pick me up?
BILL: No, I’m really interested.
BETTY: Why would you be interested in whether I come in here a lot?
BILL: I’m just . . . getting acquainted.
BETTY: Maybe you’re only interested for the sake of making small talk long enough to ask me back to your place to listen to some music, or because you’ve just rented this great tape for your VCR, or because you’ve got some terrific unknown Django Reinhardt record, only all you really want to do is fuck—which you won’t do very well—after which you’ll go into the bathroom and pee very loudly, then pad into the kitchen and get yourself a beer from the refrigerator without asking me whether I’d like anything, and then you’ll proceed to lie back down beside me and confess that you’ve got a girlfriend named Stephanie who’s away at medical school in Belgium for a year, and that you’ve been involved with her—off and on—in what you’ll call a very “intricate” relationship, for the past seven YEARS. None of which interests me, mister!
BILL: Okay.

[Bell.]

Do you come in here a lot?
BETTY: Every other day, I think.
BILL: I come in here quite a lot and I don’t remember seeing you.

BETTY: I guess we must be on different schedules.

BILL: Missed connections.

BETTY: Yes. Different time zones.

BILL: Amazing how you can live right next door to somebody in this town and never even know it.

BETTY: I know.

BILL: City life.

BETTY: It’s crazy.

BILL: We probably pass each other in the street every day. Right in front of this place, probably.

BETTY: Yep.

BILL [looks around]: Well the waiters here sure seem to be in some different time zone. I can’t seem to locate one anywhere. . . . Waiter! [He looks back.] So what do you—[He sees that she’s gone back to her book.]

BETTY: I beg pardon?

BILL: Nothing. Sorry. [Bell.]

BETTY: I guess we must be on different schedules.

BILL: Missed connections.

BETTY: Yes. Different time zones.

BILL: Amazing how you can live right next door to somebody in this town and never even know it.

BETTY: I know.

BILL: City life.

BETTY: It’s crazy.

BILL: You weren’t waiting for somebody when I came in, were you?

BETTY: Actually I was.

BILL: Oh. Boyfriend?

BETTY: Sort of.

BILL: What’s a sort-of boyfriend?

BETTY: My husband.

BILL: Ah-ha. [Bell.]

You weren’t waiting for somebody when I came in, were you?

BETTY: Actually I was.

BILL: Oh. Boyfriend?

BETTY: Sort of.

BILL: What’s a sort-of boyfriend?

BETTY: We were meeting here to break up.

BILL: Mm-hm . . . [Bell.]

What’s a sort-of boyfriend?

BETTY: My lover. Here she comes right now! [Bell.]

BILL: You weren’t waiting for somebody when I came in, were you?

BETTY: No, just reading.

BILL: Sort of a sad occupation for a Friday night, isn’t it? Reading here, all by yourself?
BETTY: Do you think so?
BILL: Well sure. I mean, what's a good-looking woman like you doing out alone on a Friday night?
BETTY: Trying to keep away from lines like that.
BILL: No, listen—

[Bell.]

You weren't waiting for somebody when I came in, were you?
BETTY: No, just reading.
BILL: Sort of a sad occupation for a Friday night, isn't it? Reading here all by yourself?
BETTY: I guess it is, in a way.
BILL: What's a good-looking woman like you doing out alone on a Friday night anyway? No offense, but . . .
BETTY: I'm out alone on a Friday night for the first time in a very long time.
BILL: Oh.
BETTY: You see, I just recently ended a relationship.
BILL: Oh.
BETTY: Of rather long standing.
BILL: I'm sorry. [Small pause.] Well listen, since reading by yourself is such a sad occupation for a Friday night, would you like to go elsewhere?
BETTY: No . . .
BILL: Do something else?
BETTY: No thanks.
BILL: I was headed out to the movies in a while anyway.
BETTY: I don't think so.
BILL: Big chance to let Faulkner catch his breath. All those long sentences get him pretty tired.
BETTY: Thanks anyway.
BILL: Okay.
BETTY: I appreciate the invitation.
BILL: Sure thing.

[Bell.]

You weren't waiting for somebody when I came in, were you?
BETTY: No, just reading.
BILL: Sort of a sad occupation for a Friday night, isn't it? Reading here all by yourself?
BETTY: I guess I was trying to think of it as existentially romantic. You know—cappuccino, great literature, rainy night . . .
BILL: That only works in Paris. We could hop the late plane to Paris. Get on a Concorde. Find a café . . .
BETTY: I'm a little short on plane fare tonight.
BILL: Darn it, so am I.
BETTY: To tell you the truth, I was headed to the movies after I finished this section. Would you like to come along? Since you can't locate a waiter?
BILL: That's a very nice offer, but . . .
BETTY: Uh-huh. Girlfriend?
BILL: Two, actually. One of them's pregnant, and Stephanie—

[Bell.]
BETTY: Girlfriend?
BILL: No, I don’t have a girlfriend. Not if you mean the castrating bitch I dumped last night.

BETTY: Girlfriend?
BILL: Sort of. Sort of.
BETTY: What’s a sort-of girlfriend?
BILL: My mother.

I just ended a relationship, actually.

BETTY: Oh.
BILL: Of rather long standing.
BETTY: I’m sorry to hear it.
BILL: This is my first night out alone in a long time. I feel a little bit at sea, to tell you the truth.
BETTY: So you didn’t stop to talk because you’re a Moonie, or you have some weird political affiliation—?

Straight-down-the-ticket Democrat.

Can I tell you something about politics?

I like to think of myself as a citizen of the universe.

I’m unaffiliated.
BETTY: That’s a relief. So am I.
BILL: I vote my beliefs.
BETTY: Labels are not important.
BILL: Labels are not important, exactly. Take me, for example. I mean, what does it matter if I had a two-point at—three-point at—four-point at college? Or if I did come from Pittsburgh—

Cleveland—

Westchester County?
BETTY: Sure.
BILL: I believe that a man is what he is.

A person is what he is.

A person is . . . what they are.
BETTY: I think so too.
BILL: So what if I admire Trotsky?

[Bell.]
So what if I once had a total-body liposuction?

[Bell.]
So what if I don’t have a penis?

[Bell.]
So what if I spent a year in the Peace Corps? I was acting on my convictions.

BETTY: Sure.
BILL: You just can’t hang a sign on a person.
BETTY: Absolutely. I’ll bet you’re a Scorpio.

[Many bells ring.]
Listen, I was headed to the movies after I finished this section. Would you like to come along?
BILL: That sounds like fun. What’s playing?
BETTY: A couple of the really early Woody Allen movies.
BILL: Oh.
BETTY: You don’t like Woody Allen?
BETTY: But you’re not crazy about Woody Allen.
BILL: Those early ones kind of get on my nerves.
BETTY: Uh-huh.

[Bell.]
BILL: Y’know I was headed to the—
BETTY [simultaneously]: I was thinking about—
BILL: I’m sorry.
BETTY: No, go ahead.
BILL: I was going to say that I was headed to the movies in a little while, and . . .
BETTY: So was I.
BILL: The Woody Allen festival?
BETTY: Just up the street.
BILL: Do you like the early ones?
BETTY: I think anybody who doesn’t ought to be run off the planet.
BILL: How many times have you seen Bananas?
BETTY: Eight times.
BILL: Twelve. So are you still interested? [Long pause.]
BETTY: Do you like Entenmann’s crumb cake . . . ?
BILL: Last night I went out at two in the morning to get one. Did you have an Etch-a-Sketch as a child?
BETTY: Yes! And do you like Brussels sprouts? [Pause.]
BILL: No, I think they’re disgusting.
BETTY: They are disgusting!
BILL: Do you still believe in marriage in spite of current sentiments against it?
BETTY: Yes.
BILL: And children?
BETTY: Three of them.
BILL: Two girls and a boy.
BETTY: Harvard, Vassar, and Brown.
BILL: And will you love me?
BETTY: Yes.
BILL: And cherish me forever?
BETTY: Yes.
BILL: Do you still want to go to the movies?
BETTY: Sure thing.
BILL AND BETTY [together]: Waiter!
BLACKOUT

TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Does the play have a plot? Does it follow the traditional formula of a beginning, a middle, and an end? (The conventional advice to playwrights is, “Get your guy up a tree, throw rocks at him, and get him down.”) Is there an ending, a resolution, or do you think the play could go on and on? Please explain.

2. Ives's opening stage direction tells us that the play is set in a café, but no details are given. If you were staging the play, would you provide more than a table and two chairs? Some sort of atmosphere? Why, or why not?

3. Ives's text calls at the end for a blackout, that is, a sudden darkening of the stage. Do you think this ending is preferable to a gradual fading of the lights, or a gradual closing of the curtain? Or, for that matter, why shouldn’t the two characters leave some money on the table and walk out together? In short, staying with Ives’s dialogue, evaluate other possible endings and present an argument for which one you believe is most effective. Ask yourself, “What kind of evidence do I need to make my argument as convincing as possible?”

4. If someone were to say to you that the play shows the need for people to keep revising their personalities, to (so to speak) keep reinventing themselves if they wish to function efficiently in the world, what might you reply? What does it mean to say that someone is “reinventing” himself or herself? Is that a desirable thing to do?

5. If someone asked you, “What is the meaning of Sure Thing?” how would you reply? Is there one meaning, or more than one? What is your evidence? Please present your view, and the evidence for it, in the form of a good argument.

6. Imagine and write up a scene that Ives neglected to include in Sure Thing. How does your new scene change the play? In your view, does it make the play better?

7. Prepare an essay of 1–2 pages, which you might imagine being sent to Ives, in which you argue why his play would benefit from the addition of your new scene.

TERRENCE McNALLY

Terrence McNally, born in 1939 in St. Petersburg, Florida, grew up in Corpus Christi, Texas, and did his undergraduate work at Columbia University. “I’m a gay man who writes plays," he has said, and most of his work concerns gay people—or the responses of straight people to gay people.

We give the original script of Andre's Mother (1988); McNally later amplified it for a 1990 television broadcast (running time is 58 minutes) that was awarded an Emmy.

Andre's Mother

Characters

cal, a young man
arthur, his father
penny, his sister andre's mother

Time: Now
Place: New York City, Central Park

Four people—cal, arthur, penny, and andre's mother—enter. They are nicely dressed and each carries a white helium-filled balloon on a string.

cal: You know what's really terrible? I can't think of anything terrific to say. Good-bye. I love you. I'll miss you. And I'm supposed to be so great with words!

penny: What's that over there?
arthur: Ask your brother.
cal: It's a theatre. An outdoor theatre. They do plays there in the summer. Shakespeare's plays. [to andre's mother.] God, how much he wanted to play Hamlet again. He would have gone to Timbuktu to have another go at that part. The summer he did it in Boston, he was so happy!

penny: Cal, I don't think she . . . ! It's not the time. Later.
arthur: Your son was a . . . the Jews have a word for it . . .
penny [quietly appalled]: Oh my God!
arthur: Mensch, I believe it is, and I think I'm using it right. It means warm, solid, the real thing. Correct me if I'm wrong.
penny: Fine, Dad, fine. Just quit while you're ahead.
arthur: I won't say he was like a son to me. Even my son isn't always like a son to me. I mean . . .! In my clumsy way, I'm trying to say how much I liked Andre. And how much he helped me to know my own boy. Cal was always two handfuls but Andre and I could talk about anything under the sun. My wife was very fond of him, too.
penny: Cal, I don't understand about the balloons.
cal: They represent the soul. When you let go, it means you're letting his soul ascend to Heaven. That you're willing to let go. Breaking the last earthly ties.
penny: Does the Pope know about this?
arthur: Penny!
penny: Andre loved my sense of humor. Listen, you can hear him laughing. [she lets go of her white balloon.] So long, you glorious, wonderful. I know-what-Cal-means-about-words . . . man! God forgive me for wishing you were straight every time I laid eyes on you. But if any man was going to have you, I'm glad it was my brother! Look how fast it went up. I bet that means something. Something terrific.
ARTHUR [lets bis balloon go]: Good-bye. God speed.

PENNY: Cal?

CAL: I’m not ready yet.

PENNY: Okay. We’ll be over there. Come on, Pop, you can buy your little girl a Good Humor.

ARTHUR: They still make Good Humor?

PENNY: Only now they’re called Dove Bars and they cost twelve dollars.

PENNY takes ARTHUR off. CAL and ANDRE’S MOTHER stand with their balloons.

CAL: I wish I knew what you were thinking. I think it would help me. You know almost nothing about me and I only know what Andre told me about you. I’d always had it in my mind that one day we would be friends, you and me. But if you didn’t know about Andre and me . . . If this hadn’t happened, I wonder if he would have ever told you. When he was sick, if I asked him once I asked him a thousand times, tell her. She’s your mother. She won’t mind. But he was so afraid of hurting you and of your disapproval. I don’t know which was worse. [No response. He sighs.] God, how many of us live in this city because we don’t want to hurt our mothers and live in mortal terror of their disapproval. We lose ourselves here. Our lives aren’t furtive, just our feelings toward people like you are! A city of fugitives from our parents’ scorn or heartbreak. Sometimes he’d seem a little down and I’d say, “What’s the matter, babe?” and this funny sweet, sad smile would cross his face and he’d say, “Just a little homesick, Cal, just a little bit.” I always accused him of being a country boy just playing at being a hotshot, sophisticated New Yorker. [He sighs.]

It’s bullshit. It’s all bullshit. [Still no response.]

Do you remember the comic strip Little Lulu? Her mother had no name, she was so remote, so formidable to all the children. She was just Lulu’s mother. “Hello, Lulu’s Mother,” Lulu’s friends would say. She was almost anonymous in her remoteness. You remind me of her. Andre’s Mother. Let me answer the questions you can’t ask and then I’ll leave you alone and you won’t ever have to see me again. Andre died of AIDS. I don’t know how he got it. I tested negative. He died bravely. You would have been proud of him. The only thing that frightened him was you. I’ll have everything that was his sent to you. I’ll pay for it. There isn’t much. You should have come up the summer he played Hamlet. He was magnificent. Yes, I’m bitter. I’m bitter I’ve lost him. I’m bitter what’s happening. I’m bitter even now, after all this, I can’t reach you. I’m beginning to feel your disapproval and it’s making me ill. [He looks at bis balloon.] Sorry, old friend. I blew it. [He lets go of the balloon.]

Good night, sweet prince, and flights of angels sing thee to thy rest! [Beat.]

Goodbye, Andre’s Mother. 1532

[He goes. ANDRE’S MOTHER stands alone holding her white balloon. Her lips tremble. She looks on the verge of breaking down. She is about to let go of the balloon when she pulls it down to her. She looks at it awhile before she gently kisses it. She lets go of the balloon. She follows it with her eyes as it rises and rises. The lights are beginning to fade. ANDRE’S MOTHER’s eyes are still on the balloon. The lights fade.]

1 Good night . . . rest! Cal is quoting lines that Hamlet’s friend Horatio speaks (5.2.336–337) at the moment of Hamlet’s death.
TOPICS FOR CRITICAL THINKING AND WRITING

1. Andre's Mother doesn't speak in the play, but we learn something about her through Cal's words, and something more through the description in the final stage direction. In a paragraph, characterize Andre's Mother.

2. Let's assume that you drafted this play, and now, on rereading it you decide that you want to give Andre's Mother one speech, and one speech only. Write the speech—it can go anywhere in the play that you think best—and then in a brief essay explain why you think the speech is effective.

3. Cal tells Penny that the balloons “represent the soul. When you let go, it means you're letting his soul ascend to Heaven.” Is that exactly the way you see the balloons, or would see them if you attended a funeral where white balloons were distributed? Explain.

Critical Perspectives
Critical Approaches: The Nature of Criticism

In everyday talk the most common meaning of criticism is something like “finding fault.” And to be critical is to be censorious. But a critic can see excellences as well as faults. Because we turn to criticism with the hope that the critic has seen something we have missed, the most valuable criticism is not that which shakes its finger at faults, but that which calls our attention to interesting things going on in the work of art. Here is a statement by W. H. Auden (1907–1973), suggesting that criticism is most useful when it calls our attention to things worth attending to:

What is the function of a critic? So far as I am concerned, he can do me one or more of the following services:

1. Introduce me to authors or works of which I was hitherto unaware.
2. Convince me that I have undervalued an author or a work because I had not read them carefully enough.
3. Show me relations between works of different ages and cultures which I could never have seen for myself because I do not know enough and never shall.
4. Give a “reading” of a work which increases my understanding of it.
5. Throw light upon the process of artistic “Making.”
6. Throw light upon the relation of art to life, science, economics, ethics, religion, etc.

—The Dyer’s Hand (New York, 1963), pages 8–9

Auden does not neglect the delight we get from literature, but he extends (especially in his sixth point) the range of criticism to include topics beyond the literary work itself. Notice too the emphasis on observing, showing, and illuminating, which suggests that the function of critical writing is not very different from the most common view of the function of imaginative writing.

Whenever we talk about a work of literature or of art, or, for that matter, even about a so-so movie or television show, what we say depends in large measure on certain conscious or unconscious assumptions that we make: “I liked it; the characters were very believable” (here the assumption is that characters ought to be believable); “I didn’t like it; there was too much violence” (here the assumption is that violence ought not to be shown, or if it is shown it should be made abhorrent; “I didn’t like it; it was awfully slow” (here the assumption probably is that there ought to be a fair amount of physical action, perhaps even changes of scene, rather than characters just talking); “I didn’t like it; I don’t think topics of this sort ought to be discussed publicly” (here the assumption is a moral one, that it is indecent to present certain topics); “I liked it partly because it was refreshing to hear such frankness” (here again the assumption is moral, and more or less the reverse of the previous one).

In short, whether we realize it or not, we judge the work from a particular viewpoint—its realism, its morality, or whatever.

Professional critics, too, work from assumptions, but their assumptions are usually highly conscious, and the critics may define their assumptions at length. They regard themselves as, for instance, Freudians or Marxists or Queer Theorists. They read all texts through the lens of a particular theory, and their focus enables them to see things that otherwise might go unnoticed. It should be added, however, that if a lens or critical perspective or interpretive strategy helps us to see certain things, it also limits our vision. Many critics therefore regard their method not as an exclusive way of thinking but only as a useful tool.

What follows is a brief survey of the chief current approaches to literature. You may find, as you read these pages, that one or another approach sounds especially congenial, and the critics may define their assumptions at length. What follows is a brief survey of the chief current approaches to literature. You may find, as you read these pages, that one or another approach sounds especially congenial, and therefore you may want to make use of it in your reading and writing. On the other hand, it’s important to remember, first, that works of literature are highly varied, and, second, that we read them for various purposes—to kill time, to enjoy fanciful visions, to be amused, to explore alien ways of feeling, and to learn about ourselves. It may be best to try to respond to each text in the way that the text seems to require rather than to read all texts according to a single formula. You’ll find that some works will lead you to want to think about them from several angles. A play by Shakespeare may stimulate you to read a book about the Elizabethan playhouse, and another that offers a Marxist interpretation of the English Renaissance, and still another that offers a feminist analysis of Shakespeare’s plays. All of these approaches, and others, will help you to deepen your understanding of the literary works that you read.

FORMALIST (OR NEW) CRITICISM

Formalist criticism emphasizes the work as an independent creation, a self-contained unit, something to be studied in itself, not as part of some larger context, such as the author’s life or a historical period. This kind of study is called formalist criticism because the emphasis is on the form of the work, the relationships between the parts—the construction of the plot, the contrasts between characters, the functions of rhymes, the point of view, and so on.

That literary criticism is a description and an evaluation of its object.
That the primary concern of criticism is with the problem of unity—the kind of whole which the literary work forms or fails to form, and the relation of the various parts to each other in building up this whole.
That the formal relations in a work of literature may include, but certainly exceed, those of logic. That in a successful work, form and content cannot be separated. That form is meaning.

If you have read the earlier pages of this book you are already familiar with most of these ideas, but in the next few pages we will look into some of them in detail.

Formalist criticism is, in essence, intrinsic criticism, rather than extrinsic, for (at least in theory) it concentrates on the work itself, independent of its writer and the writer’s background—that is, independent of biography, psychology, sociology, and history. The discussions of Langston Hughes’s “Harlem” (pages 587–588) and of Yeats’s “The Balloon of the Mind” (page 65) are examples. The gist is that a work of literature is complex, unified, and freestanding. In fact, of course, we usually bring outside knowledge to the work. For instance, a reader who is familiar with, say, Hamlet can hardly study another tragedy by Shakespeare, let’s say Romeo and Juliet, without bringing to the second play some conception of what Shakespearean tragedy is or can be. A reader of Alice Walker’s The Color Purple inevitably brings unforgettable outside material (perhaps the experience of being an African-American, or at least some knowledge of the history of African-Americans) to the literary work. It is very hard to talk only about Hamlet or The Color Purple and not at the same time talk about, or at least have in mind, aspects of human experience.

Formalist criticism begins with a personal response to the literary work, but it goes on to try to account for the response by closely examining the work. It assumes that the author shaped the poem, play, or story so fully that the work guides the reader’s responses. The assumption that “meaning” is fully and completely presented within the text is not much in favor today, when many literary critics argue that the active or subjective reader (or even what Judith Fetterley, a feminist critic, has called “the resisting reader”) and not the author of the text makes the “meaning.” Still, even if one grants that the reader is active, not passive or coolly objective, one can hold with the formalists that the author is active too, constructing a text that in some measure controls the reader’s responses. During the process of writing about our responses we may find that our responses change. A formalist critic would say that we see with increasing clarity what the work is really like, and what it really means. (Similarly, when authors write and revise a text they may change their understanding of what they are doing. A story that began as a lighthearted joke may turn into something far more serious than the writer imagined at the start, but, at least for the formalist critic, the final work contains a stable meaning that all competent readers can perceive.)

In practice, formalist criticism usually takes one of two forms, explication (the unfolding of meaning, line by line or even word by word) or analysis (the examination of the relations of parts). The essay on Yeats’s “The Balloon of the Mind” (page 65) is an explication, a setting forth of the implicit meanings of the words. The essay on Kate Chopin’s “The Story of an Hour” (pages 62–63) is an analysis.

To repeat: Formalist criticism assumes that a work of art is stable. An artist constructs a coherent, comprehensible work, thus conveying to a reader an emotion or an idea. T. S. Eliot said that the writer can’t just pour out emotions onto the page. Rather, Eliot said in an essay entitled “Hamlet and His Problems” (1919), “The only way of expressing emotion in the form of art is by finding an ‘objective correlative’; in other words, a set of objects, a situation, a chain of events which shall be the formula of the particular emotion.”

With this in mind, consider Robert Frost’s “The Span of Life”:

The old dog barks backward without getting up.
I can remember when he was a pup.

The image of an old dog barking backward, and the speaker's memory—apparently triggered by the old dog's bark—of the dog as a pup, presumably is the “objective correlative” of Frost's emotion or idea; Frost is “expressing emotion” through this “formula.” And all of us, as competent readers, can grasp pretty accurately what Frost expressed. Frost’s emotion, idea, meaning, or whatever is “objectively” embodied in the text. Formalist critics try to explain how and why literary works—these words, in this order—constitute unique, complex structures that embody or set forth meanings.

Formalist criticism, also called the New Criticism (to distinguish it from the historical and biographical writing that in earlier decades had dominated literary study), began to achieve prominence in the late 1920s and was the dominant form from the late 1930s until about 1970, and even today it is widely considered the best way for a student to begin to study a work of literature. For one thing, formalist criticism empowers the student; that is, the student confronts the work immediately, and is not told first to spend days or weeks or months, for instance, reading Freud and his followers in order to write a psychoanalytic essay or reading Marx and Marxists in order to write a Marxist essay, or doing research on “necessary historical background” in order to write a historical essay.

DECONSTRUCTION

Deconstruction, or deconstructive or poststructuralist criticism, can almost be characterized as the opposite of everything formalist criticism stands for. Deconstruction begins with the assumptions that the world is unknowable and that language is unstable, elusive, unfaithful. (Language is all of these things because meaning is largely generated by opposition: “Hot” means something in opposition to “cold,” but a hot day may be 90 degrees whereas a hot oven is at least 400 degrees; and a “hot item” may be of any temperature.) Deconstructionists seek to show that a literary work (usually called “a text” or “a discourse”) inevitably is self-contradictory. Unlike formalist critics—who hold that a competent author constructs a coherent work with a stable meaning, and that competent readers can perceive this meaning—deconstructionists (e.g., Barbara Johnson, in The Critical Difference [1980]) hold that a work has no coherent meaning at the center. Jonathan Culler, in On Deconstruction (1982), says that “to deconstruct a discourse is to show how it undermines the philosophy it asserts” (86).

The text is only marks on paper, and therefore so far as a reader goes the author of a text is not the writer but the reader; texts are “indeterminate,” “open,” and “unstable.”

Despite the emphasis on indeterminacy, one sometimes detects in deconstructionist interpretations a view associated with Marxism. This is the idea that authors are “socially constructed” from the “discourses of power” or “signifying practices” that surround them. Thus, although authors may think they are individuals with independent minds, their works usually reveal—unknown to the authors—the society’s economic base. Deconstructionists “interrogate” a text, and they reveal what the authors were unaware of or had thought they had kept safely out of sight. That is, deconstructionists often find a rather specific meaning—though this meaning is one that might surprise the author.

Deconstruction is valuable insofar as—like the New Criticism—it encourages close, rigorous attention to the text. Furthermore, in its rejection of the claim that a work has a single stable meaning, deconstruction has had a positive influence on the study of literature. The problem with deconstruction, however, is that too often it is reductive, telling the same story about every text—that here, yet again, and again, we see how a text is incoherent and heterogeneous. There is, too, an irritating arrogance in some deconstructive criticism: “The author could not see how his/her text is fundamentally unstable and self-contradictory, but I can and now will interrogate the text and will issue my report.” Readers, of course, should not prostrate themselves before texts, but there is something askew about an approach—however intense and detailed—that often leads readers to conclude that they know a good deal more than the benighted author.

Aware that their emphasis on the instability of language implies that their own texts are unstable or even incoherent, some deconstructionists seem to aim at entertaining rather than at edifying. They probably would claim that they do not deconstruct meaning in the sense of destroying it; rather, they might say, they exuberantly multiply meanings, and to this end they may use such devices as puns, irony, and allusions, somewhat as a poet might, and just as though (one often feels) they think they are as creative as the writers they are commenting on. Indeed, for many deconstructionists, the traditional conception of “literature” is merely an elitist “construct.” All “texts” or “discourses” (novels, scientific papers, a Kewpie doll on the mantel, watching TV, suing in court, walking the dog, and all other signs that human beings make) are of a piece; all are unstable systems of signifying, all are fictions, all are “literature.” If literature (in the usual sense) occupies a special place in deconstruction it is because literature delights in its playfulness, its fictiveness, whereas other discourses nominally reject playfulness and fictiveness.

READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM

Probably all reading includes some sort of response—“This is terrific,” “This is a bore,” “I don’t know what’s going on here”—and probably almost all writing about literature begins with some such response, but specialists in literature disagree greatly about the role that response plays, or should play, in experiencing literature and in writing about it.

At one extreme are those who say that our response to a work of literature should be a purely aesthetic response—a response to a work of art—and not the response we would have to something comparable in real life. To take an obvious point: If in real life we heard someone plotting a murder, we would intervene, perhaps by calling the police or by attempting to warn the victim. But when we hear Macbeth and Lady Macbeth plot to kill King Duncan, we watch with deep interest; we hear their words with pleasure, and maybe we even look forward to seeing the murder and to seeing what the characters then will say and what will happen to the murderers.

When you think about it, the vast majority of the works of literature do not have a close, obvious resemblance to the reader's life. Most readers of Macbeth are not Scots, and no readers are Scottish kings or queens. (It's not just a matter of older literature; no readers of Toni Morrison's Beloved are nineteenth-century African-Americans.) The connections readers make between themselves and the lives in most of the books they read are not, on the whole, connections based on ethnic or professional identities, but, rather, connections with states of consciousness, for instance a young person's sense of isolation from the family, or a young person's sense of guilt for initial sexual experiences. Before we reject a work either because it seems too close to us ("I'm a man and I don't like the depiction of this man"), or on the other hand too far from our experience ("I'm not a woman, so how can I enjoy reading about these women?") we probably should try to follow the advice of Virginia Woolf, who said, "Do not dictate to your author; try to become him." Nevertheless, some literary works of the past may today seem intolerable, at least in part. There are passages in Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn that deeply upset us today. We should, however, try to reconstruct the cultural assumptions of the age in which the work was written. If we do so, we may find that if in some ways it reflected its age, in other ways it challenged that culture.

Still, some of our experiences, some of what we are, may make it virtually impossible for us to read a work sympathetically or "objectively," experiencing it only as a work of art and not as a part of life. Take so humble a form of literature as the joke. A few decades ago jokes about nagging wives and mothers-in-law were widely thought to be funny. Our fairly recent heightened awareness of sexism today makes those jokes unfunny. Twenty years ago the "meaning" of a joke about a nagging wife or about a mother-in-law was, in effect, "Here's a funny episode that shows what women typically are." Today the "meaning"—at least as the hearer conceives it—is "The unfunny story you have just told shows that you have stupid, stereotypical views of women." In short, the joke may "mean" one thing to the teller, and a very different thing to the hearer.

Reader-response criticism, then, says that the "meaning" of a work is not merely something put into the work by the writer; rather, the "meaning" is an interpretation created or constructed or produced by the reader as well as the writer. Stanley Fish, an exponent of reader-response theory, in Is There a Text in This Class? (1980), puts it this way: "Interpretation is not the art of construing but of constructing. Interpreters do not decode poems; they make them" (327).

Let's now try to relate these ideas more specifically to comments about literature. If "meaning" is the production or creation not simply of the writer but also of the perceiver, does it follow that there is no such thing as a "correct" interpretation of the meaning of a work of literature? Answers to this question differ. At one extreme, the reader is said to construct or reconstruct the text under the firm guidance of the author. That is, the author so powerfully shapes or constructs the text—encodes an idea—that the reader is virtually compelled to perceive or reconstruct or decode it the way the author wants it to be perceived. (We can call this view the objective view, since it essentially holds that readers look objectively at the work and see what the author put into it.) At the other extreme, the reader constructs the meaning according to his or her own personality—that is, according to the reader's psychological identity. (We can call this view the subjective view, since it essentially holds that readers inevitably project their feelings into what they perceive.) An extreme version of the subjective view holds that there is no such thing as literature; there are only texts, some of which some readers regard in a particularly elitist way.

Against the objective view one can argue thus: No author can fully control a reader’s response to every detail of the text. No matter how carefully constructed the text is, it leaves something—indeed, a great deal—to the reader’s imagination. For instance, when Macbeth says that life “is a tale / Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury / Signifying nothing,” are we getting a profound thought from Shakespeare or, on the contrary, are we getting a shallow thought from Macbeth, a man who does not see that his criminal deeds have been played out against a heaven that justly punishes his crimes? In short, the objective view neglects to take account of the fact that the author is not continually at our shoulder making sure that we interpret the work in a particular way.

It is probably true, as Flannery O’Connor says in Mystery and Manners (1957), that good writers select “every word, every detail, for a reason, every incident for a reason” (75), but there are always gaps or indeterminacies, to use the words of Wolfgang Iser, a reader-response critic. Readers always go beyond the text, drawing inferences, and evaluating the text in terms of their own experience. In the Old Testament, for instance, in Genesis, the author tells us (Chapter 22) that God commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac, and then says that “Abraham rose up early in the morning” and prepared to fulfill the command. We are not explicitly told why Abraham “rose up early in the morning,” or how he spent the intervening night, but some readers take “early in the morning” to signify (reasonably?) that Abraham has had a sleepless night. Others take it to signify (reasonably?) that Abraham is prompt in obeying God’s command. Some readers fill the gap with both explanations, or with neither. Doubtless much depends on the reader, but there is no doubt that readers “naturalize”—make natural, according to their own ideas—what they read.

In an extreme form the subjective view denies that authors can make us perceive the meanings that they try to put into their works. This position suggests that every reader has a different idea of what a work means, an idea that reflects the reader’s own ideas. Every reader, then, is Narcissus, who looked into a pool of water and thought he saw a beautiful youth but really saw only a reflection of himself. But does every reader see his or her individual image in each literary work? Of course not. Even Hamlet, a play that has generated an enormous range of interpretation, is universally seen as a tragedy, a play that deals with painful realities. If someone were to tell us that Hamlet is a comedy, and that the end, with a pile of corpses, is especially funny, we would not say, “Oh, well, we all see things in our own way.” Rather, we would make our exit as quickly as possible.

Many people who subscribe to one version or another of a reader-response theory would agree that they are concerned not with all readers but with what they call informed readers or competent readers. Thus, informed or competent readers are familiar with the conventions of literature. They understand, for instance, that in a play such as Hamlet the characters usually speak in verse. Such readers, then, do not express amazement that Hamlet often speaks metrically, and that he sometimes uses rhyme. These readers understand that verse is the normal language for most of the characters in the play, and therefore such readers do not characterize Hamlet as a poet. Informed, competent readers, in short, know the rules of the game. There will still, of course, be plenty of room for differences of interpretation. Some people will find Hamlet not at all blameworthy; others will find him somewhat blameworthy; and still others may find him highly blameworthy. In short, we can say that a writer works against a background that is shared by readers. As readers, we are familiar with various kinds of literature, and we read or see Hamlet as a particular kind of literary work, a tragedy, a play that evokes (in Shakespeare’s words) “woe or wonder,” sadness and astonishment. Knowing (to a large degree) how we ought to respond, our responses thus are not merely private.

Consider taking, as a guide to reading, a remark made by Mencius (372–289 BCE), the Chinese Confucian philosopher. Speaking of reading The Book of Odes, the oldest Chinese anthology, Mencius said that “a reader must let his thought go to meet the intention as he would a guest.” We often cannot be sure about the author’s intention (we do not know what Shakespeare intended to say in Hamlet; we have only the play itself), and even those relatively few authors who have explicitly stated their intentions may be untrustworthy for one reason or another. Yet there is something highly attractive in Mencius’s suggestion that when we read we should—at least for a start—treat our author not with suspicion or hostility but with goodwill and with the expectation of pleasure.

What are the implications of reader-response theory for writing an essay on a work of literature? Even if we agree that we are talking only about competent readers, does this mean that almost anything goes in setting forth one’s responses in an essay? Almost all advocates of any form of reader-response criticism agree on one thing: There are agreed-upon rules of writing if not of reading. This one point of agreement can be amplified to contain at least two aspects: (1) we all agree (more or less) as to what constitutes evidence, and (2) we all agree that a written response should be coherent. If you say that you find Hamlet to be less noble than his adversary, Claudius, you will be expected to provide evidence by pointing to specific passages, to specific things that Hamlet and Claudius say and do. And you will be expected to order the material into an effective, coherent sequence, so that the reader can move easily through your essay and will understand what you are getting at.

ARCHETYPAL (OR MYTH) CRITICISM

Carl G. Jung, the Swiss psychiatrist, in Contributions to Analytical Psychology (1928), postulates the existence of a “collective unconscious,” an inheritance in our brains consisting of “countless typical experiences [such as birth, escape from danger, selection of a mate] of our ancestors.” Few people today believe in an inherited “collective unconscious,” but many people agree that certain repeated experiences, such as going to sleep and hours later awakening, or the perception of the setting and of the rising sun, or of the annual death and rebirth of vegetation, manifest themselves in dreams, myths, and literature—in these instances, as stories of apparent death and rebirth. This archetypal plot of death and rebirth is said to be evident in Coleridge’s The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, for example. The ship suffers a deathlike calm and then is miraculously restored to motion, and, in a sort of parallel rebirth, the mariner moves from spiritual death to renewed perception of the holiness of life. Another archetypal plot is the quest, which usually involves the testing and initiation of a hero, and thus essentially represents the movement from innocence to experience. In addition to archetypal plots there are archetypal characters, since an archetype is any recurring unit. Among archetypal characters are the Scapegoat, the Hero (savior, deliverer), the Terrible Mother (witch, stepmother—even the wolf "grandmother" in the tale of Little Red Riding Hood), and the Wise Old Man (father figure, magician).

Because, the theory holds, both writer and reader share unconscious memories, the tale an author tells (derived from the collective unconscious) may strangely move the reader, speaking to his or her collective unconscious. As Maud Bodkin puts it, in Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934), something within us "leaps in response to the effective presentation in poetry of an ancient theme" (4). But this emphasis on ancient (or repeated) themes has made archetypal criticism vulnerable to the charge that it is reductive. The critic looks for certain characters or patterns of action and values the work if the motifs are there, meanwhile overlooking what is unique, subtle, distinctive, and truly interesting about the work. That is, to put the matter crudely, a work is regarded as good if it is pretty much like other works, with the usual motifs and characters. A second weakness in some archetypal criticism is that in the search for the deepest meaning of a work the critic may crudely impose a pattern, seeing (for instance) The Quest in every walk down the street. But perhaps to say this is to beg the question; it is the critic's job to write so persuasively that the reader at least tentatively accepts the critic's view. For a wide-ranging study of one particular motif, see Barbara Fass Leavy's In Search of the Swan Maiden (1994), a discussion of the legend of a swan maiden who is forced to marry a mortal because he possesses something of hers, usually a garment or an animal skin. Leavy analyzes several versions of the story, which she takes to be a representation not only of female rage against male repression but also a representation of male fear of female betrayal. Leavy ends her book by examining this motif in Ibsen's A Doll's House. Her claim is that when Nora finds a lost object, the dance costume, she can flee from the tyrannical domestic world and thus she regains her freedom.

If archetypal criticism sometimes seems farfetched, it is nevertheless true that one of its strengths is that it invites us to use comparisons, and comparing is often an excellent way to see not only what a work shares with other works but what is distinctive in the work. The most successful practitioner of archetypal criticism was the late Northrop Frye (1912–1991), whose numerous books help readers to see fascinating connections between works. For Frye's explicit comments about archetypal criticism, as well as for examples of such criticism in action, see especially his Anatomy of Criticism (1957) and The Educated Imagination (1964). On archetypes see also Chapter 16, "Archetypal Patterns," in Norman Friedman, Form and Meaning in Fiction (1975).

HISTORICAL SCHOLARSHIP

Historical criticism studies a work within its historical context. Thus, a student of Julius Caesar, Hamlet, or Macbeth—plays in which ghosts appear—may try to find out about Elizabethan attitudes toward ghosts. We may find that the Elizabethans took ghosts more seriously than we do; on the other hand, we may find that ghosts were explained in various ways, for instance sometimes as figments of the imagination and sometimes as shapes taken by the devil in order to mislead the virtuous. Similarly, a historical essay concerned with Othello may be devoted to Elizabethan attitudes toward Moors, or to Elizabethan ideas of love, or, for that matter, to Elizabethan ideas of a daughter's obligations toward her father's wishes concerning her suitor. The historical critic assumes (and one can hardly dispute the assumption) that writers, however individualistic, are shaped by the particular social contexts in which they live. One can put it this way: The goal of historical criticism is to understand how people in the past thought and felt. It assumes that such understanding can enrich our understanding of a particular work. The assumption is, however, disputable, since one may argue that the artist—let’s say Shakespeare—may not have shared the age’s view on this or that. All of the half-dozen or so Moors in Elizabethan plays other than Othello are villainous or foolish, but this evidence, one can argue, does not prove that therefore Othello is villainous or foolish.

Marxist Criticism

One form of historical criticism is Marxist criticism, named for Karl Marx (1818–1883). Actually, to say "one form" is misleading, since Marxist criticism today is varied, but essentially it sees history primarily as a struggle between socioeconomic classes, and it sees literature (and everything else) as the product of economic forces of the period.

For Marxists, economics is the “base” or “infrastructure”; on this base rests a “superstructure” of ideology (law, politics, philosophy, religion, and the arts, including literature), reflecting the interests of the dominant class. Thus, literature is a material product, produced—like bread or battleships—in order to be consumed in a given society. Like every other product, literature is the product of work, and it does work. A bourgeois society, for example, will produce literature that in one way or another celebrates bourgeois values, such as individualism. These works serve to assure the society that produces them that its values are solid, even universal. The enlightened Marxist writer or critic, on the other hand, exposes the fallacy of traditional values and replaces them with the truths found in Marxism. In the heyday of Marxism in the United States, during the depression of the 1930s, it was common for such Marxist critics as Granville Hicks to assert that the novel must show the class struggle.

Few critics of any sort would disagree that works of art in some measure reflect the age that produced them, but most contemporary Marxist critics go further. First, they assert—in a repudiation of what has been called “vulgar Marxist theory”—that the deepest historical meaning of a literary work is to be found in what it does not say, what its ideology does not permit it to express. Second, Marxists take seriously Marx’s famous comment that “the philosophers have only interpreted the world in various ways; the point is to change it.” The critic’s job is to change the world, by revealing the economic basis of the arts. Not surprisingly, most Marxists are skeptical of such concepts as “genius” and “masterpiece.” These concepts, they say, are part of the bourgeois myth that idealizes the individual and detaches it from its economic context. For an introduction to Marxist criticism, see Terry Eagleton, Marxism and Literary Criticism (1976).

The New Historicism

A recent school of scholarship, called the New Historicism, insists that there is no “history” in the sense of a narrative of indisputable past events. Rather, the New Historicism holds that there is only our version—our narrative, our representation—of the past. In this view, each age projects its own preconceptions on the past; historians may think they are revealing the past, but they are revealing only their own historical situation and their personal preferences. Thus, in the nineteenth century and in the twentieth almost up to 1992, Columbus was represented as the heroic benefactor of humankind who discovered the New World. But even while plans were being made to celebrate the five-hundredth anniversary of his first voyage across the Atlantic, voices were raised in protest: Columbus did not “discover” a New World; after all, the indigenous people knew where they were, and it was Columbus who was lost, since he thought he was in India. People who wrote history in, say, 1900, projected onto the past their current views (colonialism was a Good Thing), and people who in 1992 wrote history projected onto that same period a very different set of views (colonialism was a Bad Thing). Similarly, ancient Greece, once celebrated by historians as the source of democracy and rational thinking, is now more often regarded as a society that was built on slavery and on the oppression of women. And the Renaissance, once glorified as an age of enlightened thought, is now often seen as an age that tyrannized women, enslaved colonial people, and enslaved itself with its belief in witchcraft and astrology. Thinking about these changing views, one feels the truth of the witticism that the only thing more uncertain than the future is the past.

The New Historicism is especially associated with Stephen Greenblatt, who popularized the term in 1982 in the preface to a collection of essays published in the journal Genre. Greenblatt himself has said of the New Historicism that “it’s no doctrine at all” (Learning to Curse, [1990]) but the term is nevertheless much used, and, as the preceding remarks have suggested, it is especially associated with power, most especially with revealing the tyrannical practices of a society that others have glorified. The New Historicism was in large measure shaped by the 1960s; the students who in the 1960s protested against the war in Vietnam by holding demonstrations, in the 1980s—they were now full professors—protested against Ronald Reagan by writing articles exposing Renaissance colonialism. Works of literature were used as a basis for a criticism of society. Academic writing of this sort was not dry, impartial, unimpassioned scholarship; rather, it connected the past with the present, and it offered value judgments. In Greenblatt’s words, > Writing that was not engaged, that withheld judgments, that failed to connect the present with the past seemed worthless. Such connection could be made either by analogy or causality; that is, a particular set of historical circumstances could be represented in such a way as to bring out homologies with aspects of the present or, alternatively, those circumstances could be analyzed as the generative forces that led to the modern condition. (Learning to Curse, page 167)

Biographical Criticism

One kind of historical scholarship is the study of biography, which for our purposes includes not only biographies but also autobiographies, diaries, journals, letters, and so on. What experiences did (for example) Mark Twain undergo?
Are some of the apparently sensational aspects of Huckleberry Finn in fact close to events that Twain experienced? If so, is he a “realist”? If not, is he writing in the tradition of the “tall tale”?

The really good biographies not only tell us about the life of the author, but they enable us to return to the literary texts with a deeper understanding of how they came to be what they are. If you read Richard B. Sewall’s biography of Emily Dickinson, you will find a wealth of material concerning her family and the world she moved in—for instance, the religious ideas that were part of her upbringing.

Biographical study may illuminate even the work of a living author. If you are writing about the poetry of Adrienne Rich, for example, you may want to consider what she has told us in many essays about her life, especially about her relations with her father and her husband.

PSYCHOLOGICAL (OR PSYCHOANALYTIC) CRITICISM

One form that biographical study may take is psychological or psychoanalytic criticism, which usually examines the author and the author’s writings in the framework of Freudian psychology. A central doctrine of Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) is the Oedipus complex, the view that all males (Freud seems not to have made his mind up about females) unconsciously wish to displace their fathers and to sleep with their mothers. According to Freud, hatred for the father and love of the mother, normally repressed, may appear disguised in dreams. Works of art, like dreams, are disguised versions of repressed wishes.

Consider the case of Edgar Allan Poe. An orphan before he was three years old, he was brought up in the family of John Allan, but he was never formally adopted. His relations with Allan were stormy, though he seems to have had better relations with Allan’s wife and still better relations with an aunt, whose daughter he married. In the Freudian view, Poe’s marriage to his cousin (the daughter of a mother figure) was a way of sleeping with his mother. According to psychoanalytic critics, if we move from Poe’s life to his work, we see, it is alleged, this hatred for his father and love for his mother. Thus, the murderer in “The Cask of Amontillado” is said to voice Poe’s hostility toward his father, and the wine vault in which much of the story is set (an encompassing structure associated with fluids) is interpreted as symbolizing Poe’s desire to return to his mother’s womb. In Poe’s other works, the longing for death is similarly taken to embody his desire to return to the womb.

Other psychoanalytic interpretations of Poe have been offered. Kenneth Silverman, author of a biography titled Edgar Allan Poe (1991) and the editor of a collection titled New Essays on Poe’s Major Tales (1993), emphasizes the fact that Poe was orphaned before he was three, and was separated from his brother and his infant sister. In New Essays Silverman relates this circumstance to the “many instances of engulfment” that he finds in Poe’s work. Images of engulfment, he points out, “are part of a still larger network of images having to do with biting, devouring, and similar oral mutilation.” Why are they common in Poe? Here is Silverman’s answer:

Current psychoanalytic thinking about childhood bereavement explains the fantasy of being swallowed up as representing a desire, mixed with dread, to merge with the dead; the wish to devour represents a primitive attempt at preserving loved ones, incorporating them so as not to lose them. (20)

Notice that psychoanalytic interpretations usually take us away from what the author consciously intended; they purport to tell us what the work reveals, whether or not the author was aware of this meaning. The “meaning” of the work is found not in the surface content of the work but in the author’s psyche.

One additional example—and it is the most famous—of a psychoanalytic study of a work of literature may be useful. In Hamlet and Oedipus (1949), Ernest Jones, amplifying some comments by Freud, argued that Hamlet delays killing Claudius because Claudius (who has killed Hamlet’s father and married Hamlet’s mother) has done exactly what Hamlet himself wanted to do. For Hamlet to kill Claudius, then, would be to kill himself.

If this approach interests you, take a look at Norman N. Holland’s Psychoanalysis and Shakespeare (1966), or Frederick Crews’s study of Hawthorne, The Sins of the Fathers (1966). Crews finds in Hawthorne’s work evidence of unresolved Oedipal conflicts, and he accounts for the appeal of the fictions thus: The stories “rest on fantasy, but on the shared fantasy of mankind, and this makes for a more penetrating fiction than would any illusionistic slice of life” (263). For applications to other authors, look at Simon O. Lesser’s Fiction and the Unconscious (1957), or at an anthology of criticism, Literature and Psychoanalysis, edited by Edith Kurzweil and William Phillips (1983).

Psychological criticism can also turn from the author and the work to the reader, seeking to explain why we, as readers, respond in certain ways. Why, for example, is Hamlet so widely popular? A Freudian answer is that it is universal because it deals with a universal (Oedipal) impulse. One can, however, ask whether it appeals as strongly to women as to men (again, Freud was unsure about the Oedipus complex in women) and, if so, why it appeals to them. Or, more generally, one can ask if males and females read in the same way.

GENDER (FEMINIST, AND LESBIAN AND GAY) CRITICISM

This last question brings us to gender criticism. As we have seen, writing about literature usually seeks to answer questions. Historical scholarship, for instance, tries to answer such questions as, What did Shakespeare and his contemporaries believe about ghosts? or How did Victorian novelists and poets respond to Darwin’s theory of evolution? Gender criticism, too, asks questions. It is especially concerned with two issues, one about reading and one about writing: Do men and women read in different ways, and Do they write in different ways?

Feminist criticism can be traced back to the work of Virginia Woolf (1882–1941), but chiefly it grew out of the women’s movement of the 1960s. The women’s movement at first tended to hold that women are pretty much the same as men and therefore should be treated equally, but much recent feminist criticism has emphasized and explored the differences between women and men. Because the experiences of the sexes are different, the argument goes, the values and sensibilities are different, and their responses to literature are different. Further, literature written by women is different from literature written by men. Works written by women are seen by some feminist critics as embodying the experiences of a minority culture—a group marginalized by the dominant male culture. (If you have read Charlotte Perkins Gilman’s “The Yellow Wallpaper” or Susan Glaspell’s Trifles, you’ll recall that these literary works themselves are largely concerned about the differing ways in which men and women perceive the world.) Not all women are feminist critics, and not all feminist critics are women. Further, there are varieties of feminist criticism. For a good introduction see The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature, and Theory (1985), edited by Elaine Showalter. For the role of men in feminist criticism, see Engendering Men (1990), edited by Joseph A. Boone and Michael Cadden (1990). At this point it should also be said that some theorists, who hold that identity is socially constructed, strongly dispute the value of establishing “essentialist” categories such as heterosexual, gay, and lesbian—a point that we will consider in a moment.

Feminist critics rightly point out that men have established the conventions of literature and that men have established the canon—that is, the body of literature that is said to be worth reading. Speaking a bit broadly, in this patriarchal or male-dominated body of literature, men are valued for being strong and active, whereas women are expected to be weak and passive. Thus, in the world of fairy tales, the admirable male is the energetic hero (Jack, the Giant-Killer) but the admirable female is the passive Sleeping Beauty. Active women such as the wicked stepmother or—a disguised form of the same thing—the witch are generally villainous. (There are of course exceptions, such as Gretel, in “Hansel and Gretel.”) A woman hearing or reading the story of Sleeping Beauty or of Little Red Riding Hood (rescued by the powerful woodcutter) or any other work in which women seem to be trivialized will respond differently from a man. For instance, a woman may be socially conditioned into admiring Sleeping Beauty, but only at great cost to her mental well-being. A more resistant female reader may recognize in herself no kinship with the beautiful, passive Sleeping Beauty and may respond to the story indignantly. Another way to put it is this: The male reader perceives a romantic story, but the resistant female reader perceives a story of oppression.

For discussions of the ways in which, it is argued, women ought to read, you may want to look at Gender and Reading (1986), edited by Elizabeth A. Flynn and Patrocinio Schweickart, and especially at Judith Fetterley’s book The Resisting Reader (1978). Fetterley’s point, briefly, is that women should resist the meanings (that is, the visions of how women ought to behave) that male authors—or female authors who have inherited patriarchal values—bury in their books. “To read the canon of what is currently considered classic American literature is perforce to identify as male,” Fetterley says. “It insists on its universality in specifically male terms.” Fetterley argues that a woman must read as a woman, “exorcising the male mind that has been implanted in women.” In resisting the obvious meanings—for instance, the false claim that male values are universal values—women may discover more significant meanings. Fetterley argues that Faulkner’s “A Rose for Emily” is a story not of a conflict between the South and the North or between the old order and the new; it is a story of the patriarchy North and South, new and old, and of the sexual conflict within it. As Faulkner himself has implied, it is a story of a woman victimized and betrayed by the system of sexual politics, who nevertheless has discovered, within the structures that victimize her, sources of power for herself. . . . “A Rose for Emily" is the story of how to murder your gentleman caller and get away with it. (34–35)

Fetterley goes on to state that society made Emily a “lady”—society dehumanized her by elevating her. Emily’s father, seeking to shape her life, stood in the doorway of their house and drove away her suitors. So far as he was concerned, Emily was a nonperson, a creature whose own wishes were not to be regarded; he alone would shape her future. Because society (beginning with her father) made her a “lady”—a creature so elevated that she is not taken seriously as a passionate human being—she is able to kill Homer Barron and not be suspected. Here is Fetterley speaking of the passage in which the townspeople crowd into her house when her death becomes known:

When the would-be “suitors” finally get into her father’s house, they discover the consequences of his oppression of her, for the violence contained in the rotted corpse of Homer Barron is the mirror image of the violence represented in the tableau, the back-flung front door flung back with a vengeance. (42)

Feminist criticism has been concerned not only with the depiction of women and men in a male-determined literary canon and with female responses to these images but also with yet another topic: women’s writing. Women have had fewer opportunities than men to become writers of fiction, poetry, and drama—for one thing, they have been less well educated in the things that the male patriarchy valued—but even when they have managed to write, men sometimes have neglected their work simply because it had been written by a woman. Feminists have further argued that certain forms of writing have been especially the province of women—for instance, journals, diaries, and letters; and predictably, these forms have not been given adequate space in the traditional, male-oriented canon.

In 1972, in an essay titled “When We Dead Awaken: Writing as ReVision,” the poet and essayist Adrienne Rich effectively summed up the matter:

A radical critique of literature, feminist in its impulse, would take the work first of all as a clue to how we live, how we have been living, how we have been led to imagine ourselves, how our language has trapped as well as liberated us; and how we can begin to see—and therefore live—afresh. . . . We need to know the writing of the past and know it differently than we have ever known it; not to pass on a tradition but to break its hold over us.

Much feminist criticism concerned with women writers has emphasized connections between the writer’s biography and her art. SuzanneJuhasz, in her introduction to Feminist Critics Read Emily Dickinson (1983), puts it this way:

The central assumption of feminist criticism is that gender informs the nature of art, the nature of biography, and the relation between them. Dickinson is a woman poet, and this fact is integral to her identity. Feminist criticism’s sensitivity to the components of female experience in general and to Dickinson’s identity as a woman generates essential insights about her. . . . Attention to the relationship between biography and art is a requisite of feminist criticism. To disregard it further strengthens those divisions continually created by traditional criticism, so that nothing about the woman writer can be seen whole. (1–5)
Lesbian and gay criticism have their roots in feminist criticism; feminist criticism introduced many of the questions that these other, newer developments are now exploring.

In 1979, in a book called On Lies, Secrets, and Silence, Adrienne Rich reprinted a 1975 essay on Emily Dickinson, “Vesuvius at Home.” In her new preface to the reprinted essay she said that a lesbian-feminist reading of Dickinson would not have to prove that Dickinson slept with another woman. Rather, lesbian-feminist criticism “will ask questions hitherto passed over; it will not search obsessively for heterosexual romance as the key to a woman artist’s life and work” (157–158). Obviously such a statement is also relevant to a male artist’s life and work. It should be mentioned, too, that Rich’s comments on lesbian reading and lesbianism as an image of creativity have been much discussed. For a brief survey, see Marilyn R. Farwell, “Toward a Definition of the Lesbian Literary Imagination,” Signs 14 (1988): 100–118.

Before turning to some of the questions that lesbian and gay critics address, it is necessary first to say that lesbian criticism and gay criticism are not—to use a word now current in much criticism—symmetrical, chiefly because lesbian and gay relationships themselves are not symmetrical. Straight society has traditionally been more tolerant of—or blinder to—lesbianism than to male homosexuality. Further, lesbian literary theory has tended to see its affinities more with feminist theory than with gay theory; the emphasis has been on gender (male/female) rather than on sexuality (homosexuality/bisexuality/heterosexuality). On the other hand, some gays and lesbians have been writing what is now being called Queer Theory.

Now for some of the questions that this criticism addresses: (1) Do lesbians and gays read in ways that differ from the ways straight people read? (2) Do they write in ways that differ from those of straight people? (Gregory Woods argues in Lesbian and Gay Writing: An Anthology of Critical Essays [1990], edited by Mark Lilly, that “modern gay poets . . . use . . . paradox, as weapon and shield, against a world in which heterosexuality is taken for granted as being exclusively natural and healthy” [176]. Another critic, Jeffrey Meyers, writing in Journal of English and Germanic Philology 88 [1989]: 126–29, in an unsympathetic review of a book on gay writers contrasts gay writers of the past with those of the present. According to Meyers, closeted homosexuals in the past, writing out of guilt and pain, produced a distinctive literature that is more interesting than the productions of today’s un closeted writers.) (3) How have straight writers portrayed lesbians and gays, and how have lesbian and gay writers portrayed straight women and men? (4) What strategies did lesbian and gay writers use to make their work acceptable to a general public in an age when lesbian and gay behavior was unmentionable?

Questions such as these have stimulated critical writing especially about bisexual and lesbian and gay authors (for instance, Virginia Woolf, Gertrude Stein, Elizabeth Bishop, Walt Whitman, Oscar Wilde, E. M. Forster, Hart Crane, Tennessee Williams), but they have also led to interesting writing on such a topic as Nathaniel Hawthorne’s attitudes toward women. “An account of Hawthorne’s misogyny that takes no account of his own and his culture’s gender anxieties,” Robert K. Martin says in Boone and Cadden’s Engendering Men, “is necessarily inadequate” (122).

Shakespeare’s work—and not only the sonnets, which praise a beautiful male friend—has stimulated a fair amount of gay criticism. Much of this criticism consists of “decoding” aspects of the plays. Seymour Kleinberg argues, in Essays on Gay Literature (1985), ed. Stuart Kellogg, that Antonio in The Merchant of Venice, whose melancholy is not made clear by Shakespeare, is melancholy because (again, this is according to Kleinberg) Antonio’s lover, Bassanio, is deserting him, and because Antonio is ashamed of his own sexuality:

Antonio is a virulently anti-Semitic homosexual and is melancholic to the point of despair because his lover, Bassanio, wishes to marry an immensely rich aristocratic beauty, to leave the diversions of the Rialto to return to his own class and to sexual conventionality. Antonio is also in despair because he despises himself for his homosexuality, which is romantic, obsessive, and exclusive, and fills him with sexual shame. (113)

Several earlier critics had suggested that Antonio is a homosexual, hopelessly pining for Bassanio, but Kleinberg goes further, and argues that Antonio and Bassanio are lovers, not just good friends, and that Antonio’s hopeless and shameful (because socially unacceptable) passion for Bassanio becomes transformed into hatred for the Jew, Shylock. The play, according to Kleinberg, is partly about “a world where . . . sexual guilt is translated into ethnic hatred” (124).

Examination of matters of gender can help to illuminate literary works, but it should be added, too, that some—perhaps most—critics write also as activists, reporting their findings not only to help us to understand and to enjoy the works of (say) Whitman, but also to change society’s view of sexuality. Thus, in Disseminating Whitman (1991), Michael Moon is impatient with earlier critical rhapsodies about Whitman’s universalism. It used to be said that Whitman’s celebration of the male body was a sexless celebration of brotherly love in a democracy, but the gist of Moon’s view is that we must neither whitewash Whitman’s poems with such high-minded talk, nor reject them as indecent; rather, we must see exactly what Whitman is saying about a kind of experience that society had shut its eyes to, and we must take Whitman’s view seriously. Somewhat similarly, Gregory Woods in Articulate Flesh (1987) points out that until a few years ago discussions of Hart Crane regularly condemned his homosexuality, as is evident in L. S. Dembo’s characterization of Crane (quoted by Woods) as “uneducated, alcoholic, homosexual, paranoic, suicidal” (140). Gay and lesbian writers do not adopt this sort of manner. But it should also be pointed out that today there are straight critics who study lesbian or gay authors and write about them insightfully and without hostility.

One assumption in much lesbian and gay critical writing is that although gender greatly influences the ways in which we read, reading is a skill that can be learned, and therefore straight people—aided by lesbian and gay critics—can learn to read, with pleasure and profit, lesbian and gay writers. This assumption of course also underlies much feminist criticism, which often assumes that men must stop ignoring books by women and must learn (with the help of feminist critics) how to read them, and, in fact, how to read—with newly opened eyes—the sexist writings of men of the past and present.

In addition to the titles mentioned earlier concerning gay and lesbian criticism, consult Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosocial Desire (1985) and an essay by Sedgwick, “Gender Criticism,” in Redrawing the Boundaries, ed. Stephen Greenblatt and Giles Gunn (1992).

While many in the field of lesbian and gay criticism have turned their energies toward examining the effects that an author’s—or a character’s—sexual identity may have upon the text, others have begun to question, instead, the concept of sexual identity itself. Drawing upon the work of the French social historian Michel Foucault, critics such as David Halperin (One Hundred Years of Homosexuality and Other Essays on Greek Love, [1990]) and Judith Butler (Gender Trouble, [1989]) explore how various categories of identity, such as “heterosexual” and “homosexual,” represent ways of defining human beings that are distinct to particular cultures and historical periods. These critics, affiliated with what is known as the “social constructionist” school of thought, argue that the way a given society (modern American or ancient Greek) interprets sexuality will determine the particular categories within which individuals come to understand and to name their own desires. For such critics the goal of a lesbian or gay criticism is not to define the specificity of a lesbian or gay literature or mode of interpretation, but to show how the ideology (the normative understanding of a given culture) makes it seem natural to think about sexuality in terms of such identities as lesbian, gay, bisexual, or straight. By challenging the authority of those terms, or “denaturalizing” them, and by calling attention to moments in which literary (and nonliterary) representations make assumptions that reinforce the supposed inevitability of those distinctions, such critics attempt to redefine our understandings of the relations between sexuality and literature. They hope to make clear that sexuality is always, in a certain sense, “literary”; it is a representation of a fiction that society has constructed in order to make sense out of experience.

Because such critics have challenged the authority of the opposition between heterosexuality and homosexuality, and have read it as a historical construct rather than as a biological or psychological absolute, they have sometimes resisted the very terms lesbian and gay. Many now embrace what is called Queer Theory as an attempt to mark their resistance to the categories of identity they see our culture as imposing upon us.

Works written within this mode of criticism are often influenced by deconstructionist or psychoanalytic thought. They examine works by straight authors as frequently as they do works by writers who might be defined as lesbian or gay. Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick’s reading of Billy Budd in her book Epistemology of the Closet (1990) provides a good example of this sort of criticism. Reading Claggart as “the homosexual” in the text of Melville’s novella, Sedgwick is not interested in defining his difference from other characters. Instead, she shows how the novella sets up a large number of oppositions—such as public and private, sincerity and sentimentality, health and illness—all of which have a relationship to the way in which a distinct “gay” identity was being produced by American society at the end of the nineteenth century. Other critics whose work in this field may be useful for students of literature are D. A. Miller, The Novel and the Police (1988); Diana Fuss, Essentially Speaking (1989) and Identification Papers (1995); Judith Butler, Bodies That Matter (1993); and Lee Edelman, Homographesis: Essays in Gay Literary and Cultural Theory (1993).

This chapter began by making the obvious point that all readers, whether or not they consciously adopt a particular approach to literature, necessarily read through particular lenses. More precisely, a reader begins with a frame of interpretation—historical, psychological, sociological, or whatever—and from within the frame a reader selects one of the several competing methodologies.

This paragraph and the next two are by Lee Edelman of Tufts University.
Critics often make great—even grandiose—claims for their approaches. For example, Frederic Jameson, a Marxist, begins The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act (1981) thus:

This book will argue the priority of the political interpretation of literary texts. It conceives of the political perspective not as some supplemental method, not as an optional auxiliary to other interpretive methods current today—the psychoanalytic or the myth-critical, the stylistic, the ethical, the structural—but rather as the absolute horizon of all reading and all interpretation. (7)

Readers who are chiefly interested in politics may be willing to assume “the priority of the political interpretation . . . as the absolute horizon of all reading and all interpretation,” but other readers may respectfully decline to accept this assumption.

In talking about a critical approach, it is sometimes said that readers decode a text by applying a grid to it; the grid enables them to see certain things clearly. Good; but what is sometimes forgotten is that (since there is no such thing as a free lunch) a lens or a grid—an angle of vision or interpretive frame and a methodology—also prevents a reader from seeing certain other things. This is to be expected. What is important, then, is to remember this fact, and thus not to deceive ourselves by thinking that our keen tools enable us to see the whole. A psychoanalytic reading of, say, Hamlet, may be helpful, but it does not reveal all that is in Hamlet, and it does not refute the perceptions of another approach, let’s say a historical study. Each approach may illuminate aspects neglected by others.

It is too much to expect a reader to apply all useful methods (or even several) at once—that would be rather like looking through a telescope with one eye and through a microscope with the other—but it is not too much to expect readers to be aware of the limitations of their methods. If one reads much criticism, one finds two kinds of critics. There are, on the one hand, critics who methodically and mechanically peer through a lens or grid, and they find what one can easily predict they will find. On the other hand, there are critics who (despite what may be inevitable class and gender biases) are at least relatively open-minded in their approach—critics who, one might say, do not at the outset of their reading believe that their method assures them that (so to speak) they have got the text’s number and that by means of this method they will expose the text for what it is. The philosopher Richard Rorty engagingly makes a distinction somewhat along these lines, in an essay he contributed to Umberto Eco’s Interpretation and Overinterpretation (1992). There is a great difference, Rorty suggests, between knowing what you want to get out of a person or thing or text in advance and [on the other hand] hoping that the person or thing or text will help you want something different—that he or she or it will help you to change your purposes, and thus to change your life. This distinction, I think, helps us highlight the difference between methodical and inspired readings of texts. (106)

Rorty goes on to say he has seen an anthology of readings on Conrad’s Heart of Darkness, containing a psychoanalytic reading, a reader-response reading, and so on. “None of the readers had, as far as I could see,” Rorty says, been enraptured or destabilized by Heart of Darkness. I got no sense that the book had made a big difference to them, that they cared much about Kurtz or Marlow or the woman “with helmeted head and tawny cheeks" whom Marlow sees on the bank of the river. These people, and that book, had no more changed these readers' purposes than the specimen under the microscope changes the purpose of the histologist. (107)

The kind of criticism that Rorty prefers he calls “unmethodical” criticism and “inspired” criticism. It is, for Rorty, the result of an “encounter” with some aspect of a work of art “which has made a difference to the critic’s conception of who she is, what she is good for, what she wants to do with herself . . . ” (107). This is not a matter of “respect” for the text, Rorty insists. Rather, he says, “love” and “hate” are better words, “For a great love or a great loathing is the sort of thing that changes us by changing our purposes, changing the uses to which we shall put people and things and texts we encounter later” (107).

SUGGESTIONS FOR FURTHER READING

Because a massive list of titles may prove discouraging rather than helpful, it seems advisable here to give a short list of basic titles. (Titles already mentioned in this chapter—which are good places to begin—are not repeated in the following list.)

A good sampling of contemporary criticism (60 or so essays or chapters from books), representing all of the types discussed in this commentary except lesbian and gay criticism, can be found in The Critical Tradition: Classic Texts and Contemporary Trends, 2nd ed., David H. Richter (1998).

For a readable introduction to various approaches, written for students who are beginning the study of literary theory, see Steven Lynn, Texts and Contexts (1994). For a more advanced survey, that is, a work that assumes some familiarity with the material, see a short book by K. M. Newton, Interpreting the Text: A Critical Introduction to the Theory and Practice of Literary Interpretation (1990). A third survey, though considerably longer than the books by Lynn and Newton, is narrower because it confines itself to a study of critical writings about Shakespeare: Brian Vickers, Appropriating Shakespeare: Contemporary Critical Quarrels (1993), offers an astringent appraisal of deconstruction, New Historicism, psychoanalytic criticism, feminist criticism, and Marxist criticism. For a collection of essays on Shakespeare written from some of the viewpoints that Vickers deplores, see John Drakakis, ed., Shakespearean Tragedy (1992).

Sympathetic discussions (usually two or three pages long) of each approach, with fairly extensive bibliographic suggestions, are given in the appropriate articles in three encyclopedic works. Wendell V. Harris, Dictionary of Concepts in Literary Criticism and Theory (1992), devotes several pages to each concept (for instance, author, context, evaluation, feminist literary criticism, narrative) and gives a useful reading list for each entry. Fairly similar to Harris’s book are Irene Makaryk, ed., Encyclopedia of Contemporary Literary Theory: Approaches, Scholars, Terms (1993), and Michael Groden, Martin Kreiswirth, and Imre Szeman (eds.), The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism, 2nd ed. (2005). The Johns Hopkins Guide, though it includes substantial entries on individual critics as well as on critical schools, is occasionally disappointing in the readability of some of its essays and especially in its coverage, since it does not include critical terms other than names of schools of criticism. Despite its title, then, it does not have entries for theory or for criticism, nor does it have entries for such words as canon and evaluation. In coverage (and also in the quality of many entries) it is inferior to an extremely valuable work with a misleading narrow title, The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, edited by Alex Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (1993). Although The New Princeton Encyclopedia does not include terms that are unique to, say, drama or fiction, it does include generous, lucid entries (with suggestions for further reading) on such terms as allegory, criticism, canon, irony, sincerity, theory, and unity, and the long entries on poetics, poetry, and poetry theories of, are in many respects entries on literature.

For a collection of essays on the canon, see Canons, edited by Robert von Hallberg (1984); see also an essay by Robert Scholes, “Canonicity and Textuality,” in Introduction to Scholarship in Modern Languages and Literatures, edited by Joseph Gibaldi (2nd ed., 1992), 138–58. Gibaldi’s collection includes essays on related topics, for instance, literary theory (by Jonathan Culler) and cultural studies (by David Bathrick).

Remarks about Manuscript Form

BASIC MANUSCRIPT FORM

Much of what follows is nothing more than common sense.

• Use good quality 8½" × 11" paper. Make a photocopy, or, if you have written on a word processor print out a second copy, in case the instructor’s copy goes astray.
• If you write on a word processor, double-space, and print on one side of the page only; set the printer for professional or best quality. If you submit handwritten copy, use lined paper and write on one side of the page only in black or dark blue ink, on every other line.
• Use one-inch margins on all sides. Do not use justified margins and do not use end-of-line hyphens.
• Within the top margin, put your last name and then (after hitting the space bar twice) the page number (in arabic numerals), so that the number is flush with the right-hand margin.
• On the first page, below the top margin and flush with the left-hand margin, put your full name, your instructor’s name, the course number (including the section), and the date, one item per line, double-spaced.
• Center the title of your essay. Remember that the title is important—it gives the readers their first glimpse of your essay. Create your own title—one that reflects your topic or thesis. For example, a paper on Charlotte Perkins Gilman’s “The Yellow Wallpaper” should not be called “The Yellow Wallpaper” but might be called

   Disguised Tyranny in Gilman’s "The Yellow Wallpaper"

   or

   How to Drive a Woman Mad

   These titles do at least a little in the way of rousing a reader’s interest.

• Capitalize the title thus: Begin the first word of the title with a capital letter, and capitalize each subsequent word except articles (a, an, the), conjunctions (and, but, if, when, etc.), and prepositions (in, on, with, etc.):
A Word on Behalf of Love

Notice that you do not enclose your title within quotation marks, and you do not underline it—though if it includes the title of a poem or a story, that is enclosed within quotation marks, or if it includes the title of a novel or play, that is underlined (to indicate italics), thus:

Gilman's "The Yellow Wallpaper" and Medical Practice and

Gender Stereotypes in Hamlet

• After writing your title, double-space, indent five spaces, and begin your first sentence.
• Unless your instructor tells you otherwise, use a staple to hold the pages together. (Do not use a stiff binder; it will only add to the bulk of the instructor's stack of papers.)
• Extensive revisions should have been made in your drafts, but minor last-minute revisions may be made—neatly—on the finished copy. Proofreading may catch some typographical errors, and you may notice some small weaknesses. You can make corrections using the following proofreader's symbols.

CORRECTIONS IN THE FINAL COPY

Changes in wording may be made by crossing through words and rewriting them:

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne has greatly diminished.

Additions should be made above the line, with a caret below the line at the appropriate place:

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne has greatly diminished.

Transpositions of letters may be made thus:

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne has greatly diminished.

Deletions are indicated by a horizontal line through the word or words to be deleted. Delete a single letter by drawing a vertical or diagonal line through it; then indicate whether the letters on either side are to be closed up by drawing a connecting arc:

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne has greatly diminished.

Separation of words accidentally run together is indicated by a vertical line, closure by a curved line connecting the letters to be closed up:

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne has greatly diminished.
Paragraphing may be indicated by the symbol ¶ before the word that is to begin the new paragraph:

The influence of Poe and Hawthorne has greatly diminished. ¶ The influence of Borges has very largely replaced that of earlier writers of fantasy.

QUOTATIONS AND QUOTATION MARKS

First, a word about the point of using quotations. Don’t use quotations to pad the length of a paper. Rather, give quotations from the work you are discussing so that your readers will see the material being considered and (especially in a research paper) so that your readers will know what some of the chief interpretations are and what your responses to them are.

Note: The next few paragraphs do not discuss how to include citations of sources, a topic taken up in the next appendix under the heading “How to Document: Footnotes, Internal Parenthetical Citations, and a List of Works Cited.”

The Golden Rule: If you quote, comment on the quotation. Let the reader know what you make of it and why you quote it.

Additional principles:

1. Identify the speaker or writer of the quotation so that the reader is not left with a sense of uncertainty. Usually, in accordance with the principle of letting readers know where they are going, this identification precedes the quoted material, but occasionally it may follow the quotation, especially if it will provide something of a pleasant surprise. For instance, in a discussion of Flannery O’Connor’s stories, you might quote a disparaging comment on one of the stories and then reveal that O’Connor herself was the speaker.

2. If the quotation is part of your own sentence, be sure to fit the quotation grammatically and logically into your sentence.

Incorrect: Holden Caulfield tells us very little about “what my lousy childhood was like.”

Correct: Holden Caulfield tells us very little about what his “lousy childhood was like.”

3. Indicate any omissions or additions. The quotation must be exact. Any material that you add—even one or two words—must be enclosed within square brackets, thus:

Hawthorne tells us that "owing doubtless to the depth of the gloom at that particular spot [in the forest], neither the travellers nor their steeds were visible."

If you wish to omit material from within a quotation, indicate the ellipsis by three spaced periods. That is, at the point where you are omitting material, type a space, a period, a space, a period, a space, and a third period. If you are omitting material from the end of a sentence, type a space after the last word that you quote, a period, a space, a period, a space, a third period, and a period to indicate the end of the sentence. The following example is based on a quotation from the sentences immediately above this one:

The instructions say, "If you... omit material from within a quotation, [you must] indicate the ellipsis.... If you are omitting material from the end of a sentence, type... then a period to indicate the end.

Notice that although material preceded "If you," periods are not needed to indicate the omission because "If you" began a sentence in the original. Customarily, initial and terminal omissions are indicated only when they are part of the sentence you are quoting. Even such omissions need not be indicated when the quoted material is obviously incomplete—when, for instance, it is a word or phrase.

4. Distinguish between short and long quotations, and treat each appropriately. Short quotations (usually defined as fewer than five lines of typed prose or three lines of poetry) are enclosed within quotation marks and run into the text (rather than being set off, without quotation marks), as in the following example:

Hawthorne begins the story by telling us that "Young Goodman Brown came forth at sunset into the street at Salem village," thus at the outset connecting the village with daylight. A few paragraphs later, when Hawthorne tells us that the road Brown takes was "darkened by all of the gloomiest trees of the forest," he begins to associate the forest with darkness--and a very little later with evil.

If your short quotation is from a poem, be sure to follow the capitalization of the original, and use a slash mark (with a space before and after it) to indicate separate lines. Give the line numbers, if your source gives them, in parentheses, immediately after the closing quotation marks and before the closing punctuation, thus:

In "Diving into the Wreck," Adrienne Rich's speaker says that she puts on "body-armor" (5). Obviously the journey is dangerous.

To set off a long quotation (more than four typed lines of prose or more than two lines of poetry), indent the entire quotation ten spaces from the left margin. Usually, a long quotation is introduced by a clause ending with a colon—for instance, “The following passage will make this point clear:” or “The closest we come to hearing an editorial voice is a long passage in the middle of the story:” or some such lead-in. After typing your lead-in, double-space, and then type the quotation, indented and double-spaced.
5. Commas and periods go inside the quotation marks.

Chopin tells us in the first sentence that "Mrs. Mallard was afflicted with heart trouble," and in the last sentence the doctors say that Mrs. Mallard "died of heart disease."

Exception: If the quotation is immediately followed by material in parentheses or in square brackets, close the quotation, then give the parenthetical or bracketed material, and then—after closing the parenthesis or bracket—insert the comma or period.

Chopin tells us in the first sentence that "Mrs. Mallard was afflicted with heart trouble" (50), and in the last sentence the doctors say that Mrs. Mallard "died of heart disease" (51).

Semicolons, colons, and dashes go outside the closing quotation marks.
Question marks and exclamation points go inside if they are part of the quotation, outside if they are your own.

In the following passage from a student's essay, notice the difference in the position of the question marks. The first question mark is part of the quotation, so it is enclosed within the quotation marks. The second question mark, however, is the student's, so it comes after the closing quotation marks.

The older man says to Goodman Brown, "Sayest thou so?" Doesn't a reader become uneasy when the man immediately adds, "We are but a little way in the forest yet"?

Quotation Marks or Underlining?

Use quotation marks around titles of short stories and other short works—that is, titles of chapters in books, essays, and poems that might not be published by themselves. Underline (to indicate italics) titles of books, periodicals, collections of essays, plays, and long poems such as The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. Word processing software will let you use italic type (instead of underlining) if you wish.

A Note on the Possessive

It is awkward to use the possessive case for titles of literary works and secondary sources. Rather than "The Great Gatsby's final chapter," write instead "the final chapter of The Great Gatsby." Not "The Oxford Companion to American Literature's entry on Emerson," but, instead, "the entry on Emerson in The Oxford Companion to American Literature."
What to Document: Avoiding Plagiarism

Honesty requires that you acknowledge your indebtedness for material, not only when you quote directly from a work but also when you appropriate an idea that is not common knowledge. Not to acknowledge such borrowing is plagiarism. If in doubt whether to give credit, give credit.

You ought, however, to develop a sense of what is considered common knowledge. Definitions in a dictionary can be considered common knowledge, so there is no need to say, "According to Webster, a novel is . . ." (This is weak in three ways: It's unnecessary, it's uninteresting, and it's unclear, since "Webster" appears in the titles of several dictionaries, some good and some bad.) Similarly, the date of first publication of The Scarlet Letter (1850) can be considered common knowledge. Few can give it when asked, but it can be found out from innumerable sources, and no one need get the credit for providing you with the date. The idea that Hamlet delays is also a matter of common knowledge. But if you are impressed by so-and-so's argument that Claudius has been much maligned, you should give credit to so-and-so.

Suppose that in the course of your research for a paper on Langston Hughes you happen to come across Arnold Rampersad's statement, in an essay in Voices and Visions (ed. Helen Vendler):

> Books alone could not save Hughes from loneliness, let alone give him the strength to be a writer. At least one other factor was essential in priming him for creative obsession. In the place in his heart, or psychology, vacated by his parents entered the black masses. (355)

This is an interesting idea, and in the last sentence the shift from heart to psychology is perhaps especially interesting. You certainly cannot say—with the implication that the idea and the words are your own—something like

> Hughes let enter into his heart, or his psychology—a place vacated by his parents—the black masses.

The writer is simply lifting Rampersad's ideas and making only tiny changes in the wording. But even a larger change in the wording is unacceptable unless Rampersad is given credit. Here is a restatement that is an example of plagiarism even though the words differ from Rampersad's:

> Hughes took into himself ordinary black people, thus filling the gap created by his mother and father.

In this version, the writer presents Rampersad's idea as if it were the writer's own—and presents it less effectively than Rampersad.

What to do? Give Rampersad credit, perhaps along these lines:

> As Arnold Rampersad has said, "in the place in his heart, or his psychology" where his parents had once been, Hughes now substituted ordinary black people (355).

You can use another writer's ideas, and even some of the very words, but you must give credit, and you must use quotation marks when you quote.

You can

- Give credit and quote directly, or
- Give credit and summarize the writer's point, or
- Give credit and summarize the point but include—within quotation marks—some phrase you think is especially interesting.

Documentation: Footnotes, Internal Parenthetical Citations, and a List of Works Cited (MLA Format)

Documentation tells your reader exactly what your sources are. Until fairly recently, the standard form was the footnote, which, for example, told the reader that the source of such and such a quotation was a book by so-and-so. But in 1984 the Modern Language Association, which had established the footnote form used in hundreds of journals, university presses, and classrooms, substituted a new form. It is this newer form—parenthetical citation within the text (rather than at the foot of the page or the end of the essay)—that we will discuss at length. Keep in mind, though, that footnotes still have their uses.

Footnotes

If you are using only one source, your instructor may advise you to give the source in a footnote. (Check with your instructors to find out their preferred forms of documentation.)

Let's say that your only source is this textbook. Let's say, too, that all of your quotations will be from a single story—Kate Chopin's “The Story of an Hour”—printed in this book on pages 50–51. If you use a word processor, the software program can probably format the note for you. If, however, you are using a typewriter, type the digit 1 (elevated, and without a period after it) after your first reference to (or quotation from) the story, and then put a footnote at the bottom of the page, explaining where the story can be found. After your last line of text on the page, triple-space, indent five spaces from the left-hand margin, and type the arabic number 1, elevated. Do not put a period after it. Then type a statement (double-spaced) to the effect that all references are to this book.

Notice that although the footnote begins by being indented five spaces, if the note runs to more than one line the subsequent lines are given flush left.

(If a book has more than three authors or editors, give the name of only the first author or editor, and follow it with et al., the Latin abbreviation for "and others.")
Even if you are writing a comparison of, say, two stories in this book, you can use a note of this sort. It might run thus:

If you use such a note, you do not need to use a footnote after each quotation that follows. You can give the citations right in the body of the paper, by putting the page references in parentheses after the quotations.

Internal Parenthetical Citations

On page 51 we distinguish between embedded quotations (which are short, are run right into your own sentence, and are enclosed in quotation marks) and quotations that are set off on the page and are not enclosed in quotation marks (for example, three or more lines of poetry, five or more lines of typed prose).

For an embedded quotation, put the page reference in parentheses immediately after the closing quotation marks without any intervening punctuation. Then, after the parenthesis that follows the number, insert the necessary punctuation (for instance, a comma or a period):

O’Connor begins "A Good Man is Hard to Find" with a simple declarative sentence, "The grandmother didn’t want to go to Florida" (249). O’Connor then goes on to give the grandmother’s reason.

The period comes after the parenthetical citation. In the next example no punctuation comes after the first citation—because none is needed—and a comma comes after (not before or within) the second citation, because a comma is needed in the sentence:

This is ironic because almost at the start of the story, in the second paragraph, Richards with the best of motives "hastened" (50) to bring his sad message; if he had at the start been "too late" (51), Mallard would have arrived at home first.

For a quotation that is not embedded within the text but is set off (by being indented ten spaces), put the parenthetical citation on the last line of the quotation, one space after the period that ends the quoted sentence.

Four additional points:

- The abbreviations p., pg., and pp. are not used in citing pages.
- If a story is very short, perhaps running for only a page or two, your instructor may tell you there is no need to keep citing the page reference for each quotation. Simply mention in the footnote that the story appears on, say, pages 205–206.
• If you are referring to a poem, your instructor may tell you to use parenthetical citations of line numbers rather than of page numbers. But, again, your footnote will tell the reader that the poem can be found in this book, and on what page.

• If you are referring to a play with numbered lines, your instructor may prefer that in your parenthetical citations you give act, scene, and line, rather than page numbers. Use arabic (not roman) numerals, separating the act from the scene, and the scene from the line, by periods. Here, then, is how a reference to Act 3, Scene 2, line 118 would be given:

(3.2.118)

Parenthetical Citations and List of Works Cited

Footnotes have fallen into disfavor. Parenthetical citations are now usually clarified not by means of a footnote but by means of a list, headed "Works Cited," given at the end of the essay. In this list you give alphabetically (last name first) the authors and titles that you have quoted or referred to in the essay.

Briefly, the idea is that the reader of your paper encounters an author's name and a parenthetical citation of pages. By checking the author's name in Works Cited, the reader can find the passage in the book. Suppose you are writing about Kate Chopin's "The Story of an Hour." Let's assume that you have already mentioned the author and the title of the story—that is, you have let the reader know the subject of the essay—and now you introduce a quotation from the story in a sentence such as this. (Notice the parenthetical citation of page numbers immediately after the quotation.)

True, Mrs. Mallard at first expresses grief when she hears the news, but soon (unknown to her friends) she finds joy in it. So, Richards's "sad message" (50), though sad in Richards's eyes, is in fact a happy message.

Turning to Works Cited, the reader, knowing the quoted words are by Chopin, looks for Chopin and finds the following:

Thus the essayist is informing the reader that the quoted words ("sad message") are to be found on page 50 of this anthology.

If you have not mentioned Chopin's name in some sort of lead-in, you will have to give her name within the parentheses so that the reader will know the author of the quoted words:

What are we to make out of a story that ends by telling us that the leading character has died "of joy that kills" (Chopin 51)?
The closing quotation marks come immediately after the last word of the quotation; the citation and the final punctuation—in this case, the essayist’s question mark—come after the closing quotation marks.

If you are comparing Chopin’s story with Gilman’s “The Yellow Wallpaper,” in Works Cited you will give a similar entry for Gilman—her name, the title of the story, the book in which it is reprinted, and the page numbers that the story occupies.

If you are referring to several works reprinted within one volume, instead of listing each item fully, it is acceptable in Works Cited to list each item simply by giving the author’s name, the title of the work, then a period, a space, and the name of the anthologist, followed by the page numbers that the selection spans. Thus a reference to Chopin’s “The Story of an Hour” would be followed only by: Barnet 50–51. This form requires that the anthology itself be cited under the name of the first-listed editor, thus:

If you are writing a research paper, you will use many sources. In the essay itself you will mention an author’s name, quote or summarize from this author, and follow the quotation or summary with a parenthetical citation of the pages. In Works Cited you will give the full title, place of publication, and other bibliographic material.

Here are a few examples, all referring to an article by Joan Templeton, “The Doll House Backlash: Criticism, Feminism, and Ibsen.” The article appeared in PMLA 104 (1989): 28–40, but this information is given only in Works Cited, not within the text of the student’s essay.

If in the text of your essay you mention the author’s name, the citation following a quotation (or a summary of a passage) is merely a page number in parentheses, followed by a period, thus:

In 1989 Joan Templeton argued that many critics, unhappy with recognizing Ibsen as a feminist, sought "to render Nora inconsequential" (29).

Or:

In 1989 Joan Templeton noted that many critics, unhappy with recognizing Ibsen as a feminist, have sought to make Nora trivial (29).

If you don’t mention the name of the author in a lead-in, you will have to give the name within the parenthetical citation:

Many critics, attempting to argue that Ibsen was not a feminist, have tried to make Nora trivial (Templeton 29).

Notice in all of these examples that the final period comes after the parenthetical citation. Exception: If the quotation is longer than four lines and is therefore set off by being indented ten spaces from the left margin, end the quotation with the appropriate punctuation (period, question mark, or exclamation mark), hit the space bar twice, and type (in parentheses) the page number. In this case, do not put a period after the citation.

Another point: If your list of Works Cited includes more than one work by an author, in your essay when you quote or refer to one or the other you’ll have to identify which work you are drawing on. You can provide the title in a lead-in, thus:

In "The Doll’s House Backlash: Criticism, Feminism, and Ibsen," Templeton says, "Nora's detractors have often been, from the first, her husband's defenders" (30).

Or you can provide the information in the parenthetical citation, giving a shortened version of the title. This usually consists of the first word, unless it is A, An, or The, in which case including the second word is usually enough. Certain titles may require still another word or two, as in this example:

According to Templeton, "Nora's detractors have often been, from the first, her husband's defenders" ("Doll’s House Backlash" 30).

Forms of Citation in Works Cited

In looking over the following samples of entries in Works Cited, remember:

- The list of Works Cited appears at the end of the paper. It begins on a new page, and the page continues the numbering of the text.
- The list of Works Cited is arranged alphabetically by author (last name first).
- If a work is anonymous, list it under the first word of the title unless the first word is A, An, or The, in which case list it under the second word.
- If a work is by two authors, although the book is listed alphabetically under the first author’s last name, the second author’s name is given in the normal order, first name first.
- If you list two or more works by the same author, the author’s name is not repeated but is represented by three hyphens followed by a period and a space.
- Each item begins flush left, but if an entry is longer than one line, subsequent lines in the entry are indented five spaces.

For citations of electronic sources, see pages 1574–1578.

Here are samples of the kinds of citations you are most likely to include in your list of Works Cited.

A book by one author:

Notice that the author’s last name is given first, but otherwise the name is given as on the title page. Do not substitute initials for names written out on the title page, but you may shorten the publisher’s name—for example, from Little, Brown and Company to Little.

Take the title from the title page, not from the cover or the spine, but disregard unusual typography—for instance, the use of only capital letters or the use of & for and. Underline the title and subtitle with one continuous underline, but do not underline the period. The place of publication is indicated by the name of the city. If the city is not well known or if several cities have the same name (for instance, Cambridge, Massachusetts, and Cambridge, England) the name of the state or country is added. If the title page lists several cities, give only the first.

A book by more than one author:

Notice that the book is listed under the last name of the first author (Gilbert) and that the second author’s name is then given with first name (Susan) first. If the book has more than three authors, give the name of the first author only (last name first) and follow it with et al. (Latin for “and others”).

A book in several volumes:

The total number of volumes is given after the title, regardless of the number that you have used.

If you have used more than one volume, within your essay you will parenthetically indicate a reference to, for instance, page 30 of volume 3 thus: (3: 30). If you have used only one volume of a multivolume work—let’s say you used only volume 2 of McQuade’s anthology—in your entry in Works Cited write, after the period following the date, Vol. 2. In your parenthetical citation within the essay you will therefore cite only the page reference (without the volume number), since the reader will (on consulting Works Cited) understand that in this example the reference is in volume 2.

If, instead of using the volumes as a whole, you used only an independent work within one volume—say, an essay in volume 2—in Works Cited omit the abbreviation Vol. Instead, give an arabic 2 (indicating volume 2) followed by a colon, a space, and the page numbers that encompass the selection you used:

Notice that this entry for McPherson specifies not only that the book consists of two volumes, but also that only one selection ("Why I Like Country Music," occupying pages 2304–2315 in volume 2) was used. If you use this sort of citation in Works Cited, in the body of your essay a documentary reference to this work will be only to the page; the volume number will not be added.

A book with a separate title in a set of volumes:

A revised edition of a book:

A reprint, such as a paperback version of an older hardcover book:

Notice that the entry cites the original date (1931) but indicates that the writer is using the New York Review of Books reprint of 2004.

An edited book other than an anthology:

An anthology: You can list an anthology either under the editor's name or under the title.

A work in a volume of works by one author:

This entry indicates that Sontag's essay, called "The Aesthetics of Silence," appears in a book of hers entitled Styles of Radical Will. Notice that the page numbers of the short work are cited (not page numbers that you may happen to refer to, but the page numbers of the entire piece).
Appendix A / Remarks about Manuscript Form

A work in an anthology, that is, in a collection of works by several authors: Begin with the author and the title of the work you are citing, not with the name of the anthologist or the title of the anthology. The entry ends with the pages occupied by the selection you are citing:

Normally, you will give the title of the work you are citing (probably an essay, short story, or poem) in quotation marks. If you are referring to a book-length work (for instance, a novel or a full-length play), underline it to indicate italics. If the work is translated, after the period that follows the title, write Trans. and give the name of the translator, followed by a period and the name of the anthology.

If the collection is a multivolume work and you are using only one volume, in Works Cited you will specify the volume, as in the example (p. 1569) of McPherson’s essay. Because the list of Works Cited specifies the volume, your parenthetical documentary reference within your essay will specify (as mentioned earlier) only the page numbers, not the volume. Thus, although McPherson’s essay appears on pages 2304–2315 in the second volume of a two-volume work, a parenthetical citation will refer only to the page numbers because the citation in Works Cited specifies the volume.

Remember that the pages specified in the entry in your list of Works Cited are to the entire selection, not simply to pages you may happen to refer to within your paper.

If you are referring to a reprint of a scholarly article, give details of the original publication, as in the following example:

Two or more works in an anthology: If you are referring to more than one work in an anthology in order to avoid repeating all the information about the anthology in each entry in Works Cited, under each author’s name (in the appropriate alphabetical place) give the author and title of the work, then a period, a space, and the name of the anthologist, followed by the page numbers that the selection spans. Thus, a reference to Shakespeare’s Hamlet would be followed only by rather than by a full citation of Barnet’s anthology. This form requires that the anthology itself also be listed, under Barnet.

Barnet 1075–1184

Two or more works by the same author: Notice that the works are given in alphabetical order (Fables precedes Fools) and that the author’s name is not repeated but is represented by three hyphens followed by a period and a space. If the author is the translator or editor of a volume, the three hyphens are followed not by a period but by a comma, then a space, then the appropriate abbreviation (Trans. or Ed.), then the title:

A translated book:

If you are discussing the translation itself, as opposed to the book, list the work under the translator’s name. Then put a comma, a space, and “trans.” After the period following “trans,” skip a space, then give the title of the book, a period, a space, and then “By” and the author’s name, first name first. Continue with information about the place of publication, publisher, and date, as in any entry for a book.

An introduction, foreword, or afterword, or other editorial apparatus:

Usually a book with an introduction or some such comparable material is listed under the name of the author of the book rather than the name of the author of the editorial material. (See the citation to Pope on page 1783). But if you are referring to the editor’s apparatus rather than to the work itself, use the form just given.

Words such as preface, introduction, afterword, and conclusion are capitalized in the entry but are neither enclosed within quotation marks nor underlined.

A book review: First, here is an example of a review that does not have a title.

If the review has a title, give the title after the period following the reviewer’s name, before “Rev.” If the review is unsigned, list it under the first word of the title, or the second word if the first word is A, An, or The. If an unsigned review has no title, begin the entry with “Rev. of” and alphabetize it under the title of the work being reviewed.

An encyclopedia: The first example is for a signed article, the second for an unsigned article.

An article in a scholarly journal: Some journals are paginated consecutively; that is, the pagination of the second issue picks up where the first issue left off. Other journals begin each issue with a new page 1. The forms of the citations in Works Cited differ slightly.

First, the citation of a journal that uses continuous pagination:

This article appeared in volume 58, which was published in 1986. (Notice that the volume number is followed by a space, then by the year in parentheses, and then by a colon, a space, and the page numbers of the entire article.) Although each volume consists of four issues, you do not specify the issue number when the journal is paginated continuously.

For a journal that paginates each issue separately (a quarterly journal will have four page 1’s each year), give the issue number directly after the volume number and a period, with no spaces before or after the period:

An article in a weekly, biweekly, or monthly publication:

Notice that the volume number and the issue number are omitted for popular weeklies or monthlies such as Time and Atlantic.

An article in a newspaper: Because newspapers usually consist of several sections, a section number may precede the page number. The example indicates that an article begins on page 3 of section 2 and is continued on a later page:

You may also have occasion to cite something other than a printed source, for instance, a lecture. Here are the forms for the chief nonprint sources.

An interview:

Saretta, Howard. Personal interview. 3 Nov. 2005.

A lecture:

A television or radio program:

60 Minutes. CBS. 16 Sep. 2007.
A film or videotape:

A recording:

A performance:

Citing Sources on the World Wide Web

Scholars and reference librarians have not reached a consensus about the correct form—what should be included, and in what order—for the citation of WWW sources. But all agree on two principles: (1) Give as much information as you can; (2) Make certain that your readers can retrieve the source themselves—which means that you should check the URL carefully. For accuracy’s sake, it is a good idea to copy the URL from the Location line of your browser and paste it into your list of Works Cited.

CHECKLIST: Citing Sources on the World Wide Web

Provide the following information:

☐ Author ☐ Title
☐ Publication information
☐ Title of archive or database
☐ Date (if given) when the site was posted; sometimes termed the “revision” or “modification” date
☐ Name of institution or organization that supports or is associated with this site
☐ Date that you accessed this source
☐ URL

Many Websites and pages, however, are not prepared according to the style and form in which you want to cite them. Sometimes the name of the author is unknown, and other information may be missing or hard to find as well. It is worth repeating that while you should cite the source, including the URL, accurately, you cannot be certain that the site will exist at this URL (or at all) when your readers attempt to access it for themselves. These difficulties aside, perhaps the main point to remember is that a source on the WWW is as much a source as is a book or article that you can track down and read in the library. If you have made use of it, you must acknowledge that you have done so and include the bibliographical information, as fully as you can, in your list of Works Cited for the paper.

The Wellesley College Library offers a valuable site for searching the Web and evaluating what you find there:

MLA General Conventions

The MLA recommends these general conventions:

Publication Dates For sources taken from the Internet, include the date the source was posted to the Internet or last updated or revised; give also the date the source was accessed.

Uniform Resource Locators Include a full and accurate URL for any source taken from the Internet (with access-mode identifier—http, ftp, gopher, or telnet). Enclose URLs in angle brackets (< >). When a URL continues from one line to the next, break it only after a slash. Do not add a hyphen.

Page Numbering Include page or paragraph numbers when given by the source. When citing electronic sources, follow the formatting conventions illustrated by the following models:

An online scholarly project or database:

1. Title of project or database
2. Name of the editor of project
3. Electronic publication information
4. Date of access and URL

A short work within a scholarly project:

A personal or professional site:

An online book published independently:

1. Author’s name
2. Title of the work
3. Name of the editor, compiler, or translator
4. Publication information
5. Date of access and URL

An online book within a scholarly project:

1. Author’s name
2. Title of the work and print publication information
3. Name of the editor, compiler, or translator (if relevant)
4. Electronic publication information
5. Date of access and URL

An article in a scholarly journal:

1. Author’s name
2. Title of the work or material in quotation marks
3. Name of periodical
4. Volume number, issue number, or other identifying number
5. Date of publication
6. Page numbers or number of paragraphs, pages, or other numbered sections (if any)
7. Date of access and URL

An unsigned article in a newspaper or on a newswire:

Appendix A / Remarks about Manuscript Form

A signed article in a newspaper or on a newswire:

An article in a magazine:

A review:

An editorial or letter to the editor:

An abstract:

A periodical source on CD-ROM, diskette, or magnetic tape:

1. Author's name
2. Publication information for analogous printed source (title and date)
3. Title of database
4. Publication medium
A nonperiodical source on CD-ROM, diskette, or magnetic tape:

Electronic mail (e-mail):

Mendez, Michael R. "Re: Solar power." E-mail to Edgar V. Atamian. 11 Sept. 1996.
Armstrong, David J. E-mail to the author. 30 Aug. 1996.

An Online Posting For online postings or synchronous communications, try to cite a version stored as a Web file, if one exists, as a courtesy to the reader. Label sources as needed (e.g., Online posting, Online defense of dissertation, and so forth, with neither underlining nor quotation marks). Follow these models as appropriate:

Writing Essay Examinations

WHY DO INSTRUCTORS GIVE EXAMINATIONS?

Perhaps an understanding of the nature of essay examinations will help you to write better essays.

Examinations not only measure learning and thinking, but also stimulate them. Even so humble an examination as a short-answer quiz—chiefly a device to oblige students to do the assigned reading—is a sort of push designed to move students forward. Of course, internal motivation is far superior to external, but even such crude external motivation as a quiz can have a beneficial effect. Students know this; indeed, they often will say that they have chosen to take a particular course “because I want to know something about . . . and I know that I won’t do the reading on my own.” (Teachers often teach a new course for the same reason; we want to become knowledgeable about, say, Asian-American literature, and we know that despite our lofty intentions we may not seriously confront the subject unless we are under the pressure of facing a class.)

In short, examinations help students to acquire learning and then to convert learning into thinking. Sometimes it is not until preparing for the final examination that students—rereading the chief texts and classroom notes—perceive what the course was really about; until this late stage, the trees obscure the forest, but now, in the process of the reviewing and sorting things out, a pattern emerges. The experience of reviewing and then of writing an examination, though fretful, can be highly exciting as connections are made and ideas take on life.

GETTING READY

The night before the examination you will almost certainly feel that you don’t know this, that, and the other thing, and you may feel that nothing short of reading all of the assignments—an impossibility, of course—can get you through the test. If indeed you have not done the reading, this feeling is warranted. The best preparation for an examination is not a panicky turning of hundreds of pages the night before the test; rather, the best preparation is to keep up with the reading throughout the term, and to annotate the text while reading, make connections among the works you study from one week to the next, participate in class discussion, and annotate the text during the class discussions.

If you engage in these practices, you will not only be preparing for the examination, but you will also be getting more out of the course—more knowledge and more pleasure—than if you come to class unprepared.

Nevertheless, however well prepared you are, you will want to do some intensive preparation shortly before the final examination. We suggest that you may want to reread Chapters 2, 3, 4 and 6 (all on fiction), 11 and 19 (both on poetry), 25 and 29 (both on drama), because these chapters discuss not only the genres but also the job of writing essays about them.

WRITING ESSAY ANSWERS

Let’s assume that before the examination you have read the assigned material, marked the margins of your books, made summaries of the longer readings and of the classroom comments, reviewed everything carefully, and had a decent night’s sleep. Now you are facing the examination sheet.

Here are some suggestions:

1. Before you write anything on the examination booklet beyond your name, read the entire examination. Something in the last question—maybe even a passage that is quoted—may give you an idea that will help you when you write your answer to the first question.
2. Budget your time. If the first question is worth 25%, give it about one-fourth of your time, not half the allotted time. On the other hand, do not provide perfunctory answers: If the question is worth 25%, your instructor expects a fairly detailed response.
3. Rank for yourself the degree of difficulty of the questions, from easiest to hardest. Start with the questions that you immediately know you can handle effectively, and save harder questions for later. Often those harder questions will become easier once you have gotten into the activity of writing the examination.
4. After you have thought a little about the question, before writing furiously, take a moment to jot down few ideas that strike you, as a sort of outline or source of further inspiration. You may at the outset realize that, say, you want to make three points, and unless you jot these down—three key words will do—you may spend all the allotted time on one point.
5. Answer the question. If you are asked to compare two characters, compare them; don’t just write two character sketches. Take seriously such words as compare, define, summarize, and, especially, evaluate.
6. You often can get a good start merely by turning the question into an affirmation—for example, by turning “In what ways does the poetry of Louise Erdrich resemble her fiction” into “Louise Erdrich’s poetry resembles her fiction in at least . . . ways.”
7. Don’t waste time summarizing at length what you have read unless asked to do so—but, of course, you may have to give a brief summary in order to support a point. The instructor wants to see that you can use your reading, not merely that you have done the reading.

8. Be concrete. Illustrate your arguments with facts—the names of authors, titles, dates, characters, details of plot, and quotations if possible.

9. Leave space for last-minute additions. If you are writing in an examination booklet, either skip a page between essays or write only on the right-hand pages so that on rereading you can add material at the appropriate place on the left-hand pages.

10. Reread what you have written, and make last-minute revisions. By the time you have finished writing the last essay you have probably thought of some things—for instance, some quotations may have come to mind—that might well add strength to some of the earlier essays.

Beyond these general suggestions we can best talk about essay examinations by looking at five common types of questions:

1. A passage to explicate
2. A historical question (for example, “Trace the influence of Guy de Maupassant on Kate Chopin”)
3. A critical quotation to be evaluated
4. A wild question (such as “What would Flannery O’Connor think of Katherine Min’s ‘Courting a Monk?’; “What would Othello do if he were in Hamlet’s place?”)
5. A comparison (for example, “Compare Eliot’s ‘The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock’ with Browning’s ‘My Last Duchess’ as dramatic monologues”)

A few remarks on each of these types may be helpful.

1. On explication, see pages 64–68 and page 753. As a short rule, look carefully at the tone (speaker’s attitude toward self, subject, and audience) and at the implications of the words (their connotations and associations), and see whether a pattern of imagery is evident. For example, religious language (adore, saint) in a secular love poem may precisely define the nature of the lover and of the beloved. Remember, an explication is not a paraphrase (a putting into other words) but an attempt to show the relations of the parts by calling attention to implications. Organization of such an essay is rarely a problem, since most explications begin with the first line and go on to the last. Indeed, if you glance at the poem or passage and feel worried that it is too difficult or obscure, don’t panic. Take a breath, and begin with the first line or the first sentence. Explicate that, and then focus on how the next line or sentence is related to what has come just before. Proceed step by step, piece by piece, and as you do so you will develop a sense of the whole—which is where your explication can conclude.

2. A good essay on a historical question will offer a nice combination of argument and evidence; that is, the thesis will be supported by concrete details (names, dates, perhaps, even brief quotations). A discussion of Chopin’s debt to Maupassant cannot be convincing if it does not specify certain works and certain characteristics. If you are asked to relate a writer or a body of work to an earlier writer or period, list the chief characteristics of the earlier writer or period, and then show specifically how the material you are discussing is related to these characteristics. If you remember and can quote some relevant terms, phrases, or lines from the works, your reader will feel that you really know the works themselves.

3. If you are asked to evaluate a critical quotation, read it carefully, and in your answer take account of all the quotation. If, for example, the quoted critic has said, “Louise Erdrich in her fiction always . . . but in her poetry rarely . . .” you will have to write about poetry and fiction; it will not be enough to talk only about one form or the other, unless, of course, the instructions on the examination ask you to take only as much of the quotation as you wish. Watch especially for words like always, for the most part, never; that is, although the passage may on the whole approach the truth, you may feel that some important qualifications are needed. This is not being picky; true thinking involves making subtle distinctions, yielding assent only so far and no further. And (again) be sure to give concrete details, supporting your argument with evidence.

4. Curiously, a wild question, such as “What would Shakespeare think of Death of a Salesman?” or “What would Desdemona do in Antigone’s place?” usually produces rather tame answers: A couple of standard ideas about Shakespeare (for instance, Shakespeare chiefly wrote poetry, and he usually included some comedy in his tragedies) are mechanically applied to Arthur Miller, or a simple characterization of Desdemona is applied to the situation set forth in Antigone, and some gross incompatibilities are revealed. But as the previous paragraph suggests, it may be necessary to do more than set up bold oppositions. The interest in such a question and in the answer to it may be largely in the degree to which superficially different figures resemble each other in some important ways. Remember that the wildness of the question does not mean that all answers are equally acceptable; as usual, any good answer will be supported by concrete detail. If time permits, you can often enrich your answer by reflecting a bit on the other way of looking at the issue. First, to be sure, explain how Desdemona would have acted in Antigone’s place—this is what the question asks for. But consider too how you could strengthen this answer by taking note as well of how Antigone might have acted in Desdemona’s place.

5. On comparisons, see pages 68–69. Because comparisons are especially difficult to write, be sure to take a few moments to jot down a sort of outline so that you know where you will be going. In a comparison of Browning’s and Eliot’s monologues, you might treat one poem by each, devoting alternate paragraphs to one author, or you might first treat one author’s poem and then turn to the other’s. But if you adopt this second strategy, your essay may break into two parts. You can guard against this weakness in three ways: Announcing at the outset that you will treat one author first, then the other; reminding your reader during your treatment of the first author that you will pick up certain points when you get to the second author; and briefly reminding your reader during the treatment of the second author of certain points you already made in your treatment of the first. Remember to make your points as clear and specific as you can. If you say that two authors are both “pessimistic about whether love can endure,” you’ll want to explain the nature of this pessimism, the reasons in each case for this view, and the precise similarities and the differences. A frequent weakness in “comparisons” is that they are too general, lacking the details that indicate subtle differences. When you review your answer, ask yourself if you have been sufficiently precise.
The terms briefly defined here are for the most part more fully defined earlier in the text. Hence many of the entries are followed by page references to the earlier discussions.

accent stress given to a syllable.

act a major division of a play.

action (1) the happenings in a narrative or drama, usually physical events (B marries C, D kills E), but also mental changes (F moves from innocence to experience); in short, the answer to the question, “What happens?” (2) less commonly, the theme or underlying idea of a work. (951)

allegory a work in which concrete elements (for instance, a pilgrim, a road, a splendid city) stand for abstractions (humanity, life, salvation), usually in an unambiguous, one-to-one relationship. The literal items (the pilgrim, and so on) thus convey a meaning, which is usually moral, religious, or political. To take a nonliterary example: The Statue of Liberty holds a torch (enlightenment, showing the rest of the world the way to freedom), and at her feet are broken chains (tyranny overcome). A caution: Not all of the details in an allegorical work are meant to be interpreted. For example, the hollowness of the Statue of Liberty does not stand for the insubstantiality or emptiness of liberty. (149–152)

alliteration repetition of consonant sounds, especially at the beginnings of words: free, form, phantasm. (726)

allusion an indirect reference; thus when Lincoln spoke of “a nation dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal,” he was making an allusion to the Declaration of Independence.

ambiguity multiplicity of meaning, often deliberate, that leaves the reader uncertain about the intended significance.

anagnorisis a recognition or discovery, especially in tragedy—for example, when the hero understands the reason for his or her fall. (1016)

analysis an examination, which usually proceeds by separating the object of study into parts. (29–30, 35, 54)

anapest a metrical foot consisting of two unaccented syllables followed by an accented one. Example, showing three anapests: “As I came to the edge of the wood.” (724)

anecdote a short narrative, usually reporting an amusing event in the life of an important person. (295)

antagonist a character or force that opposes (literally, “wrestles”) the protagonist (the main character). Thus, in Hamlet the antagonist is King Claudius, the protagonist is Hamlet; in Antigone, the antagonist is Creon, the protagonist Antigone.
antecedent action  happenings (especially in a play) that occurred before the present action. (951) apostrophe  address to an absent figure or to a thing as if it were present and could listen. Example: “O rose, thou art sick!” (675) approximate rhyme see half-rhyme.

archetype  a theme, image, motif, or pattern that occurs so often in literary works it seems to be universal. Examples: a dark forest (for mental confusion), the sun (for illumination).

aside  in the theater, words spoken by a character in the presence of other characters, but directed to the spectators (i.e., understood by the audience to be inaudible to the other characters). (952) assonance  repetition of similar vowel sounds in stressed syllables. Example: light/bride. (726) atmosphere  the emotional tone (for instance, joy, or horror) in a work, most often established by the setting.

ballad  a short narrative poem, especially one that is sung or recited, often in a stanza of four lines, with 8, 6, 8, 6 syllables, with the second and fourth lines rhyming. A folk or popular ballad is a narrative song that has been transmitted orally by what used to be called “the folk”; a literary ballad is a conscious imitation (without music) of such a work, often with complex symbolism. (598–600)

blank verse  unrhymed iambic pentameter, that is, unrhymed lines of ten syllables, with every second syllable stressed. (748) cacophony  an unpleasant combination of sounds.

caesura  a strong pause within a line of verse. (725)

canon  a term originally used to refer to those books accepted as Holy Scripture by the Christian Church. The term has come to be applied to literary works thought to have a special merit by a given culture—for instance, the body of literature traditionally taught in colleges and universities. Such works are sometimes called “classics” and their authors are “major authors.” As conceived in the United States until recently, the canon consisted chiefly of works by dead white European and American males—partly, of course, because middle-class and upper-class white males were in fact the people who did most of the writing in the Western Hemisphere, but also because white males (for instance, college professors) were the people who chiefly established the canon. Not surprisingly the canon-makers valued (or valorized or “privileged”) writings that revealed, asserted, or reinforced the canon-makers’ own values. From about the 1960s feminists and Marxists and others argued that these works had been regarded as central not because they were inherently better than other works but because they reflected the interests of the dominant culture, and that other work, such as slave narratives and the diaries of women, had been “marginalized.”

In fact, the literary canon has never been static (in contrast to the biblical canon, which has not changed for more than a thousand years), but it is true that certain authors, such as Homer, Chaucer, and Shakespeare have been permanent fixtures. Why? Partly because they do indeed support the values of those who in large measure control the high cultural purse strings, and perhaps partly because their works are rich enough to invite constant reinterpretation from age to age—that is, to allow each generation to find its needs and its values in them.

catharsis  Aristotle’s term for the purgation or purification of the pity and terror supposedly experienced while witnessing a tragedy. (1017)

character  (1) a person in a literary work (Romeo); (2) the personality of such a figure (sentimental lover, or whatever). Characters (in the first sense) are sometimes classified as either “flat” (one-dimensional) or “round” (fully realized, complex). (26, 96, 101–102, 200–201, 947–948, 950–952, 1350) characterization the presentation of a character, whether by direct description, by showing the character in action, or by the presentation of other characters who help to define each other. (26) cliché an expression that through overuse has ceased to be effective. Examples: acid test; sigh of relief; the proud possessor.
climax the culmination of a conflict; a turning point, often the point of greatest tension in a plot. (951) comedy a literary work, especially a play, characterized by humor and by a happy ending. (1220–1222, 1351) comparison and contrast To compare is strictly to note similarities; to contrast is to note differences. But compare is now often used for both activities. (68–69) complication an entanglement in a narrative or dramatic work that causes a conflict. (96) conflict a struggle between a character and some obstacle (for example, another character or fate) or between internal forces, such as divided loyalties. (96, 101, 951, 1349–1350) connotation the associations (suggestions, overtones) of a word or expression. Thus seventy and three score and ten both mean “one more than sixty-nine,” but because three score and ten is a biblical expression, it has an association of holiness; see also denotation. (676) consistency building the process engaged in during the act of reading, of reevaluating the details that one has just read in order to make them consistent with the new information that the text is providing.
consonance repetition of consonant sounds, especially in stressed syllables. Also called half-rhyme or slant rhyme. Example: arouse/doze. (726) convention a pattern (for instance, the 14-line poem, or sonnet) or motif (for instance, the bumbling police officer in detective fiction) or other device occurring so often that it is taken for granted. Thus it is a convention that actors in a performance of Julius Caesar are understood to be speaking Latin, though in fact they are speaking English. Similarly, the soliloquy (a character alone on the stage speaks his or her thoughts aloud) is a convention, for in real life sane people rarely talk aloud to themselves.
couplet a pair of lines of verse, usually rhyming. (732) crisis a high point in the conflict that leads to the turning point. (951) criticism the analysis or evaluation of a literary work. (1537–1557) cultural criticism criticism that sets literature in a social context, often of economics or politics or gender. Borrowing some of the methods of anthropology, cultural criticism usually extends the canon to include popular material—for instance, comic books and soap operas.
dactyl a metrical foot consisting of a stressed syllable followed by two unstressed syllables. Example: underwear. (724) deconstruction a critical approach that assumes language is unstable and ambiguous and is therefore inherently contradictory. Because authors cannot control their language, texts reveal more than their authors are aware of. For instance, texts (like such institutions as the law, the churches, and the schools) are likely, when closely scrutinized, to reveal connections to a society’s economic system, even though the authors may have believed they were outside of the system. (1539–1540, 1556) denotation the dictionary meaning of a word. Thus soap opera and daytime serial have the same denotation, but the connotations (associations, emotional overtones) of soap opera are less favorable. (676) dénouement the resolution or the outcome (literally, the “unknotting”) of a plot. (96, 101, 951) deus ex machina literally, “a god out of a machine”; any unexpected and artificial way of resolving the plot—for example, by introducing a rich uncle, thought to be dead, who arrives on the scene and pays the debts that otherwise would overwhelm the young hero.
dialogue exchange of words between characters; speech.
diction the choice of vocabulary and of sentence structure. There is a difference in diction between “One never knows” and “You never can tell.” (652–653, 752) didactic pertaining to teaching; having a moral purpose.
dimeter a line of poetry containing two feet. (724)
discovery see anagnorisis.
drama (1) a play; (2) conflict or tension, as in “The story lacks drama.”
dramatic irony see irony.
dramatic monologue a poem spoken entirely by one character but addressed to one or more other characters whose presence is strongly felt. (648) effaced narrator a narrator who reports but who does not editorialize or enter into the minds of any of the characters in the story.
elegy a lyric poem, usually a meditation on a death. (614) elision omission (usually of a vowel or unstressed syllable), as in o’er (for over) and in “Th’ inevitable hour.”
end rhyme identical sounds at the ends of lines of poetry. (726) end-stopped line a line of poetry that ends with a pause (usually marked by a comma, semicolon, or period) because the grammatical structure and the sense reach (at least to some degree) completion. It is contrasted with a run-on line. (725) English (or Shakespearean) sonnet a poem of 14 lines (three quatrains and a couplet), rhyming ababcdcdefefgg. (733) enjambment a line of poetry in which the grammatical and logical sense run on, without pause, into the next line or lines. (725) epic a long narrative, especially in verse, that usually records heroic material in an elevated style.
epigram a brief, witty poem or saying.
epigraph a quotation at the beginning of the work, just after the title, often giving a clue to the theme.
epiphany a “showing forth,” as when an action reveals a character with particular clarity.
episode an incident or scene that has unity in itself but is also a part of a larger action.
epistle a letter, in prose or verse.
essay a work, usually in prose and usually fairly short, that purports to be true and that treats its subject tentatively. In most literary essays the reader’s interest is as much in the speaker’s personality as in any argument that is offered.
euphony literally, “good sound,” a pleasant combination of sounds.
explanation a line-by-line unfolding of the meaning of a text. (64–68, 753) exposition a setting forth of information. In fiction and drama, introductory material introducing characters and the situation; in an essay, the presentation of information, as opposed to the telling of a story or the setting forth of an argument. (101, 951) eye rhyme words that look as though they rhyme, but do not rhyme when pronounced.
Example: come/home. (726)
fable a short story (often involving speaking animals) with an easily grasped moral.
(94) farce comedy based not on clever language or on subtleties of characters but on broadly humorous situations (for instance, a man mistakenly enters the women’s locker room).
feminine rhyme a rhyme of two or more syllables, with the stress falling on a syllable other than the last. Examples: fatter/batter; tenderly/slenderly. (726) feminist criticism an approach especially concerned with analyzing the depiction of women in literature—what images do male authors present of female characters?—and with the reappraisal of work by female authors. (1548–1553, 1557–1558) fiction an imaginative work, usually a prose narrative (novel, short story), that reports incidents that did not in fact occur. The term may include all works that invent a world such as a lyric poem or a play.

figurative language, figures of speech words intended to be understood in a way that is other than literal. Thus lemon used literally refers to a citrus fruit, but lemon used figuratively refers to a defective machine, especially a defective automobile. Other examples: “He’s a beast.” “She’s a witch.” “A sea of troubles.” Literally, such expressions are nonsense, but writers use them to express meanings inexpressible in literal speech. Among the most common kinds of figures of speech are apostrophe, metaphor, and simile (see the discussions of these words in this glossary). (668–677)

flashback an interruption in a narrative that presents an earlier episode.

flat character a one-dimensional character (for instance, the figure who is only and always the jealous husband or the flirtatious wife) as opposed to a round or many-sided character. (101)

fly-on-the-wall narrator a narrator who never editorializes and never enters a character’s mind, but reports only what is said and done. (125)

foil a character who makes a contrast with another, especially a minor character who helps to set off a major character.

foot a metrical unit, consisting of two or three syllables, with a specified arrangement of the stressed syllable or syllables. Thus the iambic foot consists of an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed syllable. (723–724) foreshadowing suggestions of what is to come.

formalist criticism analysis that assumes a work of art is a constructed object with a stable meaning that can be ascertained by studying the relationships between the elements of the work. Thus a poem is like a chair: a chair can of course be stood on, or used for firewood, but it was created with a specific purpose that was evident and remains evident to all viewers. (1537–1539, 1556)

free verse poetry in lines of irregular length, usually unrhymed. (748)

gap a term from reader-response criticism, referring to a reader’s perception that something is unstated in the text, requiring the reader to fill in the material—for instance, to draw a conclusion as to why a character behaves as she does. Filling in the gaps is a matter of “consistency building.” Different readers of course may fill the gaps differently, and readers may even differ as to whether a gap exists at a particular point in the text.

gay criticism see gender criticism.

gender criticism criticism concerned especially with alleged differences in the ways that males and females read and write, and with the representations of gender (straight, bisexual, gay, lesbian) in literature. (218, 1548–1553, 1557–1558)

genre kind or type, roughly analogous to the biological term species. The four chief literary genres are nonfiction, fiction, poetry, and drama; but these can be subdivided into further genres. Thus fiction obviously can be divided into the short story and the novel, and drama obviously can be divided into tragedy and comedy. But these can be still further divided—for instance, tragedy into heroic tragedy and bourgeois tragedy, comedy into romantic comedy and satirical comedy.

gesture physical movement, especially in a play. (948)

haiku a Japanese form having three unrhymed lines of five, seven, and five syllables. (701–704)

half-rhyme repetition in accented syllables of the final consonant sound but without identity in the preceding vowel sound; words of similar but not identical sound. Also called near rhyme, slant rhyme, approximate rhyme, and off-rhyme. See also consonance. Examples: light/bet; affirm/perform. (726)

hamartia a flaw in the tragic hero, or an error made by the tragic hero. (1014–1015)

heptameter a metrical line of seven feet. (724) hero, heroine the main character (not necessarily heroic or even admirable) in a work; cf. protagonist.

heroic couplet an end-stopped pair of rhyming lines of iambic pentameter. (732)

hexameter a metrical line of six feet. (724)

historical criticism the attempt to illuminate a literary work by placing it in its historical context. (1544–1545)

hubris, hybris a Greek word, usually translated as “overweening pride,” “arrogance,” “excessive ambition,” and often said to be characteristic of tragic figures. (1015) humor character a character dominated by a single trait—the miser, the jealous husband, the flirtatious wife.

hymn a lyric on a lofty theme (from the Greek, “a song of praise”). (614) hyperbole figurative language using overstatement, as in “He died a thousand deaths.” (706)

iamb, iambic a poetic foot consisting of an unaccented syllable followed by an accented one. Example: alone. (724)

image, imagery Imagery is established by language that appeals to the senses, especially sight (“deep blue sea”) but also other senses (“tinkling bells,” “perfumes of Arabia”). (683–684) incremental repetition repetition with slight variations that advance a narrative, such as “She heard, . . . she rose, . . . she left.” (599) indeterminacy a passage that careful readers agree is open to more than one interpretation. According to some poststructural critics, because language is unstable and because contexts can never be objectively viewed, all texts are indeterminate.

innocent eye a naive narrator in whose narration the reader sees more than the narrator sees. (124)

internal rhyme rhyme within a line. (726)

interpretation the assignment of meaning to a text.

intertextuality All works show the influence of other works. If an author writes (say) a short story, no matter how original she thinks she is, she inevitably brings to her own story a knowledge of other stories—for example, a conception of what a short story is; and speaking more generally, an idea of what a story (long or short, written or oral) is. In opposition to formalist critics, who see a literary work as an independent whole containing a fixed meaning, some contemporary critics emphasize the work’s intertextuality—that is, its connections with a vast context of writings and indeed of all aspects of culture, and in part depending also on what the reader brings to the work. Because different readers bring different things, meaning is thus ever-changing. In this view, then, no text is self-sufficient, and no writer fully controls the meaning of the text. Because we are talking about connections of which the writer is unaware, and because “meaning” is in part the creation of the reader, the author is by no means an authority. Thus the critic should see a novel (for instance) in connection not only with other novels, past and present, but also in connection with other kinds of narratives, such as TV dramas and films, even though the author of the book lived before the age of film and TV. See Jay Clayton and Eric Rothstein, eds., Influences and Intertextuality in Literary History (1991).

invective abusive language, in literature often used for comic purposes.

irony a contrast of some sort. For instance, in verbal irony or Socratic irony, the contrast is between what is said and what is meant (“You’re a great guy,” meant bitterly). In dramatic irony or Sophoclean irony—also called tragic irony—the contrast is between what is intended and what is accomplished (Macbeth usurps the throne, thinking he will then be happy, but the action leads him to misery), or between what the audience knows (a murderer waits in the bedroom) and what a character says (the victim enters the bedroom, innocently saying, “I think I’ll have a long sleep”). (705, 1016)

Italian (or Petrarchan) sonnet a poem of 14 lines, consisting of an octave (rhyming abbaabba) and a sestet (usually cdcedc or cdcdcc). (732) lesbian criticism see gender criticism.

litotes a form of understatement in which an affirmation is made by means of a negation; thus “He was not underweight,” meaning “He was grossly over-weight.”

lyric poem a short poem, often songlike, with the emphasis not on narrative but on the speaker’s emotion or reverie. (613–616)

Marxist criticism the study of literature in the light of Karl Marx’s view that economic forces, controlled by the dominant class, shape the literature (as well as the law, philosophy, religion, etc.) of a society. (1545, 1587) masculine rhyme rhyme of one-syllable words (lies/cries) or, if more than one syllable, words ending with accented syllables (behold/foretold). (726) mask a term used to designate the speaker of a poem, equivalent to persona or voice. (638–643) meaning Critics seek to interpret “meaning,” variously defined as what the writer intended the work to say about the world and human experience, or as what the work says to the reader irrespective of the writer’s intention. Both versions imply that a literary work is a nut to be cracked, with a kernel that is to be extracted. Because few critics today hold that meaning is clear and unchanging, the tendency now is to say that a critic offers “an interpretation” or “a reading” rather than a “statement of the meaning of a work.” Many critics today would say that an alleged interpretation is really a creation of meaning.

melodrama a narrative, usually in dramatic form, involving threatening situations but ending happily. The characters are usually stock figures (virtuous heroine, villainous landlord).

metaphor a kind of figurative language equating one thing with another: “This novel is garbage” (a book is equated with discarded and probably inedible food), “a piercing cry” (a cry is equated with a spear or other sharp instrument). (672–673) meter a pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables. (723–726, 771–775)

metonymy a kind of figurative language in which a word or phrase stands not for itself but for something closely related to it: saber rattling means “militaristic talk or action.” (673) monologue a relatively long, uninterrupted speech by a character.

monometer a metrical line consisting of only one foot. (724) montage in film, quick cutting; in fiction, quick shifts.

mood the atmosphere, usually created by descriptions of the settings and characters.

motif a recurrent theme within a work, or a theme common to many works.

motivation grounds for a character’s action. (102)

myth (1) a traditional story reflecting primitive beliefs, especially explaining the mysteries of the natural world (why it rains, or the origin of mountains); (2) a body of belief, not necessarily false, especially as set forth by a writer. Thus one may speak of Yeats and Alice Walker as myth-makers, referring to the visions of reality that they set forth in their works.

myth criticism the study of patterns that seem universal or archetypal. (1543–1544, 1556) narrative, narrator a narrative is a story (an anecdote, a novel); a narrator is one who tells a story (not the author, but the invented speaker of the story). On kinds of narrators, see point of view. (94–103, 598–612)

New Criticism a mid-twentieth-century movement (also called formalist criticism) that regarded a literary work as an independent, carefully constructed object; hence it made little or no use of the author’s biography or of historical context, and it relied chiefly on explication. (1537–1539, 1556)

New Historicism a school of criticism holding that the past cannot be known objectively. According to this view, because historians project their own “narrative”—their own invention or “construction”—on the happenings of the past, historical writings are not objective but are, at bottom, political statements. (1545–1546, 1557) novel a long work of prose fiction, especially one that is relatively realistic.

novella a work of prose fiction longer than a short story but shorter than a novel—say, about 40 to 80 pages.

objective point of view a narrator reports but does not editorialize or enter into the minds of any of the characters in the story. (125)

octameter a metrical line with eight feet. (724)

octave, octet an eight-line stanza, or the first eight lines of a sonnet, especially of an Italian sonnet. (732) octosyllabic couplet a pair of rhyming lines, each line with four iambic feet.

ode a lyric exalting someone (for instance, a hero) or something (for instance, a season). (614)

off-rhyme see half-rhyme. (726) omniscient narrator a speaker who knows the thoughts of all of the characters in the narrative. (124) onomatopoeia words (or the use of words) that sound like what they mean. Examples: buzz; whirr. (726) open form poetry whose form seems spontaneous rather than highly patterned.

overstatement exaggeration, to emphasize a point. (706) oxymoron a compact paradox, as in a mute cry; a pleasing pain; proud humility.

parable a short narrative that is at least in part allegorical and that illustrates a moral or spiritual lesson. (11, 295)

paradox an apparent contradiction, as in Jesus' words “Whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it.” (706) paraphrase a restatement that sets forth an idea in diction other than that of the original. (6) parody a humorous imitation of a literary work, especially of its style.

pathos pity, sadness.

pentameter a line of verse containing five feet. (724)

peripeteia a reversal in the action. (1016) persona literally, a mask; the “I” or speaker of a work, sometimes identified with the author but usually better regarded as the voice or mouthpiece created by the author. (638–643) personification a kind of figurative language in which an inanimate object, animal, or other nonhuman is given human traits. Examples: the creeping tide (the tide is imagined as having feet); the cruel sea (the sea is imagined as having moral qualities). (674)

Petrarchan sonnet see Italian sonnet.

plot the episodes in a narrative or dramatic work—that is, what happens. (But even a lyric poem can be said to have a plot; for instance, the speaker’s mood changes from anger to resignation.) Sometimes plot is defined as the author’s particular arrangement (sequence) of these episodes, and story is the episodes in their chronological sequence. Until recently it was widely believed that a good plot had a logical structure: A caused B (B did not simply happen to follow A), but in the last few decades some critics have argued that such a concept merely represents the white male’s view of experience. (26, 200, 950–952, 1349–1350) poem an imaginative work in meter or in free verse, usually employing figurative language.

point of view the perspective from which a story is told—for example, by a major character or a minor character or a fly on the wall; see also narrative, narrator, omniscient narrator. (122–126, 201) postmodernism The term came into prominence in the 1960s, to distinguish the contemporary experimental writing of such authors as Samuel Beckett and Jorge Luis Borges from such early twentieth-century classics of modernism as James Joyce’s Ulysses (1922) and T. S. Eliot’s The Waste Land (1922). Although the classic modernists had been thought to be revolutionary in their day, after World War II they seemed to be conservative, and their works seemed remote from today's society with its new interests in such things as feminism, gay and lesbian rights, and pop culture. Postmodernist literature, though widely varied and not always clearly distinct from modernist literature, usually is more politically concerned, more playful—it is given to parody and pastiche—and more closely related to the art forms of popular culture than is modernist literature.

prologue an introductory statement, especially a monologue at the beginning of a play, summarizing the plot or introducing the characters. (951)

prosody the principles of versification. (723)

protagonist the chief actor in any literary work. The term is usually preferable to hero and heroine because it can include characters—for example, villainous or weak ones—who are not aptly called heroes or heroines. (951)

psychological criticism a form of analysis especially concerned both with the ways in which authors unconsciously leave traces of their inner lives in their works and with the ways in which readers respond, consciously and unconsciously, to works. (1547–1548, 1557) pyrrhic foot in poetry, a foot consisting of two unstressed syllables. (724)

quatrain a stanza of four lines. (732) reader-response criticism criticism emphasizing the idea that various readers respond in various ways and therefore that readers as well as authors “create” meaning. (1540–1543, 1556)

realism presentation of plausible characters (usually middle class) in plausible (usually everyday) circumstances, as opposed, for example, to heroic characters engaged in improbable adventures. Realism in literature seeks to give the illusion of reality.

recognition see anagnorisis. (1016)

refrain a repeated phrase, line, or group of lines in a poem, especially in a ballad.

resolution the dénouement or untying of the complication of the plot. (96, 296)

reversal a change in fortune, often an ironic twist. (1016) rhetorical question a question to which no answer is expected or to which only one answer is plausible. Example: “Do you think I am unaware of your goings-on?”

rhyme similarity or identity of accented sounds in corresponding positions, as, for example, at the ends of lines: love/dove; tender/slender. (726)

rhythm in poetry, a pattern of stressed and unstressed sounds; in prose, some sort of recurrence (for example, of a motif) at approximately identical intervals. (717–718, 725)

rising action in a story or play, the events that lead up to the climax. (951) rising meter a foot (for example, iambic or anapestic) ending with a stressed syllable.

romance narrative fiction, usually characterized by improbable adventures and love.

round character a many-sided character, one who does not always act predictably, as opposed to a “flat” or one-dimensional, unchanging character. (101)

run-on line a line of verse whose syntax and meaning require the reader to go on, without a pause, to the next line; an enjambed line. (725)

sarcasm crudely mocking or contemptuous language; heavy verbal irony. (705)

satire literature that entertainingly attacks folly or vice; amusingly abusive writing. (662–663)

scansion description of rhythm in poetry: metrical analysis. (725) scene (1) a unit of a play, in which the setting is unchanged and the time continuous; (2) the setting (locale, and time of the action); (3) in fiction, a dramatic passage, as opposed to a passage of description or of summary.

selective omniscience a point of view in which the author enters the mind of one character and for the most part sees the other characters only from the outside. (124)

sentimentality excessive emotion, especially excessive pity, treated as appropriate rather than as disproportionate.

sestet a six-line stanza, or the last six lines of an Italian sonnet. (732)
sestina a poem with six stanzas of six lines each and a concluding stanza of three lines. The last word of each line in the first stanza appears as the last word of a line in each of the next five stanzas but in a different order. In the final (three-line) stanza, each line ends with one of these six words, and each line includes in the middle of the line one of the other three words. (743–745) setting the time and place of a story, play, or poem (for instance, a Texas town in winter, about 1900). (96, 150, 152, 201, 225–229)

short story a fictional narrative, usually in prose, rarely longer than 30 pages and often much briefer.

simile a kind of figurative language explicitly making a comparison—for example, by using as, like, or a verb such as seems. (671)

soliloquy a speech in a play, in which a character alone on the stage speaks his or her thoughts aloud. (952)

sonnet a lyric poem of 14 lines; see English sonnet, Italian sonnet. (732–733)

speaker see persona. (638–643, 751–752)

spondee a metrical foot consisting of two stressed syllables. (724) stage direction a playwright’s indication to the actors or readers—for example, offering information about how an actor is to speak a line.

stanza a group of lines forming a unit that is repeated in a poem. (732) stereotype a simplified conception, especially an oversimplification—for example, a stock character such as the heartless landlord, the kindly old teacher, the prostitute with a heart of gold. Such a character usually has only one personality trait, and this is boldly exaggerated.

stock epithet standardized descriptions, common in folk ballads, such as “golden hair,” “milk-white steed.” (599)

stream of consciousness the presentation of a character’s unrestricted flow of thought, often with free associations, and often without punctuation. (125)

stress relative emphasis on one syllable as compared with another. (717–719, 723)

structuralism a critical theory holding that a literary work consists of conventional elements that, taken together by a reader familiar with the conventions, give the work its meaning. Thus just as a spectator must know the rules of a game (e.g., three strikes and you’re out) in order to enjoy the game, so a reader must know the rules of, say, a novel (coherent, realistic, adequately motivated characters, a plausible plot—for instance, The Color Purple) or of a satire (caricatures of contemptible figures in amusing situations that need not be at all plausible—for instance, Gulliver’s Travels). Structuralists normally have no interest in the origins of a work (i.e., in the historical background, or in the author’s biography), and no interest in the degree to which a work of art seems to correspond to reality. The interest normally is in the work as a self-sufficient construction. Consult Robert Scholes, Structuralism in Literature: An Introduction, and two books by Jonathan Culler, Structuralist Poetics (1976) and (for the critical shift from structuralism to post-structuralism) On Deconstruction (1982).

structure the organization of a work, the relationship between the chief parts, the large-scale pattern—for instance, a rising action or complication followed by a crisis and then a resolution.

style the manner of expression, evident not only in the choice of certain words (for instance, colloquial language) but also in the choice of certain kinds of sentence structure, characters, settings, and themes. (202)

subplot a sequence of events often paralleling or in some way resembling the main story.

summary a synopsis or condensation.

symbol a person, object, action, or situation that, charged with meaning, suggests another thing (for example, a dark forest may suggest confusion, or perhaps evil), though usually with less specificity and more ambiguity than an allegory. A symbol usually differs from a metaphor in that a symbol is expanded or repeated and works by accumulating associations. (149–152, 202, 683–684)

synecdoche a kind of figurative language in which the whole stands for a part (the late for a police officer), or a part stands for the whole (wheels for an automobile). (673) tale a short narrative, usually less realistic and more romantic than a short story; a yarn.

tercet see triplet.

tetrameter a verse line of four feet. (724)

theme what the work is about; an underlying idea of a work; a conception of human experience suggested by the concrete details. Thus the theme of Macbeth is often said to be that “vaulting ambition o’erleaps itself.” (101, 103, 202, 208–209)

thesis the point or argument that a writer announces and develops. A thesis differs from a topic by making an assertion. “The fall of Oedipus” is a topic, but “Oedipus falls because he is impetuous” is a thesis, as is “Oedipus is impetuous, but his impetuosity has nothing to do with his fall.” (30, 56–57, 71)

thesis sentence a sentence summarizing, as specifically as possible, the writer’s chief point (argument and perhaps purpose). (56)

third-person narrator the teller of a story who does not participate in the happenings. (124–125)

tone the prevailing attitude (for instance, ironic, genial, objective) as perceived by the reader. Notice that a reader may feel that the tone of the persona of the work is genial while the tone of the author of the same work is ironic. (638–643, 751–752)

topic a subject, such as “Hamlet’s relation to Horatio.” A topic becomes a thesis when a predicate is added to this subject, thus: “Hamlet’s relation to Horatio helps to define Hamlet.”

tragedy a serious play showing the protagonist moving from good fortune to bad and ending in death or a deathlike state. (1014–1017, 1350)

tragic flaw a supposed weakness (for example, arrogance) in the tragic protagonist. If the tragedy results from an intellectual error rather than from a moral weakness, it is better to speak of “a tragic error.” (1015) tragicomedy a mixture of tragedy and comedy, usually a play with serious happenings that expose the characters to the threat of death but that ends happily.

transition a connection between one passage and the next. (60, 71) trimeter a verse line with three feet. (724)

triplet a group of three lines of verse, usually rhyming. (732)

trochee a metrical foot consisting of a stressed syllable followed by an unstressed syllable. Example: garden. (724)

understatement a figure of speech in which the speaker says less than what he or she means; an ironic minimizing, as in “You’ve done fairly well for yourself” said to the winner of a multimillion-dollar lottery. (705)

unity harmony and coherence of parts, absence of irrelevance.

unreliable narrator a narrator whose report a reader cannot accept at face value, perhaps because the narrator is naive or is too deeply implicated in the action to report it objectively. (123–124)

verbal irony see irony.

verse (1) a line of poetry; (2) a stanza of a poem. (719)

verse paragraph a passage of blank verse that presents a unit of thought. (748)

vers libre free verse, unrhymed poetry. (748)

villanelle a poem with five stanzas of three lines rhyming aba, and a concluding stanza of four lines, rhyming abaa. The entire first line is repeated as the third line of the second and fourth stanzas; the entire third line is repeated as the third line of the third and fifth stanzas. These two lines form the final two lines of the last (four-line) stanza. (739–743)

voice see persona, style, and tone. (638–643, 662)
