The Gig Economy
Alex de Ruyter and Martyn Brown

The “gig economy” covers self-employed people who work for hire; those on temporary, short-term contracts; and those on zero-hours contracts. Proponents of flexible working arrangements point to the opportunities the gig economy offers to unlock the potential of those who cannot work full-time and note that technology is changing the nature of work. Opponents fear that it is driven by the corporate need to cut costs and reduce the administrative burden and legal responsibilities that accompany a permanent workforce.
